GEORGE P. HODNETT, a leading citizen of this county, where he is particularly prominent in business circles, is a member of an old pioneer family of Georgia, his grandfather, who died in 1863, and who had served in both the revolutionary and Indian wars, having settled in Troup county early in the century. His wife was Carlisle (Findley) Hodnett, and their son was George Hodnett, born in Troup county in 1826, and who died in the late war, in which he served in Company K of the Thirteenth Georgia regiment. He had married Mary Moore, a daughter of William and Catherine (Chambers) Moore, the former a soldier in the war of 1812. The younger George, the son of George and Mary (Moore) Hodnett, was born in Troup county in 1851, and here, on the farm, spent his first score of years, enjoying such restricted facilities for education as could then and there be obtained. In 1871 he removed to Coweta county, and began life for himself. For some time he worked for William Taylor at $12 per month, after which he began farming on his own account. That he was successful in this work is evident from the fact that he now owns a fine farm of some 600 acres; moreover, he did not let his excellent business talent go to waste, but set up in the mercantile business in Haralson, in which enterprise he has also been very successful, owning a large general store and carrying on a thriving business. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and a man held in high esteem by all who know him. In 1874 Mr. Hodnett married Miss Ophelia Rawls, a native of Coweta county, born in 1853. She is the daughter of Jesse and Martha (Bell) Rawls, the former a native of South Carolina, who came to Georgia in 1839, and was a soldier in the late war. Mr. and Mrs. Hodnett are both members of the Lutheran church. Their marriage has been blessed with seven children: Alonzo, Jessie, Clifford, Fay, Clarence, Albert and Robbie.

BENJAMIN HUTCHINSON, one of the pioneers of this section of Georgia, comes of revolutionary stock, both of his grandfathers having been soldiers in that long contest. His paternal grandfather came to Georgia at a very early date, and here, in 1787, in Jones county, his son John was born. This son married Ferriba Hollon, also a Georgian by birth, whose father, John Hollon, had fought in the revolution. Benjamin Hutchinson, the son of John and Ferriba Hutchinson, was born in Pike county, Ga., Dec. 12, 1832. In his home on the farm in the midst of the wilderness the boy had no opportunities of obtaining an education, never attended school a day in his life, nor had even the privilege of learning to read or write. On reaching manhood he began farming, which has always been his vocation. He had little money to start with, but by diligence and economy has been successful in accumulating a large property. Early in 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Fifty-fifth Georgia regiment. The company was commanded at that time by Capt. Dr. Baker, whose death occurring shortly afterward the place was filled by Capt. O'Rea. Col. Persons commanded the regiment, which was among the forces under Gen. Frazier. After Mr. Hutchinson had been out sixteen months he was captured at Cumberland Gap, Tenn., and for twenty-two months kept in prison at Chicago, Ill. After his release and return to Georgia Mr. Hutchinson had to make a new beginning, but patience and perseverance enabled him to succeed. He now owns 455 acres, one of the best improved farms in Coweta county, and is deservedly respected by all who know him. In 1859 he married Miss Camilla Ann Kelly, who was raised in Coweta county, her parents, John Wilbon and Mary (Fields) Kelly, being among the early settlers of the state. Mr. and Mrs. Hutchinson are worthy and devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They are the parents of eleven children, nine of whom are living: J. Wilbon, Mrs. R. L. Hardy, Leroy, Arthur, Mrs. H. J. Hodnett, Andrew, Otto, James and Ector.

FIELDEN F. HUNTER belongs to a family noteworthy as having five of its members to serve bravely in the war of the revolution. These were Joseph, James, George, William and Nathan Hunter, who had accompanied their father, William Hunter, when he emigrated from Ireland previous to the revolution. The younger William Hunter married Mary Abernathy, and their son John, born in South Carolina, married Abigail, daughter of John and Rebecca (Pitts) Johnson, Virginians who had long before settled in South Carolina. To John and Abigail Hunter Fielden F. was born in South Carolina in 1825. Eleven years later John Johnson and his son-in-law, John Hunter, brought their families to Georgia to found a home. They made their journey in wagons, bringing with them their cows and dogs, and settled first near Turin, in Coweta county, hitching their horses to the trees and making a bush hut while they could build their log cabins. Their settlement was made in the midst of the dense forest where, save for a small clearing of about ten acres, not a tree had ever been touched by the hand of a white man. On this new farm was young Fielden reared, and enjoyed only the very limited school privileges obtainable in this sparsely settled country. He married in 1844, Oct. 22, his wife being Miss Frances Bailey, born in Oglethorpe county in 1821. Her father, James Bailey, was born in Oglethorpe county in 1795. Mr. Bailey's wife, Miss Nancy Dicks, was a native of Danville, Va. Mr. and Mrs. Hunter are members of the Baptist church, to which they have belonged forty-two years, having united with it at the same time and also having been baptised on the same day. They have five children living: Robert F., J. B., W. S., Frederick and Mary. Mr. Hunter is a member of the masonic fraternity. Although Mr. Hunter started out in life with nothing, in fact, being somewhat in debt, he worked with such vigor that he rapidly accumulated a fine property, owning 100 acres of land and a number of negroes when the war laid waste his estate. He also lost his health, but with his natural determination of character he went to work at the shoemaker's trade, which he carried on for thirteen years. His honest integrity and self-respectful independence have placed him high in the estimation of all who know him.

JOSEPH HUTCHESON, farmer, Roscoe, Coweta Co., Ga., son of James and Sarah P. (Henry) Hutcheson, was born in Campbell county, Ga., in 1839. His father was born in Ireland in 1793, and came to America in 1818. He went to Orange county, N. Y., first, but was there only a short time when he decided to come to Georgia. After reaching here he taught school a while, and then engaged as clerk in Augusta. From Augusta he went to McDonough, Henry county, where he went into business for himself. He then went to Newnan, Coweta Co., where he conducted a general merchandise business a few years, when, finally, he permanently settled in Campbell county, and in connection with a store he conducted a farm. When he came from Ireland he was nearly two months on the voyage, was poor and without relatives on this side; yet he was industrious and a good manager, and accumulated quite a valuable estate. He was married in Newnan to a daughter of William and Sarah (Pickens) Henry, Coweta county pioneers. Mr. Hutcheson received a good common-school education, but before he could utilize it the war began and he enlisted in 1861 in Company C (Capt. Kendrick) Third Georgia battalion. Capt. Kendrick was killed at Pine Mountain when he was retiring before Sherman between Dalton and Atlanta. Col. M. A. Stovall was his first commander, and he was in all the battles in which his company was engaged—the principal of which were Hoover's Gap, Chickamauga and Murfreesboro—and was wounded in each of the two battles last named. His command was in the front of Sherman from Dalton to Atlanta. At the last-named place he was captured Aug. 7, 1864, and was held a prisoner ten months at Johnson's Island. Mr. Hutcheson entered the service as a private, was made orderly sergeant, and was promoted to a lieutenancy, which he held when captured. His brother, William Hutcheson, who was at first a lieutenant, rose to be a captain, and was killed in the battle of Jonesboro, Ga. Mr. Hutcheson came out of the war with very little property. But having good business qualities in connection with progressive ideas of farming, he has been exceptionally prosperous—having a farm of 1,000 acres not surpassed in beauty of arrangement in the state. He raises all he needs; has extensive fields of red clover, and fields of wheat and oats as well as corn and cotton, and has one of the most beautiful dwellings in his part of the country. Mr. Hutcheson was married in 1891 to Miss Mertis Harris—born and reared in Coweta county—daughter of C. J. Harris, whose family was among the first settlers, and now rank among the most prominent in the county. Two children have blessed this union, but only one, Louise, is living. Mr. Hutcheson ranks as a leading farmer in his county whether diversity of products, yield per acre, or progressive and improved methods be considered; and stands very high as a citizen. Mrs. Hutcheson is an exemplary and esteemed member of the Presbyterian church.

J. P. JONES belongs to one of Georgia's oldest families, his grandfather, John Jones, born in Wilkes county in 1809, being the son of a Virginian who settled in the wilderness in that county about 1800 and cleared up a farm. John Jones married Elizabeth Strozier and settled in Meriwether county where, in 1831, their son, Willis A., was born, who in after years was a central figure in the stirring events of the time. During the early years of the war he had charge of the commissary department of Andersonville prison, and afterward, until the war was over, he was in charge at the hospital at Marietta. He had represented his county, Lee, in the legislature of 1860 and 1861, and had also been justice of the inferior court of Lee county; but after the war, although again and again solicited, would not consent to be a candidate for any political position. He was a man of the most estimable character, of a high sense of honor, one whose justice and integrity won universal regard. He was a member of the Baptist church, and also a Mason of the royal arch degree. His wife was Lucy A. Callaway, whose parents, Parker and Susie (Peteah) Callaway, natives of South Carolina, were among the early settlers of Wilkes county, Ga. J. P. Jones, the son of Willis A. and Lucy A. Jones, was born in Wilkes county in 1851, where he passed his boyhood among rural scenes, and with a good education in the common schools, and had entered upon a course at Mercer college, when the school was broken up by the war, and the young man was for a while deprived of the extended education he sought. He, however, graduated in the first class at Macon after Mercer was moved from Penfield. He was representative for Coweta county in 1888 and 1889, and is a useful and honored citizen. He married in 1873, his wife being Miss Mary H. Wilcoxon, who was born and reared in the old Wilcoxon homestead near Newnan, her father being the well known John B. Wilcoxon of that place. Mr. and Mrs. Jones are both members of the Baptist church. Six children have blessed their marriage: Willis, Otis, Mary, Thomas, J. P., Jr., and Wilkes.

JOHN D. JOHNSON, a prosperous farmer of Coweta county, belongs to one of the brave pioneer families of this region, his grandparents, John and Elizabeth (Pitts) Johnson, natives of Virginia, having emigrated thence, first to South Carolina, and finally, in 1827, to Georgia. During his residence in Virginia and South Carolina Mr. Johnson devoted himself chiefly to the culture of tobacco, and it was his custom to pack his crops into a hogshead and roll it to the Charleston market, a distance of many miles. When the family removed to Georgia the son, John, was a lad of eleven years, having been born in South Carolina March 3, 1816. While helping to clear up the farm for the new home in the Georgia wilderness he was deprived of much education. He married Miss Selah Haines, a daughter of Daniel and Rachel (Weaver) Haines, the father a native of Maryland, the mother of North Carolina. About 1800 they settled in Greene county, Ga., where the daughter was born Oct. 1, 1807. Mr. Haines served during the war of 1812, and after his death his wife, having received a warrant for land in Coweta county, set out to make a home there. After a long and toilsome journey at one of their camping places, knowing herself to be near her destination, Mrs. Haines made inquiry, and found she was upon her own land. "Then," said she, "we will go no farther," and as soon as possible the cabin was erected on that spot. Afterward when proper surveys were made it was discovered that the cabin had been located just within the corner of her claim. Amid these surroundings the daughter grew to womanhood, and at length became the wife of John Johnson and the mother of John D. Johnson (Sept. 17, 1843). The husband enlisted in 1862 in the company of Capt. Powell, but at the end of a year's service he was taken ill and returned home, only to die. The son had enlisted in 1861 under Capt. J. D. Hunter in Company D, Nineteenth Georgia regiment. He served through the entire war, always at his post, never shirking duty or drawing back on account of danger, but received only one wound, and that a slight one on the collar bone. Yet he went through many of the fiercest and most closely contested conflicts of the war, Williamsburg, Yorktown, Seven Pines, the seven days before Richmond, and others. He was a non-commissioned officer, at first in Gen. Stonewall Jackson's command, but at Wellington, N. C., was transferred to the forces under Gen. Johnston, with which he remained until the close of the war, when he returned to Georgia. In 1870 he married Miss Margaret Carmichael, who was born in South Carolina in 1850, and was of Irish lineage, her great-grandparents, Patrick and Mary Ann Carmichael, having come to America from Ireland at an early day, when the voyage took nine weeks. Mrs. Johnson's parents were South Carolinians, William and Margaret R. (Hunter) Carmichael, her father being a son of Abraham and Nancy (Hall) Carmichael. Her maternal grandparents were George and Mary (Weatherton) Hunter, the former of Irish birth, who came to America with his parents, Nathan and Mary (Young) Hunter, both natives of Ireland, making the journey in company with the Carmichaels, and settling first in Newberry district, S. C. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Johnson has been blessed with nine children: Egbert D., Ada E., William P., Anna May, Francis H. L., Lena E., J. E. D., R. H. and Robert Lee. The parents are faithful and devoted members of the Baptist church. Like most of the courageous pioneers of the state, Mr. Johnson had but a limited education, and, as was the case with his comrades, he, too, had to begin life empty-handed after the war, but in spite of these disadvantages he has climbed the ladder of success. The first fifteen months after the war he only received ten dollars per month wages. After his marriage he settled on a farm; by hard work and by steady application to business he has reached his present prosperity. He now owns a large farm, well improved, a beautiful home, and is one of the leading men of the county.

W. A. LEACH, one of Coweta county's leading farmers, comes of brave and hardy pioneer stock. His grandfather, John Leach, brought his wife, Dorcas (Wyng) Leach, from their native state, South Carolina, to the Georgian forests very early in the century. They cleared up a farm and erected a house, and here, in Gwinnett county, in 1816, their son, E. W. Leach, was born. This man was a soldier in the Indian war, represented the county in the Georgia legislature in 1874-5, and married Miss Mary A. Jones, whose parents were among the early settlers of the state. Their son, W. A. Leach, was born in Fayette county in 1844, and spent his boyhood upon the farm, attending school in the old log school house, with slab seats and without windows, the cracks between the logs serving to admit light. The chimney was of rock, and the great fireplace occupied nearly the whole of one side of the house. In 1861 Mr. Leach enlisted in Company F of the Second Georgia regiment, Crew's old brigade. His company was in command of Capt. Hardy Chapman. Mr. Leach went through the entire war without being either captured or wounded, passing unscathed through the following battles: Perryville, Ky., both conflicts at Murfreesboro, Tenn., Chickamauga, Knoxville, and was with Gen. Johnston in his famous retreat. After the war Mr. Leach returned to Fayette county and pursued the occupation of agriculture. In 1866 he married Sarah E. Denham, daughter of Daniel D. and Nancy E. (Easton) Denham. Mr. Denham was a North Carolinian by birth, having come with his parents from his native state to settle in Fayette county when but a small boy. He was elected to represent his county in the Georgia legislature four different times before the war, and twice to the senate. His daughter, now Mrs. Leach, was born in Fayette county, and there the home of the family had always been until 1891, when they moved to Coweta county for the sake of the educational privileges afforded to the children. These are five in number, Luella, Daniel R., William E., Nancy A., and Paul. Mr. and Mrs. Leach are devoted members of the Baptist church. Mr. Leach is a member of the council of Senoia, and is deservedly held in high esteem wherever he is known.

CAPT. THOS. LEIGH is the son of Anselm B. and Eleanor (Drane) Leigh, and was born in Wilkes county, Ga., on May 15, 1832. His father was a son of Anselm Leigh, who came from Maryland to Georgia some time in 1700. Mrs. Leigh, a daughter of Col. Wm. and Cassandra (Magruder) Drane, was born in Columbia county, Ga. Mr. Leigh, the father of Thomas Leigh, was born in Georgia in 1794, and served in the war of 1812, slipping off with his brother Thomas, who was killed by the Indians and his head placed upon a pole, which the Indians placed in the ground as a warning to others. On Feb. 14, 1861, he married Mary Brewster, daughter of James and Jeannett (Ferguson) Brewster, both natives of South Carolina. To them six children were born, only three of whom are living: Walter, James, and Bessie. Mrs. Leigh was born and reared in Campbell county, Ga. March 11, 1862, Mr. Leigh enlisted in Company D, Forty-first Georgia regiment, under Capt. J. W. Powell, who upon resigning in June was succeeded by Mr. Leigh. He was with Gen. Joe Johnston at Bentonville and Kingston, in North Carolina, and on March 19 was shot through the right shoulder, fracturing the collar bone. He was engaged in some of the hardest conflicts of the war: Perryville, Atlanta, Baker's creek, siege of Vicksburg, Missionary ridge, Resaca, Jonesboro, Palmetto, and Nashville. He was with and in command of his company in all its engagements, and is known by all the old soldiers as being the captain who never said "Go, boys," but it was always "Come, boys." During the war he lost all he had except one horse and some land, with which he commenced again and is now quite well-to-do. He has been engaged several years in the saw-mill, shingle-making and cotton-gin business. Both Mr. and Mrs. Leigh are members of the M. E. church. His occupation now is farming.

CAPT. WILLIAM D. LINCH, one of the prominent men of Senoia, was born in Coweta county, Feb. 19, 1840. He is the grandson of Rev. Elijah Linch, a noted Universalist preacher, well-known through South Carolina, and who had four brothers in the revolutionary war, and was of the same family as that Thomas Lynch, Jr., who signed the Declaration of Independence. Rev. Linch was a native of South Carolina and his wife was a Miss Chapman. Their son David was born in Newberry on Feb. 14, 1805, and in December, 1832, married Miss Mary Beam, a native of Fairfield, S. C., and the date of whose birth was the same as his own. After their marriage they set out to establish a home for themselves in Coweta county, Ga., making the long journey thither by team, much of the way through the unbroken forest, with no path to guide them to their destined abode. They brought with them a negro girl and two negro boys, who helped them in the establishment of their home and the clearing up of their farm. The little log cabin still stands to mark the place where these brave pioneers made their first dwelling place. There were seven children born to them, four of whom are living: Elijah O. Linch, Mrs. M. E. Green, Mrs. Martha Perry of Carrollton and William D. They were both members of the Universalist church, and closed their devoted and useful lives—the father in 1862, the mother in 1891, having attained the great age of eighty-six years. Their son, William D. Linch, spent his early years upon the farm, with only such educational privileges as the old log school-house afforded. He had little more than attained his majority at the outbreak of the war, and in May, 1861, he enlisted in Company A of the Seventh Georgia regiment, under Capt. S. W. Lee, serving out the first enlistment of twelve months. He at once re-enlisted in the same company, in which he was elected second lieutenant, and after serving about a year was promoted to the command of the company, serving as captain for the remainder of the war. He took part in both battles of Manassas, the seven days' fight at Richmond, the battles of Malvern Hill, Cold Harbor, Knoxville, Wilderness, Fair Oaks, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, and many smaller engagements, and was present at the surrender at Appomattox. He was thrice wounded: in the arm at Loudon, east Tennessee; in the shoulder at the Wilderness, and at Fort Harrison was shot through the neck. For three years after his return to Coweta county at the close of the war he engaged in farming, and then spent four years in Newnan in the mercantile business, after which he came back to the farm, which he has carried on ever since. His father left him some money and land, but he has added greatly thereto, and at one time owned 3,500 acres. He moved into Senoia in 1891, and there carried on several branches of business, although his farm is not neglected. He is a man of wealth and influence in the county, where he is widely known and respected. In 1870 Capt. Linch married Miss M. E. Tench, daughter of John H. and Martha E. (Gray) Tench, who came to Georgia from Abbeville, S. C., in 1836, and cleared up a farm in the midst of the forest. Mrs. Linch was born in Coweta county. Five children were born to Capt. and Mrs. Linch, of whom four are still living: Tench, Martha G., Mary F. and J. Andrew. The family holds an enviable and well-deserved position in the regard of the community.

R. L. Y. LONG, M. D., one of the old and leading citizens of Newnan, Ga., and a son of John and Charlotte (May) Long, both natives of Tennessee, was born in east Tennessee Aug. 20, 1822. His father, son of Robert Long, a native of Virginia, was a soldier in the revolutionary war with Gen. Sevier and Gen. Shelby, and in the Creek Indian war. John Long was the second clerk of Carroll county superior court, and served thirty-two years. The mother of Dr. Long was the daughter of John May, who was a native of Virginia, but a pioneer settler of east Tennessee. Dr. Long was reared at Carrollton, Ga., where he received his education by the fireside after his day's work. On Jan. 13, 1839, he began the study of medicine with Dr. A. B. Calhoun, and read with him one year. In 1839 he, in company with three other students, started to Charleston, S. C., to attend college, graduated from the Transylvania university in 1841, and located the same year at Greenville, Ga., where he remained one year. Then he came to Newnan, where he remained until 1844, when he went into the country and formed a partnership with Dr. Ira E. Smith; after four years he went to Louisiana and practiced until 1848, when he returned to Newnan, where he has since remained and has had a large and lucrative practice. June 1, 1836, he enlisted in Capt. W. S. Parr's company in the Creek Indian war, and on Nov. 2, 1837, he went into the Seminole war in Florida as captain of the Carroll Rangers cavalry, and with one exception was the youngest of the company and was mustered out May 13, 1838, by Maj. Churchill of the United States army. In 1861 he enlisted in Company D, Phillips' legion cavalry, as first lieutenant, but was chosen captain a short time after. Capt. Long was engaged in many very hard conflicts, some of which were: Spottsylvania court house, Gettysburg, Williamsburg, battle of the Wilderness and many others. At Williamsburg he, with 250 men, captured 1,100 men under Col. Campbell, the captain riding the same horse 125 miles in twenty-five hours. He served throughout the entire war without receiving a wound or being captured. His company was noted for bravery and was called upon for all particular and dangerous work. After the war he returned to Newnan, began the practice of medicine, and Oct. 23, 1849, Dr. Long was united in marriage with Martha Ann Powell, a daughter of James and Sarah A. (Summerlin) Powell. To this union five children have been born: Edgar H., James J., Charles D., Helen A. and R. Y. Mrs. Long was born and reared in this county, but her parents both died while she was yet a child and she had no way of gathering their history. Dr. Long has always been a stanch democrat, but would never consent to have his name used for public office. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, having become a member at Newnan in 1845, and is one of the leading citizens of the county.

WILLIAM S. M'DONALD, a prosperous young farmer of this county, is of Scotch ancestry, his grandfather, Neil McDonald, having been born in Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1777. His father, Roderick McDonald, was concerned in the great religious dissensions which in those days disturbed Scotland. In 1803 Neil McDonald emigrated to Virginia, and after two years' residence there he moved to South Carolina, where he married Miss Sarah Curry. In 1827 he moved to Newton county, Ga., which he made his permanent home, clearing up for himself a farm in the midst of the woods. Here his son was born and reared with the few educational advantages incident to the period and that sparsely settled region. He enlisted under Capt. J. M. White in Company B, Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment, and after about eighteen months' service in this company was transferred to the Fifty-third regiment, in which he served to the end of the war. He was wounded five times, the little finger being shot from his left hand at Spottsylvania. He was in the great battles at Seven Pines, Mechanicsville, Cold Harbor, Malvern Hill and a number of less importance, and was at Appomattox at the general surrender. After the war Mr. McDonald returned to Georgia and in 1865 moved to Coweta county. His wife, whom he married in 1854, was Miss Melissa Curry, who was born in 1833 in Franklin county, Ga., where she was also reared. Mr. and Mrs. McDonald were the parents of seven children, of whom William S. is the eldest. He was born in Newton county, Dec. 8, 1854, and in 1881 married Miss Dora M. Arnold, daughter of James D. and Nancy (Owens) Arnold, and who was born in Coweta county in 1861. Mr. McDonald is a member of the M. E. church; his wife is a Baptist. Five children have been born to them: Alvin, Florence, Harley, Jesse and Watson. The second child of Young McDonald is Margaret Jane, wife of T. J. Young; they have five children: William A., Victoria, Joseph H., Ernest McD. and Paul. The third child is Thomas W., who in 1884 married Miss Sallie L., daughter of Leonard H. and Melissa (Bowers) Walthall; she is a Presbyterian and he a Methodist, and they have two children living: Roy A. and William C. The fourth child is Bartow. The fifth John Y., who married Roxy, the daughter of David C. and Amanda (Carpenter) Neeley; both are members of the M. E. church. The two remaining children are Sallie E. and Robert E. Lee. William S. McDonald, although deprived of early advantages and compelled to begin life empty-handed, has shown himself the possessor of those qualities which win; he is now the owner of an excellent farm and is widely respected. He is a member of the masonic order.

W. E. E. MARTIN, a prominent young farmer of Coweta county, belongs to one of those hardy pioneer families from whom are descended many of Georgia's most valued citizens. He is the grandson of Elijah and Amanda F. (Amos) Martin, Virginians by birth, but among the early settlers of Oglethorpe county, Ga., and who in 1830 moved to Coweta county, where they brought into being a home in the forest wilderness. Mr. Martin was a soldier in the Florida war, and his son, William M. Martin, born in 1837, enlisted in 1861 in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment. He served through the war until about two months before the surrender, when he was killed in a skirmish at Maynesboro, Ga. At the time of his enlistment his little son, W. E. E., the subject of this sketch, was but about two years old, having been born in 1859. The mother, Carrie (Smith) Martin, was a daughter of George E. and Martha N. (Pinkard) Smith, Virginians, her grandfather, George Smith, who served as captain in the war of 1812, having brought his family and settled in Georgia about 1830. After Mr. Martin's death in 1865, Mrs. Martin continued to reside upon the farm where she and her husband had settled just after their marriage, and here the lad, W. E. E., grew to manhood. Although circumstances deprived him of more than a limited education, he made the best of such opportunities as he had, and has done well. He owns a good farm, well-improved, and stands well in the community. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

W. M. A. MITCHELL, clerk of the superior court of Coweta county, Ga., and son of B. H. and Susan W. (Barnes) Mitchell, was born in November, 1839. His father, who was born in Virginia in 1800, went to North Carolina with his parents when eight years of age, and at the age of twenty-one started out for himself. He walked from North Carolina to Georgia, and in 1832 settled in Newnan, and, being a saddler by trade, opened a shop. In 1838 he was elected clerk of the superior court and served ten years; and in 1852 was elected ordinary, serving sixteen years, when he retired on account of old age. He was a devout member of the Methodist Episcopal church and a council degree Mason. He was the father of eleven children, only two of whom are living, William and a sister, Mary. William A. Mitchell was reared in Newnan and received a common school education. In April, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, Twelfth batallion, Georgia volunteers, in Gen. Evans' brigade, entering before the first gun was fired and remaining until after the surrender. In 1862 he was made sergeant. He was present at the battle of Cold Harbor, Laurel City, and retreated at Monocacy; was in the smaller conflicts in the Shenadoah valley in Virginia, and was present when Sheridan made his famous ride. He was with E. Kirby Smith in his raid in Kentucky, serving in the artillery and living on roasted ears of corn and pumpkins. After the war he returned to Newnan and engaged in the hardware business until 1891, when he was elected clerk of the superior court of Coweta county. In 1868 he was united in marriage to Neah W. Brown, daughter of Joseph Brown, who served one term as representative of Coweta county, sometime in the fifties. To this union three children were born, Brown, Bessie, and Lillie. Mrs. Mitchell was born in Heard county, Ga., but came to Coweta county when a child, and here died in 1875. She was a member of the Methodist church. In 1876 Mr. Mitchell married Mrs. Susan M. Coleman, daughter of Henry K. Allen, a native of South Carolina, who came to Georgia in an early day, and engaged in merchandising and cotton buying. He was a member of the M. E. church and also a member of the masonic order of the council degree. He was one of the leading citizens of the county, and his death was deeply mourned by the community. To the second marriage of Mr. Mitchell three children have been born, John, Mary E., and May Bell. Both Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell are members of the M. E. church south. He is a member of the masonic order, council degree, and is also a member of the I. O. O. F.

JOHN P. MORGAN, a thriving farmer and son of John and Mary (McCullough) Morgan, was born in Coweta county, where he now lives, in May, 1851. His father was born in South Carolina in 1812, and came when a young boy with his father to Coweta county, Ga., which at that time was a wilderness. Mr. Morgan's grandparents, Daniel and Mary (Lankford) Morgan, were both natives of South Carolina, but removed to Coweta county, Ga., in the early part of the nineteenth century, and cleared up a farm about ninety miles from Macon, to which place their cotton had to be carried for sale. The mother of Mr. Morgan was a daughter of Lewis and Ruth (Elmore) McCullough, both natives of South Carolina who had removed to Georgia, and cleared for themselves a farm. John P. Morgan was reared on the farm where he now lives and received a common school education. In 1871 he married Elizabeth Elmore, daughter of Thomas A. and Matilda (Brooks) Elmore. Mr. and Mrs. Elmore were both natives of South Carolina, who in an early day came to Georgia. Mr. Elmore was a soldier in the late war and served in Company D, Nineteenth regiment, under Capt. James Hunter, and was killed in the battle of Manassas July 10, 1863. Five children, four of whom are living, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Morgan: John T., Wilber E., Walter S., and Nellie F. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan are members of the M. E. church. Mr. Morgan is also a member of the masonic order, and was an alliance man during the lifetime of that order. He is a man that is well respected by all who know him.

HON. CHARLES L. MOSES, congressman from the fourth district of Georgia, is of noble ancestry, for his great-grandfathers on both sides took part in the revolutionary conflict. His grandfather, Neal Moses, the son of John Moses, the revolutionary hero, was born in North Carolina, took part in the war of 1812, and in 1820 moved to Fayette county, Ga. His wife was Nancy Manning, and in 1829 his son Ansley was born. The latter was reared on the farm in Fayette county and married Miss Mary Leavell, whose parents Charles and Elizabeth (Hunter) Leavell, were natives of South Carolina, and were married in Newberry district in 1831, removing to Georgia in 1833. Charles Leavell was born in 1802, his father being John Leavell, a Virginian, whose father, also John Leavell by name, emigrated from England before the revolution, and was with Francis Marion through all that struggle. Charles L. Moses was born in 1856 and reared on the old farm in Coweta county, Ga., and received a good common school education. In 1873 he entered Mercer university and graduated in 1876. He began teaching in Newnan, having charge, for seven years, of the boy's department; the last year in this department there were 150 boys. Among Mr. Moses' college classmates were Thomas Watson, John Boifeuillet, Seaborn Wright of Rome, W. D. Jelks, and T. E. Murphy, who took first honors. Mr. Moses himself carried off the second honors. He is a young man of great promise and recognized ability, his election to congress in 1890 from the fourth district being in evidence of this. Throughout his district he is held in high esteem, and justly regarded as a most worthy citizen. His wife, to whom he was married in 1881, was Miss Blanche Hall, daughter of Rev. J. H. Hall of Newnan. They have seven children living: Coral, James H., Charles L., Jr., Ansley, Hugh A., Blanche, Amaziah. Mr. and Mrs. Moses are honored members of the Baptist church. Mr. Moses is a member of the I. O. O. F.

LUTHER T. MOSES is one of the best known men of this section of the state, being chief deputy of internal revenue of Georgia. He is a grandson of a soldier of the war of 1812, Neal Moses, who with his wife, Nancy (Manning) Moses, came from their native state, North Carolina, to Georgia in 1821, and after a short residence here went to Alabama, where Mr. Moses died. Their son, Ansley Moses, was born in Fayette county, Ga., in 1829. He was a man of great ability and very useful to his state. In 1860 he helped organize Company D, Fifty-third Georgia regiment, Longstreet's corps. With this he went out as captain, being sent on an expedition to the coast. The next year he went out as first lieutenant but after a few months was made captain of Company D, which rank he held until 1863. Longstreet was then transferred to the western army, and in April Capt. Moses was taken prisoner at Knoxville, Tenn., and imprisoned for eight months at Camp Chase, Ohio; it was while here that he contracted the chronic lung disease which eventually caused his death; from Camp Chase he was transferred to Fort Delaware, where he remained until the close of the war. Mr. Moses represented his county in the legislature in 1873 and 1874. He was deacon in the Baptist church, in which he had been a conscientious member and earnest worker from the age of twenty-one. His death occurred in 1886, and was greatly deplored. The wife of Capt. Moses was Miss Mary E. Leavell, daughter of Charles and Elizabeth W. (Hunter) Leavell, both natives of Virginia, but who passed their youth in South Carolina, coming to Georgia about 1832 and making their home in Coweta county. It was in this county that Luther T. Moses was reared, having been born in 1853. He received a good common school education and devoted some ten years to teaching. His interest in schools has always been very deep, and he has manifested this interest constantly and by every possible means, doing everything in his power to advance the educational interests of his native county, often at considerable sacrifice to himself. He was a member of the school board from 1880 to 1887, and again from 1889 to 1893, each time resigning to take an important government position. This was the office of deputy internal revenue collector, to which he was appointed by President Cleveland in January, 1887, holding it until the inauguration of the new president, being appointed chief deputy in August, 1893, the position he still holds. Mr. Moses was married in 1884, his wife being Miss Etta North, born in 1860 and reared in Coweta county, the daughter of Thomas G. and Jane (Jones) North. They have four children: Tallmadge, Alice, L. T., and Mary. Both Mr. and Mrs. Moses are steadfast members of the Baptist church, and everywhere beloved and respected. Mr. Moses is a man of wide and growing influence and is sure to make his mark in his country and age.

I. N. ORR, a prominent business man of Newnan, Coweta Co., Ga., who was born in November, 1840, is the son of Robert and Almira (Simms) Orr. His father, who was born in 1813, was a native of Wilkes county, Ga., and came to Coweta county in 1829 with his parents, who, on their arrival, cut a road ten miles long from Newnan to the place in the woods where they cleared up for a plantation. The mother of I. N. Orr was a daughter of John Simms, who was born in Hancock county, Ga., and whose family was one of the pioneer families of that county. I. N. Orr was reared in Coweta county, where he received a good common school education. In April, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, First Georgia regiment, under Capt. Hunley, and, strange to say, he had one finger only on his right hand; he served two years, when he was made enrolling officer for Coweta county. He had four brothers in the war, only one of whom was killed. After the war he returned to Newnan, and in 1875 went into business in a small way, but, by close application and honest dealing, he has built up a large and lucrative business. He served as a member of the school board for five years, but on being elected to the city council in 1878, was obliged to give up his position on the school board. He was then elected mayor of Newnan and was re-elected in 1893, the duties of which office he still fulfills. In 1868 he married Miss Dora Johnson, a daughter of Berry D. and Cynthia (Gibson) Johnson, whose father was a pioneer of Heard county, and who represented Heard county in the legislature two terms. He was a member of the first convention after the war. To Mr. and Mrs. Orr were born eight children, all boys, seven of whom are living: S. G., I. N., Benjamin, Robert, Cleveland, Frank and Paul. Mrs. Orr was born and reared in Heard county, Ga., and both she and her husband are members of the Baptist church, and Mr. Orr is an Odd Fellow. Mr. Orr and family are among the leading families of Newnan and are held in high esteem.

ROBERT PERKINS, one of Coweta county's best citizens and the son of John C. and Ann (Parks) Perkins, was born in this county in 1841. His father was born in Virginia in 1807 and while yet quite a small boy came to Georgia, his father having died. He first settled in Coweta county in 1835, coming thence from Oglethorpe county, Ga. His mother was a daughter of Bird and Martha (Smith) Parks, who were among the first settlers of this county. Robert Perkins was reared in Coweta county and attended school in one of the first old log school-houses ever built there. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment, under Capt. S. W. Lee and served two years, then being transferred to Phil Logan cavalry. He was in every battle in which his company was engaged, and was wounded but once, and that was at Sharpsburg, Md. After the war he came to his old home and since that time has been engaged in farming. In 1866 he was married to Miss Martha Elder, daughter of William and Elizabeth (Smith) Elder, to which union three children were born: Anna L., Fannie L. and Eula Bird. Mrs. Perkins was born and reared in Coweta county and is a member of the M. E. church. Mr. Perkins is a member of the masonic order and is respected by every one who knows him. He is an uncompromising democrat, but would never allow his name to be used for office. He now owns 1,800 acres where he lives, besides large landed interests in other localities.

A. C. RUSSELL is the grandson of Andrew Russell, who entered the revolutionary army at the age of eighteen, and whose father had come from Scotland some years before. Jane Caldwell, a sister, who came over at the same time, paid the sum of nine guineas for her passage. Andrew Russell married Miss Mary Caldwell and settled in South Carolina, where his son Robert was born. Here the latter grew to manhood and was for some time captain in the state militia. He married Miss Mary Brown, whose parents, Robert and Nancy Brown, were natives of Scotland, both members of the Presbyterian church, who had come to this country previous to the revolution, in which war the father took part. Mr. Russell's father was a member and an elder of the Presbyterian church. In 1825, in Newberry district, S. C., Robert Russell's son, A. C., was born, and in 1832 the father took his family and such of his property as he could transport and set out for Georgia, making the long journey in mule wagons. With the train were a dog and a colt which belonged to the little lad, A. C., and in crossing the Savannah river both fell into the stream. To the great joy of their young owner, after considerable effort, they were both rescued, but it is not surprising that the circumstance made a deep impression upon his childish mind. The settlement was made in Coweta county in the woods, where, while their cabins were building, they stretched a tent for shelter. Here the wolves were so numerous that they frightened the stock and even the dogs were driven under the tent for safety. During the first year, while clearing up his farm, Mr. Russell was obliged to go thirty miles for corn to feed his stock. Amid the varied scenes of this pioneer life, with only such opportunities of learning as were commonly found in the little log school-houses of that period, young Russell grew to manhood. In 1862 he enlisted with Capt. Gabbett, under Col. Stovall, but his company was chiefly engaged in the manufacture of saltpetre, and Mr. Russell, desiring to be engaged in more active service, proposed exchanging into a cavalry company; his captain, however, calling him a fool for wishing to go into the danger at the front, persuaded him to remain with his company, which he did until the close of the war. At one time when a raid of the Federal soldiers was expected, there being considerable of a panic among the troops, Mr. Russell was brevetted captain, but the Federals did not make their appearance. After the war he returned to his home in Coweta county, where his thoughtful wife had been busy during his absence and with the little she had been able to save from her own earnings, had made a new beginning; year by year he added to his wealth and has become one of the most influential and well-to-do citizens of the county. He at one time owned 500 acres of well-improved land, but in 1892 he retired from the farm and moved to Turin. In 1856 he married Miss Rebecca C. Parks, daughter of Joseph Parks, whose parents were natives of South Carolina, where she also was born in 1828, but they removed thence to Meriwether county, Ga., in 1832. They were members of the Presbyterian church, as also their daughter, Mrs. Russell, and her husband. Mrs. Russell died in April, 1891, leaving four children: Ella C., wife of Loson Carmichael; Mary, wife of Payson Watley; Sarah A. and Walter C. Mr. Russell was for some time a member of the Sons of Temperance. In spite of early disadvantages he has carved out for himself a name and a place in the world. He and his family deservedly stand high in the community.

W. W. SASSER, one of the leading men of Coweta county, is of the hardy pioneer stock, to which many of the state's most valuable citizens belong. His grandfather, John Sasser, a native of England, came to America prior to the revolution and took part in that heroic struggle for liberty. His son William was a soldier in the war of 1812. During this war, on one occasion he and a comrade quarreled and to punish them their officers compelled them to undress, smear themselves all over with grease and fight it out. They then made friends and the episode was a lesson to them both. William Sasser married Elizabeth Beverly, like himself a native of Laurens district, S. C., and in 1818, with her and their two children, set out for Georgia. Their vehicle was a dump-cart, and in this comfortless conveyance they made their toilsome way over rough roads and by-paths, and often through an almost trackless wilderness to their destination. For a short time they rented a small cabin while Mr. Sasser was building one for himself. He completed this and began to clear up his land that fall. With his brother-in-law, who had come with him, he engaged in sawing lumber, using the old-fashioned whip-saw for a year. After that he was employed as an overseer. In 1825 he removed to Monroe county and with his savings bought a piece of land. On reaching his newly-purchased property he immediately began to saw the boards with which to make a shelter for his wife and five children, the land being covered with the heavy forest which at that time constituted the wealth of central Georgia. After six years on this site, during which time (Feb. 7, 1829) his son, W. W. Sasser, was born, Mr. Sasser moved to Meriwether county, Ga., where he again settled in the woods and in this place he dwelt until his death. He and his wife were consistent members of the Baptist church. In this home, amid such surroundings, W. W. Sasser was reared, attending school in the old log school-house which alone could be found in country districts at that time. The seats were of split slabs, the chimney of sticks and dirt, the fireplace six or seven feet wide, the roof tied on. William Sasser at his death turned all his property over into the hands of his son, W. W. Sasser, with the request that he rear and keep the family, and properly school them and otherwise care for them, and this he has faithfully done. During three years of the war he was running a mail route and did not do much fighting; during the last of the war he was one of Joe Brown's favorites. Mr. Sasser is a royal arch Mason. For seven years he was county commissioner for Coweta county, and then on account of ill health was compelled to resign. He is greatly liked and thoroughly respected by all who know him. On May 14, 1857, he married Keziah Boyd, daughter of Milton and Jane (Douglass) Boyd, both natives of South Carolina, who settled in Meriwether county, near Greeneville, about the year 1836. Mr. Boyd was a soldier in the war of 1812. The daughter, now Mrs. Sasser, was born in South Carolina and was but two years old at the time of the removal of her parents to Georgia. Mr. and Mrs. Sasser have been blessed with a family of eight children, of whom seven are now living: Charles F., Milton, J. A., Hugh, B. Edward, Lula and Eunice. John was the name of the son who died. Mr. and Mrs. Sasser are faithful and devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal church and so, likewise, are all their children.

HENRY T. SHORES, a prosperous farmer and native of Coweta county, was born in 1842, his parents, Daniel and Elizabeth (Kilgore) Shores, being also natives of the state of which his grandparents on both sides were among the pioneer settlers. His paternal grandparents, Planner and Nancy (Dorman) Shores, were natives of Maryland and settlers of Putnam county, Ga., while his mother's parents, John and Priscilla (Wood) Kilgore, were born in Pennsylvania. Daniel Shores settled in Coweta county after the death of his father, and here his son Henry was reared with but limited educational advantages, having attended school only four weeks in all. In July, 1861, he enlisted in Company D, Eighth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Howard, upon whose death Capt. Malone was put in command. Mr. Shores took an active part in many of the fiercest engagements of the war. He was in the second battle of Manassas; in that seven days of almost continuous conflict that culminated in the furious struggle of Malvern Hill, scenes the like of which "had never before been enacted on the American continent;" he fought along the Rappahannock, and at Spottsylvania court-house; he was all through the Wilderness campaign, and in the fiercest and most bloody battles, or series of battles, of the war, the fierce strife at Gettysburg, when more than 50,000 brave men were numbered among the killed, wounded or missing. Mr. Shores was wounded by a shell in the abdomen, from the results of which injury he has been a sufferer all his life, and obliged to wear a truss. He was at Charleston for about four months, but as soon as sufficiently recovered returned to his regiment, then at Chattanooga, with which he remained until the close of the war. He was present at the surrender of Appomattox, and then set out for home, walking more than half the way. On reaching home he began work, receiving $8 per month for the first five months; his second employer was Dr. Reese. In 1867 he had saved enough to purchase a mule, by the aid of which he began farming for himself. Thus he continued by industry and close economy to gather wealth, and is now the owner of a fine farm of 800 acres in a good state of cultivation, and is one of Coweta county's most valued and beloved citizens. His wife, whom he married in February, 1868, was Miss Della Latimore, born in Oglethorpe county in 1846, and the daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth (Jordan) Latimore. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. and Mrs. Shores have two daughters, Leila and Lillie T. The former is the wife of Jack Croley, and they have two children, Forest G., and an infant.

CAPT. JOHN D. SIMMS, one of the pioneers of Coweta county, was born in December, 1830. His parents, John and Comfort M. (Grace) Simms, were natives of North Carolina. His father was born in 1780, coming in 1788 to Hancock county with his parents, Robert and Sarah (Dickinson) Simms, both natives of North Carolina. The mother of John D. Simms was a daughter of Joshua Grace. The family came to Coweta county in 1828, settling in the midst of the forest and clearing up a farm, suffering meanwhile the many trials and hardships common to the lot of pioneers. His education was obtained under many disadvantages in the old log schoolhouse. On reaching manhood he showed himself worthy of the esteem in which he has constantly been held. He had been elected justice of the peace and his commission had just been received at the outbreak of the war, and at the same time he received a commission from Gov. Brown as captain of the militia, which would have kept him out of the service. But this did not suit his ardent temperament, and in 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Sixteenth Georgia battalion of cavalry. He himself organized this company and went out as its captain, serving in this position throughout the war. His first service was thirty days under Gen. John A. Morgan in Kentucky, and after this under Gen. Early, through Virginia to Washington City, in which service he performed a great deal of detached duty. After the war Capt. Simms returned to Coweta county and engaged in farming, which he has carried on ever since. In 1877 he was elected to the legislature, it being the first legislature convened after the constitutional convention, and served three years. Hé has served also as county commissioner four years. His wife, a native of Heard county, Ga., was Miss Louisa Hanson, daughter of Thomas K. and Gracie (Mosely) Hanson. Her father was the son of Thomas and Sarah (Boswell) Hanson, and was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1799. The marriage of Captain and Mrs. Simms was solemnized in 1848, and the union has been blessed with three children: Ellen A., wife of Asbury H. Arnold; Fannie L., wife of H. M. Arnold, and John H. Capt. Simms and wife are honored members of the Baptist church, and the family is among the best and most respected in the county of Coweta, where they have the regard of all who know them.

REV. DR. JAMES STACY, LL. D., one of the prominent Presbyterian ministers of the state of Georgia, was born June 2, 1830. His father, John W. Stacy, was a son of John Stacy, who was a native of Wales, and joined the Puritan colony which came to Georgia from South Carolina, and was united in marriage to a Puritan girl. Rev. Dr. James Stacy was reared in Liberty county and received his first religious instructions at the old Midway church, which is supposed to be one of the oldest churches in Georgia. In this church John Stacy, Rev. Stacy's grandfather, was a deacon in 1809, and Ezra Stacy, an uncle, was deacon in 1838. This church has a great history. The first church was organized in 1754, but the building was destroyed by fire in 1778 by a body of men under Col. Prevost. At the close of the revolution it was rebuilt on the same site, and in 1785 was enlarged and so stood until 1792, when the present church was erected. Rev. Stacy had the preliminary advantage of a good common-school education, and at the age of seventeen entered Oglethorpe university, near Milledgeville, where he was graduated two years later. He then entered the Theological seminary at Columbia, S. C., and graduated in three years, having had conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. He immediately entered upon his work, devoting his entire time and energy to it, until now he is one of the leading ministers of the state, and, strange to say, he is the only one of the Stacy name to enter the ministry, although the whole family were devoted Christians. He has been stated clerk of the presbytery since 1866, and stated clerk of the synod of Georgia since 1876, succeeding the venerable John W. Wilson, D. D. In 1877 a $200 prize, which was offered by William A. Moore, of Atlanta, for the best essay on the holy Sabbath, was gained by Rev. Stacy, although there were over 200 contestants. He has been married twice. His first wife lived only a few years, and in 1867 he married Mrs. Kendrick, widow of Maj. Kendrick. She is a daughter of Thomas M. Jones of Newnan. Rev. Stacy is reputed to be the best educated man in this part of Georgia, and is held in the highest regard by all who know him. He has now been in charge of the Newnan church for thirty-seven years.

JOHN D. STAFFORD, a prosperous farmer of Coweta county, is also of the pioneer stock of the state. His grandparents, Anderson and Henrietta (Weatherly) Stafford, were natives of Virginia, who after some years' residence in South Carolina, settled in Pike county, Ga., in 1826, and cleared up a farm in the midst of the forest wilderness, which was their home for the remainder of their lives. Mr. Stafford had been a soldier in the war of 1812. He and his wife were among the early Methodists of this section. It is difficult to realize the many privations endured by these early settlers, or the numerous economies they were forced to practice. Shoes in those days were so costly and difficult to procure that it was customary to go barefooted the greater part of the time, and even on the Sabbath the shoes were carried in the hands until the church was nearly reached, when they were put on and worn through service, and until at a little distance from the church, when they were taken off and carried home again. Ellis Stafford, the son of Anderson, was born in North Carolina in 1809, and accompanied his parents through the vicissitudes of their pioneer life, and at length married Miss Anna Lovejoy, who was the daughter of Eleazar and Mary (Pennington) Lovejoy, natives of Virginia. Mr. Lovejoy was the son of Edward and Jemima (Mobley) Lovejoy, the former a native of Maryland. Eleazar was born in 1779, and about 1794 accompanied his parents to Georgia, where, after a few years' residence among the woods of Jackson county, they moved to Jasper county. In 1803 he married in what is now Jackson county, and served his country in the war of 1812. He and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal church. John D. Stafford, the son of Ellis, was born in 1842, and, having received a good common school education, in 1861 entered the state troops under Capt. Milton Tucker. After six months in this service he enlisted under Capt. Tucker, in Company K, Fifty-fifth Georgia regiment. He was not engaged in any of the regular battles of the war, but was in many skirmishes; he served to the end of the war, for fifteen months as guard at Andersonville. The war being ended, he returned to Coweta county, and in November, 1865, married Miss Lizzie Head. This lady was born in Morgan county, Ga., and is the daughter of James and Nancy (Jackson) Head, both natives of Georgia. Mr. Head was born in 1796, and spent his boyhood on the farm, and fought in the war of 1812. His parents, James and Elizabeth J. (Powell) Head, Virginians, had settled in Elbert county, Ga., about 1793, the former having fought in the revolutionary war. Mr. and Mrs. Stafford are both faithful and consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal church. Their union has been blessed with eight children: Emma, Edwin O., Paul, Lamar, Fannie May, Louise, Anna L. and Claude. Mr. Stafford began life for himself empty-handed, but has made a success of his work, his farm being very valuable. He devotes some thirty acres to the culture of grapes, which he has made profitable. He is one of the best farmers and leading men of Coweta county.

WILLIAM T. STALLINGS, a prominent citizen of Coweta county, is the grandson of Pelasiah and Mary (Edwards) Stallings, natives of Virginia, who settled in the Georgia wilderness at an early day, and reduced a part of it to cultivation. They had brought with them a little son, Malachi, born in 1805, who afterward married Miss Martha Crawley, and became the father of William T. The latter was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1833, and grew up on the farm, making the best of such educational opportunities as were afforded him, albeit for some years only those to be found in a log school house, with dirt floor, mud and stick chimney and puncheon seats. After coming of age by hard work and close economy he saved enough money to pay his way at school four years. One year he attended school at Madison, Ga., one year in Fayetteville, Ga., and then at Bowdon college, Carroll county. After this he taught three years and a half, until the outbreak of the war, when, in 1861, he enlisted in Company D, Nineteenth Georgia regiment, under Capt. J. D. Hunter. He went as orderly-sergeant, but was soon promoted to a lieutenancy, and before long was made first lieutenant, from which time he really commanded the regiment most of the time, as the captain was sick at home. Lieut. Stallings was engaged in several very hard-fought battles, among them Occoquan, fourteen miles from the city of Washington, the second battle of Manassas, and all the principal battles of the Virginia campaign. He was once wounded, being shot through the thigh on the Dec. 13, 1862, by which wound he was laid up some time. At the close of the war

Mr. Stallings came to Coweta county, and having but fifty cents with which to start life, began the labor of accumulation which has made him at the present time one of the largest land-holders and wealthiest citizens of his section. His first occupation was teaching, which he pursued for two years in Coweta county and one year in Fayetteville. After this he turned to farming, to which calling he has ever since devoted himself, and by prudence and industry has become the proprietor of a fine farm of 2,200 acres of good land, well improved, and with a pleasant home, a frame dwelling of two stories. Mr. Stallings was elected to the legislature in 1882, serving two years. In 1866 he married Miss Nancy S. Freeman, whose parents, Henry and Nancy (Moody) Freeman, were among the early settlers of Coweta county, where the daughter was born and reared. Mrs. Stallings is a member of the Baptist church. Eleven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Stallings, one of whom is dead: W. L. is a graduate of the university of Georgia, Athens, and is now a practicing attorney in Newnan. The next son is T. O. The daughters, Lillian and Mattie, the latter of whom is dead, were graduates of Wesleyan Female college at Macon. Another daughter, Inez, is now attending college at La Grange. The remaining children are Earnest L., Wade H., Pink, Charles R., Elgin and a babe unnamed. Mr. Stallings is one of the leading citizens of Coweta county, where he and his family are deservedly widely known and esteemed.

DR. J. P. TAYLOR, a prominent physician of Coweta county, is a South Carolinian by birth, born in Lexington county, July 26, 1826. His father, William Taylor, also a South Carolinian, was a son of William and Catherine (Price) Taylor, the former a soldier of the revolution who served under Col. Washington and was badly wounded in the battle of Eutaw Springs; he was a Virginian who moved to South Carolina and afterward went to Tennessee. Dr. Taylor's mother, Rebecca (Corley) Taylor, was the daughter of Lawrence and Barbara (Derrick) Corley, natives of South Carolina, in which state she too was born. In 1839, William Taylor with his wife and family moved to Georgia and settled upon a farm. His son, now Dr. Taylor, passed here his later boyhood, receiving a part of his education in the old log cabin school house of the district, but afterward attended more advanced schools; having received a good general education, he applied himself to the study of medicine under Dr. Enlow, of Meriwether county; later he pursued his study of medicine in the Southern medical college, of Augusta, Ga., from which he received his degree in 1850. He at once located for the practice of his profession at Haralson, and has devoted himself to it with that assiduity that always brings success. His practice is very extensive and lucrative, as his fine education, long experience and his faithfulness and skill would naturally bring to pass; and he holds a high position in the regard of all who know him. He is a well-known member of the masonic fraternity. He married in 1853, his wife being Miss Rebecca Hodnett, born in Newton county in 1831, and reared at White Sulphur Springs. Her parents, John and Elizabeth (Tignor) Hednett, were among the pioneers of Newton county, and Mr. Hodnett was a soldier in the war of 1812. The union of Dr. Taylor and his wife was blessed with four children, the eldest, R. H., is following his father's honored example, and practicing the profession of medicine. The other members of this well-known and esteemed family are William H., Mary R., and Sarah P. Mrs. Taylor died in March 17, 1890.

WILLIAM TAYLOR, one of Georgia's pioneers, was of German ancestry, his two grandfathers, William Taylor and Jacob Price, being both natives of that country; the latter came to America in his boyhood, and settled in South Carolina, where he died in 1804; he was in many ways a remarkable man—especially given to reading, and delighted in the study of the Scripture; his death was extremely sudden, and his last earthly action was the perusal of the sacred page—while reading which he suddenly fell forward upon the fire, and was so badly burned that death ensued. His grandson, William Taylor, had in his possession the Bible which the aged man had been reading at the moment of his sudden demise. Mr. Taylor's parents were William and Catherine (Price) Taylor; the father, who served in the war of the revolution in which he was severely wounded in the thigh, was born in Virginia but settled in South Carolina, afterward removing to Tennessee. The youngest son, William, was born in South Carolina in 1801, and here spent the years of his youth and early manhood, with such privileges of education as the country schools of his day could afford. He was thirty-eight years of age when he removed to Georgia, where he remained during life, and lived to be one of the oldest and most respected citizens of Coweta county. He was a member of the masonic fraternity. In 1819, Mr. Taylor married Rebecca Corley, a daughter of Lawrence and Barbara (Derrick) Corley, of South Carolina, where Mrs. Taylor was born in 1800. Ten children were the offspring of this union: Eliza (deceased); Louisa, Mrs. Sibley; Mary, Mrs. Hardison; Dr. J. P.; Julia, Mrs. Peary (deceased); Jane, Mrs. Hodnett (deceased); Dr. J. W.; Col. R. P., killed in the late war; Rebecca, Mrs. Franck; and W. L. Mrs. Taylor also died in 1863, and in 1864 Mr. Taylor married Miss Mary Hodnett, who was born in Troupe county, Ga., in 1832, and was a daughter of William and Caroline (Findley) Hodnett, Virginians, who came to Georgia in the early days; Mr. Hodnett was a soldier in the war of 1812. This union was blessed with seven children: Thomas, George (deceased), Carrie, Benjamin, Henry, John and Louis. Mr. and Mrs. Taylor are members of the Lutheran church, and the family is one widely known and esteemed. Wm. Taylor died March 31, 1895, wanting one week of being ninety-four years of age.

Y. H. THOMPSON, a leading citizen and prominent merchant of Newnan, Coweta county, is a native of Georgia, and was born September 13, 1833. He is the son of Thomas and Rebecca (Smith) Thompson, who were also natives of the state, and is grandson of Charles Thompson, a South Carolinian, who, during the revolutionary war was with Gen. Francis Marion, the intrepid hero known as the "Swamp Fox." At an early period, with the courage born of that heroic age, Charles Thompson came to the wilds of Georgia, and settled in the woods among the Indians and cleared up a farm. Here, in 1809, his son Thomas was born, who also endured all the hardships and privations attendant upon a pioneer life, from which he was removed by death at the early age of twenty-seven, at which time his son, Y. H. Thompson, was but three years old. When the boy was but thirteen his mother also died, and he was left to carve out for himself a name and a fortune. He had attended school but very little, and now entered the shop of a cabinet-maker to learn the trade, working there about six years, attending school about six months of that time; but the fact is that by assiduous effort he learned more out of school than ever in school. In 1854 he came to Newnan and worked at his trade until the opening of the war, when he enlisted, in 1861, in Company A, First regiment, Georgia volunteers, his company being mustered into service March 18, 1861. This was the only regiment ever mustered out of the service of the southern Confederacy, being mustered out but a few days before the Conscript Act took effect. It, however, at once formed the Twelfth battalion, Georgia artillery, and in this arm of the service Mr. Thompson served with signal bravery until the surrender at Appomattox, being engaged in many hard-fought battles. In the battle of Monocacy, when Gen. Evans was shot, Y. H. Thompson, with his brother James and two others carried the wounded general across the Monocacy river. On entering the army, Mr. Thompson was chosen band-leader, but although he performed this duty with enthusiasm all through the war he was always ready to fight when the time came. Mr. Thompson returned to Newnan at the close of the war, and began to work at his trade, but the country here as elsewhere was in such an unsettled condition that he and his brother James went twelve miles away to help build a mill, and were obliged to take their wages in something to eat. They received plenty of meat and cornmeal and so were more fortunate than many in those hard times. In 1866, the brothers engaged in a small way in the furniture business until now they have an extensive and profitable trade in furniture and undertakers' goods, of which they carry a large stock. They are regarded as among the best citizens, and are universally esteemed. Mr. Y. H. Thompson is a Mason of the council degree, now high priest, an Odd Fellow, having passed through the chairs, and also a member of the Red Men. He has served as an alderman of Newnan, where he is highly respected as a man of earnest purpose and strict integrity. He and his wife are faithful and beloved members of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mrs. Thompson was Miss Martha Edwards, daughter of Lemuel and Susan (Cole) Edwards, and is a native and life-long resident of Coweta county. They were married in 1859, and have one child, Thomas M. Thompson. James Thompson is a brother of Y. H. Thompson and his partner in the furniture business. He was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1831, and owing to early orphanage was denied the privilege of more than a very limited education. His history to a great extent is identical with that of his brother. His apprenticeship in Decatur, Ga., began in 1845, a year before that of his brother, and lasted seven years. He also enlisted in Company A of the First Georgia regiment, and served with his brother throughout the war. Since then their business interests have been united. Mr. Thompson is a royal arch Mason. For two years he served on the city board of aldermen, and for four years on the board of education, and is highly regarded as one of the most influential citizens of the county. His marriage occurred in 1852, his wife, Miss Lucinda Shumate, being the daughter of Barryman and Thirza (Farrer) Shumate. They have six children: Barryman, Emma, Young, Effie, Jimmie L., and Birdie. Mr. Thompson and his family are all devoted and worthy members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

CHESTER THOMPSON, JR., an honest and industrious young farmer of Coweta county, was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1851. His father, Chester Thompson, was the son of a revolutionary soldier, and was born in Jasper county, Ga., and himself volunteered in the late war, but was rejected. This man married Miss Mary Ann Hudgens, daughter of William and Martha Hudgens, Virginians by birth, the father being a soldier of the revolution. The young Chester Thompson was reared in Heard county, and had no school privileges, his parents needing his care and support, and his life has been full of arduous toil. In 1880 he married Melissa Story, who was born and reared in Pike county, and whose parents, James and Martha Story, are also Georgians by birth. Mrs. Thompson is a faithful member of the Baptist church. To her and her husband three children have been given, of whom but two are living: Mattie Pearl and Jessie.

JAMES B. WALKER is the grandson of Solomon Walker, a North Carolinian, and the son of Samuel Walker, who was born in South Carolina, as was also his wife, Mary Carmichael, whom he married in that state. In 1832 he, Samuel Walker, came on horseback to Coweta county to select a site for a home, and in 1835 he brought his family and settled in district No. 2. Here he opened up a farm and devoted himself to its cultivation. He had in the beginning but little substance save pluck and indomitable courage and persistence, but these were quite sufficient to conquer the difficulties of his lot and to render him a man of standing and considerable property. He was a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and attained the age of seventy-five years. His wife was the daughter of Arthur and Fannie (Bell) Carmichael, both natives of South Carolina, and the granddaughter of William Carmichael, who came to this country from Ireland and served during the revolutionary war, in which he was wounded. James B. Walker was born in Coweta county in 1845 and reared upon the woodland farm, with the limited educational facilities of that time and place. In 1861 he enlisted under Capt. Sanders Lee, in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment. He had enlisted for a year, but when the time expired and his discharge was received he immediately re-enlisted, this time in Company K, of the First Georgia cavalry. He was in the battles of Yorktown, the seven days' fight at Richmond, Va., and he was wounded at the battle of Sunshine church, Ga., at the time his brigade captured Gen. Stoneman. This necessitated a stay of three months in the hospital. After having recovered he returned to his company and remained to the end of the war, holding the office of first sergeant, and at times commanding the company, which was among the forces under Gen. Johnston. Upon his return home he found his father so affected in mind by the loss of all his slaves as the result of the war, and the great depreciation of his property, that the young man was compelled to take charge of his estate. In his management of this, as of all affairs which came into his hands, his diligence in the discharge of duty, his faithfulness to every trust were constantly manifested. He has won for himself valuable property and an assured position in society. In 1866 he married Miss Almata P. Shell, who was born and reared in Coweta county, and whose parents, William B. and Nancy (Nance) Shell, were natives of South Carolina, and about 1836 came to settle in Coweta county. Mr. Shell was a delegate to the secession convention, and has retained the pen with which he signed those declarations. Mr. and Mrs. Walker have been blessed with seven children: Agnes May, John R., Wilbur M., Kate M., Lizzie S., Roland B., and William C. The parents are faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and hold an honorable position in the community.

CALOWAY M. WEBB, one of the prosperous farmers of this county, belongs to one of the pioneer families of the state, to which his grandparents, Burrell J. and Lou J. (Spear) Webb, natives of Virginia, came before the opening of the century. Mr. Webb was a soldier in the war of 1812. His son and namesake, Burrell J. Webb, Jr., was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1804. On reaching manhood he married his cousin, Miss Mary E. Webb, and set out with his possessions in a little ox-cart to found a home for himself. He settled near Newnan, Coweta Co., and cleared up a farm, living in a tent while he built his little log cabin home. Here, Nov. 12, 1835, the son Caloway M., was born, and here he passed his early years with such opportunities for education as he could obtain. His first teacher, in the little log hut with its bare interior which served as a school-house, was William Porch, the second Mamie Barnes, and the third William Allen. In 1861 Mr. Webb enlisted, serving through the war, being engaged in various hard battles and many skirmishes, among the former being the battles of Chickamauga and the siege of Atlanta. On returning from the war he found himself penniless and with a family of young children dependent on him. Mr. Webb was not dismayed, however, but with courage and vigor has pushed his way, gaining year by year, adding not to his riches alone, but to his influence. He has a fine farm of 550 acres, and his children have all been well educated. He has six of these: Fannie, Mary, Nancy, Sophronia I., Leander B. and Reuben. His son Leander has taken the degree of M. D. and is now in successful practice at Corinth. Mr. Webb's wife, whom he married in 1854, was Miss Sophia Evans, the daughter of William and Rachel (Cotton) Evans. She is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Webb is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is one of the best and most worthy citizens of Coweta county.

JOHN B. WILCOXON, son of Levi and Lena (Griggs) Wilcoxon, was born in Hancock county, Ga., in 1823. His father was a native of South Carolina and came to Georgia in 1819, settling in Hancock county. Here he remained until 1830, when he came to Newnan, where he followed farming in connection with milling. He was elected judge of the inferior court of Coweta county eight or ten years. He and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal church. John B. Wilcoxon came with his grandparents to Coweta county one year before his parents' arrival. He attended school in a pine log schoolhouse with a dirt floor and a log cut out for a window and a large, old-fashioned fireplace, a stick chimney and puncheon seats. After he became a man he rode five miles every day from his father's home to Newnan and attended school. Then for two years he assisted his father, at the end of which time he came to Newnan and began the study of law with Charles McKinley, and in 1848 was admitted to the bar. He kept his office open at Newnan and did a good practice until the war came on, when, in 1861, he made up a company known as the Coweta rangers, furnished horses for some of the men, and went to Camp McDonald. He was made captain of the company, which went from McDonald to Lynchburg, and from there to western Virginia. In 1861, before going into regular service, when the Phillips legion was formed, he was made a major of cavalry. He was taken sick after a short time in South Carolina, and was discharged in 1862 and came home, but after he regained his health he raised another regiment of ten companies, which was called "Joe Brown's pets," and served one year, the term of enlistment. He was a great help to the Confederacy during the war, after which his father-in-law helped him to start at farming; he was very prosperous from the start and now owns 2,900 acres of good land in Coweta county, which are well improved, with a brick dwelling within the corporate limits of Newnan. In 1852 he was elected as state senator of Coweta county and served one session. At the time when Tom Hardeman was speaker of the house he served one session of two years as representative of Coweta county and since that time has given his entire attention to farming. In 1850 he was married to Mary West, daughter of Rev. John Q. West, of Wilkes county, Ga., to which union four children were born, two of whom are living: John W. and Hattie (Mrs. J. P. Jones). Mrs. Wilcoxon died in 1857, and in 1861 Mr. Wilcoxon married Mary H. Cleveland, daughter of Aaron Cleveland. To them two children have been born, one of whom is still living: Cleveland Wilcoxon, a prominent lawyer of Atlanta. Mrs. Wilcoxon is a member of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Wilcoxon is now one of Coweta county's best and wealthiest citizens.

ALBERT R. WOOD, the leading coal and wood merchant of Newnan, Coweta Co., Ga.; was born in 1843, his parents being William and Elizabeth (Brown) Wood. His father, son of John and Elizabeth (Nail) Wood, was born in Laurens district, S. C., removing to Georgia in the year 1833. He was a farmer and a harness-maker by trade. His father, the grandfather of A. R. Wood (son of Samuel Wood, a native of Ireland, who came to America at a very early date), was born in North Carolina. He lost his life while constructing a mill. He was carrying up one of the corners of it, when he lost his balance and fell. A. R. Wood was reared in Newnan from childhood, receiving a common school education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, First Georgia regiment, under Gen. Clement A. Evans, and was with this company, which has the honor of being the company which fired the first shot at Laurel Hill, in all its engagements. He was wounded in the thigh at Ream's station, which caused him to be at the hospital for about two months, during which time Gen. Kilpatrick very nearly captured Richmond; and before he was well he went out on the breastworks, and, being sergeant, and no commissioned officer being present, he took charge of the men and repulsed the attack. After serving out his first enlistment, he immediately re-enlisted in the Twelfth Georgia battalion, serving until the close of the war. He was at the surrender, but he and a friend, Sam Echols, succeeded in making their escape by taking possession of two horses, which were attached to an ambulance wagon and riding them down through South Carolina, avoiding the Yankees and finally reaching home in safety. After the war he began farming, which he continued a few years. In 1867 he was elected marshal of Newnan, serving one year. In 1869 he married Georgia Snelling, daughter of Robert J. and Mary (Canaday) Snelling, to whom were born nine children: Thomas, Willie R., Jennie L., Jessie, Andrew H., Nellie, Anna, Elizabeth, and Georgia C. Mrs. Wood was born and reared in Georgia, and both she and her husband are members of the M. E. church. After his marriage, Mr. Wood removed to Richmond, Ga., where he was engaged in mercantile business for three years, then he removed to Coweta county, where he continued in the same occupation one year. He then went back to his farm, where he remained until 1890, when he opened a large coal and wood yard. Mr. Wood is a member of the masonic fraternity.

ROBERT H. WOODS, one of Coweta county's leading citizens, is the grandson of Robert Woods, a native of Ireland, who came to America and became one of the first settlers of Madison county, Ga., about the year 1800. His son, Francis A., married Phoebe Wood, like himself a native of Madison county, and to them on Christmas day, 1827, was born Robert H. The father was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. Robert was born and reared in Pike county, and owing to the limited opportunities of those days and the early death of his father, when he was but nine years of age, received only such an education as could be obtained in the old log school house of that time, prior to his father's death. After this event the brave lad worked not only to obtain his own living, but to aid in the support of the family. The courage displayed in boyhood continued to develop, and ere he reached manhood's estate, upon the declaration of war with Mexico, he was one of those who, with patriotic ardor, rushed to arms, enlisting on June 10, 1846, in the regiment commanded by Col. Henry R. Jackson, of Savannah, Ga. He was in the company of Capt. H. J. Sargent, who with himself are the only members of the company now living in Coweta county. These troops were among the forces landed by Gen. Scott on March 9, 1847, at Vera Cruz, and among the exploits of that famous investment this company not only bravely bore its own part but has the credit of doing more hard marching than any other. In recognition of his service to his country in those momentous days, Mr. Woods draws a pension from the United States government. In 1849, on Dec. 22, Mr. Woods was married to Miss Mary E. Brooks, a native of Pike county, the daughter of Hillary and Nancy (Anderson) Brooks, and they have two children: Hillary A. and John C. Upon the outbreak of the war, Mr. R. H. Woods enlisted as a private in Company I, of Col. Neeley's regiment, but was soon elected lieutenant. Having served in this position for six months he formed another company, of which he was made captain, and later a second company was organized through his efforts. He was engaged in several very hard battles as that before Richmond, and was in command of the company at the battle of Malvern Hill, during the terrible four days and nights of the Wilderness, at Sharpsburg, Gettysburg and Knoxville, and also in many skirmishes. He was with Gen. Lee when this great chieftain surrendered at Appomattox, being then in command of the Fifty-third Georgia regiment. Mr. Woods was also in command of the last line ever formed by Gen. Lee, being the Celand line, ordered to charge a Yankee battery on the morning of the surrender. On May 6, Capt. Woods paroled his men, seventy-five being left of his regiment, the others having been killed, wounded or captured. After the war he returned to Coweta county and began farming; although his means in the beginning were but small, his prudence and diligence in the management of his affairs increased his business and now he is very well to do, one of the best and most respected of the citizens of Coweta county.

WILLIAM J. WOOD is a son of Jordan Wood, whose father, a Baptist minister, was by birth a South Carolinian. Early left an orphan he came to Georgia in 1811, and cleared up a small farm in the woods. After a time he sold this and moved to Flat Rock, Ala., where he spent the remainder of his life. His son Jordan was born in Georgia, Monroe county, Nov. 7, 1821; he was reared upon the farm and received a good common school education, after which he taught three or four years. By his own energy and perseverance he made his way in the world and acquired quite a fortune. During the war he was in the state militia, and carried on a blacksmith shop, doing all work without charge. His wife, Miss Emily Clegg, was born in Coweta county, and is of an old pioneer family. Their son, William J. Wood, was born in Alabama, in 1854, and reared upon the farm with very limited educational privileges. When he reached manhood his father gave him $125, and with this he engaged in an evaporator; little by little he has accumulated until he is now worth a considerable property. He has one of the best farms in the county, is also engaged in mercantile business in Sharpsburg, and is a stockholder in the Sharpsburg ginnery. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and one of Coweta's most respected citizens. His wife bore the maiden name of Lovida F. Neeley, is a daughter of D. C. and Amanda (Carpenter) Neeley, and was born in Carroll county, Ga., July 4, 1859. Mr. and Mrs. Wood are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church. Their union has been blessed with nine children: Ola B., born Aug. 13, 1877; Thomas H., born Jan. 21, 1879; Leonard E., born Sept. 27, 1881; Erma May, born March 26, 1883; Robert A., born Dec. 23, 1884; Ina R., born Dec. 30, 1886; William J., Jr., born April 15, 1889; Hubert G., born Feb. 17, 1892; Love, born March 1, 1894.

WILLIAM S. WOODS belongs to a family of the early settlers of the state, and is the grandson of a revolutionary soldier, Samuel Woods, who came to Georgia in the latter part of the last century, and settled in what is now Morgan county, where he engaged in trade, and where, in 1817, his son William was born. In 1836, he came to Coweta county and after marriage, settled on the farm still owned by his son, who occupies the same log house. The wife of William Woods was a daughter of Stephen and Jane (Davis) Woods, who were pioneers of the county of Coweta, the father also having served in the war of 1812. William S. Woods was born on this farm in May, 1845, and here grew to manhood, with the scanty school privileges of that period. In 1862, he enlisted in Company C, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Rollings, and served throughout the war; the young man was in many important battles: Missionary Ridge, Tunnel Hill, Chickamauga, New Hope, Resaca, and all the way with Gen. Johnston to Atlanta, in which fight he also took part. He returned to his farm in Coweta county at the close of the war, where he has ever since remained. He at first began farming on shares, having no means of his own, but he devoted himself to his work with a zeal that must needs win success, and he is now quite prosperous, owning some 600 acres of good land in excellent condition, and stands well in the estimation of all who know him. In 1871, Mr. Woods was married to Miss Eliza Pittman, daughter of Isaac H. and Mary (Waites) Pittman. By this union he had three children: Ola, William and Laudon. Their mother was born in Heard county, in December, 1844, and died in 1883. She was a faithful and conscientious member of the Baptist church. In 1884, Mr. Woods married Miss Martha J. Cleveland, who was born in Troup county, Ga., in 1847. Of their three children two are living: Samuel and Nancy E. Mrs. Woods is a member of the M. E. church. Mr. Woods is a Baptist, he and his first wife being charter members of the first church in Corinth, Heard Co., Ga.

OBADIAH WYNN, a prominent citizen of Coweta county, was born June 29, 1842, and is a brother of Joseph H. Wynn, his grandfather being Maj. John Wynn of revolutionary fame, and his father Judge Glen O. Wynn, for many years a central figure in the affairs of this region. Although his school privileges had been few, Judge Wynn was a great reader and kept fully abreast of the times on all of the leading questions of the day. He was a man who had the full confidence of the people for his unswerving integrity, it being said that his word was as good as his note. In 1858, when he was elected to the state senate, a large portion of the better element of the whig party supported him, although he was a staunch and uncompromising democrat, feeling that a man of his stability of character might be safely trusted, and loving him for his generous friendship for the poor and needy. During the dark days of the war many soldiers' wives and others of the needy were supported by his generous hand and it is well known that no one ever applied in vain to Judge Wynn. His patriotism displayed itself in the gift of two of his sons to serve in the war. His wife's father, Samuel Lumpkin, was also a revolutionary soldier, and the family is widely known as one of the worthiest in the state. Obadiah Wynn received his education in Fayetteville seminary and Newnan college, and had prepared himself to enter the state university, but the war coming on put an end to his hopes. He enlisted May, 1861, in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment, being appointed lieutenant, but after the first battle of Manassas was promoted to the captaincy. After serving two years he was forced to resign, owing to a wound received at the battle of Malvern Hill. Besides this he was engaged in several very fierce battles: Manassas, Yorktown, Seven Pines, Garnett's farm, and others of less note. After the war Mr. Wynn married Miss A. E. Ware, whose parents, George and Mildred (Sorrel) Ware, both natives of Virginia, were among the early settlers of Georgia. Mrs. Wynn's grandfather was in the revolutionary war and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis. Mrs. Wynn was born in Fayette county, Ga., and she and her husband are both members of the Baptist church. Mr. Wynn is also a member of the masonic fraternity. At the close of the war Mr. Wynn, like most of the old soldiers, returned home to begin life anew, without a dollar to start with. He began farming, but also engaged in mercantile trade, and by his own efforts, with care and diligence, has accumulated considerable wealth, and has given his children the best educational advantages. He has one son, Glen B. Wynn, of whom any father might be proud. He is a young man of great promise and marked ability as an amateur geologist, has one of the finest collections of minerals in all that region, and is thoroughly familiar with the subject. It is a delight to examine his beautiful specimens, and to listen to his lucid and interesting description; and it seems to afford him equal pleasure to display his collection and to explain concerning them. Mr. Wynn has three daughters: Annie, Louise and Ruby, who are typical representatives of true southern ladies, in beauty, goodness and refinement. The two elder are highly educated; the younger has not yet completed her studies. Mr. Wynn's beautiful home is elegantly fitted up and furnished, his farm is one of the best improved in the county, and he and his family deservedly stand high in the esteem of all who know them, and are leaders in the society of the county.

JOSEPH H. WYNN, a prominent citizen of Coweta county, residing in Kedron, was born in 1844. He is a son of Glen O. Wynn, born in Oglethorpe county in 1817, whose father, John Wynn, was a revolutionary soldier, a native of Virginia. About the year 1800 the latter with his wife, Susannah (Owen) Wynn, also of Virginia, came from that state to make a home in Georgia. Their son, Glen O., had comparatively few school privileges, but by a diligent use of such as he had he acquired a quite extensive general knowledge and was a man of broad and thoughtful mind. His wife, Miss Sarah P. Lumpkin, was a daughter of Samuel and Mary (Arnold) Lumpkin, a niece of Joseph Henry Lumpkin, and an aunt of Samuel Lumpkin, now judge. Both Mr. and Mrs. Wynn were faithful and devoted members of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1841 they came to settle in Coweta county, cleared up a farm from the dense woods, patiently enduring the hardships of such a life. Mr. Wynn's value as a citizen was duly recognized by his neighbors and in 1856 he was elected state representative, serving two years; in 1858 he was elected to the state senate by the largest majority ever given a candidate in Coweta county. He was for some time justice of the inferior court, and was a well-known Mason. Throughout his life he was one of the most popular men in the county, universally beloved and respected. Joseph H. Wynn, having passed his boyhood on the farm, had received a common school education, and was prepared to enter college when the outbreak of the war disappointed his expectations. Having been a student in a military institute, in 1863 he joined a troop of recruits at Rome, Ga., and with them was ordered back to Kennesaw mountain, where they were put into regular service with proper drill and training. From this time he remained in active service until the close of the war, being with Gen. Johnston through all the famous and hardly-contested battles fought during the retreat to Atlanta before Sherman, and also in the siege of Atlanta. After the war young Wynn spent a year upon the farm, and then went to Newnan to try the mercantile business, but after a year at this he returned to the farm, where he has since remained. In 1870 he married Miss Sallie Arm Glass, who was born in Coweta county in 1844, and is the daughter of Glove and Lydia (May) Glass, both natives of Georgia. Both Mr. Wynn and his wife are members of the Baptist church. Of their seven children all save one are living: R. L., Ernest G., Joe H., Gordon, George and Robert E. Mr. Wynn is a member of the masonic fraternity and is widely known and esteemed.

THOMAS E. ZELLARS, a prominent business man of Grantville, belongs to one of the valued pioneer families of the state, to which his grandfather came more than a century ago. He, Jacob Zellars, the son of a German, served through the revolutionary war, and for many years the old gun and powder-horn he had carried through that struggle were carefully preserved in his family. In 1790

he brought his wife, Barbara (Fudge) Zellars, like himself a native of Virginia, and settled in what is now Lincoln county, Ga., a pioneer in the midst of the dense woods. Though poor in the beginning, he was able, by his own industry and prudent management, to amass a considerable fortune, and became one of the richest men of that section of the state. In 1798 his son Solomon was born and was reared on his father's farm in Lincoln county, but after his marriage he went to Newton county for a few years, removing thence, in 1849, to Campbell county, where he died in 1862. Though starting in life with but very little, he was able to accumulate a considerable property; he was a successful farmer, and at one time owned about 700 acres of good land. He and his wife were members of the Baptist church. Mrs. Zellars was Miss Emily Tatum, whose parents, John and Rebecca (Stovall) Tatum, natives of North Carolina, came at an early day to Georgia, making what is now Lincoln county their permanent home. Thomas E. Zellars, the son of Solomon and Emily Zellars, was born in Newton county in 1834. He passed his early years upon the farm with such advantages as the poorly-equipped schools of that day could give him. To read, to write and to cipher, "the three R's," were the extent of the curriculum of those backwoods schools in general, but these, being at the foundation of all knowledge, were sufficient to enable the studious young man to acquaint himself with all subjects of general interest, so that he is reckoned a man of broad mind and great intelligence. In April, 1862, he enlisted in Company C, Nineteenth Georgia regiment, in command of Thomas C. Johnson, and was with his company in many of its engagements. He was in many battles, among them Ocean Pond (where he was wounded), Round House, Petersburg, Richmond, Fort Fisher and many others. The war left him penniless and he returned to his home to make a new start in life. Having a natural aptitude for business, he entered into partnership with William J. Garrett, on a borrowed capital of $2,000, and has been greatly prospered. Their business has steadily increased and they are now among the largest merchants in Coweta county, carrying a stock of some $10,000, doing a business of about $50,000 per annum, with an estimated working capital of $30,000, and owning land as a firm valued at $7,000 or $8,000. Mr. Zellars' individual property in Grantville is estimated at about $7,000. In 1869 Mr. Zellars married Miss Ella Moreland, daughter of Thomas C. and Emma (Barnett) Moreland. She was born in Heard county, Ga., in 1851, and was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, while Mr. Zellars belongs to the Baptist church, of which he is a very useful and influential member. Mrs. Zellars died in 1891, having been the mother of five children: Jessie A., Thomas M., Ellen G., Emma, and Ella E. Mr. Zellars is one of the wealthiest citizens of the county, where he is universally liked and esteemed. He and his family deservedly hold a position of influence in the community.

CRAWFORD COUNTY.

JOHN I. CHAMPION, farmer, Roberta, Crawford Co., Ga., son of Thomas G. and Mary (Sandford) Champion, was born in Crawford county in 1845. His paternal grandfather was Joseph I. Champion, who was born and raised in Augusta, Ga., whence he moved to Alabama. A few years afterward he moved thence to Crawford county and subsequently returned to Alabama. He was a very devoted, ardent Baptist, and a leading member of the denomination in the state. He lost all his sons in different wars—Henry and James in the Indian war of 1836; Jefferson in the Mexican war, and Thomas G. in the late war. Mr. Champion's father was born in Alabama, whence he came to Georgia with his father when a boy. He, like his father, was a farmer by occupation. He enlisted in Company A, Benaud's battalion, and died near Savannah while in the service. Mr. Champion's mother was a daughter of John S. and Silvia (Spivey) Sandeford. He was born in South Carolina, and coming to Georgia, was one of the early settlers of Jefferson county. He was a farmer and fruit distiller. Mr. Champion was raised on a farm and received a very limited education. In 1863 he enlisted in Company A (Capt. Joseph A. Cotton). His battalion was subsequently consolidated with the First Georgia regulars, in which he saw some pretty hard service. He was in the battles of Olustee, Cusahassee, James Island, Silver Hills and Bentonville. He was severely wounded at Olustee and disabled from service four months. His father died during the war, and the son came out of it poor, and, being the oldest child, had his mother and her family of children to provide for. For a number of years he rented land, but in 1873 he made his first purchase, to which he has added, until now he has a 400-acre farm of good land, well improved, and a nice home. He cultivates well and is quite as prosperous and as much respected as any citizen of the county. Mr. Champion was married in 1866 to Miss Agnes L. Roberts—born in Crawford county in 1844—daughter of James and Margaret (Stiles) Roberts. He was born in Jones county, but early in life moved to Crawford county, which continued to be his home until he died. He was a soldier during the Indian war of 1837. Of the fruits of this marriage five children are now living: Robert E., John H., Mary A., Beulah and Walter E. Mrs. Champion is a member of the Primitive Baptist church. In January, 1895, Mr. Champion was unanimously elected by the citizens of his county tax collector.

WILLIAM J. DENT, farmer, Knoxville, Crawford Co., Ga., son of John W. and Elizabeth (Hoy) Dent, was born in Bibb county, Ga., in 1841. His paternal grandfather was William Dent. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, was born in South Carolina, and was a prosperous farmer. Mr. Dent's father was born in South Carolina, migrated thence to Tennessee, whence he came to Georgia in 1838 and settled in Bibb county. Subsequently he removed to Crawford county, where he lived the remainder of his life. His life pursuit was farming, but he served the county as a justice of the inferior court and as a justice of the peace, and was a captain of the militia when it was a coveted local distinction. Mr. Dent's maternal great-grandfather, Quinton Hoy, was born in England, and came thence to Georgia in the first quarter of this century and settled in what is now Bibb county, where he made his permanent home. His maternal grandfather, James Hoy, was a Bibb county pioneer, and owned land where the city of Macon now stands. He was a farmer and large land-owner and was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Dent was raised on the farm and received a country common school education. About the time he reached manhood the civil war was commenced. In 1862 he enlisted in Company K (Capt. Gibson, later Capt. William Rutherford), Forty-fifth Georgia regiment, and went to the front. He participated in many battles, notably the seven days' fight around Richmond and second Manassas. After this last-named battle he was taken sick, and on his recovery was transferred to the cavalry service and fought all through the Atlanta campaign. On the close of the war he returned to his farm. Starting in life with little or nothing he has so judiciously managed and so invested as to acquire quite a large estate and attain to honorable prominence and wide influence. He was county commissioner eight years, and was on the board of education nine years. Mr. Dent was married in 1860 to Miss Jane Davis—born in 1839—daughter of G. L. and Mary (Chambliss) Davis. He was born in Bibb county, was a farmer all his life, served in the Indian war of 1836, and lived in the county of his birth until he died. To this marriage eight children were born: Walter B., Ida, John W., Gardner L., Mary P., Safronia E., Sarah J., and Hoy. Mrs. Dent, who was an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died in 1887. Mr. Dent in 1887 contracted a second marriage with Miss Anna Dixon—born in Crawford county in 1855—daughter of Thomas and Mary J. (Hicks) Dixon. Mr. Dixon was born in Bibb county, Ga., and moved to Crawford county, where he married and raised his family. He was a mill-wright by trade, and after he enlisted during the war he was detailed to service in the machine shops. Mrs. Dent is a member of the Methodist church and he is a member of the masonic fraternity.

WILLIAM G. HARTLEY, farmer, Crawford county, Ga., (P. O., Fort Valley, Ga.), son of James D. and Parmelia (Jackson) Hartley, was born in Houston county in 1833. His great-grandfather, Daniel Hartley, was a native of South Carolina, was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and accompanied his son to Georgia in 1827. Mr. Hartley's grandparents, Michael and Polly (Harris) Hartley, were born in South Carolina, came to Georgia and settled in Crawford county in 1827. He was a farmer, raised his family in the county, in which he spent his days. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Hartley's father was born in South Carolina in 1810, and came to Georgia with his father when seventeen years old, and settled with the family in Crawford county. He was married in Crawford county, and farmed until he died. He was a justice of the peace for many years. Mr. Hartley's mother was a daughter of Nimrod and Elizabeth (Busby) Jackson, who was born in South Carolina, and migrated thence to Georgia. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, Mr. Hartley was reared a farmer's boy, and received only the meager education which fell to the lot of such at the time. He was a soldier in the Confederate army, and returned from the war very poor, but by hard work he has placed himself in comfortable circumstances. He was a justice of the peace many years. Mr. Hartley was married in 1852 to Miss Sarah Avery, born in Crawford county in 1831, daughter of David and Elizabeth (Hood) Avery. He was born in Washington county, Ga., moved thence to Crawford, and a few years afterward moved to and permanently settled in Houston county. He followed farming all his life. Of the children born to this union seven are living: Roxie, James C., Randolph, Trefinia, George D., Warren O., and Willie. Having no aspirations beyond being a good farmer and neighbor, and securing their good will, Mr. Hartley has been content with the success he has achieved. He is a member of the Primitive Baptist church and a master Mason.

W. W. JOHNSON, farmer, Culloden P. O., Monroe Co., Ga., son of Ephraim and Rebecca (Jackson) Johnson, was born in Crawford county in 1830. He lived in the county until he died. He was a member of the Primitive Baptist church. His maternal grandfather was a native of Virginia, and related to Gen. Andrew Jackson. He was a farmer, and moved from Virginia to Georgia in this century, and permanently settled in Wilkes county. Mr. Johnson was raised on a farm and received a good common-school education.

He began life for himself as an overseer, which calling he followed and was doing well until the war between the states was precipitated. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Capt. Charles Dennis, Twenty-seventh Georgia regiment. In all he was in twenty-seven regular battles while in the army; some of them the most hotly contested and sanguinary of any during the conflict, among them Williamsburg, Seven Pines, Ocean Pond, Fort Sumter, the Wilderness, Fort Fisher, Sharpsburg, Petersburg, and Bentonville. He was wounded at Sharpsburg and sent home, where he remained thirty days and then returned to his command. He continued in the service until the surrender, was in the last battle at Bentonville, entered the service as a lieutenant and came out as a captain, having been promoted at Petersburg. After the war he directed his energies to farming, bought his first land in 1874, and entered upon a term of gratifying prosperity. His success has satisfied his most ambitious desires. In 1876 he was elected sheriff of the county, and held the office one term. In 1888 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and was placed on the following committees: Agriculture, asylum for the blind, asylum for the insane, emigration and coal mines. Mr. Johnson was married in 1851 to Miss Frances Stripland, born in Crawford county in 1835, daughter of Abner and Nancy (Nichols) Stripland. He was born in Mississippi and was a millwright by trade. He was born in South Carolina, came to Georgia and settled in Washington county, whence he afterward moved to Crawford county and reared his family. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Joyner was reared on the farm, and the meager schooling he received was obtained at the old-time log school house. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F, Capt. Fowler, Fifty-seventh Georgia regiment. He participated in the battle of Baker's creek, and was captured at Vicksburg and paroled. He afterward returned to the army and remained in the service until the surrender—was in the last battle at Bentonville, N. C. Coming home from the war he started anew in life without a dollar in his pocket. In 1866 he bought 100 acres of land, to which he has added as he made money, until now he has a large farm and a comfortable home in which to spend the decline of life. He has been a justice of the peace ten years—a tribute to his impartiality and local popularity. Mr. Joyner's prosperity has been such that he has supplemented his farming interests with a general merchandise store. In 1860 Mr. Joyner was married to Miss Elizabeth Aultman, born in Bibb county, Ga., in 1839, daughter of William and Mary (Rowland) Aultman. He was born in South Carolina, moved to Georgia early in life, and settled in Bibb county, where he reared his family. His principal occupation was that of a mechanic, and he served as a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Lindsey's maternal grandparents, Lewis and Sallie Brown, were natives of Virginia, and migrated to Georgia and settled in Baldwin county early in this century. He was a farmer, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Lindsey was reared on the farm and received a very limited education. In early life he worked considerably as a mechanic, but afterward followed farming as a life pursuit. He made his first land purchase in 1840, to which he has gradually added by purchase, until now he owns about 600 acres, mostly cleared and under good cultivation. Being exempt by age from regular service during the war, he was detailed as one of the home guard, and although he did faithful service, he made no exciting record. Mr. Lindsey was married in 1851 to Miss Mary J. Harbuck, born in Warren county, daughter of James and Sarah (Thurman) Harbuck. He was a farmer, and moved early in life to Crawford county, and lived there all his life. Of the children which blessed this union these five are living: Robert L.; Ella, wife of Louis Lindsey; Mack; Mattie, and Mamie. Mr. Marshall's father was born in Hancock county; when a young man moved to Bibb county, where he reared his family, and then moved to Crawford, where he died. Mr. Marshall's mother was the daughter of Jack Layfield, who was born in Hancock county and was a farmer all his life, which was spent entirely in Hancock county. Mr. Marshall began life as a farmer's boy, and poor, received very little schooling, and has followed farming all his life. Although not rich, he has prospered, and now has a large farm of good land. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E, Capt. Cleveland, Sixth Georgia regiment, and was engaged in many hard-fought, bloody battles, among them: Seven Pines, Cold Harbor, Chancellorsville, James island, Ocean Pond, Weldon, Kurston, and Bentonville. He was severely wounded in the battle of Cold Harbor, was in the hospital two months, and then came home, where he remained three months. When he recovered he returned to the army, and was again wounded at Bentonville. When the war ended he resumed farming, and bought his first land, a small farm, in 1867, to which he has since added. In 1860 Mr. Marshall was married to Miss Sarah Walker, born in Crawford county, daughter of Joe and Sarah (Woods) Walker. He was an old settler in the county. To this union were born three children: Addie, Octavia, and Sallie. His wife died in 1873. where he raised his family. He was a farmer and was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Sandeford's father was born in Jefferson county in 1813. He followed farming all his life and did some service in the late war. Mr. Sandeford's mother was a daughter of William and Polly Rowe. He was born in South Carolina, migrated to Georgia, and going to Crawford, was one of the first settlers in the county. He was a Missionary Baptist preacher and was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Sandeford was reared on the farm, and as his school and boyhood days were passed during the war period, he received but a limited education. He began life with nothing, and besides being the eldest child, had to work hard and oversee the farm. But he has prospered and he now owns a good 750-acre farm, which he has under improved and productive cultivation. Mr. Sandeford was married in 1876 to Miss Willie E. Stripland—born in Crawford county in 1858—daughter of William R. and Amanda (Sandeford) Stripland. Mr. Stripland was born in Crawford county and was a prosperous farmer. Mr. Sandeford ranks with the richest and most substantial of the citizens of the county and commands universal respect.

R. B. SCHOFIELD, farmer, Taylor, Crawford Co., Ga., son of Philip and Charity (Busby) Schofield, was born in Crawford county in 1833. His paternal grandfather was William Schofield, who was a native of South Carolina, a farmer, and lived all his life in that state. Mr. Schofield's father was born in South Carolina, migrated to Georgia when a young man, and settled in Crawford county, where he married, reared a family, and died. He was a farmer all his life, and in religious faith a Primitive Baptist. Mr. Schofield's mother was a daughter of Reese and Mary (Winn) Busby. Mr. Schofield's boyhood was spent on the farm, and the little schooling he had was obtained at the old-time log school house. He farmed until 1861, when he enlisted in Company F (Capt. Fowler), Fifty-seventh Georgia regiment. Among the battles in which he was engaged were Baker's Creek, Missionary Ridge, Atlanta and Bentonville. He was made a prisoner at Vicksburg, and when exchanged rejoined the army; was wounded at Atlanta, and sent to the hospital, where he remained three weeks. After the surrender he came home on foot, and on reaching home he had $1. Starting with this capital, and supplementing it with hard work, he has gotten himself comfortably fixed for the balance of his life. Mr. Schofield was married in 1853 to Miss Jane, daughter of Solomon and Lethia (Barnes) Davis, early settlers of Crawford county, by whom he had four children: Wm. F., John S., Lethia E. and Reese A. In 1868 he was married to Ellen Bryant—born in Houston county in 1836—daughter of Robert and Temperance (Rowell) Bryant. He was a native of Georgia and came to Crawford county early in life. Of the children born to this marriage there are living, Ella, James and Anna. Mrs. Schofield is a member of the Primitive Baptist church.

CHARLES H. WALKER, farmer, Roberta, Crawford Co., Ga., son of William and Elizabeth (Bostic) Walker, was born in Jefferson county, Ga., in 1812. Mr. Walker's grandparents, Joel and Judith Walker, were born in Buckingham county, Va., and migrated to Georgia and settled in Jefferson county about the beginning of the present century. Mr. Walker's father was born in Virginia in 1763 and came to Georgia in early life and settled in Jefferson county. He was a soldier in the patriot army and served through the revolutionary war. He was under the command of Gen. John Twiggs, and letters written to him by that officer, now in possession of the subject of this sketch, testify to his courage, faithfulness and fidelity. He was a farmer and lived in Jefferson county until he died in 1818. Mr. Walker's mother was a daughter of Nathan and Martha Bostic. He was a native of what is now Jefferson county and was a farmer. His mother was born in 1770 and died in 1835. Mr. Walker was reared on the farm and received a common school education, and when grown to manhood he taught school one term. Although a plain farmer, Mr. Walker was popular and influential, and that he was and is held in high esteem is evidenced by his election to office. In 1840 he was elected a state senator and was re-elected for seven terms, and was elected again in 1880 when sixty-eight years of age. In 1864 he was a member of the Georgia militia, and served in defense of Atlanta. Mr. Walker was married in 1834 to Miss Caroline E. Jones—born in Putnam county in 1815—daughter of William and Retensia Jones. He was born in Putnam county and lived in the county all his life. To Mr. and Mrs. Walker ten children have been born, of whom five are living: T. H. was killed at the battle of Sharpsburg; Caroline E., wife of W. H. Ficklin; George E.; Joel A., William J., and Robert W. Mrs. Walker, who was an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died in 1880. Mr. Walker is an honored member of the Methodist church, and no better or stronger proof of the confidence of the people in his integrity and of the estimation in which they hold him could be given than the fact that when last elected to the general assembly—1880—he received every vote cast. Was enlisted in the Georgia militia in 1864 and served around Atlanta with that command.

DADE COUNTY.

BENJAMIN T. BROCK is a prominent member of the Dade county bar, and editor and proprietor of the "State of Dade News," and belongs to one of the pioneer families of North Georgia. He was born in Dade county, March 21, 1866, and is the son of Dr. William Brock, an old and respected citizen of that county, and a well-known person in northwest Georgia. Dr. Brock is born in what is now Whitfield county in 1832, and was the son of Benjamin Brock, a native of Virginia, who settled in North Carolina early in this century, and migrated to North Georgia when that territory was yet in possession of the Cherokees. The family settled in Dade county early in the fifties, and there Benjamin Brock survived to a great age, dying in 1886. Dr. Brock studied medicine, and for several years previous to the war engaged in the practice of that profession in Dade county. At the commencement of hostilities between the states he was a man of note and influence in North Georgia, and took an active part in the support of the Confederate movement. On the first call to arms he raised a company for the Confederate service. He was commissioned captain, but later was made surgeon of the Thirty-fourth Georgia, and in that capacity he served through the war. He accompanied his regiment in the Tennessee and Kentucky campaign in 1862, and was present at the siege of Vicksburg. On the capture of that city, in July, 1863, he was made prisoner of war, but was paroled and returned to his home. Having been exchanged after the battle of Chickamauga, he rejoined his regiment and was present at the battle of Missionary Ridge, in November, 1863. In May, 1864, Johnston withdrew from Dalton, to commence the celebrated Atlanta campaign. Dr. Brock accompanied his regiment and was present on the fields of Resaca, New Hope Church, Kennesaw Mountain, Peachtree

Creek, and in various battles around Atlanta. On the removal of Johnston from the command he followed the fortunes of that general and his army during the autumn and winter of 1864-65, and was present at his surrender in North Carolina in April of the latter year. Dr. Brock returned to his home and resumed the practice of his profession at Trenton, where he resided until his death in 1881. He was a citizen of high and unblemished character and of sterling integrity. Dr. Brock married Miss Nancy Taylor, daughter of R. L. Taylor, of Dade county, a descendant of a New England family. They had issue eight children: James R., at present a practicing physician at Rising Fawn; Benjamin T.; Ernest D., a planter in Dade county; Mollie, who married Elbert McMahon; Allie, wife of W. G. Morrison, of New England city; Nannie, who died in infancy, and William H. Benjamin T. Brock received his preliminary education in the schools of Dade county, at William and Emma Austin college, Stevenson, Ala., and at the Kirkwood Military academy. He resolved to adopt the legal profession, and entered the law department of Washington and Lee college at Lexington, Va., in 1883, where he pursued a course of study in the various branches of jurisprudence during one year. Returning to Trenton in 1884, he continued his studies, and in 1885 was admitted to the bar in the superior court of Dade county. He at once engaged actively in the practice of the law with T. J. Lumpkin, under the firm name of Lumpkin & Brock. Three years later the firm was mutually dissolved, and Mr. Brock has continued to practice his profession at Trenton. He is a lawyer of very considerable learning and is extensively read in the general principles and technical learning of the law, and has taken meritorious and worthy rank in the walks of his profession—a good advocate, and an able and conservative counselor. He possesses the confidence of the public and the friendship of his professional brethren. His early training and education gave him a taste for literature and literary occupation. In 1891 he became editor and proprietor of the "State of Dade News," a weekly paper published at Trenton, and the official organ of Dade county. This newspaper has a good circulation in North Georgia, in North Alabama and in Tennessee. Mr. Brock is a member of the Georgia Weekly Press association. He is a prominent leader of the democratic party in his district, and has been chairman of the democratic state central committee of Dade county. In 1886 he married Miss Sally F. Cureton, daughter of Hon. J. W. Cureton, a leading citizen of Dade county, at one time its representative in the legislature, and formerly senator from the Forty-fourth senatorial district. Hon. G. W. Cureton, the present representative of Dade county, is a brother of Mrs. Brock. J. W. Cureton entered the Confederate service and was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Thirty-ninth Georgia, which regiment he commanded during the latter part of the war. By this marriage Mr. and Mrs. Brock had four children, three of whom survive: Bernice, Cureton M., and Guy Raymond; Walter, deceased.

JAMES DONNELLY, physician, Trenton, is one of the rising members of the profession of Dade county. He was born in Louisville, Ky., the son of James Donnelly, a native of Queenstown, Ireland, who immigrated to the United States in 1846 and settled in New York city, where he married Teresa Fitzsimmons, a daughter of Patrick Fitzsimmons. By this union were born ten children, five of whom survived to attain maturity: Mary, deceased, who married Thomas E. Winnard, of Tennessee; James, Stephen, now of Florida; Teresa J., and Annie B. The father of Dr. Donnelly was a mechanic, and during many years resided in the metropolitan towns of the North and East. Previous to the war he settled with his family in Louisville, Ky., where he lived four years, moving to Nashville, Tenn., and later to Wilson county, in that state. He died in De Kalb county, Tenn., Feb. 18, 1880. His widow still survives at Smithville. Dr. Donnelly was chiefly reared in Tennessee and received a good education in the schools of that state and at Purse Fountain college at Smithville. He learned the trade of a painter, which he followed for several years, but a laudable ambition led him to aspire to a place in the ranks of the medical profession, and he commenced the study of medicine and surgery under Dr. J. P. Wannock, and later under Dr. J. J. Broyles of Chattanooga. In 1889 he entered the Chattanooga Medical college and pursued the regular course of study in that institution and graduated therefrom in 1894. On Jan. 9, 1895, he settled in Trenton, in Dade county, and has become fully identified with the progress and prosperity of Georgia. He engaged in the practice of his profession, and from the outset has been remarkably successful. He has acquired a good practice in Dade and surrounding counties. He is justly popular and is trusted and respected as a citizen. He leads in the circle of young men now beginning to shape the social conduct and business progress of the present generation of Georgians, among whom he finds himself at home. On July 3, 1892, Dr. Donnelly was married to Miss Nannie Parker, daughter of the late Joseph Parker of Walker county, this state. They have two children, Lillian Beatrice and Stephen Milton.

JOHN P. JACOWAY. This able lawyer is a resident of Trenton, and was born in Dade county, in 1856. He was the son of John G. Jacoway, a native of Kentucky, born in 1818, who settled in Dade county about 1845, and for many years previous to the war engaged in the practice of the law. After the war he became a minister of the Gospel and continued in the service until his death in Dade county in 1892. He married in Tennessee Miss Nancy Middleton of that state, and they had four sons and two daughters: William U., at present a practicing lawyer, at Trenton; Thomas R., a trader at Fort Payne, Ala., and at present postmaster at that place; Henry J., a very successful planter and stock dealer in northern Alabama; Susan G., wife of R. A. D. Dunlap, a member of the Alabama bar and master in chancery in that state; Lucy J., wife of T. H. B. Cole, at present clerk of the superior court of Dade county; and John P. The subject of this sketch was educated in the schools of Dade county. Early in life he manifested a desire to enter the ranks of the legal profession, and with that object in view, he began a course of study at Gadsden, Ala., and in 1880 he was admitted to the bar in the courts of that state. He commenced the practice of his profession at Trenton, and his legal career has been very successful. On locating at Trenton he became attorney for the Alabama & Great Southern railroad company, and for six years had charge of the claim department of that road. He was thus early in the practice of his profession intrusted with responsibilities usually devolving upon older heads—responsibilities that called forth the fullest resources of his mind, and doubtless were active causes in developing his mental faculties and power, and ripening his judgment. The character of his duties made him familiar with the rules of practice in corporation cases, and equipped him with a knowledge of legal precedents, not only a desideratum, but a necessity. He purchased a valuable library, and devoted every spare moment to the pleasing task of acquiring an intimate knowledge of legal principles and practice, exploring the misty labyrinths of the law and the rich mines of equity jurisprudence, and storing his mind with the wisdom and thought of the great masters of his profession. He thus fortified his mind with a knowledge of the art of acute reasoning, and with the method of clear, concise and lucid statement. Accordingly his success was assured. He rose rapidly to an honored place in the ranks of his profession; and it is no exaggeration of his legal powers to say that he justly and meritoriously stands at the head of his profession in his circuit. His practice extends beyond his circuit, in the United States court, and before the bar of the supreme court of this state. Whether as an advocate, discussing questions of fact before a jury; or as a solicitor in chancery, unravelling the hidden mysteries and complex questions of equity practice, he is alike successful as he is self-confident, and commands the respect and assurance of both court and jury, as well as the esteem of his legal brethren and the public. Mr. Jacoway is not only an ardent and persevering student of these branches which strictly appertain to the duties of his profession, but also a close and exhaustive student of miscellaneous subjects, including history and political literature. His conversation is learned, rich and racy, and bears ample evidence of omnivorous reading in the broad field of general literature and science. His associations and relations with the public in his county, and elsewhere through the state, are most cordial and friendly. He has never sought political preferment, and has given only such thoughts to politics and public questions as became his character as a citizen and a lawyer. He is at present chairman of the democratic executive committee of Dade county. He is the regular attorney for the Dade coal company; the Walker iron and coal company, the Phoenix iron and coal company, and the Alabama & Great Southern railroad company. Mr. Jacoway was married in 1879 to Miss Carrie Pace, daughter of B. F. Pace, of Dade county. They have five children: Eula, Sidney, Price, Henry Grady and Albert Briggs. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and belongs to the masonic fraternity.

THOMAS JEFFERSON LUMPKIN, physician, New England city, is one of the distinguished family of that name in this state. He was born at Rome, Ga., Jan. 17, 1839. His father was William D. Lumpkin, a native of Spottsylvania county, Virginia, where he was born in 1810, the son of George Lumpkin, also a native of Virginia, and an extensive tobacco planter. George married Mary Ann Smith, and reared a family of four sons and two daughters: George W., who migrated to Chattooga county, Ga., while that county was Cherokee territory; William D., who settled with his father near Gainesville, and later in Floyd county, and died a resident of Walker county; Payton S., who settled in Mississippi; Bushrod, who moved to Chattooga county in 1856, and later to Texas; Martha, wife of Akion Ross, a Methodist minister, and afterward a bishop in Texas; and Keron H., wife of William Fain, and mother of J. C. Fain, judge of the superior court. Wm. D. Lumpkin married Esther Hudgins, of Hall county, daughter of Beverly Hudgins, and they had seven children: Wilson D.; Martha J., wife of B. D. McWorter; John H., Thomas J., Payton S., Charles F. and Hugh P. Hugh P. Lumpkin is at present a member of the Walker county bar, and is county judge of that county. Both Judge Lumpkin and his brother Charles saw active service in the late war. Charles died in the service at Knoxville. All are now deceased save Judge and Dr. Lumpkin. Dr. Lumpkin was reared in Walker county, and educated at La Fayette. About 1858 he commenced the study of medicine in Texas, to which state he migrated late in the fifties. Returning to Georgia he attended the Nashville medical college, and in 1860, the Atlanta medical college. Early in 1861, he enlisted in the Alabama state service, and soon afterward enlisted in the Confederate service in Company C, Seventh Alabama, and was ordered to Pensacola, where he saw service in the medical department of the army. He returned to Chattanooga and there, in connection with Dr. P. D. Ames, established the first hospital in that city. He was present at the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh, but was not engaged. His regiment having been disbanded he returned home, and enlisted in Company H, Forty-eighth Alabama, and was ordered to the valley of Virginia, where his regiment was attached to Stonewall Jackson's brigade. He fought in all the principal battles of the war in Virginia, including Cedar mountain, Second Manassas, Georgetown, Harper's Ferry, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Suffolk, Gettysburg, Port Royal, Chickamauga, Darby Town, Lookout mountain, Campbell station, Knoxville, Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House, Cold Harbor, Fort Harrison, Williamsburg. He was also engaged in the seven days' fight around Richmond, in defense of the Confederate capital, at Chancellorsville, Malvern Hill, Drury's Bluff and Petersburg, and was present at Appomattox when Lee surrendered his army on April 9, 1865. It is believed that the above record is unsurpassed by any soldier in the late war. He was made second lieutenant on enlisting in the Forty-eighth Alabama, and in November, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of captain, and during the greater part of his service commanded his regiment. He ranked high as a useful and courteous officer. At Sharpsburg he was severely wounded in the shoulder, and was shot in the arm and thigh at Chickamauga, and again at Fredericksburg he was shot in the shoulder and side. He fought in every engagement in which his regiment participated from the time of its organization until April 9, 1865. Returning to his home he completed his medical studies at the university of Georgia, and graduated at that institution. He commenced the practice of his profession in Dade county, and so continued until 1871, when he became agent for the state of Georgia, in its relation with the Alabama & Great Southern railroad. He studied law, was admitted to the bar, and since 1873 has practiced law in Dade county. He owns a valuable homestead in Lookout valley, near New England city, on which he resides. He has long been one of the active citizens of Dade county, and has filled various positions of trust in that county. In 1884 he became the candidate of his party for the office of representative in the legislature, and was elected, serving creditably during the sessions of 1884-85. He served on the special judiciary committee, on mine and mining, on enrollment, printing and banks and banking. He rendered efficient service both on the floor and in committee and became known as a useful and industrious member. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and since 1885 has been high priest of the Trenton chapter. In 1867 he married Miss W. M. McKinney, daughter of William McKinney, of Wilkes county, Ga. They have three children: Carra, Thomas H. and Virginia E.

D. SPENCER MIDDLETON, a rising and successful physician, residing at Rising Fawn, was born in Sumner county, Miss. He is a son of Z. L. Middleton, a planter in that state, who was born in Tuscaloosa county, Ala., in 1828. Z. L. Middleton has always resided in Mississippi and engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. At the commencement of the late war he entered the Confederate service, enlisting in the Fifteenth Mississippi regiment, and served through the long contest which followed. He participated in some of the leading battles and campaigns, including the siege of Vicksburg. At the close of hostilities between the states he returned to his home, having performed without a murmur the thankless duties of a Confederate soldier. He married Miss Mary Savage of Mississippi, daughter of Benjamin Savage, and to them have been born ten children: Mary Jane, wife of Maranda Shumake; John C., Albert B., Annie E., wife of T. F. Gordon; William J., Georgia E., wife of Joseph Parker; Dr. D. Spencer, Robert Luther, Minnie A. and Lucy S., all residing in Mississippi save Dr. Middleton. Dr. Middleton was educated in Webster county, Miss., and completed his literary study at Bellefontaine high school. He began the study of medicine first under Dr. W. A. D. James, of Alva, Miss., and later desiring to complete his medical education, he entered, in 1892, the Chattanooga Medical college, and there, under the care of Dr. G. Manning Ellis, a professor of that institution, pursued a course of study in medicine and surgical science until 1894, when he graduated. He commenced the practice of his profession at Rising Fawn and rapidly acquired a good practice. He has given particular study to diseases of the eye, ear and throat. He is a well educated and reliable physician and has already won the confidence of the public in Dade county. In his practice he is governed by the ethics of his profession. On Dec. 19, 1894, Dr. Middleton married Miss Dolly Virginia Chadwick, daughter of John Chadwick, of De Kalb county, Ala. The paternal grandfather of Dr. Middleton was Parks Middleton, of Alabama. The Middleton family came from South Carolina and are of English extraction. One of the name was Hon. Arthur Middleton of South Carolina, and formerly a member of congress from that state. Dr. Middleton is an active member of the Missionary Baptist church.

COL. JAMES COOPER NISBET belongs to one of the distinguished and well-known families of Georgia. He was born in Macon, Sept. 26, 1839, and was the son of Hon. James A. Nisbet, also a native of this state, born in Greene county. James A. Nisbet was educated at the university of Georgia, and was a graduate of that institution. He read law at the Litchfield law school in Connecticut, and was admitted to the bar about 1833. He commenced the practice of his profession at Macon, first under the firm name of Poe & Nisbet, and later Nisbet & Nisbet. After the war the firm was composed of Howell Cobb, Judge Jackson and Messrs. James A. and E. A. Nisbet, under the firm name of Nisbets, Cobb & Jackson, and long continued among the ablest law firms in the state. Mr. Nisbet early rose to prominence in Bibb county, and was elected mayor of Macon. For several terms he represented Bibb county in the legislature with distinguished ability, and when that body was composed of some of the greatest men whom Georgia has produced. In 1860 he supported the Douglas and Johnson presidential ticket. With Stephens and others he was a strong Union man, and when Georgia seceded he gave his support to the Confederate movement with all the vigor he possessed until the close of the war. He died in Macon in 1871, full of years and honors, after a long, brilliant and successful career as a lawyer and citizen. His father was Dr. James Nisbet, born in Iredell county, N. C., who settled in Georgia in 1791. He married a Miss Cooper, an aunt of Hon. Mark A. Cooper, the distinguished pioneer iron manufacturer of Georgia. To them were born eight children. Of these was Eugenius A., an eminent lawyer, statesman and a man of excellent literary attainments, who graduated at Franklin college in 1821 with the highest honors of his class. He read law at the Litchfield law school, New Haven, Conn, and was admitted to the bar. He served several terms in both upper and lower branches of the general assembly. In 1838 he was elected to congress, and in 1840 was re-elected, but resigned before the close of his term. In 1845 he was elected associate justice of the supreme court at its formation, and was several times re-elected to that position, in which he served continuously until the commencement of the war, his decisions being still quoted as good authority in all the states. In 1861 he was elected to the Confederate congress and served in that body with distinction during four years. Another was Milas Nisbet, a wealthy planter in Morgan county, who died, leaving one son, who married Miss Trabue, of Kentucky, sister of a congressman from that state. Others were John T. Nisbet, a member of the Bibb county bar; Sarah, wife of Dr. William Le Conte, of Liberty county, a large rice planter, and Mary, who died without issue. The father of James C. Nisbet married Frances Rebecca, daughter of Dr. John Wingfield, of Morgan County. Dr. Wingfield was the son of John Wingfield and Rebecca Nelson, of New Kent county, Va. The common ancestor of the Wingfields was Edmund M. Wingfield, first deputy governor of Virginia under Sir John Smith. By this marriage James A. Nisbet reared five children: Irene, wife of Col. George H. Hazellhurst, a distinguished civil engineer; John W., a graduate of Oglethorpe university, and the major of the Twenty-sixth Georgia infantry—he served in the army of Northern Virginia until 1863, and in the western army during the remainder of the war and died in Dade county in 1885; James Cooper, Anna, who married Marshall De Graffenread, a member of the Atlanta bar; Mary Amanda, deceased, and Frank, who died in infancy. Col. James Cooper Nisbet grew to manhood in Macon, and received a classical education at Oglethorpe university, where he graduated in 1858. He removed to Lookout Valley, in Dade county, in 1859, and settled on the Clover Dale stock farm. At the commencement of the war he raised a company in Dade county, and at his own expense uniformed and equipped it. This company he transported to Richmond, Va., and there it was attached to the Twenty-first Georgia, Trimbel's brigade, Ewell's division of Jackson's corps. He was commissioned captain of his company. He fought in all the battles in which Jackson's corps participated until after the fight at Fredericksburg, including the valley campaign, in which were fought the battles of Front Royal, Winchester, Strausburg, Cross Keys and Port Republic. He was also engaged in several of the seven days' fights around Richmond, including Cold Harbor, where he was wounded by a shell, but continued to command his regiment (Twenty-first Georgia), and fought at Savage Station, White Oak Swamp and Malvern Hill. During the seven days' fight he commanded his regiment as senior captain with signal ability and courage. He fought Pope at Cedar Run and was engaged in the second battle of Manassas, Chantilly, Harper's Ferry, Sharpsburg, where he was slightly wounded, and Fredericksburg, where he also commanded his regiment, and for gallantry displayed on the field under the eyes of Stonewall Jackson and Gen. D. H. Hill he was promoted to the rank of colonel. He next went to Richmond and held a personal interview with President Davis and the secretary of war, by whom he was ordered to Macon with instructions to recruit a regiment. He mustered into service fourteen companies, which were organized into the Sixty-sixth Georgia regiment and the Twenty-sixth Georgia battalion; of the latter his brother, John W. Nisbet, was made major, and the command of the regiment and battalion was given to Col. Nisbet. He proceeded with his command to Fort Cobb, in Florida, and later was ordered to Chickamauga, but did not reach the field until after the battle. He was placed in command of Walker's Georgia brigade and fought at the battle of Missionary Ridge, supporting the right wing under Cleburne. The army fell back to Dalton, and in May, 1864, began the celebrated Atlanta campaign. He fought at the battles of Resaca, New Hope Church, Kennesaw Mountain, Peachtree Creek, and on July 22, where he was made prisoner of war, near Atlanta. He was confined at Johnson's island, Lake Erie, until September, 1865. After undergoing four years of hard and self-sacrificing service in support of the Confederacy he returned to his home and again engaged in agricultural pursuits. He married Miss Mary E., daughter of Gen. John A. Young, of Charlotte, N. C. Miss Young was a relative of the historical families of Grahams, Davidsons, Brearlds and Ewings, and of Mrs. Stonewall Jackson. To them were born three daughters and one son, two of whom survive: Irene and Malvine. His wife died and he was again married to Miss Louise Wingfield Bailey, daughter of Gen. Armstrong Bailey, of Columbus, Ga. They have two children, James Cooper and Frances Lloyd. His service was again called for by the public in 1868, when he was elected to the house of representatives in the legislature, and served in that body during the sessions of 1869-70 and 1871. In 1877 he was elected secretary of the constitutional convention. He has since filled various positions of trust in his county and is a fitting representative of the progress and push of his age in North Georgia. Mrs. Nisbet is a lineal descendant of a revolutionary officer, being a granddaughter of Maj. Edward Lloyd, of Savannah. Maj. Lloyd entered the patriot army early in his youth, at the age of sixteen years. He was a lieutenant of artillery and lost an arm while in command of his company at the siege of Savannah in 1779, on the same day that the Count Pulaski was killed. He was afterward promoted to the rank of major. At the close of the war he organized an artillery company known as the Chatham artillery. This famous organization is still in existence, and was the first volunteer company organized in the United States after the war of the revolution. He married late in life, in 1810, at Athens, Ga., Mrs. Sarah Anderson Hatchett, a young, beautiful and brilliant widow who was on a visit to Georgia from her native state of Virginia. They had one child, the late Mrs. Gen. Armstrong Bailey, of Columbus, Ga., the mother of Mrs. Nisbet. Maj. Lloyd died at his summer home in Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., this state, in 1814. The Nisbet family, with their connections, justly rank among the most distinguished and illustrious in Georgia and the south, and for upward of three-quarters of a century have taken an active and prominent part in shaping the conduct of public affairs in this state. The family is particularly noted for high intellectual attainments, honorable motives, and has at all times possessed a high character for patriotism toward American institutions. Maj. Lloyd was an officer in the order of the Society of Cincinnati, which society was organized by Washington, membership being confined to officers of the revolution and to the oldest male descendants, an honor which now descends by right of inheritance to Cooper Nisbet, the eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. J. Cooper Nisbet.

DAWSON COUNTY.

REUBEN S. ANDERSON, farmer, McKee, Dawson Co., Ga., son of Jordan and Lusena (Stone) Anderson, was born in what is now Dawson county, in 1843. His parents were of English descent and born in South Carolina. After their marriage they came to Georgia and "entered" the land now owned and occupied by the subject of this sketch, under government authority, and the property has remained in the family ever since. Mr. Anderson's mother died on the place in 1880 and his father Aug. 5, 1882. To them eight children were born: William, deceased; Robert, killed during the war in the army; Frances, wife of John Kelley; James P., in Alabama; Reuben S., the subject of this sketch; Emeline, wife of Andrew J. Hide; Jordan L., and Jackson R. Mr. Anderson was reared on the farm and received only the limited education obtainable in the common schools of the county. In 1863 he enlisted in the Union army, in Company A, Capt. Rogers, of Michigan, which was part of the First Georgia regiment, union troops, organized in Tennessee. He remained with this command until the surrender at Appomattox, when he returned to the old homestead and engaged in farming and stock raising, in which he has more than realized his most sanguine expectations. On his farm is a very fine water power, which he has made use of by building on it a fine corn and wheat mill. Besides he operates a cotton gin and a threshing machine. Upright and scrupulously honorable in all his dealings, he enjoys the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Anderson was married Aug. 31, 1865, to Miss Melinda, daughter of John and Mary (Hill) Green, who were born and married in South Carolina, and early in life moved to Georgia and settled in Lumpkin county (now Dawson). To them nine children were born: Sarah; Carolina; Bishop, who died in the army; Jane; Monroe, who died in the army; Farlena; Melinda, wife of the subject of this sketch, and two who died in infancy. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Anderson eight are living: John B., born June 5, 1866; Mary E., born Sept. 21, 1867, wife of Levi Pinyon; Sarah C., born Nov. 21, 1871, wife of Doyle Burt; Samuel A., born Nov. 28, 1873; Lydia C., born Aug. 15, 1875, wife of Jasper Henry; Laura E., born July 13, 1878; Walter M., born Oct. 27, 1882, and Bishop N., born Feb. 21, 1885. Mr. Anderson is a staunch republican, and himself and wife are active members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

WILLIAM B. BURDINE, farmer, Yellow Creek, Dawson Co., Ga., son of James and Nancy (Bowen) Burdine, was born in Pickens district, S. C., March 31, 1836. His parents were natives of South Carolina, and his father, of Irish descent, was a blacksmith by trade, and also conducted a farm. They both died in South Carolina, having raised a family of six children: William B., the subject of this sketch; Jane, Martin, James, John, killed while in the army during the war, and Thomas, also killed while serving in the army. Mr. Burdine was reared on the farm and learned the trade of a blacksmith under his father. So necessary were his services on the farm and in the shop that he received but little educational advantages. When he became of age he worked at his trade, to which he added wagon-making. In 1870 he moved to Dawson county and located on his present farm, containing 800 acres, lying on the Etowah river, 150 acres of which are bottom land. This he has paid for and improved out of his surplus earnings. He has confined his energies and entire attention to the homestead and his private affairs and is perfectly content with the results. Surrounded by an affectionate family and possessing the confidence and esteem of all who know him, he is spending the closing years of his life in quiet and comfort. Mr. Burdine was married in 1863 to Miss Lucinda Putnam, daughter of Abner and Hannah Putnam. To them the following children—all living—have been born: James A.; Hannah, wife of Lody Redd; Jane; William L.; Martin; Nancy, wife of John Roper; Isabella, wife of Wheeler Hill, sheriff of Dawson county; Martha, wife of Thomas Hubbard; William R., Thomas, Mary and Rebecca. He is a staunch democrat and a member of the I. O. O. F., and himself and wife are consistent and much appreciated members of the Baptist church. Eleven of the children are also members of the Baptist church.

BALAAM HARBAN, county ordinary, Dawsonville, Dawson Co., Ga., son of Nathaniel and Barbara (Maldan) Harban, was born in South Carolina Feb. 25, 1828. His great-great-grandfather on his father's side emigrated from England to this country, and his grandfather, Samuel Harban, was a native of South Carolina. Mr. Harban's father was also born in that state, came to Georgia in 1828 and settled among the Indians. While he made farming his chief reliance for a livelihood, he was an expert blacksmith, which trade he worked at and repaired guns for the Indians. His mother was born in South Carolina, and was descended from early Scotch settlers. They raised ten children to become heads of families. The children born to them were: Samuel; James; Susan, wife of A. J. Spriggs; John, died with fever during the war; Tyra; Balaam, the subject of this sketch; Nathaniel W.; Benjamin; Jesse, and Lucinda E., wife of James P. Howard. His father died in February, 1865, and his mother in 1874. Mr. Harban was reared on the farm and educated at the near-by country schools. Ambitious of adventure, and to secure wealth, he left his home, January, 1852, for California. Going by way of Cuba—he spent eight days on the island—he landed in San Francisco forty days after leaving home. Leaving that city he went to Sacramento, and thence via Colona and Georgetown to Nevada, and stopped at Alpha, Nevada Co., where he remained about five years. During the greater part of this time he worked a mine of his own, and the remainder of the time he worked at the carpenter's trade. In December, 1860, he returned home and commenced farming, which he pursued until 1862, when he enlisted in Capt. Pierce's company, Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment. The regiment first went to Cartersville, then to Chattanooga and Loudon, Tenn., whence it went into Kentucky, and back to Cumberland gap; skirmishing and fighting more or less throughout the campaign. He was taken sick at the "Gap" and was sent home. At the end of thirty days, however, he returned to his command, which was at Loudon, Tenn. He continued with the army, faithfully discharging his duties as a soldier until the army went under Gen. Hood into Tennessee; was taken prisoner at Franklin and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he was held until the surrender. Coming home he engaged in farming, and in addition has worked at blacksmithing and carpentering. His fellow-citizens expressed their appreciation of his integrity and capabilities by electing him ordinary of the county in 1892, the responsible duties of which he discharged acceptably and with conscientious fidelity. Mr. Harban was married March 10, 1861, to Miss Mary Anne, daughter of Joseph and Matilda Grogan, by whom he had the following children: Mary W., wife of William H. Bird; Samuel J.; Martha, deceased; Susan, wife of W. J. Turner, and Joseph N. The mother of these died in 1873, and the following year he married Mohala M., a sister of his first wife, who has borne him five children: Jesse B., Andrew C., Minnie M., Barbara M., and George W. In politics Mr. Harban is a democrat. Himself and wife are devout members of the Baptist church.

HENRY HOUSER, hotel man, Dawsonville, Dawson Co., Ga., son of David and Jane (Dickson) Houser, was born in Yorkville district, S. C., in 1820. His paternal grandfather, Henry Houser, was a native of Germany, and emigrated to America before the revolutionary war. He lived a short time in Boston, Mass., and then went to Pittsburg, Pa. He was a furnace builder by trade, and built the first sixteen furnaces in that state. Subsequently, he moved to Yorkville, S. C., where he continued to work at his trade, and finally settled on King creek, where he died. Mr. Houser's father was born in Pennsylvania, and followed farming and gold-mining through life. His maternal grandfather, Dickson, was born in Dublin, Ireland, and came to this country when quite young with his parents, who settled in New Jersey. Here the mother of the subject of this sketch was born. Seven children were born to Mr. Houser's parents: Henry, the subject of this sketch; Sarah, deceased; David; Elizabeth; Robert, killed during the late war; Johnson, killed at Seven Pines, and Thomas. Mr. Houser remained at home until he was seventeen years old, when he engaged to work with a millwright, to learn the trade. After that he entered upon a general trading life, in which he was phenomenally successful, and soon became the largest slave dealer in North Georgia. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. N. D. Tabor, Eleventh Georgia cavalry. He participated in every battle in which his regiment was engaged, performing arduous and efficient service, and remained in the army until the surrender. In 1887 he built a fine, large hotel in Dawsonville, and to the management of that he has devoted his time and attention since that time. Mr. Houser was married March 4, 1864, to Sarah, daughter of Elijah and Jane (Fields) Castleberry. He is an uncompromising democrat, a master Mason and a consistent and influential member of the Baptist church.

VIRGIL D. MONROE, farmer, Dixon, Dawson Co., Ga., son of Daniel P. and Carey A. (Dodson) Monroe, was born in Haywood county, N. C., June 9, 1841. His father, of Irish descent, was born in South Carolina, and his mother, of Scotch descent, was born in North Carolina. In 1844 his father came to Georgia and settled in Habersham county, thence to Cherokee, and finally to Lumpkin county, settling on land now included in Dawson county. By profession he was a school teacher—but in connection with teaching, he managed a small farm, and engaged in wagon-making—and was conceded to be the best mechanic in that line in the county. He was recognized as a man of more than ordinary ability, and attained to considerable prominence. He was elected clerk of the superior court five terms successively, county judge one term, and in 1866 was elected to the state convention. The following children were born to him: Mary M., deceased; Van Buren H., deceased; Samuel L., deceased; Martha C.; Daniel G.; Virgil D., the subject of this sketch; John W., deceased; Louisa A., and Marion R. His wife died in 1879 and he in 1881. Mr. Virgil D. Monroe was reared a farmer, and making farming his life occupation, is regarded as one of the best, as he has certainly been one of the most successful in the county. In 1864 he enlisted in Company H, Capt. W. A. Twiggs, Fifth Tennessee Mounted infantry, Col. S. B. Boyd, Union army. He is one of the oldest settlers of Dawson county, and has been foremost and active in promoting every movement to improve the town and develop the resources of the county. For several years he was a notary public, and ex-officio justice of the peace, and ordinary of the county four years. He is one of the county's solidest and most substantial citizens. In 1894 he moved from Dawsonville to the southeastern part of the county, where he owns a large and magnificent tract of land. Mr. Monroe was married in 1866 to Miss Susan—born Jan. 20, 1846—daughter of William and Rachel (Darnell) Kelly, who has borne him four children: Amanda L., wife of James H. Owens; Mary M.; Emma L., and an infant child, deceased. He is an uncompromising republican, a member of the I. O. O. F., and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

JOHN PALMOUR, farmer-capitalist, Dougherty, Dawson Co., Ga., son of John and Nancy (Boon) Palmour, was born in Hall county, Ga., June 10, 1829. His parents were born in South Carolina, and while yet young, came to Georgia and settled in Hall county. Subsequently he moved to Lumpkin (now Dawson) county, and engaged in farming. When he settled on the place the Indians were nearly as numerous in northeast Georgia as the whites are now, and the country nearly an unbroken forest. The Indians, however, Mr. Palmour says, were very peaceable, and spent their time hunting—but would steal corn and other farm products. His father died in 1836. To him seven children were born: Ratcliffe; Silas, deceased; John, the subject of this sketch; Lucinda; Narcissus; Elizabeth and Sally. Mr. Palmour—a genuine pioneer—was raised on the farm. Soon after the late war began he enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. Russell, which was a part of Col. Findlay's regiment. He was made first lieutenant of the company, and with it did efficient service. Near the close of the war he was elected a justice of the inferior court, and came home. He has represented his county in the general assembly six sessions, and ranks very high in political circles. He has a very large, excellently well-located farm, which is one of the best-equipped and best-arranged of any in that part of the state, on which he has built and operated a large, first-class grist mill. While profitably managing these interests he has also been profitably interested in other important enterprises. He owns a large brick hotel in Gainesville, Hall Co., Ga., and scattered throughout northeast Georgia, he owns various large bodies of valuable mineral lands. Of extensive information and great will power, he exercises a potent influence politically and otherwise. Mr. Palmour was married March 16, 1849, to Miss Caroline Couch—born March 16, 1834—daughter of Terry and Agnes Couch; a union which has been blessed with fifteen children, of whom the following survive: Benjamin, life insurance agent; Silas, farmer; William A., a leading physician of Gainesville, Ga.; Edgar, farmer, and Homer, dentist, Dougherty, Ga.; Oscar, student, North Georgia Agricultural college, Dahlonega, Ga.; John L., traveling in the west; Raymond, remaining at home; Sallie, wife of Richard Block; Amanda, wife of J. D. Wheelchel, and Malinda, wife of R. A. Gober. Messrs. Block and Gober are merchants, and Mr. J. D. Wheelchel is a farmer. Mr. Palmour is an unyielding democrat, and a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

AMOS ROPER, farmer, Yellow Creek, Dawson Co., Ga., son of Tyre and Melinda (Ednes) Roper, was born in Pickens district, S. C., Dec. 23, 1845. His parents were natives of South Carolina, and his father was a prosperous farmer and Baptist minister of considerable prominence. They were the parents of nine children: Rachel, Jesse, Rebecca, Samuel, Eliza, Annie; Amos, the subject of this sketch; Mary, and Vashti. Mr. Roper was reared on the farm and educated at the common schools of the district. He enlisted in 1862 in Company H (Capt. Philpot), Second South Carolina regiment, and with his regiment participated in many important battles—among them, the Wilderness and Darbytown. At the last-named battle he was wounded, Oct. 7, 1864, and was taken to Jackson. After receiving his discharge he returned to South Carolina, and to farming. In 1875 he came to Georgia and bought the farm in Dawson county on which he now lives, which contains 2,140 acres. He came out of the war with only $16, and this large farm with its capacious and substantial improvements are the fruits of his hard work and extraordinary good management. In 1891 he was elected tax collector and served one term. He is energetic and enterprising, and always on the alert—always ready—to lend a helping hand to measures calculated to benefit the county. Mr. Roper was married Dec. 31, 1868, to Mary E., daughter of Cornelius and Harriet (Lynch) Keith, of old South Carolina families. Six children have blessed this union: John A., married Nancy Burdine; Annie, wife of William M. Gentry; Harriet, wife of Andrew Turner; Sarah, Cornelia, and Foster. He is a very strong and enthusiastic populist, and himself and wife are working and very prominent members of the Baptist church.

JOHAN B. THOMAS, journalist, Dawsonville, Dawson Co., Ga., son of William H. and Mary (Stegall) Thomas, was born in Lumpkin county, Ga., March 28, 1847. He is of Scotch-Welsh descent, and his parents were natives, respectively, of North Carolina and Georgia. His father was a farmer and a pioneer settler of North Georgia, and died in 1868; and his mother died in 1884. To them eight children were born: Elizabeth (deceased); Sarah (deceased); William C.; John B., the subject of this sketch; California (deceased); Martha J., wife of Joseph W. Woodward; and Henry H. Mr. Thomas learned the printer's art when a mere boy, and worked at the trade until just after the beginning of the war between the states. In 1862, when not quite sixteen years of age he enlisted in Company C (Capt. R. R. Asbury), Fifty-second Georgia regiment, and went to the front.

The regiment was ordered to Knoxville, accompanied Gen. Bragg in the Kentucky campaign, and participated in the battles of Tazewell, Tenn., and Frankfort, Ky. He was at the siege of Vicksburg, and in the battles of Lookout mountain and Missionary ridge. His regiment was with the army from Dalton toward Atlanta, and took an active part in the campaign. At Kennesaw mountain he was captured and sent to Camp Chase, Cincinnati, and was confined there until the close of the war. After his release he went to Kentucky where he stopped awhile, and then went to Mississippi, where he was foreman of a bridge gang about a year. Returning to his Lumpkin county home he engaged in the newspaper business in Dahlonega. In 1872 he went to Utah, and after engaging in mining four years returned to Dahlonega and resumed the newspaper business. In 1888 he sold out and embarked in mining in Lumpkin county, and followed it two years, when he came to Dawsonville and bought a printing office and material, and has devoted his time and attention since to the permanent establishment of the "Dawson County Advertiser." He is also agent for Dawson county for the Georgia immigration bureau. Mr. Thomas is energetic and progressive, well posted and public spirited, and all the time on the alert to advance the best interests of Dawson county. Mr. Thomas was married Oct. 8, 1871, to Miss Julia, daughter of Thomas H. Kilgore, by whom he had one child which died in infancy—and July 27, 1872, the mother died. In 1879 he contracted a second marriage, with Miss Martha J., daughter of Benjamin T. White, a union which has been blessed with five children: Mary T., born Jan. 9, 1880; William T., born Dec. 5, 1883; Anna J., born March 21, 1885; Maude, born in 1889; and Ruth, born Sept. 30, 1893. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

DECATUR COUNTY.

B. B. BOWER. For fourteen years, by successive re-election, Byron B. Bower, Bainbridge, Decatur Co., Ga., has been the popular and honored presiding judge of the superior courts of Albany circuit, comprising Baker, Calhoun, Decatur, Dougherty, Mitchell and Worth counties. Judge Bower descends from the sturdy stock which settled New England, and his great-grandfather, John B. Bower, was a resident of Providence, R. I., during the revolutionary war, where Isaac Bower, the judge's grandfather was born. When he was eighteen years of age, he came on a visit to relatives in Georgia, and was so favorably impressed that he determined to make his home here. He married a lady of Baldwin county and made his home in Milledgeville, where he lived all his life, except an interval of five years in Arkansas, raised a family, and died in 1863. The judge's father, Isaac B. Bower, studied law and was admitted to the bar in Talbotton, Talbot Co., Ga. He was married in Talbot county July 8, 1838, to Miss Adeline D. Breedlove, and the next year moved to Early county, where he purchased and conducted a plantation in connection with his law practice. After a short residence there near Fort Gaines he located in Cuthbert, Randolph Co., in 1854, where he remained until 1864, continuing the practice of his profession and the supervision of his farm. From 1864 to 1866 he lived in the adjoining county of Miller and became interested and very prominent in politics, and represented the county in the constitutional convention of 1865 and in the state senate. In 1866 he moved to Bainbridge, which has since been his home, where his father died Oct. 3, 1873, during a yellow fever epidemic. He was a man of sterling character and was specially honored in the Georgia reports by a biographical sketch from the pen of Hon. Richard H. Clark, judge of Stone Mountain circuit—his life-long friend. He raised a family of seven children: Byron B., Marcene, killed at the Black and White station fight during the war; John, deceased; Jamthus, merchant, Decatur county; Euzema, who moved to Los Angeles, Cal., after having been prominently identified with state politics many years, during which he served a term in the state senate; Richmond M., merchant, Decatur county; Ceneilla, wife of Rev. W. M. McAlexander, a Presbyterian divine, Memphis, Tenn. Judge Bower's mother is still living and is a member of his family. Judge Bower was born in Talbotton Sept. 26, 1839, began the study of law at the age of seventeen and a year later was admitted to the bar. After a few months' practice with his father he located in Newton, Baker Co., and although quite young took an active interest in politics. The year following he was elected justice of the peace; and six days before he attained his majority he was elected ordinary of the county, defeating a gentleman who was backed by the influence of the late Senator Colquitt. This was in September, 1860, and when, the following winter, the war spirit developed he enlisted as a private in the Cuthbert Rifles, one of the first companies at Tuscaloosa. The next year he suffered a severe attack of pneumonia while on duty at Cumberland gap, and when convalescent returned home. But the need of his country was too pressing for him to remain contented at home, and a few months later found him again in the field, this time a member of Company B, Eighth Georgia cavalry. At the taking of Plymouth, N. C., he led the company as captain, having previously served as its orderly sergeant, and the regiment as adjutant. Soon after the company was ordered to join Gen. Lee's army, and he was thenceforth in conflict almost daily about Petersburg. He participated in the famous Hampton beef raid when that daring and valorous general stampeded 3,000 beeves from a point immediately in the rear and within one mile of Grant's headquarters. After the surrender Mr. Bower settled in Miller county, was elected county judge and served until 1868, when he removed to Bainbridge, which has since been his home. In 1882 he was one of the five candidates before the general assembly for judge of the Albany circuit, and after a spirited contest he was elected on the eighth ballot to fill an unexpired term of two years. So satisfactorily and efficiently has he discharged the responsible duties of his office that he has been re-elected three times since without opposition. Judge Bower was married in Bainbridge in June, 1871, to Miss Ellen L. Dickenson, formerly of Virginia, a union which has been blessed with nine children, of whom six are living: Byron B., Jr., in senior class university of Georgia, reputed to be one of the brightest members of the class; Evergiline Vestalgar, also a student at the university of Georgia; Gordon, Don Roland, Jack, and Lucien Conway. The very estimable mother of these died in March, 1885, and the following year her sister Annie was called upon to assume the duties of the head of the judge's household, to be called away by death a few months later. It is almost superfluous to add that the judge is an unswerving democrat; he is also a member of the masonic fraternity, and of the Methodist church.

JOHN H. BOYETT, JR., son of John H. and Elizabeth (Trawick) Boyett, was born June 7, 1864, in the western part of Decatur county, Ga. John's parents had four children: Isaac L., a planter; Elizabeth, single, with brother; Julia Ann (Mrs. Samuel Brunson, Decatur county) and John. The Boyetts are of Irish origin and members of the family came to this country among its earliest settlers. Isaac Boyett, John's grandfather, was a soldier in the Indian wars. He came to Georgia and settled in the western part of Decatur county, being one of the three families there in 1836. He lived and died on a plantation then settled. The Trawicks are of Welsh descent, the branch in Georgia coming from North Carolina. Mr. Boyett's grandfather Trawick served under Gen. Jackson, and while in this service helped to blaze the first road from the Carolinas into Georgia, afterward known as the "Three Notch Road," or Jackson's trail. John H. Boyett, his father, was born in North Carolina, and came to Georgia with the family. In 1853 he and Elizabeth Trawick were married, and to them were born four children. Mr. Boyett's father enlisted as a member of Company A, Fifty-first Georgia regiment in May, 1861, and served in Virginia. He was in many hard-fought battles, was wounded once and once captured and passed ninety days in prison. While doing picket duty in Shenandoah valley, just before day, Oct. 19, 1864, he was shot dead by a Federal picket and was buried where he fell. His devoted widow still cherishes his memory, making her home among her children awaiting her summons to join him. Mr. Boyett grew to manhood in his native country, enjoying but limited educational advantages, in fact the most of his education has been picked up, as it were, since he attained to man's estate. His first business venture was with a brother in 1889 at the home place, and known as Boyettville. As Boyett Brothers they conducted a general merchandise business until Aug. 1, 1891, when he purchased a half interest in the general merchandise business of S. D. Cherry at Donalsonville, the firm being Cherry & Boyett, with flattering promise of splendid success. He is a democrat and for four years was a member of the county democratic executive committee and a notary public. Mr. Boyett is held in high estimation as a citizen and business man.

S. J. CHESNUT, M. D., son of R. G. and Mary (King) Chesnut, was born in Bainbridge, Ga., Nov. 16, 1862. The Chesnuts were of Irish and the Kings of Scotch descent. The lineage of the latter can be traced to the famous McDonald clan in Scotland. Of the Chesnut family three brothers came from Ireland—one settling in North Carolina, one in South Carolina and the other in the west. The brother which settled in South Carolina was the great-grandfather of Dr. Chesnut. David, his grandfather, moved to and settled in Newton county, Ga., where he reared his family. The doctor's father late in the forties went from Newton county to Attapulugus, Decatur Co., to take charge of the school there as principal—that then being a somewhat famous school center. There he married his first wife, a Miss Donalson (of a pioneer family), by whom he had three children: C. E., planter, Decatur county; W. A., farmer, De Kalb county, Ga., and Mrs. E. G. Wilson, Decatur county. This wife died in 1855, and Mr. Chesnut married his second wife (Mary King) in Americus, Ga., in 1860, who also bore him three children: R. G., railroader, Ocala, Fla.; S. J., physician, and David K., who died in infancy. Mr. Chesnut was a graduate of Erskine college, a thoroughly educated man and a thorough educator himself. His life-work was that of a teacher, and he was considered one of the very best in the south. He was a democrat in principle. Dr. Chesnut had the benefit of the scholarly instruction his father could impart and was trained under his wise guidance and discipline at Attapulugus. In 1886 he attended a session of the Peabody Normal school at Atlanta. In 1884 he taught school at Whigham and subsequently at other places—two years at Attapulugus—until 1889. In the fall of that year he entered the medical department of the university of Maryland, where he remained three years, graduating in 1892. Returning home he was accepted as a partner by Dr.

L. H. Peacock, with whom he had passed his vacation, taking a high rank and establishing an enviable reputation in his profession. Nov. 13, 1893, Dr. Chesnut married Ella, daughter of C. L. Harrell. He is a democrat in politics and in religious faith a Methodist, although his family are Presbyterians. He is also a Knight of Pythias.

CURRY. This is also one of the pioneer families of Decatur county, one whose numerous representatives have for many years imparted strength and solidity to the framework of its political and social life. Of Scotch Presbyterian stock, their austere religiosity and unyielding opposition to immorality in all its forms have always been most marked. The progenitor of this branch of the family in this country was Duncan Curry, who came from Argyleshire, Scotland, before the revolutionary war and settled in North Carolina. During that memorable conflict, while at home for a brief period, he was murdered by a band of guerrillas, led by one Cunningham. This sad event occurred a few months before the head of this family, Duncan Curry, was born. When only seven years of age his mother died and he was bound out to a family named McPherson, and by them apprenticed to a gunsmith. When eighteen years old, having served his apprenticeship, he came to Telfair county, Ga., where he married a Miss Sarah Smith, and where he lived until 1823, when with a family of six children he removed to Decatur county, Ga., and settled near the site of the present town of Climax. He resided here until his death, February, 1849. Mrs. Curry died in 1834. Mr. Curry was a man of excellent sense, an active, ardent whig and was frequently the chosen standard-bearer of the party and served both Telfair and Decatur counties in the general assembly. Nine children were born to this pioneer couple, all of whom are dead excepting Dr. Joshua Curry of Bainbridge. They were: Mary, who married David Holloman; Cassandra, Archibald, Duncan, Calvin, Martin L., Joshua C., Sarah J. (Mrs. Dr. Martin R. Martin) and Margaret, who married Edward Love. Of these we further mention Duncan and Calvin.

Duncan Curry was born in Telfair county, Ga., March 6, 1818. Near Quincy, Fla., Oct. 23, 1845, he married Mary Jane Love, of a North Carolina family which settled in Florida in 1824. His wife is still living. They were the happy parents of eleven children: Duncan, Sallie (deceased), Julia F., Marion H., Mary Ann (Mrs. Alex. Maxwell, Hico, Tex.), Joseph, Margaret (deceased), Janey (Mrs. Eugene B. Townsend, Climax), Mary L. (Mrs. Manton Alford, Marion county, S. C.) and Daniel L. The head of this family died April 26, 1886. He was a quiet man, true to his convictions and highly esteemed, and with the exception of the time of the war, devoted the years of his life to agricultural pursuits. He was an excellent farmer and wise manager. During the late war he was importuned to accept the captaincy of a company, and yielding to the general desire, he led to the field Company F, Fiftieth Georgia regiment, and participated in the Second Manassas and Fredericksburg battles. Retiring on a certificate of disability, he returned home and was made captain of commissary work and did efficient service until the war ended.

Calvin A. Curry was born in Telfair county, Ga., May 8, 1820, and Feb. 9, 1843, at Quincy, Fla., married Jane E. Gregory, by whom he had ten children, seven of whom are living: D. B., J. G., H. C., A. B., C. H., A. D. and Amittie S. (Mrs. J. H. Martin, Hawkinsville, Ga.). Mr. Curry died of brain fever April 21, 1867, but his wife is still living. Mr. Curry was always greatly interested in public affairs and was an ardent whig partisan, but could not be induced to accept an office. The Currys, however, were best known in their religious life; they were the pioneers of Presbyterianism in Decatur county, and were noted for their devotion to its teachings. Calvin was especially active and concerned for the welfare of the church, and always insisted on having a good minister in the community. Indeed, to enumerate the many virtues of this member among a family so noted for piety, would require more space than can be devoted to this sketch. His was indeed a golden character, unbending in its integrity, relentless in its justice, spotless in its purity. The Bible was the absolute law of its household, and family prayers always preceded the day's duties. Even his slaves were held responsible for their "shorter catechism," he himself hearing them recite every Sunday morning. His children were raised in the most careful manner and are known as persons of the highest character.

Henry C. Curry, son of Calvin A. and Jane E. (Gregory) Curry, was born Nov. 20, 1850, and received his education under the tutorship of Rev. H. F. Hoyl. He was married in Camilla, Ga., April 30, 1878, to Miss S. E. McElveen, by whom he has two sons: H. H. and C. A. Mr. Curry taught school successfully for several years and then conducted a general merchandise store in Bainbridge. In 1886 he was appointed agent for the Alabama Midland and the Savannah, Florida & Western railways at Bainbridge, a position he still holds to the entire satisfaction of the corporations and the public. He is an active member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an elder, and is secretary of Orion lodge, F. & A. M.

S. H. DICKENSON. It affords the biographer much pleasure to note in this sketch the essential points in the history of a man who, for nearly sixty years, was one of Decatur county's most respected citizens. Coming to the county in 1835, he was a potent factor in its development, and by untiring industry and good business judgment he succeeded in making himself comfortable in the world's goods, and in the declining years of his life enjoyed the hard, well-earned fruit of his toil. Mr. Dickenson was a scion of an old Virginia family, whose home for many generations has been in Caroline county, in that state. Thomas, the father of S. H., was married, in that county, to Annie Parker, by whom he had nine children: Matilda, S. H., John P., William, Thomas, Lucy, George, Mary and Annie, of whom S. H. was the last to depart this life. Mr. Dickenson was born in Caroline county Sept. 15, 1815. At the age of twenty, in company with a younger brother, he came to Decatur county, having been induced to do so by an uncle, John I. Dickenson, who was greatly interested in the then new and all-absorbing silk craze. The idea was to introduce the Morus multicaulis—or many-leaved mulberry—extensively used for feeding silk-worms. The death of the uncle the next year caused the collapse of the scheme. Mr. Dickenson, however, concluded to remain in the south, and, so, after spending a year in Florida, he built a mill on the Flint river, now just across from Bainbridge. In consequence of the hard times which followed the panic of 1837, a failure of this venture was caused. Nothing daunted, Mr. D. moved his mill to Tallahassee, Fla., where he continued milling for ten years. In 1850 he bought a small tract of land on the Chattahoochee river, directly west of Bainbridge, erected his mill on it, and in connection with it established a general merchandise store. His success exceeded his most sanguine anticipation. From time to time he added to his property, until he had some 5,000 acres of valuable land and a fine milling property. Since 1880 the cares of his business have been largely assumed by one of his sons—Mr. Dickenson gradually retiring from active control. In 1886 he purchased a beautiful site, and built an elegant house in the quaint old county-seat of Decatur, where he resided until his death, Dec. 27, 1894. The energy and independence of Mr. Dickenson are finely illustrated by the following incident. In the early seventies he became greatly annoyed because of unjust discrimination and the negligence of the steam-boat company controlling the river navigation. He determined to teach the company a lesson—and he did. Investing $10,000 in a boat, he started a competing line, cut prices, and so reduced the company's profit that they were glad to buy him out at a high figure, and such was the impressiveness of the lesson that the freight-rates and service have been satisfactory from that day to this. Feb. 23, 1873, while living near Tallahassee, Mr. Dickenson was married to Julia A. Hail, who survives him. To them ten children have been born, four of whom only survive—E. T. C., merchant, Greenwood, Fla.; G. H., in charge of the old plantation; Lulu L., widow of Julian Fleming, deceased, formerly a lawyer of Augusta, Ga., who with her daughter, resides at the old home; and J. L., a merchant at Iron City, Decatur Co. Mr. Dickenson was a democrat, and a thoroughgoing Methodist of forty years' standing.

ISAIAH GRIFFIN, a thrifty planter, and a much-respected citizen, is the son of Len and Louisa (George) Griffin, and was born in Decatur county, Ga., Nov. 7, 1837. His grandfather, James Griffin, and his family, lived, early in the century, in Twiggs county, Ga. One morning, as he opened his door at daybreak, he was shot dead by some Indians, leaving a widow and five children, four boys—James, Len, William, and Mitchell, and a girl, Linnie—all of whom are dead. In 1825, Mr. Griffin's father, Len, visited Decatur county and bought some land, and in 1826 the entire family removed to Decatur county. Mr. Len Griffin grew to manhood in the county, and married Louisa George, by whom he had three children: Isaac; Martha J., Mrs. B. F. Hines, widow, near Bainbridge, and I. M., Jr., a planter in Decatur county. Losing his first wife, Mr. Griffin married a Miss Catharine Hines, by whom he had six children. Isaiah Griffin has been married four times. In 1861 he was married to Rachael Lasseter, by whom he had one child—L. E.—now in Florida. His second wife was Lucy Hunnewell, who bore him no children. For his third wife he married Mrs. Dr. Skinner, by whom he had two children: Hunnewell and Mattaner, both at home. After the death of this wife, Mr. Griffin married Mrs. L. S. Wright, who has had no children. After the war, Mr. Griffin was elected tax collector and served two terms. He is a democrat, a member of the Methodist church, and a master Mason.

W. W. HARRELL enjoys the unique distinction of being the oldest native-born citizen of Decatur county—having been born Oct. 17, 1822, at a point eleven miles southeast of Bainbridge, then a mere trading post known as Fort Hughes, so named in commemoration of the killing there, by the Indians, of a fifer named Hughes. The name of Harrell is indelibly written on every page of the annals of Decatur county. Energetic, enterprising, aggressive, the members of the family have so impressed their personality on the county that no history would be complete without honorable mention of the name. Business ability being the prominent characteristic of the family, solid facts, concisely and pointedly presented, will form the staple of this sketch. Jacob Harrell, grandfather of W. W. Harrell, came from North Carolina in the latter part of the last century and settled in Pulaski county, Ga., but in 1821, with his wife, moved to Decatur county and settled eleven miles southeast of Bainbridge. The original plantation is now in the possession of W. W. Harrell. The parents of W. W. Harrell, John and Sarah (Brock) Harrell, had been married just before the removal to Decatur county. Five children were born to them: W. W., the eldest; Mary, widow of James Bird; John; Martha, widow of James Thomas, and Jacob, all now living in Decatur county. The father of this family was a shrewd and industrious planter, who, though poor in his youth, accumulated before middle age one of the finest properties in the county. At the close of the late war he released 250 negroes. He died in 1876, when seventy-five years and some months old; his wife died some years before. Mr. Harrell grew to manhood in a pioneer country, subject to all the disadvantages and hardships of the time and locality. Education was obtained almost on the "catch-as-catch-can" principle—that is, by attending school only two or three months in the year. He managed, however, to attain to such proficiency in knowledge of the "three R's," as, supplemented by his inborn shrewdness and business tact, has enabled him to successfully compete, in the struggle of life, with others whose early advantages were superior to his. Beginning as a planter near the old homestead, he, after an experience of eight years, bought the hotel property at Bainbridge, and served as "mine host" of the Decatur house for a number of years, operating in connection with it a livery business. Retiring from the hotel in 1859, he engaged in a number of enterprises—merchandising, running a stage line, keeping a livery stable, etc. In 1857 Mr. Harrell was elected sheriff of the county, serving in that capacity and as deputy until the war began, when he volunteered as a private in the First Georgia infantry, and served at Pensacola, Fla., and in West Virginia, until compelled to retire on a certificate of disability. His service, though brief, was none the less arduous and honorable. While absent he had been elected sheriff, in which office he served continuously until 1877, with the exception of a few months in 1872. A republican had been elected that year, but resigned, when Mr. Harrell was again elected. In 1877 he was elected to the house of representatives—rendering efficient and valuable service, and afterward retiring to private life. Since the war he has bestowed much attention to planting and milling; and, although past three score and ten, is active and vigorous, and operates two mills and several plantations, aggregating 2,300 acres. Col. Harrell was married June 29, 1843, to Ann B. Bird. To them six children have been born: John D., merchant, Bainbridge; Martha Isabella; W. J., doctor; a little boy, not named (deceased); Charles L., merchant, in company with John D., and Clifford, Mrs. Dr. W. D. Wilson, Bainbridge. Mrs. Harrell died July 28, 1882. Col. Harrell ranks as one of the staunchest of democrats, is a thorough-going Methodist, and as a Mason has been exalted to the royal arch degree.

JOHN D. HARRELL, United States marshal, southern district of Georgia, eldest child of W. W. Harrel, was born April 9, 1844. The common school education he was receiving was cut short by the civil war. In February, 1862, he enlisted as a private in Troop A, Fifth Georgia cavalry; soon after was made a corporal, and later was appointed second senior lieutenant, Company A, Twenty-ninth battalion, Georgia cavalry—his service being mostly guard duty on the Atlantic coast. He was on his way to Virginia at the time of the surrender, and was paroled at Augusta. Returning home he engaged as salesman until 1873, when, in company with his brother Charles, he embarked in a general merchandise business, in which he has continued. He is best known, however, by his civil service, to which his capabilities and superior qualifications were adapted. He has been sheriff of Decatur county; he then served a two years' term as clerk of the superior court, and after that a term of treasurer. For twenty-five years he has been a much valued and serviceable member of the city council—two years of the time as mayor. In 1884 he was elected to represent Decatur county in the general assembly, and served by re-election until 1889. While in that body he was chairman of the committee on railways and finances. He was appointed on the governor's staff, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, by Gov. H. D. McDaniel, and was reappointed by Govs. J. B. Gordon and W. J. Northen. He has been an active member of the democratic executive committee, second congressional district, and was appointed chief of special land service at Washington by Secretary of the Interior Department Hoke Smith; an honor which the demands of his business compelled him to decline. In 1894 he was appointed United States marshal for the southern district of Georgia by President Cleveland, and office whose duties he is discharging with his characteristic fidelity and efficiency. No commendatory remarks could add anything to such a well-rounded public career. Marshal Harrell was married in Burke county, Ga., Feb. 23, 1863, to Miss Annie E. Owens. Of their children, Annie R. is the widow of J. M. Terrell, who was a confidential traveling agent of the Western Union Telegraph company; Evelyn H. is the wife of R. A. McTyer, Bainbridge, and an infant, which died unnamed. He is a Knight of Pythias, a royal arch Mason, is grand senior deacon of the Grand lodge of master Masons, and is an active member of the Methodist church.

C. J. MUNNERLYN. If one should go to Decatur county on a mission of inquiry pertaining to its public affairs—past, present or future—he would at once be referred to Col. Munnerlyn, one of the best known characters of southwest Georgia, who for ten years has been the popular and exceptionally efficient ordinary of the county, his tenure of which will probably only terminate by death or total disability. The Munnerlyns are of Welsh-Irish origin, and are of the old colonial stock which gave the Carolinas their strongly marked character for self-reliance and independent spirit. During the war for independence, Col. Munnerlyn's grandfather and six of his brothers were in some one or other of the patriot armies. His immediate branch of the family settled in Marion county, S. C. His parents, Chas. Munnerlyn and Hannah Shackleford, were married in Georgetown, S. C., and in 1833 removed to Gadsden county, Fla. In 1837 they came to Decatur county, Ga., where Col. Munnerlyn's father had been a successful planter, and had accumulated a large property at the time of his death in 1856. His mother died in 1865. Col. Munnerlyn was an only child, and was born in Georgetown, S. C., Feb. 14, 1822. He was educated at Emory college, Oxford, Ga., and studied law under Judge A. B. Longstreet, its president, and was admitted to the bar. His taste, however, ran in another direction, and he never regularly entered the practice. Col. Munnerlyn's entrance upon public life was as a delegate to the secession convention, in which he cast an affirmative vote. While the convention was still in session the war-cloud burst, and he left and volunteered as a private in the First Georgia Volunteers, and served at Pensacola and in West Virginia. Failing health compelled him to return. Soon after his return he was elected to represent the second congressional district, and in February, 1862, took his seat in the first permanent congress of the Confederate States. Seeking re-election he was defeated, as was the entire Georgia delegation, the prime cause of which was their votes in favor of the conscript act, a very unpopular measure. It is a matter of interest to state that every man then defeated entered the army. Col. Munnerlyn entered Scott's battalion of cavalry as a private, but was soon detailed by Gen. Anderson on special service. Reporting to President Davis, whom he had known while in congress, he was given a major's commission and ordered to Florida, where he was to organize a regiment of reserves south of the then military line. It was the duty of these reserves to keep open the lines, and in every possible way to facilitate the collection and forwarding of supplies to the army in Virginia. This duty, faithfully performed, secured his promotion to a lieutenant-colonelcy, which he held at the surrender. In view of the uncertain status of affairs, Gen. Jones advised him to remain quiet and hold himself in readiness to facilitate the escape of any of the officers of the late Confederacy who might desire to leave the country. It thus became his privilege, in connection with Capt. J. G. Leslie, to aid in the escape of Judah P. Benjamin, the brilliant secretary of war. The war over, Col. Munnelyn devoted himself to farming until 1884, when he was elected ordinary of the county, to which he has since been continuously re-elected. Col. Munnerlyn was married in Charleston, S. C., Feb. 20, 1845, to Eugenia, daughter of James and Harriet Shackelford, a union which has been blessed with nine children: Mary (Mrs. I. B. English, Macon, Ga.); Harriet (widow of R. J. Binford), now living with her father; Eugenia, Mr. Dr. J. E. Ethridge, Macon, Ga.; Elma, Mrs. F. C. Ethridge, Macon, Ga.; Florrie, Mrs. J. B. Bethea, Bainbridge, Ga.; Charles, Donaldsonville, Ga.; and Pane, Birmingham, Ala. (both railway officials); and Calhoun, Decatur county. James, of Savannah, is deceased. Col. Munnerlyn is of course an old war horse of democracy. He is a member of the Methodist church and a royal arch Mason.

WILLIAM E. POWELL, a highly esteemed citizen and prosperous farmer living ten miles east of Bainbridge, Decatur Co., is a descendant of one of the very earliest of the pioneer families of southwest Georgia. His grandparents, William and Sarah (Turner) Powell, settled in Decatur county as early, possibly, as 1857, near where W. E. Powell now lives. The old frame cabin which made their rude but happy home is still standing in a well-preserved condition, almost revered by the family, and an object of interest and curiosity to all. The children of these worthy pioneers were: Kedar, Jane (who married a Trulock), Sarah (Mrs. Albert Cunningham), Margaret (Mrs. James McElven), Benj. F., William, and Louisa (Mrs. Dr. Bruce), all of whom are dead. William Powell, son of William and Sarah (Turner) Powell, was born in Decatur county Jan. 1, 1830, and was married Nov. 22, 1853, to a daughter of William and Mary (Compton) Donalson. To them the following children were born: William E.; G. D., Tampa, Fla.; Eugene (deceased); and Frederick M., Roseland, Fla. Mrs. Powell died July 20, 1884, and Mr. Powell married Mrs. Emma Knighton, by whom he had four children: Wight, Luellen, Jeff. Davis, and Ruth. Mr. Powell died May 29, 1892. He was a man of excellent traits of character, and a successful planter. He was a democrat and a consistent member of the Methodist church. William E. Powell, son of William Powell by his first wife, was born in Decatur county, Ga., Aug. 3, 1854, and grew to man's estate on the plantation he now cultivates. Dec. 30, 1879, he was married to Georgia E. Gainey, who also was a native of the county. She has borne him five children: Maude E., Mattie Lou, Ethel, Eola, and Marvin Eugene. Mr. Powell belongs to the democratic party, and is a member of the Methodist church.

C. H. THOMAS, one of Decatur county's leading citizens, is a prosperous merchant at Woodland, on the Chattahoochee branch of the Savannah, Florida & Western railway. He also operates, nearby, a saw-mill on an 1,800-acre tract of fine timber land. His grandfather, Hezekiah Thomas, came from Maryland and settled in South Carolina, where he married Mary Brooker. In 1829, with a small family he moved to Decatur county and settled in the Fowlton neighborhood, where he died after a long and useful life, in 1861, at the age of eighty-three. His wife died in 1873, at the age of eighty-six. Mr. Thomas' father was born in South Carolina, but grew to manhood in Georgia. He married in Baker county and settled in Fowlton, where at the age of sixty he died in 1871. His wife died when thirty-five years old, in 1864. They had six children: Melinda (deceased), C. H., J. M., J. C. (deceased), B. B., and E. M., all of whom reside in Decatur county. C. H. Thomas, the subject of this sketch, was born in Decatur county Aug. 16, 1847. When twenty-one he engaged in the mercantile business at Fowlton, which he continued with marked success there until 1892, when he removed to Woodland. Confiding his mercantile interests largely to the management of his brother, Mr. Thomas gives his attention to his milling business. Prior to the presidential campaign of 1892 Mr. Thomas had been an active and earnest democrat, but at that time with a large number of his fellow-citizens he became dissatisfied with the financial policy of the party, and became an equally ardent worker in the people's party ranks. In company with several others he became interested in "The Globe," published at Bainbridge, which voices the sentiments of the new party. He still owns a third interest in the enterprise. Jan. 18, 1882, Mr. Thomas married Beulah H., the accomplished daughter of Lucian Folsom, Centerville, Fla. The family of this lady is a branch of the noted New England Folsoms who came to this country from England in the seventeenth century and settled at Hingham, Mass. Mrs. Thomas has in her possession a genealogical tree showing the numerous branches of the family which she justly prizes very highly. The interesting fact may be stated here, with no breach of propriety, that the popular wife of our president, Mrs. Grover Cleveland, is a member of the same family. Mr. Thomas is a member of the Methodist church and a master Mason.

ANDREW J. TRULOCK, planter, is a member of one of the substantial early families of Decatur county. The family is of English origin, and first settled in Maryland. The grandfather of Mr. Trulock, Sutton Hines Trulock, came from Maryland to Darlington district, S. C., where he afterward married. With a small family he moved to Pulaski county, Ga., where he died. Sutton Hines Trulock, son of the above, was born in Darlington district, S. C., Oct. 23, 1800; and, with his brother, J. H., both single, came to Decatur county in 1826, and settled about twelve miles east of Bainbridge. Sept. 22, 1829, he married Jane Powell, born June 7, 1812, who was a member of a pioneer family. The offspring of this union were: Delia (Mrs. Dr. Elbert Peacock, Cairo, Ga.); Missouri B. (Mrs. John T. Harrell, deceased); Gordon B., merchant, Whigham, Ga.; Zimmerman, Whigham, Ga.; Mary L. (Mrs. J. W. Maxwell, Cairo, Ga.); Sallie D., single; and Andrew J. With the exception of twelve years' residence in Early county, the family have been continuously citizens of Decatur county. Mr. Trulock was a thrifty planter, a strong democratic partisan before and after the war, but never aspired to office. He died Nov. 3, 1878, and his widow died in 1882. Andrew J. Trulock, son of Sutton Hines and Jane (Powell) Trulock, was born in Early county, Ga., Oct. 13, 1846. When during the war a call was made for youths of seventeen and eighteen years of age, he enlisted in Company I, Third Georgia reserves, and saw service at Coosawhatchie, S. C., and Columbus, Ga., and in the ditches at Macon. He was also engaged in guarding Federal prisoners at Andersonville for about six months. Since the war Mr. Trulock has given his attention exclusively to planting, and is one of the most advanced and successful planters in the county. Nov. 9, 1882, he was married to Sallie J., a daughter of Dr. Henry Martin, a native of the county, by whom he has had four children: Paul Hines, Alice Martin, James Andrew, and Charlie Martin. Mr. Trulock is a democrat, and a member of the Presbyterian church.

W. W. WRIGHT is a prominent and prosperous warehouseman, Bainbridge, Ga., a citizen who has ever taken a lively interest and exerted an active influence in behalf of every movement promotive of the advancement of the "city of oaks." He is now, and has been since 1870, with a possible interval of a year or so, a member of the board of aldermen, and in 1885-6 was mayor. Mr. Wright is a son of John and Susan (Hoffman) Wright, of Henrico county, Va., for generations past the home of his ancestors. His parents had five children: Gustavus, farmer, Old Church, Va.; John Henry; Charles (deceased); W. W., Bainbridge; and George, Old Church, Va. His father was a merchant in early life and later a planter, and died March 17, 1878. His mother died June 30, 1882. W. W. Wright was born Jan. 29, 1844, in Hanover county, Va., and was reared on a farm. In 1863 he enlisted as a private in Company A, Twenty-fifth Virginia battalion. His service was mainly about the capital. At the battle of Sailor's creek, in April, 1865, he had the misfortune to be captured, and for three months was in the Federal prison at Newport News. Aug. 6, 1873, Mr. Wright was married to Miss Florence M. Maxwell, and to them have been born four children: Stella V., Florence (deceased), an infant (deceased), and William Wallace. Mr. Wright is a democrat, a Methodist, a Knight of Honor and a member of the Legion of Honor.

DE KALB COUNTY.

JOSEPH H. GREEN, physician and surgeon, Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., son of Dr. William and Rebecca F. (Sassnett) Green, was born in Sparta, Hancock county, Jan. 9, 1859. Both parents were natives of Hancock county; his mother was a niece of Rev. W. J. Sassnett, D. D., at one time professor at Emory college and later president of Lagrange Female college. Dr. Green received a good common-school education and when eighteen years of age began the study of medicine under his father and later with Dr. R. C. Word. He then attended lectures at the Southern Medical college, Atlanta, from which he graduated in March, 1881. He immediately located in Decatur, and in connection with his practice clerked in a drug store, but the following fall he went to Louisiana and settled in Morehouse parish, where he remained until 1883; his father having died in April, 1882, he returned to Decatur, which has been his home ever since. His recognized ability and skill and consequent success have enabled him to secure a liberal share of the patronage of De Kalb county and vicinity. Few practitioners of his age stand better with the profession or have attained to higher local reputation. Dr. Green married Miss Mollie, daughter of Alexander Little of Richmond, Va., who has borne him three children: Margaret O., Rebecca F. and S. Ulrich. He is a member of the National Union and a Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Presbyterian church. He is a stanch democrat.

WASHINGTON J. HOUSTON, retired railway official and farmer, Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., son of Oswald and Anna Louise (Shaw) Houston, was born in Abbeville district, Oct. 10, 1831. His parents were of Scotch-Irish and Welsh descent and both were native South Carolinians. Early in life his father migrated from South Carolina to Tennessee, moved thence in 1845 to Savannah, whence in 1846 he moved to Atlanta and engaged in merchandising on Decatur street, on or near the site of Mr. John Silvey's eight-story building. He built up a large and profitable trade and was prominent in all movements looking to the growth and prosperity of Atlanta, and active in all church and Sunday-school work. Soon after Atlanta was chartered as a city he was elected treasurer and was continued in the office a number of years. Mr. Houston began life as drayman and clerk for Mr. Jonathan Norcross soon after coming to Atlanta. His unusual business aptitude—his proficiency and efficiency—were flatteringly evidenced by his having been elected while yet a youth the cashier of the first bank started, and he enjoys the honor of receiving the first deposit ever made in a bank in Atlanta. He left the bank in 1851 and entered the employ of the Georgia railway as assistant agent, since which his active business life has been with railways. He next went to the Western & Atlantic (state) railway under Supt. Wadley and James F. Cooper and remained with it until the second year of Gov. Brown's administration, when he accepted the position of general passenger and freight agent of the Atlanta & West Point railway. In 1876 he resigned and retired to private life on his farm in De Kalb county—finally, as he then thought. But when Supt. G. J. Foreacre assumed the management of the (then) Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line railway he called for Mr. Houston's services as assistant, with the official title of general passenger and ticket agent. While acting in this capacity he was the first to reduce passenger fare from five to three cents per mile, which created no inconsiderable stir in railway circles. When the line became part of the Richmond & Danville system he declined the offer of general passenger agent because it would necessitate his removal to Richmond, but by special request he remained with the system as assistant general passenger agent at this end of the line for a year, and then permanently retired to his farm. Mr. Houston enjoys the distinguished honor of having suggested the organization of the railroad commission of Georgia, the bill for which was drafted at his request and pressed forward to adoption by Representative W. R. Rankin of Gordon county. Though urgently pressed by admiring friends and the press of the state to serve on the commission, he peremptorily declined. His action throughout was cordially endorsed by President Sibley of the Atlanta & Charlotte air line, his sanction being practically demonstrated by a large increase of salary. Appointed one of the commissioners to appraise the property of the Western & Atlantic railway before it was transferred to the present lessees, he rendered invaluable assistance to the state's attorneys in defeat of the betterment claim made by the old lessees, as it was his especial duty to prepare the rebuttal accounts, which were sustained by the commission. In November, 1893, he received, unsolicited, the appointment of chairman of a commission to negotiate a treaty with the Yuma Indians of southern California and Arizona. A treaty was submitted which was pronounced to be the most satisfactory of any made under the present administration, was approved by the senate and became a law without alteration. More than one-half of the money appropriated for that special service was returned to the treasury. In 1894 he was elected by a handsome majority to represent De Kalb county in the general assembly. Here, as in every other position to which he has been called, he proved to be one of the most faithful and hard-working of all members. Thoroughly posted, broad-minded, public-spirited and progressive, fully abreast with the advanced thought and methods of the times and always at the post of assigned duty, it is not possible to exaggerate the value and efficiency of his services to his immediate constituents and the state. He was placed on the most important standing and special committees, where he measured fully up to the highest standard of legislative thought, action and duty. He was a charter member of Atlanta Fire company No. 1, the first volunteer fire company organized in the city, and was secretary of it many years. As might be expected, Mr. Houston entertains the most liberal and advanced views in regard to public schools and advocates the most generous legislation and expenditure for their betterment and extension. He is also an ardent and unflaggingly active worker in the Sunday-school cause. It was he, in connection with Hon. Milton A. Candler and William G. Whidby, who issued the call for a state Sunday-school association, the present grandly beneficent and useful organization being the outcome of that call. He has devoted a quarter of a century of service to the County Sunday-school association as chairman of its executive committee, and has been mainly instrumental in gaining for it the honor of being the banner association in the state. So long-continued and unaffectedly self-sacrificing has been his devotion to this work that he is known to every man, woman and child who annually attend these great gatherings. "I would not exchange the smiles and greetings of these good people," he exclaims, "for all the honors the political field can bestow." In 1868 he bought the old homestead of Dr. Chapman Powell (his wife's father), where, since his retirement from railway business, he has devoted himself to farming and stock-raising. While his neighbors with more experience have criticised his methods, they have been compelled to give him credit for having very greatly improved the live stock in his locality. He prides himself on having a herd of the finest Ayrshire cattle in the United States. Mr. Houston was happily married in 1854 to the second daughter of Dr. Chapman Powell, an old settler and widely-known physician of De Kalb county, who half a century ago represented the county in the general assembly and was a pioneer settler of Atlanta, then Marthasville. He is a member of the Scotch-Irish society of the United States, a member of the Pioneer Citizens society of Atlanta, a member of Atlanta lodge No. 59, F. & A. M., and was the first person exalted to the royal arch degree in Atlanta after the chapter was removed from Decatur to Atlanta, and is a prominent and influential member of the Presbyterian church, of which he was recently elected an elder, after having served forty years as a deacon.

ASBURY SMITH MAYSON, physician and surgeon, Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., son of James L. and Lucinda (Douglas) Mayson, was born in De Kalb (now Fulton) county, May 21, 1836. His parents were natives of South Carolina and his father was a farmer and railway contractor. He died in 1881. Dr. Mayson received his primary education in the common schools of the county and was graduated from Emory college, Oxford, Ga. He began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. James F. Alexander, one of the most eminent physicians of Atlanta, then entered the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1857. Subsequently he took a course at Bellevue hospital at New York. He located at Powder Springs, Cobb Co., Ga.; afterward moved to Acworth, same county, whence, a year later, he moved to Decatur, where he located permanently, establishing an excellent reputation as a practitioner and a large and remunerative practice. He entered the Confederate service in May, 1861; was at the burning of Harper's Ferry, participated in the first battle of Manassas and was afterward made hospital steward. He was soon promoted and made assistant surgeon, and in May, 1862, was commissioned as hospital surgeon. He was present at the battle of Chickamauga, and those between there and Kennesaw Mountain. He was afterward at Andersonville, and was at Atlanta at the time of the surrender. He is a member of the Georgia Medical association, of which he was one of the organizers. Dr. Mayson was married March 9, 1858, to Miss Rebecca, daughter of Dr. L. K. Catlen of Powder Springs, who has borne him four children, one of whom only is now living: Lena R., wife of Dr. W. P. Smith, druggist, Atlanta, Ga. Dr. Mayson and his wife are exemplary members of the Methodist church of long standing.

WILLIAM MASON RAGSDALE, county ordinary, Decatur, De Kalb Co., son of Elijah N. and Caroline (Born) Ragsdale, was born in De Kalb county, Nov. 30, 1855. His parents were born in what is now De Kalb county, and are aged, respectively, seventy-nine and seventy-seven years. He received a good preparatory education, and, after leaving college, attended lectures in the law department of the university of Georgia, at Athens, from which he graduated in 1879. Among the members of his class were John J. Strickland, S. Morris, and Hooper Alexander. After he graduated, he settled in Atlanta, but remained there only two years. He then located at Stone Mountain, where he practiced with encouraging success until January, 1889, when he was elected ordinary of the county, and has been continuously re-elected since. He was the editor and publisher of the first newspaper published in Decatur, "The De Kalb News," which he sold after running it a year. He is well posted, genial, affable, and popular with his fellow-citizens. Mr. Ragsdale was married Jan. 27, 1882, to Miss Bartie C., daughter of Benjamin F. Veal, a popular and prosperous merchant of Stone Mountain, by whom he has had three children: Louise, Benjamin E., and William M., Jr. He is a member of the Royal Arcanum, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

GEORGE A. RAMSPECK, fertilizer manufacturer, Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., son of George P. and Charlotte R. (Lewis) Ramspeck, was born near Petersburg, Va., March 1, 1841. His father was a native of Frankfort-on-the-Main, and emigrated to the United States and settled in Virginia when a young man. He owned and conducted a farm near Petersburg, in which city he was engaged in merchandising. He was highly educated, and could write and speak three other languages besides his own. In 1853 he left Virginia and came to South Carolina with the intention of settling in Charleston, but took the yellow fever, and died in Savannah that year. Mr. Ramspeck's mother was born in Prince George county, Va., and was a daughter of Joseph Lewis of revolutionary fame. Mr. Ramspeck's education was limited—he received none after he was eleven years old. When twelve years of age he was apprenticed to A. J. Burke, a book and job printer in Charleston, until he reached maturity. But in December, 1860, he entered the state service as a member of the Chichester Zouaves, which became a part of First regiment, South Carolina Rifles. He later was a member of the battery of Capt. Stevens, who fired the first gun of the war, Jan. 9, 1861, on the occasion of firing on the "Star of the West," in its attempt to land supplies at Fort Sumter. He was engaged in the coast-defense service on Sullivan's and Morris' islands, etc., for some time. Falling from the ramparts of Castle Pinckney, Charleston harbor, while mounting a gun, he was permanently disabled and discharged from the service. In response to a telegram from J. J. Toon, of the Franklin Publishing company, he came to Atlanta July 1, 1862, and accepted a place at $15 a week. At the close of the war he found himself the possessor of $50,000 in Confederate money. Immediately after hearing of Gen. Lee's surrender he went to Griffin, where he exchanged it for goods which he brought in a one-horse wagon to Atlanta, realizing about $200 on them. In company with J. C. Rogers and M. T. Castleberry he constructed the first building erected—near the corner of Whitehall and Mitchell streets, and nearly opposite what is known as "Dodd's Corner," where they sold the first goods brought over the Georgia railway, and sold in Atlanta after the war. This enterprise proved very successful and profitable. Later he withdrew from the firm and settled permanently in Decatur, where he believed he could handle his capital to better advantage, but principally on account of his wife's health. He engaged at once in general merchandising, which he continued until 1890 with exceptional success and prosperity. Since retiring from mercantile life he has devoted himself to farming and the manufacture of fertilizers. He has established for himself an enviable reputation for business sagacity and enterprise, and financial ability, and accumulated a large property. He has been elected and served two terms as mayor of Decatur; is a stockholder in the Donald Frazier school for boys; one of the trustees of the Decatur Male and Female academy, and a member of the board of county commissioners. Mr. Ramspeck was married Aug. 25, 1863, to Miss Eliza Florida, daughter of Capt. Robert Anderson, of Charleston, S. C., who died Dec. 28, 1865, leaving one child—Eliza Florida. He contracted a second marriage Dec. 31, 1868, with Miss Margaret, daughter of Joseph and Jane Morgan, Decatur, a descendant of the Kirkpatrick—De Kalb county pioneers. Five children have blessed this union: George, Mary, Joseph Lewis, Helen, and Jean. He is a member of the Royal Arcanum. Himself and family are devoted members of the Presbyterian church.

DODGE COUNTY.

W. W. ASHBURN, a native of North Carolina, was born Nov. 26, 1838, and reared on the old family plantation in Surry county, that state. His education was limited, though he obtained a fair business training and was sufficiently equipped for life's battle to discharge creditably a clerical position he was holding in a mercantile firm, when the war broke out. He then enlisted in the Twenty-first North Carolina regiment, in which he served for about two years, when he was promoted to Gen. Early's staff as courier and scout, and in this capacity he served until the close of the war. He participated in the following battles: Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Winchester, Cedar town, Gettysburg, Plymouth, N. C., and was in a number of skirmishes during Jackson's and Early's raids in the valley of Virginia. He was wounded in the battle of Plymouth, N. C., and was near the immortal Lee on the day of his surrender at Appomattox. He returned to his old home about the middle of April, 1865, and on May 16, was married to Miss Anna P. Atkinson, the daughter of Johnson Atkinson, of Caswell county, N. C., Mr. Ashburn and Miss Atkinson having been engaged for the last two or three years of the war. Mr. Ashburn was then without resources, save a small tract of unimproved land in Surry county, N. C. He at once set to work improving this land, and there laid the foundation of a very successful business life. In 1868 he engaged in buying and selling tobacco and stock in South Carolina and Georgia, and in this way he found the "piney woods" or, as he maintains, the "garden spot" of Georgia. His family remained in North Carolina until the year 1871, and he then brought them to Eastman, Ga., where he located and commenced a mercantile business. In this and purchasing timber lands, he continued for ten or twelve years. About the year 1882, he commenced the manufacture of naval stores and lumber, and this business he conducted for five or six years with great success. During this time Mr. Ashburn had become the owner of large tracts of lands, which he determined to hold for farming purposes, selling the timber, as well as his manufacturing interests. He then turned his attention to a general real estate business, buying and selling timber and farm lands, and city and town lots, and this has been handled with marked success.

He has been the trusted and efficient treasurer of his county, and has ably represented it in the legislature, serving with distinction on important committees, where his business abilities and sound judgment were appreciated. He is president of the Citizens' Banking company, of Eastman, Ga. Mr. Ashburn is a powerful factor in the development of southern Georgia. He is a consistent member of the Baptist church, and a Mason of the royal arch degree. Mr. Ashburn's children have been reared in Eastman. He has four daughters and one son: Ella May, Mrs. Lee B. Jones; Ida Belle, Mrs. Park Harper; Lizzie, Mrs. Z. H. Clark; Willie Warren, and Howard Ingram. His sons-in-law are respected and well-known citizens, and his son is a bright lad of twelve years.

JUDGE JAMES BISHOP, the present county school commissioner of Dodge county, is a native of Pulaski county, Ga. His father, Simeon Bishop, was a native of New Jersey, and was born in 1799, and died in 1836. He was engaged in the mercantile business, and, being a man of exceptional business qualifications, he rapidly accumulated a competency. His wife, who survived him some years, was a Miss Nancy J. Daniels. Her death occurred in 1873. There were born to them but two children, one of whom died in youth, the other, James Bishop, was born December, 1829. He received the benefit of a good education, and studied for the profession of the law. Being left with an abundance of this world's goods, he never felt the necessity for applying for admission to the bar. He married Miss Mary E. Guyton, a daughter of Maj. Guyton, one of Laurens county's old and most prominent citizens. To this union eight children have been born, as follows: Mrs. E. W. Bullock, of Wilcox county, Ga.; Mrs. G. F. Harrison, Atlanta; Mrs. R. L. Bush, Wilcox county; Helen and Emma, at home, and James, Jr., attorney, at Eastman, Ga. The oldest son, Saxon, died in his nineteenth year, and the youngest, Guyton, at two years of age. The wife and mother died in 1890. For a number of years, Judge Bishop has been identified with the interests of Eastman. For a term he was engaged in the mercantile business. In 1875 he was appointed by Gov. Smith judge of the county court. In 1889 he was appointed to the office of county school commissioner, which he has held since, to the credit of himself, and the satisfaction of his numerous friends. He is a Methodist in faith, and a democrat in politics.

MATTHEW CLARK.—The prominence of this family in the early history of Georgia and the sterling character of its representatives in Dodge county at the present time, makes a full sketch of it unnecessary in these Memoirs. The gentleman who introduced this branch of the family into Georgia was John Clark, a native of Virginia who emigrated to Burke county in early manhood. He there married Emily Sacks, and reared Amerinthia, who married a Wm. Clark, and is now a widow residing in Montgomery county; Mary, Mrs. Samuel Miller, Laurens county; Elizabeth, widow of John Gay, Montgomery county; and the following deceased sons, John G., Matthew, Harlow, Flournoy, Francis, and Colfrey. Of these Colfrey is the father of the gentlemen now residing in Dodge county. He was born in 1806, was given a good education, and studying medicine, became a physician of note and an extensive planter in Montgomery county, where he died in 1869. He was largely self-educated and a man of wonderful energy. He served for twenty-seven years as justice of the peace when that office was of much more importance than at present. He married Cynthia Burch, who was a daughter of Benj. Burch, of Laurens county. He was a patriot and veteran of the Florida Indian wars. He left a large property to his children, which was the result of his own labors. This marriage produced eight children, four of whom are now living: John J., Appling county; and Matthew, Hamilton, and Harlow. Benjamin died of small-pox while a prisoner of war at Point Lookout. The mother of these children lived to be quite aged, dying in January of 1894. She was a devout member of the Baptist church and a woman of beautiful traits of character. Matthew Clark was born May 8, 1835, in that part of Montgomery county which is now Dodge. He was reared on his father's plantation and received an academic education, as did all the family. In 1860 he was united in marriage to Mary Henley, whose children are: Columbia J., widow of John Knowles, Dodge county; Mattie Maud, single; Mary T., Mrs. Calhoun, Eastman; Marsa, Mrs. Wilcox, Dodge county; Virginia, Emma, Endora, Colfrey, Callie, and Platten. The last named is deceased; the others live with their parents. In 1862 Mr. Clark enlisted in the Confederate service, Company G, Tenth Georgia. He participated in many battles of the war, and was one of the daring company which captured the Yankee pickets the next night after the bloody battle of Chickamauga, notice of which was made officially at the time. Mr. Clark served during the entire four years, surrendering at Raleigh, N. C. Returning to the old home in Montgomery county he took up the broken threads, and began life anew. By close economy and hard work, he accumulated property slowly but surely, and has long been considered among the most substantial men of his county. In 1885 the wife of his youth who had stood by him bravely and had reared his children departed this life. His present wife is Dollie C. Pickens. She is the mother of Allie B., Eva, and Leslie M. In 1882, perceiving the need of better educational advantages for his children, Mr. Clark moved into Eastman, the county seat, where he has since resided, though he continues the cultivation of his extensive plantation. He is a Baptist and votes with the party of strong government—the democratic.

HAMILTON CLARK, fourth son of Colfrey Clark, was born May 14, 1839. In 1862 he responded to the call for troops and went out to do battle for right and against oppression. He was a member of Company H, Forty-seventh Georgia, Capt. J. M. Aiken commanding, and followed it through the four years' course of battle and camp life. He was in fourteen engagements, the most prominent of which were the battle of Jackson, Miss., and that of James island. He remained at home the first year after the war. In 1866 he married Margaret Miller of Montgomery county, a daughter of Joseph Miller, and settling in the county remained there engaged in planting some eight years when he removed to Dodge. In 1882 he removed to his present home at Chauncey, from which point he superintends his four plantations. He is also largely interested in the raising of stock. Like his brother he is a Baptist in faith and a democrat, though he takes possibly more interest in the latter than any member of the family. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and sustains the reputation of the family for sobriety, honesty, and integrity of character. His children are: Sarah F., Mrs. L. S. Evans; John M.; Leonora E., Mrs. R. L. Edwards; Hattie E., Wm. H., and Ilda May. The latter three are at home; the others in homes of their own in the county near.

HARLOW CLARK, one of the sons of Colfrey, was born in 1845, Feb. 26. Although but a youth, he became a soldier, enlisting in the "Wiregrass" Fourth Georgia cavalry under Capt. Crum. His service was mostly on the coast of Florida and Georgia, and his most serious engagement was at Ocean Pond, Fla., where the carnage was terrible, 8,000 being killed, and where Mr. Clark received slight wounds. On his return from the war he married Cassie A., daughter of Joseph Miller, Montgomery county, and a sister of Hamilton's wife, and settled down to build a home. He has succeeded admirably, and entirely by his own exertions. Beginning with but little capital he has reared his family in the best society and with good educational advantages, and has accumulated one of the handsomest properties in Dodge county. His plantation consists of 400 acres of rich land, on which he has all the modern improvements, and he operates a gin and grist mill in their season. Harlow Clark is also a democrat, though he cares nothing for political preferment, and the masonic order also numbers him among its best members, he being a past worshipful master. His children are: John B., at home; Cynthia, Mrs. Donaldson; Mary F., Mrs. Nash; Bartlett H., and Cassie G., all of Dodge county—the first and last two being at home.

J. T. COLCORD, the present manager of the Amoskeag Lumber company, is a native of Brentwood, N. H., and was born Oct. 27, 1839. When but a youth of twenty he came south and located in Screven county, where he secured employment as a millwright. His position was one of great hardship, but by being most faithful in the performance of his duties, and practicing the most rigid economy, he soon became a mill manager and owner. He successfully conducted mills in the following counties: Emanuel, Burke, Pierce and Ware. In 1881 he moved to Dodge county, his present location. Here he established the large industry of Amoskeag. Mr. Colcord is not an aspirant for political distinction, though he is a most zealous democrat. He is very proud of the fact that his first ballot was cast for the distinguished Stephen A. Douglas, of whom he is a great admirer. In 1869 he became a member of the masonic lodge, and is a Knight Templar. He has been high priest of his chapter for eight years and grand captain of H of the state grand chapter. The present Amoskeag is due entirely to the intelligent management of Mr. Colcord, who views with justifiable pride one of the largest and most prosperous lumber plants in the south. The Amoskeag Lumber company was incorporated in 1881, its site lying on the E. T., Va. & Ga. railroad, one and a half miles from the thriving county seat town of Eastman. From a force of sixty employes the pay roll has grown to 400; two immense mills are operated with the latest improved machinery; and thirty miles of railroad have been built, on which are run four locomotives.

ELIAS HERMAN, judge of the county court of Dodge county, is of Jewish extraction. His father was Henry Herman, a native of Germany, where he was reared and where he married Henrietta Goodman. They emigrated to the United States in 1849 and settled in Laurens county, Ga., where he engaged in merchandising with great success at Dublin. In 1873 the family removed to Eastman, where he was one of the leading business men until his death, which occurred in 1875. Mr. Herman was a man who very fully identified himself with his adopted people. He was for years the efficient postmaster of Dublin, and took great interest and was an active worker in the democratic party. Like most men of his race he was endowed with great financial ability, which carried him through a successful career. During the war between the states he did his duty as a member of the state troops, serving through the Atlanta campaign with credit. He was a master Mason and a member of the Macon Jewish parish, where he and his wife lie buried, the latter dying in December of 1893. His children were well-educated and honor their parents by useful and successful lives. Their names are: Isaac, born in New York, came to Eastman in 1869, and was one of her first merchants. He served a period as clerk of the superior court. He is now dead; Elias was the second child; Solomon, a merchant; Jefferson Davis, physician; Albert and Carrie, all of Eastman. Elias Herman was born in Dublin, Ga., and was given an excellent education, doing some advanced work in New York city. He began the study of law under T. J. Simmons, now chief justice of the supreme court of Georgia, and in 1874 was admitted to the bar of Laurens county. He practiced in Macon until 1877, when he located at Cochran, Pulaski Co., where for ten years he enjoyed a lucrative practice, being most of that time city attorney for that progressive town. Judge Herman has been a resident of Eastman since 1888 and so won his way into the hearts of Dodge county people as to cause his appointment to his present important position by Gov. Northen in 1893. He makes a model judge and administers the office in a manner satisfactory to his constituents. Judge Herman also served the city of Eastman as mayor during 1891, and the unusually able conduct of that office had much to do with his appointment to the judgeship. Fraternally he affiliates with the Masons and with the Knights of Pythias, and is of course a good democrat. Judge Herman found a lady to suit him for a life companion in Josephine Heimer of Montezuma, Ga., a union which has been blessed with three attractive children, Jule, Isaac and Hennie.

SAMUEL HOWARD LOWTHER, one of the substantial planters and a citizen of merit in Dodge county, is a son of Absalom Lowther, a South Carolinian. He was born July 30, 1838, in Screven county, Ga., where he was reared to manhood's estate with a limited education. Just as he was ready to leave the home nest to build one of his own, his government asked his aid in a similar enterprise, and he unselfishly relinquished his own aspirations and enlisted in the army of the new Confederacy. He was mustered into the service in the spring of 1861 at Whitesville, Ga., a private in Company D, Forty-seventh Georgia regiment, Capt. J. D. Ashton. Chickamauga was his most notable engagement, though he was in many others almost equaling it in interest. During his service he was twice captured by the Yankees, but luckily made his escape. He settled in Screven county after the war, and though he had nothing to begin with, managed to provide for his wife and child until he could secure a foothold. In 1868 he removed to Pierce county, Ga., where he engaged in the lumber business until 1882. While living in that county he also served a term as sheriff, from '72 to '74. He made some considerable money at the lumber business, but was greatly crippled in the panic of '73. In October of 1882 he bought his present home, and has since resided there. He owns 600 acres of good land, 200 of which are under excellent cultivation. He also operates a gin and grist-mill. Mr. Lowther is a believer in the principles of Jefferson, but cannot vote with the so-called democratic party, the new people's party being more to his notion. He is a Free and Accepted Mason, and since his fourteenth year has been a member of the Baptist church. He married a Miss Kelly, and to them one child—Verbena—has been born, now Mrs. Howard, of Screven county. The mother of this child died, and Mr. Lowther subsequently married his present estimable consort, Susan A. Cail, daughter of Bird Cail of Screven county, who has borne him a daughter, Willie, who married Mr. Wood, but was early bereaved and is now at home with her parents. Mr. Lowther's father was, as stated, a native of South Carolina, where he was born March 2, 1806. He married, Feb. 10, 1828, in Screven county, Ga., Elizabeth J. Thompson, daughter of James Thompson. She was born Oct. 30, 1806, and died in February of 1874, the mother of the following children: Mary C., widow of H. B. Howard; Caroline E., widow of Rev. J. S. Thompson; Sarah, Mrs. W. W. Lesch, Effingham county, and Samuel H. The father of these children died in middle age in 1840.

DAVID M. ROBERTS. The authentic history of this branch of the Roberts family begins with the grandfather of the gentleman named above, whose name was Frederick, and who came to Georgia after participating in the revolutionary war under the leadership of Gen. Lincoln, and in which he lost a limb. He settled in middle Georgia, became a wealthy planter and reared a family of which Daniel, the father of Judge Roberts of Eastman, was one. Daniel Roberts was born in Burke county and at the age of twelve moved to Laurens county—in 1792, and in early life was captain of a steamboat on the Oconee river. Later he became a planter and was one of the wealthy and influential men of his section. In 1857 he removed to Thomas county, where he died in 1859. He married Elizabeth Carey and was the father of ten children, of whom Judge Roberts and Mrs. Elizabeth Cox of Eastman, are the only ones living. The mother was a woman of deep piety, and an active member of the Baptist church. She survived her husband some eleven years. David Montgomery Roberts was born June 15, 1837, in Laurens county, Ga. With a common-school education he read law in the office of Ex-Senator Hugh Moore of Dublin, and was admitted to the bar in 1859 by Judge Peter E. Love, at Dublin. Telfair county, Ga., attracted the young attorney for a year, but he had scarcely begun to get a foothold when the guns of Ft. Sumter announced the advent of war. Returning to Dublin Judge Roberts enlisted in Company G of the Tenth Georgia at Hawkinsville, Col. O. C. Horne commanding, and was mustered in at Richmond. Immediately after this event, however, he was prostrated by sickness and discharged for disability. On recovering he again enlisted, this time in Company G, Tenth regiment of Tennessee cavalry. In this company he saw continuous service to the very end of the war, laying down his arms after participating in the last battle, Bentonville, S. C. He was under some of the most noted cavalry generals, such as Scott, Morgan, Forrest and Joe Wheeler. His severest engagements were Chickamauga and the New Hope church, and on the Atlanta campaign, where he was under fire twenty-six days in succession. Judge Roberts took up the practice of his profession again in Appling county, where he resided eight years, a short period in Jesup, Ga., preceding his location in Eastman in 1877, where he has since resided. The matrimonial life of Judge Roberts began Dec. 22, 1875. He wedded Ursula, daughter of W. H. and Eliza Edwards of Tattnall county, and has three living children: James H., Fred A. and Paul. The legal career of Judge Roberts has been uniformly successful, and of such solid merit as to bring him the judgeship of the Oconee circuit in 1889. He filled this place in a manner highly satisfactory to all concerned with his court, but resigned in 1893 on account of ill health. Politically the judge has served his party in various important conventions, but has never been an aspirant for political honors. He was in the convention which nominated Hancock in 1888. He is a Knight Templar of Macon commandery. A man of solid legal attainments, socially of great geniality, and a citizen of strength of character, Judge Roberts is a man of whom Dodge county and south Georgia may well be proud.

EMANUEL CURTIS SMITH, of Eastman, is a son of Emanuel Smith, a North Carolinian, who was born May 24, 1821. The family have for generations been people of education and wealth, and by marriage are connected with some of the most prominent families in the south. Emanuel Smith grew to manhood under most favorable environments, and became a man of influence and wealth. He married in 1844, Mary, daughter of Daniel G. Curtis, of Virginia, who was a man of political prominence in the "old dominion" in the several decades preceding the war. To the marriage were born Daniel, Emanuel C., Mary and James. Daniel and Mary are living on the old homestead in North Carolina, while James is a lawyer of fine reputation and promise in Richmond, Va. The parents passed a long and useful life, the mother passing away in 1869, while the father survived until 1890, dying in his seventy-first year. Emanuel Curtis Smith was born Sept. 28, 1860, amid the mutterings and lowering clouds of the storm which was so soon to break with such relentless fury. But infancy reckes not of scenes of blood and carnage, and ere he had grown to years of accountability the political elements had resumed their wonted calmness, and he was left undisturbed to pursue his educational training. He early became a matriculate at the university of Virginia, from which he graduated at the remarkably tender age of 13 years. He afterward came to Georgia, and in Savannah met and married Miss Eloise, daughter of Oscar Dunham, a wealthy citizen of that city. From there Mr. Smith came to Dodge county, where he is interested in agricultural pursuits. He favors democracy, and is a Baptist in religious belief.

He is an efficient member of the county board of education, and a member of the Southwest Georgia Medical association. He belongs also to Cordele lodge, Knights of Pythias, being a past chancellor and grand representative. The wife of Dr. Baker is Georgia, the daughter of Rev. John W. Brock, a M. E. preacher, of Lexington, Ky. They have two children, Elizabeth, born April 27, 1893; and Thomas Newton, Jr., born May 7, 1895. One of the doctor's brothers, Wm. A. RICHMOND A. BEDGOOD, an enterprising business man of Arabi, was born Aug. 3, 1847, in Washington county, Ga. He was the son of a farmer, Henry Bedgood, from whom he was separated by death in 1856. The boy received but a very limited education, enlisting in the Seventh Georgia militia in 1864, when he had scarcely completed his seventeenth year. Since the war closed Mr. Bedgood has been engaged in farming, and has also carried on a large sawmill and a successful mercantile business in Arabi. He is a respected member of the masonic fraternity. The first wife of Mr. Bedgood was Elizabeth Brown, whose father was the well-known Maj. Brown, of Cordele. Mr. Bedgood's second wife

In Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., James H. first saw the light on Oct. 5, 1842. He had received a good common school education, and when the war broke out, he hastened to join the First regiment of Georgia Volunteers, serving as second sergeant of Company E. The youthful soldier was noted for his bravery, taking part in every battle of the war in which his company was engaged. In the battle of Ocean Pond he brought the colors of his regiment safely out of a charge, in which the color sergeant had been slain. The war being over, he located in Dooly county, near the site of the present town of Cordele, where he successfully conducts the affairs of a large plantation. Mr. Dorough is a member of the Baptist church, a thorough Democrat, and just now a prominent member of the legislature. His wife, whom he married Oct. 22, 1866, was Miss Sarah E. Powell, the daughter of Isaiah Powell, a well-known planter of Dooly county. From the time of leaving college, 1871, until 1878, he engaged in the pursuit of agriculture, then for nearly two years in that of lumbering in Burke county, Ga., after which for a short time he worked for R. B. Rippard & Co., of Pierce county. In 1880 he engaged with the Amoskeag Lumber company, of Eastman, Ga., and remained with it six years. He then went into business for himself in the manufacture of naval stores, in which he has become one of the largest operators in the state. Having some years before bought an interest in the turpentine business, in 1889 he established a manufactory at Cordele, which he still operates, being now interested in four stills. He carries on, besides, a good farm in Dooly county. Mr. Doughtry is a member of the masonic fraternity (a chapter mason), also of the A. O. U. W., and of the Woodmen of the World. He married Laura J., daughter of Thomas S. Barbour, a planter, of Screven county, and has four children: William T., born May 20, 1872, who in early childhood, as a result of a severe fever, lost both speech and hearing. After ten years at a deaf and dumb school, the young man, who is very bright, took a business course at Sullivan & Crichton college, at Atlanta, and is the only deaf mute in the south holding a business diploma. He is now cashier and bookkeeper for the Naval Store and Lumberman's bank at Cordele. August, 1893, he married Miss Nealie Bene, of Atlanta, who is as the result of accident, semi-mute. The subject of this sketch was born March 15, 1841, and having received a common school education, at the early age of nineteen began the study of medicine under the tutelage of Dr. N. A. Rice. In 1861 he entered the Charleston Medical college, but remained five months only, leaving the pursuit of knowledge to join the Sixth regiment of Georgia volunteers. Here he first acted as brigade apothecary, then was appointed acting assistant surgeon. For ten years after the war he practiced medicine in Worth county, and then removed to Dooly county. Having built up a large practice, and being desirous of fitting himself more thoroughly for his work, Dr. Haslam took a finishing course at Atlanta Medical college, graduating in March, 1883. When but four years old he was deprived by death of his father, Redding Pate, Sr. The young lad acquired his education in the common schools and the high school of Sandersville, later reading medicine under the guidance of Dr. J. M. O'Brien. The year 1856-57 he spent at Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, and the following year entered the medical department of the state university at Nashville, from which he graduated in 1859. The young physician located first in Dooly county, but after two years removed to Hawkinsville, where he remained until the war broke out; in 1862 he entered the army of Virginia as assistant surgeon. He had received an excellent academic education, and was prepared to enter college in the junior class when the war broke out, and he instead entered the army, joining the Allen S. Cutts battalion of Georgia artillery, which formed a part of the army in northern Virginia. Though three times slightly wounded the young man persisted to the end of the war, when he returned to Georgia. He married Miss Maggie J. Bagley, the daughter of Dr. David Bagley of Sumter county, where Mr. Scott located, remaining until 1889, when he removed to Cordele, still, however, retaining his farming interest in his former home, while engaged in the same work in his new place of abode. Moreover he erected an ice factory and a guano factory as well as a coix, or Job's-tears plant at Cordele, and thus he aided much in the commercial advancement of the city of his adoption. His integrity and enterprise were duly recognized by his fellow-townsmen, by whom he was elected mayor, which office he has held during almost the whole time of his residence in Cordele, in addition to that of justice of the peace. Mr. Scott was also a member of the constitutional convention of 1877, is a strict democrat, and at present democratic nominee for tax collector. He is a prominent member

After receiving a good common school education Mr. Strozier studied law in Greenville under the supervision of Col. Warner Hill. Here by his energy and faithfulness he has built up for himself a large practice, and is attorney for several corporations. In 1893 he was one of the rival candidates for mayor, and after a very close and exciting contest was elected, but ousted by contest, unjustly, it is thought by many of his warm adherents. He is now a leading candidate for legislative honors. Mr. Strozier, too, is a Knight of Pythias and a member of Cordele lodge, of which he is past chancellor.

W. M. S. THOMSON, an attorney-at-law, Cordele, is the son of W. H. Thomson, a prominent farmer of Sampson county, N. C., who is well known and esteemed, and who during the late war was captain of a company of infantry. Mr. Thomson was born Jan. 19, 1866, and when he had completed his education at Wake Forest college began the study of law, graduating from the law department of the state university in 1887. He practiced his profession in Clinton, N. C., until January, 1891, when he removed to Cordele, Ga., where he formed a partnership with Z. A. Littlejohn. The firm has the leading practice of the city, and they are the local attorneys for the S. A. & M. railroad, and for several local corporations. Mr. Thomson is also the solicitor for the Dooly county court. He is a member of several of the fraternal orders—the masonic, the Odd Fellows, and the Knights of Pythias. In September, 1891, Miss Apphia Williams became his wife; she is the daughter of C. J. Williams, a planter of Sampson county, N. C. They have two daughters, Louise, born June 20, 1892, and Elizabeth, born Jan. 8, 1894.

ALEXANDER F. WARE, son of Rev. Nicholas C. Ware, a well known Methodist Episcopal minister who died in 1889, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., Aug. 16, 1855. His educational advantages consisted in several years' attendance at the common schools, and a year at Middle Georgia college, under Prof. Geo. C. Looney. Ever since he was eighteen Mr. Ware has devoted himself to the education of youth. During the years 1880-81 he had charge of the Raytown high school, at the same time being county surveyor. For six years, 1882-88, he was principal of Warrenton academy, and for the four succeeding years had charge of the Augusta orphan asylum. In 1892 he removed to Arabi, where he founded the Arabi institute, the best school in the county, and one of the best and most successful in the wire grass country. His wife, Rosa, is the daughter of Judge W. H. Edwards, of Warrenton, to whom he was married in 1877. They have four children: Clive Looney, born Nov. 10, 1878; Eva, Aug. 23, 1882; Mabel, Feb. 16, 1886; Alexander Ford, July 29, 1889. Prof. Ware is a member of Arabi lodge, F. & A. M., and also belongs to the Royal Arcanum at Warrenton. The Ware family to which Mr. Ware belongs is of Welsh origin, and has been prominent in the state for several generations. Ware county was so named in honor of one of Mr. Ware's ancestors, United States senator Nicholas Ware. His immediate family are remarkable for their devotedness to work of a religious and educational character. Eight of his uncles as well as his father have been engaged in the ministry of the M. E. church, while three of his brothers, like himself, are faithful teachers. One brother, N. E. Ware, is in charge of the public schools at Hawkinsville. Mr. Ware organized the Cordele high school in 1895 and is its present principal.

JAHIEL J. WEST, born April 3, 1856, at Chemung, Chemung Co., N. Y., is one of a family of eleven children, all living and having families of their own. His father, a farmer, Geo. P. West, now lives at Waverly, N. Y. Jahiel received a fair common-school education, and at the age of eighteen took a thorough business course at Wyoming Seminary and Commercial college, graduating under Prof. L. L. Sprague. He then went into the milling business at Chemung, remaining there two years, and next engaged in the cider, vinegar and lumber trade at Waverly, where he also established what was afterward called the Herdic Coach line. In 1886 he accepted a position in Gresson, Ga., with the Gress Lumber company, but after eight months, during which he was promoted to the superintendency, he went to Atlanta and established the Georgia Pine and Lumber company, with which he remained two years. He had formed a partnership with Mr. I. X. Cheeves in lumbering, and they now sold out the (Atlanta) business to A. A. Fletcher and G. V. Gress, while Messrs. Cheeves & West assumed entire control of the Gress Lumber company, the former as secretary and treasurer, the latter as general manager. From its very beginning the enterprise so prospered that at the end of nine months its managers inaugurated a new undertaking, founding the Parrot Lumber company at Richmond, Ga., with G. W. Parrot as president, the other two members of the firm holding the same offices as in the Gress company. The capacity of the mills is 100,000 feet per day, and in connection with it they carry on a general store and operate a railroad. The latter is fourteen miles in length and requires a force of 250 men, ninety mules, fourteen stationary engines and three locomotives. Mr. West has been in charge of the post-office at Richwood ever since it was established. His wife, whom he married in 1884, was Miss Annie Voris of Waverly, N. Y. He is the proud father of three sons: Herbert, aged nine; Stephen, seven, and George, two years of age. In June, 1895, he sold his interest in the Parrot Lumber company, moved to Atlanta, where he can better educate his boys, and established the West Lumber company at 244 West Petters street. At the same time he bought a nice house at 55 East Georgia avenue, which place he expects to make his permanent residence.

He then worked for D. Greenfield, general merchandise, and from 1877 to 1887 was his partner. He then bought out the business and increased the stock and has otherwise developed the trade until it is not excelled for the line in Albany. Mr. Brown was married in 1877 to Miss Ernestina Plonsky, and they have had born to them five children: Paul J., Ed. D., Lee Roy, Marie E. and Etta R. Mr. Brown is a Mason and a member of the A. O. U. He commenced life as a mere clerk, but by perseverance he finds himself now at the head of one of the best general merchandise business establishments in his section of the state. He is president of the Exchange bank and of the Albany Savings and Trust bank, and owns a large tract of farm land, much of which he is cultivating. He is one of the best business men in the state, and his keen mind is ever looking for opportunities for investment and improvement as will promote the prosperity of Albany. The Exchange bank commenced business about April 17, 1895, has a cash paid-up capital of $50,000, and is doing a large deposit business. —at eighteen—he was made captain of the company, and was with it all through the war. When hostilities were ended he returned to Albany and began planting on his farm of some 700 acres, which is located near Albany. In 1889, he with his son, opened a fine livery and feed-stable, with some twenty head of horses and a number of vehicles for hire. In 1888 Mr. Godwin was made deputy sheriff under Mr. Edwards and has held the position ever since. He was married to Miss Mayo, of Albany, daughter of J. J. (Graves) Hester, and first saw the light of day Dec. 14, 1839, in Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga. He was educated at the Washington academy under R. M. Wright, as principal, and at the age of seven-teen was made assistant principal. He continued in that capacity until twenty years of age, when he went to South Carolina to teach school. Returning to Georgia he came to Albany, where he was when the storm of war arose. He enlisted in the Fourth Georgia regiment and served two years in that command, when on order of Gen. Lee, he was placed in command of a company from Wilkes county. He remained with the Sixty-first Georgia regiment, colonel (afterward general) Clement A. Evans, until the surrender. Immediately after the war he opened a general merchandise store in Albany and has built up an extensive business. He retired from merchandising on being elected tax collector, a position to which he has been re-elected for a number of terms. He was a member of the general assembly one term in 1880-1881, and served his county with credit. Capt. Hester was first united in marriage to Miss Tate Collins of Albany, who died in 1876. Three years afterward he married Miss Lillie Hutcherson of Louisville, Ky., by whom he has had five children: Daisy, Eugene G., John H., Marguerite and Cora D. Karver and his mother, Anna Rutherford Wienberry, both of Scotch parentage, the mother coming from Virginia. Henry Karver was born in Baker county, Ga., but at the age of fifteen years located in Albany, and was employed on a plantation eighteen miles from the city. Here he started for himself and soon owned a fine plantation of 7,500 acres in a high state of cultivation, and a large number of slaves. J. W. KEMP, real estate owner, Albany, is a son of W. W. and Phoebe (Rodgers) Kemp, and was born in Warren county in 1836. He attended the common schools when he could, but the fact that he worked on a plantation when only nine years old shows that his opportunities were abridged. For five years he pegged away on a small salary and pittance of work; but when fourteen years old he started in business for himself and established a livery stable. He was conducting this business when the war broke out, and he was elected marshal of Albany. He resigned, however, and enlisted with the Albany guards. He served four years, and was captured May 12, 1864, at the battle of Horseshoe. He returned to Albany, and in 1866 was elected sheriff of Dougherty county, and subsequently re-elected three times. During President Cleveland's first administration Mr. Kemp was appointed a deputy United States marshal, and at the same time was made special policeman. He was united in marriage on Nov. 26, 1868, to Nellie, a daughter of Dr. J. Tomlinson, of Lee county. Mayer & Bros. as clerk for about six months. When the war broke out he was among the first to enlist, and joining the Fifty-first Georgia regiment, served through the late war, seeing plenty of hard fighting and active service. After the war he settled in Alabama, but soon returned to his first love—Albany, Ga. Here he was the full and only partner of the firm, "Morris Mayer," composed of Jacob Lorch and Morris Mayer, for a period of over twenty years, and after their dissolution on Feb. 1, 1894, interested himself with his nephews, Mayer and Crine. He was always found faithful and honest in his capacity as a merchant and cotton buyer—everybody wishing him the success he deserved. As a statistician on cotton he is said to have no equal in the south. Mr. Lorch, in connection with his nephews, Mayer and Crine, has one of the largest stores and finest stocks of merchandise in Albany. The store occupies three stories and a basement; they carry a stock of an average value of $30,000, and their annual sales amount to $65,000. Mr. Lorch is a member of the masonic fraternity, council degree, Knights of Pythias, I. O. of Heptosoph, and B'nai Brith. He is unmarried and is one of the most popular citizens, enjoying the esteem and friendship of everybody.

His father was a very large planter, and at one time owned some 300 slaves. His father died some years ago, but his mother is still living. Mr. Pace attended the common schools in his early days, and at the age of nineteen years took a business course and was graduated from the Atlanta commercial college. Accepting a position with H. H. Tift, of Tifton, as clerk and bookkeeper, he remained with him in that capacity for seven years. He then engaged in the mercantile business for himself for a few years. Later on he sold his entire stock, and removed to Albany, and formed a partnership with N. J. Cruger as the Flint River Brick & Lumber company, and has continued with it ever since. It is one of the largest building material furnishers in Georgia. Mr. Pace has charge of the office business of the company. Mr. Pace was married to Mary Davis, the sister of Buford Davis, member of the well-known firm of Hardeman, Davis & Turner, of Macon, Ga. Mr. and Mrs. Pace have two children, W. W. Pace, Jr., and Jesse McDonald Pace. Mrs. Pace is a member of the Episcopal church. Mr. Pace is a man with all the qualifications promising a most successful business career.

On June 12, 1861, when only fifteen years old, he joined a Confederate company under command of John C. McMillan. It was Company C, Twelfth Georgia, and was made up at Marshallville, Macon Co., and after organization left immediately for Richmond, Va. After two years' fighting he was discharged, and at once organized a company in Dooly county, and was made second lieutenant. With this company he served until August, 1866, when he returned to Albany and went into the merchandise business with A. C. Westbrook. In 1879 he was elected marshal and chief of police of Albany; the latter position he is still holding, being his sixteenth year. This is the longest that any officer has held the office, which is a tribute to Mr. Westbrook's efficient administration and popularity. Mr. Westbrook has two large farms, and a great deal of real estate in Albany, and by long and faithful service has secured a competence of the world's goods. He was married to Miss Lizzie Cruger, a daughter of Col. N. Cruger, of South Carolina, and later of Savannah, April 6, 1875. To this union have been born three children: Allatia C., Cruger and William P. Mrs. Westbrook is a member of the Episcopal church. Mr. Westbrook is a leader in local politics and a faithful adherent to the cause of democracy.

COL. EDWIN LEIGH WIGHT, wholesale grocer, Albany, Dougherty Co., Ga., is a gentleman extensively and favorably known throughout Georgia, especially in military circles, where he has labored faithfully and successfully for a creditable and efficient state militia. Samuel B. Wight, the colonel's father, was a merchant and leading citizen of Atlanta for years prior to and succeeding the late war. He was the first mayor of the west end, then a suburb of Atlanta, and during the war served as quartermaster of Howell Cobb's regiment, with the rank of captain. He died in 1888. Col. Wight was born in Decatur county, Ga., Oct. 4, 1846, and was educated at the state university, and while a student enlisted in the Sixteenth Georgia battalion of cavalry, Col. Samuel J. Winn, now of Lawrenceville, Gwinnett Co., Ga., commanding. After the war he, in company with his father, went into the wholesale dry goods business in Atlanta. After two years' experience he concluded to try the general merchandise business in a smaller town, and located at Newton, Baker Co., where he continued successfully until 1873. From 1873 to 1881 he was with the cotton firm of Welch & Bacon, Albany. For the six years following he conducted a cotton warehouse of his own. In 1887 he associated himself with Mr. Morris Weslasky under the firm name of Wight & Weslasky. This firm is one of the most prominent wholesale grocery houses in Southern Georgia, and does a yearly business of some half a million dollars. Col. Wight is a popular citizen of Albany, in the progress of which thriving city he has always displayed an active interest, having frequently served the city as a councilman, served a term as mayor in 1881, and is at this time (1895) occupying that honorable position. He was for fifteen years foreman of a volunteer fire company, in which position he did valuable service for the city. Col. Wight is an honored member of a number of the best fraternal organizations—a Knight Templar in Masonry, an Odd Fellow, and a Knight of Pythias, in which latter organization he was for years captain of the uniformed rank. As indicated in the opening sentence of this sketch, Col. Wight has given much attention to the state militia. His record in this line is as follows: He was elected second lieutenant of the Albany guards Jan. 31, 1876, and captain of the same, March 27, 1877. Feb. 1, 1883, he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gov. Stephens, was made captain of Jackson light artillery April 12, 1884, and again became captain of the Albany guards Feb. 1, 1888. Two years later, March 19, 1890, he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh Georgia battalion, and on Sept. 15, 1891, was elected colonel of the Fourth Georgia regiment, which he held until 1893, when he was placed on the retired list at his own request. Col. Wight has held a commission under every governor since the war except Gov. Bulloch. The marriage of Col. Wight and Miss Mary M. Billingsly was solemnized Nov. 24, 1874, at Albany—she being a daughter of Col. Francis A. Billingsly, a leading citizen of the place. His only son, Edwin L., Jr., is a student at the Atlanta Technological school, and Ruby, his only daughter, is at the Lucy Cobb institute, Athens, Ga.

DOUGLAS COUNTY.

ROBERT N. ANDERSON, farmer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Annie (White) Anderson, was born in South Carolina in 1831. His paternal grandfather, David A. Anderson, was a native of Scotland, emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, and settled in Louisa county, Va. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the war, and was captured by the British. He migrated to South Carolina in 1790, where he died about 1820. Mr. Anderson's father was born in South Carolina in 1790, served in the army during the last war with Great Britain, served many years as sheriff of Marion district, and was a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war. He moved to Georgia and settled in Newton county, in 1836; making the trip in ox-carts and camping by the roadside at night. He lived in tents until he could build a cabin, and then cleared a farm on which he lived until 1849. That year he moved to Cobb county, Ga., and lived there until his death, which occurred in 1872. Mr. Anderson was reared on the farm and educated at the historic dirt floor log schoolhouse with holes sawed through the logs on the sides to let in the light. In June, 1863, he enlisted in Company F—of which he was made orderly sergeant—First Georgia regiment, and participated in the battles at Resaca, Calhoun, New Hope, Kennesaw mountain, Peachtree creek, Franklin and Murfreesboro. He was wounded July 26, 1863, and was captured at Salisbury, N. C., but made his escape at Statesville, rejoined his command and remained with it until the surrender. One hundred and forty bullet holes through a blanket he carried through the war evidence the danger to which he was exposed, and his many narrow escapes from death. At the close of the war he returned to his home to find it despoiled amid a scene of desolation, and his family refugeeed to Newton county. Resuming his farm work he continued it in Cobb county until 1890, when he moved to Douglasville so that his children might have the benefit of the college there. He is a good and thrifty farmer, and by good management has placed himself in comfortable circumstances, and has the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Anderson was married in 1855 to Miss Pellonia, daughter of Thomas and Marina (Chandler) Butner—an old Virginia family of Scotch descent. Seven children have blessed this union: Charles C., Mrs. Eugenia Morse, Mrs. Susan Dorsett, Eunice W., Marina E., Annie, Addie L., and Frank B.—all living. He is a master Mason, and an influential member of the Primitive Baptist church.

CALEB P. BOWEN, farmer, and postmaster, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Thomas J. and Nancy (Yarbrough) Bowen, was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1827. His paternal grandfather, of Welsh descent, was born in Pennsylvania in 1762, and migrated to South Carolina, where he died in 1848. Mr. Bowen's father was born in South Carolina in 1788, was raised on the farm and educated at the country schools. His family moved to Georgia and settled in Jackson county when he was a small boy. About the time he grew to manhood he taught school for some time. During the war with Great Britain he commanded a battalion of American troops, holding the rank of major. He afterward was drillmaster of the state militia, and twice represented his county in the general assembly. As a farmer he was eminently successful and died about 1860. Mr. Bowen was reared on the farm and attended the common country schools. When nearing manhood he joined a company of volunteers for the Mexican war, but peace was proclaimed before the company was called into service. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Thirtieth Georgia regiment, of which he was made first lieutenant, and soon afterward promoted to the captaincy. Among the battles in which with his command he participated, were: Vicksburg, Jackson, Missionary ridge, Chickamauga, Resaca, etc. He was captured Dec. 16, 1864, and sent to Johnson's island, where he was detained as a prisoner until after the surrender. He was twice wounded during the war; and while himself suffering from wounds, spent five days on the Chickamauga battlefield burying the dead. Capt. Bowen moved to what is now Douglas county before its organization; and in 1870, when it was organized, he was elected the first treasurer of the county. In 1876 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly. In 1893, he was appointed postmaster at Douglasville, and is still holding that office. Mr. Bowen has been a successful farmer and general business man, and is very popular and very much respected by his fellow-citizens. Capt. Bowen was married April 8, 1848, to Miss Thirze A., daughter of Hiram and Charity (Blackwell) Boen, by whom he had two children: Helen, Mrs. Magourik (deceased), and Margaret, Mrs. Bomar. His wife died May 9, 1862, and in September, 1867, he contracted a second marriage with Miss Melissa, daughter of James S. and Adaline (Perryman) Morse, and to them have been born three children: Cora, Mrs. Hunter; Annie, Mrs. Wright, now deceased; and Hugh B.

HENRY T. COOPER, farmer, banker and county ordinary, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Benjamin and Katharine (Allison) Cooper, was born in what is now Douglas county, in 1850. His paternal grandfather, Henry Cooper, was an old settler in Georgia and a gallant soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Cooper's father was born in what is now Putnam county, Ga., in 1799. He was reared on the farm, and was given a fairly good country school education. When forty years of age he bought a tract of land in then Campbell county, a part of which he cleared and farmed most successfully until his death in 1876. His mother, daughter of Thomas and Margaret Allison, was born in 1820, educated in the country schools, was married when eighteen, was the happy mother of three children and died in 1885. Mr. Cooper was reared on the farm, and received his early schooling at the country schools near his home, and later attended the high school at Palmetto, Ga. Although the family had been what was considered wealthy before the war, the property was nearly all lost during the war, and the subject of this sketch became the main support of the family. In 1879 he was elected tax receiver, and held the office, by re-election, six years continuously. On account of his faithful discharge of the duties of this office his appreciative fellow-citizens elected him ordinary of the county, and, like a true patriot, he accepted the situation, and the people have continued him in it since. When the Douglasville bank was organized in 1892 he was elected, and still holds the position of cashier. He is recognized as a prompt, careful and conscientious business man, and being of the highest integrity, and perfectly reliable in every respect, he has the entire confidence of the community. Mr. Cooper was married in January, 1881, to Miss Emily, daughter of Solomon and Sarah (Glass) Dorsey, by whom he has had five children: Jewel, Sallie K., Gordon, Lamar, and Mary E. He is a charter member of the I. O. O. F., and an influential member of the Baptist church.

JOHN B. DUNCAN, farmer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of William W. and Mary (Barnwell) Duncan, was born in Henry county, Ga., Nov. 5, 1826. His paternal grandfather was John Duncan, who was born in South Carolina, of Scotch parentage. Mr. Duncan's father was born in Greenville district, South Carolina, in July, 1800. When only ten years of age he was left an orphan, and although a mere boy, the duty and responsibility of caring for the family—the work of matured manhood—devolved upon him; but he met and discharged them with much self-reliance. Under the circumstances his education was necessarily very limited, and natural ability and force of character had to be relied on. In January, 1823, he was married to Miss Mary Barnwell, of Jackson county, Ga., and settled in Henry county, where he lived about eleven years, and then moved to Cobb county, Ga., and settled in the woods filled with wild beasts and roamed over by Indians. Here he cleared a small farm, and built a comfortable log cabin home. Later he built a mill, and conducted both with profit. He attained to considerable prominence and was elected a justice of the inferior court, to which he was re-elected for a number of terms, and died Jan. 23, 1847. His mother was born in Jackson county in 1806, and was the daughter of John and Mary Barnwell. Her father was born in Ireland of Irish parentage, settled in Orange district, North Carolina, and was a soldier in the revolutionary army during the war. She died March 8, 1850. Mr. Duncan was reared on the farm and received his education at the old-time dirt floor log schoolhouse. When his father died in 1847 he assumed control, managed the affairs of the farm, and provided for the family, and the education of his younger brothers and sisters. In 1862 he enlisted in Company D, Seventh Georgia regiment, and gallantly met all the hardships and dangers of soldier life—participating in most of the important battles of the war. In the battle of the Wilderness he was severely wounded in the temple, and was present at the memorable siege of Petersburg. When the war ended he returned to his home in Cobb county to find it almost a desolate waste. But with characteristic pluck and energy he set about the work of restoration, and recuperation. In a few years he not only placed it in good condition but so prospered as to add a valuable milling interest, increasing his worldly possessions and prosperity. In 1891 he moved to Douglasville where he is living in the enjoyment of the competency which his well-directed energy, enterprise, and labor have brought him, and the respect and esteem which his integrity of character and Christian life have won for him. Mr. Duncan was married Feb. 15, 1849, to Miss Louisa, daughter of William and Priscilla (Bankston) Matthews, who died six months afterward. Oct. 17, 1850, he contracted a second marriage with Miss Martha E., daughter of Samuel G. and Elizabeth (Bankston) Mosley. Seven children which blessed this union are still living: William S., Napoleon B., Mrs. Mary E. Burton, John T., Priscilla, Robert Lee, and Frank. He is a master Mason and an exemplary member of the Methodist church.

JOHN T. DUNCAN, farmer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of William and Martha E. (Mosley) Duncan, was born in Cobb (now Douglas) county in 1858. In consequence of the unsettled condition of the country during his boyhood and youth, his education was limited. When twenty years old he engaged as a clerk in his brother's store at Powder Springs, Cobb Co., his wages being $4 and board per month. Here he learned the lesson of rigid economy, which has contributed so largely to the success he has achieved. During his first year's service his personal expenses amounted to only $32. In 1883 he came to Douglasville with a few hundred dollars of hard-earned money, and in company with his brother, Napoleon B., embarked in a general merchandising business. He has been eminently successful, established a large, permanent and profitable business, and a reputation for integrity and financial reliability in the commercial world. He ranks among the foremost of the merchants of Douglasville, and numbers his friends by his acquaintances. He is a member of the city council and a trustee of Douglasville college. His interesting family occupy one of the most delightful homes in the city. Mr. Duncan was married in March, 1888, to Miss Luceriah, daughter of John G. and Luceriah (Varner) Clonts, by whom he has had four children: Thomas J., deceased; John H., deceased; Willie C. and Edith. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., a master Mason, and an active, working and influential member of the Methodist church.

JOHN M. EDGE, lawyer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of John and Sarah (Miller) Edge, was born in Baldwin Co., Ga., in August, 1810. His paternal grandfather, Nehemiah Edge, of English lineage, was a native of Maryland and a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Subsequently he migrated to Georgia and settled in Wilkes county. Mr. Edge's father was born in Wilkes county in 1784, was raised on the farm, and received such education as was common to the period and locality. He served in the Creek Indian war during and immediately following the last war with Great Britain. About 1820 he moved to what is now Newton county, where he served as a justice of the peace for a number of years. In 1836 he moved to Benton county, Ala., but in a short time moved back to Georgia and settled at Cave Spring, Floyd Co. He was killed one Sunday morning in 1844 while on his way to church by the sudden falling upon him of the limb of a tree. His mother was born in what is now Baldwin county, Ga., in 1780, and was the daughter of a North Carolina revolutionary soldier. She was married in 1810 and died in 1840. Mr. Edge was reared on the farm, attended the common near-by schools when growing up, and finished his education at Cave Spring, then a branch of Mercer university. He then studied law under the preceptorship of Judge A. R. Wright, Rome, Ga., where he was admitted to the bar in April, 1845. The ensuing August he located in Marietta, Cobb Co., Ga., where he established a good professional reputation and secured a good and influential clientage. In 1855 he moved to Campbell county, where he engaged in farming. He had prospered at his profession and was prospering as a farmer when the desolating "war between the states" was inaugurated, and at its close he found his life-time accumulations swept away. His age and ill health prevented him from taking an active part in the field, but he did efficient provost duty. In 1865 he was elected to represent Campbell county in the general assembly. In 1870 he moved to the then new county of Douglas and re-entered upon the practice of his profession. Notwithstanding his advanced age he retains his old-time fire, vigor and energy; has re-established a remunerative law practice and has the patronage and support of a large and influential clientage. In ante-bellum times he was an ardent "old-line whig" and an active stump speaker. So vigorous and well-equipped was he that Hon. L. J. Gartrell, who long represented the district in congress, was reported to have remarked that "Edge was one of the toughest customers he ever encountered on the stump." He is one of the oldest and best-known citizens of Douglas county and one of the oldest lawyers in that part of the state, and no person commands greater respect. Mr. Edge was married Nov. 19, 1846, to Clara, daughter of Martin and (Butt) Kolb, of Campbell county, a union blessed with six children: Mrs. Mary Adderhold, John V., J. K., J. B., Mrs. Octavia Bennett and Mrs. L. M. Dixon. Mrs. Edge died in 1886. He is a long-time master Mason and a prominent and useful member of the Baptist church.

W. A. JAMES, lawyer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Stephen and Martha (Shipleigh) James, was born in Campbell (now Douglas) county, May 7, 1847. His paternal grandparents, Stephen and Mary (Mills) James, were natives of North Carolina, whence they moved in 1825 to Walton county, Ga. They made the journey in ox-carts, in which they lived until cabins could be built. Clearing a piece of land, he engaged in farming. A few years later he moved to Cobb, and subsequently to Campbell county. Mr. James' father was born in Newbern, N. C., in 1821, and when a child came to Georgia with his parents. He became a large farmer and also a very prominent citizen of Campbell county. He was a justice of the peace for thirty years consecutively, and is credited with having married not less than 200 couples. He died in 1871. His mother was born about 1820 and was married in 1840. She is still living. Mr. James received his primary education in the common schools of his native county and finished it in the city schools of St. Louis. In 1864, at the age of seventeen, he enlisted in the Confederate service and served as aide de camp and courier to Gen. Wheeler. He was afterward transferred to the Third Alabama cavalry, in which he served until the surrender near Salem, N. C., by Gen. J. E. Johnston. He made his escape, however, and made his way home. Mr. James enjoys the distinction of having been one of the youngest soldiers in the regular Confederate service. He began life for himself as a clerk in a drug store in St. Louis, Mo. Afterward he studied law under the late Judge Dennis F. Hammond, of Atlanta, and was admitted to the bar in 1871. In 1873 he settled where Douglasville now stands, and the following year, in company with his brother James and others began the erection of the first house built in the town. In 1876 he moved to his mother's plantation near Lithia Springs, where he remained until 1881, when he returned to Douglasville and resumed the practice of law, in which he has been very successful, representing a large and valuable clientage. In 1885-86 he was mayor of the city, and again during the years 1892-93-94, and is chairman of the board of trustees of Douglasville college, which demonstrates his efficiency and public spirit, and the estimation in which he is held by his fellow citizens. Mr. James was married Jan. 15, 1879, to Miss Mary M., daughter of William P. and Mary (McLarty) Strickland. To them five children have been born: Clifford M., Ruby L., Nettie P., William P. and James. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and an active, influential member of the Methodist church.

JOSEPH S. JAMES, United States district attorney of the northern district of Georgia, was born in Campbell (now Douglas) county, Ga., March 20, 1849. He received a common school education, attending the log-cabin school located near his home. At an early age his mind possessed of much firmness, breadth and power for solving difficult problems, he decided to become a lawyer, and studied with this end in view. In 1869 he married Margaret Elizabeth E., daughter of the late Dr. E. W. Maxwell, a native of Douglas county. At this time, being very poor and without a thorough education, he was disqualified for the battle of life, but gathering all his strength and ability, he applied himself to the study of law, reading and being admitted to the bar without instructions from a lawyer or attending any law school, at times poring over his books the entire night. When admitted to the bar he stood a most creditable examination and immediately forged his way to the front of the profession in his section and has maintained that position ever since. He was admitted in Douglasville in 1875, and to the supreme court two years later. When twenty-one years of age he was elected justice of the peace in Douglas county, but resigned after two years' service. He was chosen the first mayor of Douglasville in 1876, holding the office for one term, and by his executive ability obtained the regard and congratulations of the community. In 1880 he was elected to represent Douglas county in Georgia's general assembly and re-elected after the expiration of the first term. In 1886 he was elected to the state senate from the thirty-sixth senatorial district, and served two years. In 1892 he was chosen a presidential elector-at-large from the state of Georgia, and in ninety days made 102 speeches in the state, covering almost every nook and corner, his consecutive appointments sometimes being from 100 to 300 miles apart, and frequently meeting in joint debate the opponents of his party. He was appointed United States district attorney by President Cleveland on April 3, 1893. As the legal representative of the government, the sole responsibility devolved upon him of grappling with and suppressing the gigantic organization in North Georgia known as "White Caps." In his herculean task he was ably assisted by Messrs. Rucker, Bell and Camp of his office and by the internal revenue collector and marshals. Lawyers who rank among the best in the state were employed for the defendants and the nature of the cases being wholly new to the practice, it required the greatest skill and ingenuity to draft bills of indictment that would stand the test of the law's technicalities. To this effort Mr. James devoted himself, spending one whole night in his office to perfect the bill upon which the worst of the organization were put on trial. They were convicted and his bill was sustained by the supreme court of the United States, to which the case was carried. Col. James has three daughters: Margaret Odessa, Eunice Lettitia and Lois Cleveland. He is a member of the Odd Fellows and affiliates with the Methodist church south. Mr. James is the son of Stephen James, who, with his three sons, fought valiantly in the late civil war. Those in the ranks were: George W., who gave up his life at Front Royal, Va.; John M., a member of the Twenty-first Georgia regiment, first lieutenant of Company A, who lost his right leg at Chancellorsville, and William A. James. Their bravery is denied by none.

W. H. POOLE, physician and surgeon, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of T. J. and Sarah (Brown) Poole, was born in South Carolina in 1833. His grandfather, Benjamin Poole, of English lineage, was born in South Carolina in 1780, served as a soldier in the last war with Great Britain in 1812, in the Seminole war of 1836, and died in 1850. Dr. Poole's father was born in South Carolina in 1810, was raised a farmer in that state, whence he migrated to Georgia, making the trip in ox-carts, and settled in Carroll county. He farmed in that county until 1850, when he moved to Cass (now Bartow) county, where he engaged in mining. From there he went to Iron Mountain, Ala., and thence to the famous Shelby mines, in the same state. He pursued his mining operations there until about 1870, when he returned to his old home in Georgia. There he conducted a farm until 1874, when he was killed by his horse running away. Dr. Poole's mother, daughter of William Brown, who distinguished himself in the war of 1812, and in the Indian war of 1836, was born in South Carolina in 1812. She was married in 1832 and is still living. Dr. Poole was raised on the farm and received his primary education at the near-by country schools, and when eighteen years old was sent to Hiwassee college. After being there three and a half years he had to leave on account of failing health, and did not graduate. A short time after that he began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. M. F. La Dell, an eminent physician of Cedartown, Ga., under whose instruction he remained two years. He then entered the Savannah Medical college—well known at the time as the "Old Arnold School"—where he remained two years, serving one year as interne in the Marine hospital. He graduated in 1860 with the first honors of his class. His graduating thesis—subject, "Modus Operandi of Medicines"—was published in the medical journals of the day and attracted the attention of the profession. During the war he was an examining surgeon for the Confederate army. Soon after the surrender he located near the present site of Douglasville. His natural ability and acquired attainments, his large experience, though yet young in the profession, and an already recognized superior physician, secured for him an extensive and profitable practice. He has been exceptionally successful in his practice, and has a well-earned, wide reputation, few, if any, physicians outranking him. He is an extensive planter and owns and operates several of the best farms in the county and two grist mills. Dr. Poole was married Oct. 3, 1861, to Miss Annie Marcella, daughter of Reuben and Flora (Price) Vansant, of an old South Carolina family. Eight children have blessed this union: Italia D., Mrs. Baxley, Carrie A., William T., Reuben H., Thomas J., Sallie, May and De Witt. Dr. Poole is a prominent member of the masonic fraternity and of the Lutheran church.

WILLIAM T. ROBERTS, lawyer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Melville C. and Susan E. (Skeen) Roberts, was born in Campbell county, Ga., Dec. 26, 1858. His paternal great-grandfather, Josephus Roberts, was North Carolina born, of English parentage. His grandparents were Grant and Frances (Pass) Roberts—the grandfather born in Buncombe county, N. C., Nov. 14, 1804. He was a large farmer, a prominent and influential citizen, and accumulated a very large fortune. In 1815 he migrated to Georgia and settled in Clarke county, subsequently moving to Campbell county, where he died March 16, 1888. Mr. Roberts' father was born in Campbell county, Sept. 28, 1834, was reared a farmer, and received such education as the best county schools could give. Soon after the war between the states began he enlisted in Company C, Thirty-sixth Georgia regiment, and served in all Gen. Lee's campaigns in defense of Richmond until July 3, 1863, when he was killed at Gettysburg. His mother, daughter of Purnell H. and Adaline (Steed) Skeen, an old North Carolina family, was born in Coweta county, Ga., Feb. 12, 1836, and was educated at the La Grange Female college, at La Grange, Ga., from which she was graduated in 1854. She was married Feb. 25, 1858, and became the mother of three children: William T., the subject of this sketch; Mrs. Sarah E. Terrell, deceased, and John M. Mr. Roberts was raised on the farm and received his education at the near-by country schools. He began life for himself as a clerk in the store of his uncle in Whitesburg, Ga. After clerking a few years he studied law and in 1881 was admitted to the bar in Carrollton, at the October term of Carroll county superior court, and in April, 1882, he located in Douglasville. He at once secured a good practice, which has increased in volume and value as the years rolled by. In 1884 he was elected mayor of Douglasville, and the following year was elected solicitor of the county court. In 1890 he was elected to represent Douglas county in the general assembly. In October, 1894, he was elected solicitor-general of the Tallapoosa circuit. Possessing fine talents and great energy, and being a close student, he has bright prospects before him.

J. L. SELMAN, physician and surgeon, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of James K. and Elizabeth (Hert) Selman, was born in Campbell (now Douglas) county in 1855. His paternal grandfather was a South Carolinian, a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and was scalped by the Indians—living many years afterward. Dr. Selman's father was born in South Carolina in 1812. He was raised on the farm and received a common school education; was raised a farmer, and continued to be one all his life. In 1848 he migrated to Georgia—coming in wagons—purchased land, continued farming and accumulated property. He died in 1866 from the effects of exposure and harassing reverses occasioned by the war. His mother, daughter of Wiley Hert, was born in South Carolina in 1812, and died in 1880. Dr. Selman was raised on the farm and educated at the country schools—his vacations being spent at the plow handles. In 1875 he began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. W. H. Poole, two years later entering Atlanta medical college, from which he was graduated in 1879 with marked distinction. He located in Douglasville, and soon established a good reputation and built up a large practice. He then established a drug store, the business of which has grown to large proportions. Dr. Selman was married in 1879 to Miss Nannie, daughter of William and Elizabeth (Selman) Abercrombie, and to them five children have been born: Bessie, Paul, Dewitt G., James and Joe M. He is an ardent member of the I. O. O. F., a master Mason, and an earnest working member of the Baptist church.

ALEXANDER G. WEDDINGTON, farmer and county treasurer, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of Alexander Green and Hannah (Polk) Weddington, was born in Campbell (now Douglas) county, in 1839. His paternal grandparents, William and Polly (Gilliam) Weddington, of Scotch-Irish parentage, were natives of North Carolina. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, serving with distinction, and died in 1836. Mr. Weddington's father was born in the "Old North state" in 1806, where he was raised on the farm and given a good country school education. In 1825, after having married, he migrated to Georgia and settled in the woods in what is now Campbell county. He made the trip in the old-time wooden-wheel ox-cart, held together by wooden pins, and hickory withes. The greater part of the journey a roadway had to be cut through the forests; at night they kept a fire burning to frighten off wild animals, and slept in tents, and under and in the carts. When they reached their new home in the woods filled with Indians and wild beasts, the family slept as they had on the road, and lived in tents until log cabins could be built, after which a farm was cleared in the virgin forest. He engaged in farming and gold-mining, amassed quite a fortune, and died Oct. 7, 1890. His mother was a daughter of Charles and Nellie Polk—her father being a cousin of President James K. Polk—was born Sept. 1, 1812, and died Aug. 27, 1874. She was well educated for the times, and shared with her husband all the privations and hardships incident to frontier life. Of the children born to them these survive: Mrs. Pollie A. Hawkins, Mrs. Jane E. White, Mrs. Hannah A. Stewart, Mrs. Campie V. McBrayer, Mrs. Catharine L.

Roach, Charles W., Atlanta, and Alexander G., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Weddington was raised on the farm, received as good an education as could be obtained at the time and locality, and on reaching maturity engaged in farming. In 1861, he enlisted in Company C—of which he was commissioned third lieutenant—Thirtieth Georgia regiment. In a very short time he was promoted to first lieutenant. The first service of his command was on the river and harbor defenses near Savannah; he was then sent to Vicksburg and participated in the battle of Jackson, after which his command was with the army defending Atlanta. He was in nearly every battle of importance between Nashville and Jonesboro. Just before the battle of Chickamauga he was stricken with fever which necessitated a furlough. At the end of three months he returned to the army and continued in the field until the surrender. He returned to his home to find it a scene of desolation—slaves freed and gone, stock killed or stolen, fences gone and houses rifled and almost ruined. Finding an old blind horse roaming at large near his home he “conscripted” it, and with it worked his first crop. Later he moved to Paulding county, where he successfully farmed six years and then came back and purchased the old homestead from his father. Adopting the progressive methods of farming, and using improved implements he thoroughly cultivated his land with the best of results, added to his possessions and improved and enlarged his buildings. In addition to his farming he established a ginnery and engaged in milling. In 1884, in order to give his children better educational advantages, he moved to Douglasville. For three years after this he was associated with A. W. McClarty in a general merchandise business, in which he cleared money. In 1892 he was elected county treasurer, and now holds the office by re-election. Among his old comrades he is known by the familiar name of “Sandy,” and those who once stood side by side with him on the battlefield stand firmly by him now, as they all love him like a brother—and stand ready to bestow upon him any office he may ask for. Of untiring energy and excellent business judgment, he has made a success of everything he has undertaken, and is well fixed for life, happy in his domestic relations, and has a warm place in the affections of his fellow-citizens. Devotion to duty has been his motto, and his devotion has been rewarded. Obtaining ten days’ leave of absence after the battle of Jackson, he hastened home, and Aug. 11, 1863, was married to Miss Luvinia, daughter of Thomas J. and Mary A. (Taylor) Blanchard—formerly of Columbia county, Ga.—a union blessed with the following children: Mrs. Rhoda E. Tanner; Mrs. Ella V. Burson, Mrs. Frances E. Griffith, and James L. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and a master Mason; and a life-long exemplary member of the Methodist church.

T. R. WHITLEY, physician and surgeon, Douglasville, Douglas Co., Ga., son of E. R. and M. M. (Rice) Whitley, was born in what is now Douglas county in 1855. His father, son of Jackson Whitley, was born in North Carolina in 1820. In 1840 he visited Greene county, Ga., as a traveling clock trader, and being favorably impressed with the country, established himself as a slave dealer, in which business he made much money. When the war between the states began he made up the second company which went from Campbell (now Douglas) county, of which he was elected captain. In 1863 he was discharged on account of bad health, but immediately re-enlisted in the state service. He was captured at Campbellton, Ga., and was sent to Johnson’s Island, where he was detained eighteen months, during which time he employed his time and amused himself by making gutta percha rings for sale. After the surrender he returned to his home and engaged in farming and trading in land. He was soon afterward elected sheriff of the county, and held the office almost continuously until his death in 1878. His wife, daughter of Thomas and Leah (Bromer) Rice, was born in South Carolina in 1832, and when a mere child came to Georgia with her parents. She was married in 1847 and is still living. Dr. Whitley was raised on the farm and educated mostly at Chapel Hill. After leaving school he read medicine and when nineteen years of age he entered the medical college at Louisville, Ky., and attended lectures one term, and subsequently attended the Atlanta Medical college three terms, from which he graduated in 1876. He immediately located at Douglasville, and while he has engaged in the general practice of his profession, he has paid particular attention to surgery. He has been very successful, established an excellent reputation, and a richly paying medical patronage. He has always interested himself in educational matters and was the moving spirit in the establishment of the Douglasville college, an institution second to none in the smaller cities of the state, and has been a member of the board of trustees since its inception. Dr. Whitley has been since his majority one of the leaders of political thought and action of his section and has been honored many times by the community in which he lives with positions of honor and trust, and is at present state senator from the thirty-sixth senatorial district, which is composed of the counties of Coweta, Meriwether, Campbell and Douglas. He is a member of some of the most important committees of the senate and recognized as a strong and influential factor in that body. Dr. Whitley was married in 1876 to Miss Mary F., daughter of Henry C. and Raymouth (Rice) Holcombe, who has borne him the following children: Helen Edna, Hattie R., Mary F., Grady and Raymouth. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and himself and wife are prominent members of the Baptist church.

ECHOLS COUNTY.

J. FRANK HALL, physician and surgeon, Statenville, Echols Co., Ga., was born in Montgomery county, Ga., May 4, 1838. He was educated at Randolph high school, and then studied medicine under Dr. Paul F. Eve, Nashville, Tenn., and graduated from the college there in 1860. Soon afterward he entered the Confederate service and was appointed assistant surgeon of Bartow hospital, Savannah, Ga. After a year's service there he enlisted in the Fourth Georgia cavalry and was elected a first lieutenant. He saw much active service and was wounded in an engagement in Burke county, Ga., while with his command he was operating on the flank of the Union forces when marching through Georgia. At the close of the war he located in Tattnall county and engaged in the practice of his profession, did a very large practice, and was remarkably successful. In 1872 he removed to Statenville, Echols Co., Ga., where his acknowledged skill, sympathetic attention, and conscientious discharge of his professional duties have secured for him an extensive and lucrative practice. No medical practitioner in what is known as the wire grass country of Georgia stands higher with the people and the profession than Dr. Hall, and no one is more justly entitled to the confidence and good will accorded him. He has acquired a comfortable fortune, and his land holdings in Echols county amount to 8,000 acres. In 1876-77 he was president of the board of county commissioners, and in 1880 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly. In that body he was placed on the committees on penitentiary, sanitary and hygiene, and the state of the republic, on all of which he rendered effective and valuable service. Dr. Hall was married in 1860 to Miss Lurana, daughter of Solomon Mobley of Appling county, who died in 1886, leaving ten children, of whom seven are living, and five of whom are located as follows: John F., born in November, 1863, educated at Bradwell institute, Liberty county, Ga., read medicine under his father, graduated at the Atlanta Medical college, and is located at Lake Park, Ga., where he enjoys a good practice; Mary R., married D. S. Parton, mill-man, farmer and merchant, Seward, Montgomery Co., Ga.; Flora C., married H. J. Gibbs, sawmill man and farmer, Montgomery county; Eliza B., married Robert J. He is a member of the masonic fraternity.

EARLY COUNTY.

Mr. Chancey was educated in the common schools of the county and was reared on the farm, but later in life engaged in merchandising. During the war he was a member and sergeant of Company C, Twenty-ninth battalion, Georgia artillery. He was elected to represent the county in the general assembly in 1872 and has served in this capacity four terms, the last ending in 1886. He was also a member of the constitutional convention in 1877. Being honored by election to such responsible positions shows an appreciation of his capacity and integrity. Mr. Chancey was married Jan. 12, 1851, to Miss Narcissus, daughter of R. W. Sheffield, who once represented Early county in the general assembly. They have had five children: B. E., born in 1853; Quitman, born in 1855; James B., born in 1857, county ordinary; John C., born in 1859, marshal of Blakeley, and Hattie D., widow of John W. Deal. Mr. Chancey is an uncompromising democrat and a master Mason.

Mr. Chancey's father was not only a successful merchant in Blakely, but filled many important offices in the county, and represented it a number of years in the general assembly. Mr. Chancey received a fair common-school education, and when he reached manhood engaged in farming, which he still continues. He has held the office of justice of the peace six years. In 1893 he was elected ordinary of the county, an office which he still holds. Mr. Chancey was married in 1877 to Miss Elizabeth Minter, of Early county, by whom he has had three children: Alpheus Baker, born in February, 1878; Lawton Eugene, born in 1886, and Hattie May.

THOMAS F. JONES, merchant, Blakely, Early Co., Ga., son of Thomas F. and Elizabeth (Scott) Jones, was born in Covington, Newton Co., Ga., Aug. 26, 1845. His father was a prominent lawyer, and at one time represented his senatorial district in the general assembly. He died in 1874, leaving nine children, one of whom, Maj. John F. Jones, was a distinguished officer in the Confederate army, and for a number of years was in the office of the secretary of state of Georgia. Thomas F. Jones was educated at the Georgia military academy, then at Marietta, Cobb Co., Ga. Toward the close of the war the cadets went into the state service for home defense. After the surrender he went into the mercantile business in Conyers, Rockdale Co., continuing it four years, and then removed to Blakely, where he has lived as a merchant ever since. In 1874 he was elected colonel of the Pataula battalion of state troops, and held the office four years. That same year he was elected county school commissioner, and has been continued in it until now—twenty years. Maj. Jones is not only an efficient officer, but he takes great interest in all movements and legislation promotive of educational advancement. Maj. Jones was united in marriage in Early county, in 1874, with Miss Fannie C., daughter of Dr. William M. Standifer. Four children have been born to them. Frank Standifer, born January, 1876, now a student at the university of Georgia, at Athens; Ethel, born in 1878; Emory Scott, born in 1883; and Murray Thomas, born in 1889. Maj. Jones does a large business, has been successful and is prosperous; unambitious as to politics.

JOSEPH P. LANE, planter, Early Co., Ga., son of Joseph W. Lane, was born in Early county, Sept. 21, 1849. His father was a prosperous farmer, and died in 1864. As was the case with most boys and girls during Mr. Lane's youthful period, his education, even common school, was limited. His life labor has been confined to farming, on a good-sized plantation, eight miles from Blakely. His fellow-citizens, recognizing his fitness and capability, have frequently called him into their service. In 1878 he was elected receiver of tax returns, and was continued in the office six years. He has also served as county commissioner one term. He is at present county representative in the general assembly—having been elected in 1890, and re-elected in 1892—and was assigned to the following committees: General agriculture, enrollment, penitentiary, wild lands and asylum. Mr. Lane was happily married in 1873 to Miss Georgia, daughter of Roland and Isabella Russon, of North Georgia, who has borne him four children: Robert W., born Oct. 1, 1874; Mary Ida, born February, 1876; Susie B., born Nov. 6, 1880, and Joseph R., born Jan. 15, 1882. RICHARD HOLMES POWELL, lawyer, Blakely, Early Co., Ga., son of Rev. Hiram Powell, one of the pioneer Baptist ministers in the middle portion of Georgia, was born Oct. 21, 1841, in Talbot county, Ga. The latter part of 1843 his father moved to Crawford county, and in 1859 to Early county, where he died in 1861. Mr. Powell's education was limited to the common county schools, as the impending "war," and his consequent subsequent experience interfered with his laudable ambition in this direction. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Sixth Georgia regiment, and enjoyed the honor of being the first man in the county to volunteer. He was made sergeant of his company. He was wounded a number of times during his service, and, finally, at Petersburg, lost his right leg. Until then, 1864, he never missed a day. After the war he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1866, before Judge John T. Clark. He located in Blakely, which has continued to be his residence, and where he has built a large and profitable business. The next week after his admission to the bar he was unanimously elected solicitor of the county court. Mr. Powell was married Dec. 3, 1872, to Miss Kittie, daughter of Col. Joel Perry, one of the most prominent citizens in the county. To them have been born five children: Arthur G., born Sept. 2, 1873, educated at Mercer university, Macon, Ga., with a law course at the university of Virginia, and now associated with his father in the practice of his profession; Richard H., Jr., born March 3, 1875, graduated at Mercer university with first honor, and is now principal of Tennille, Ga., high school; Wade Hampton, born Dec. 19, 1877; Hiram Perry, born March 1, 1880, and Katie Lee, born Sept. 11, 1884. Col. Powell has an excellent standing with his profession, and with the people as a lawyer, and is held in the highest esteem by his fellow-citizens. A brilliant future seems to be in store for the son, associated with him.

WILLIAM M. STANDIFER, physician and surgeon, Blakely, Early Co., Ga., was born in Jasper county, Ga., June 12, 1816. After receiving a country school education, he studied medicine under Dr. Ridley, at La Grange, Ga. He then attended the lectures at Charleston (S. C.) Medical college, graduating in 1838. He located in Blakely, Ga., in 1840, where he has spent his professional life. He afterward attended lectures at the medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, where he graduated in 1844. ELBERT COUNTY.

GEORGE L. ALMOND. The Almond family were among the early settlers of Elbert county, and have for nearly a century been prominently identified with its history and business interests. John Almond, the head of the Georgia branch of the family by this name, was a native of Virginia, and of English-French descent. He settled in Elbert county when a young man, and taking up farming as a vocation, married Ann Settle, the daughter of another old settler of the county. During the war of 1812 he left the farm in the hands of his wife and served his country throughout the struggle. His son, James Almond, the father of the subject of this sketch, followed the pursuit of his father, on the farm, and was an honest, upright citizen, popular with every one. He was an ardent and strict member of the Baptist church, and lived to the ripe old age of seventy-eight years, dying at his home at the old homestead. He married Amanda M. Fortsom, a daughter of Benjamin and Elizabeth (Gaines) Fortsom. Mr. Fortsom was a wealthy planter of Elbert county, who had come from Virginia in the early part of the century. He too served in the war of 1812, thus giving Mr. George L. Almond, the subject of this sketch, two immediate ancestors, who served in the second war of this country against England. George L. Almond, the ordinary of Elbert county, was born in the county he so efficiently serves, in 1851. He was brought up as a farmer boy usually found it in those days, with plenty of work and meager opportunities for learning. Yet George improved every chance, and by the time he reached manhood possessed a well-stored mind. In 1876 he married Mattie Chandler, daughter of Asa and Laura H. (Sullivan) Chandler. Mr. Asa Chandler was a native of Franklin county, Ga., and was a very prominent minister of the Baptist church. He died in Elberton, Ga., in 1874, respected and honored by the entire community. Mrs. Almond was born in 1855. To Mr. Almond and his wife one child, Vaunie, has been born, to whom they are giving the best opportunities for a finished education. The family are members of the Baptist church, of which he is a deacon and Sunday school superintendent. He was made a deacon when only eighteen years of age, and when twenty-five was made superintendent of the Sunday school. He is a master Mason, and takes great interest in the fraternity. That the people of Elbert county regard Mr. Almond most favorably and are well satisfied with his official life, is shown by the continuous election to the office of ordinary since 1881. He is an open-hearted, honest, Christian gentleman, whose career in life, witnessed by hundreds of people who knew him from birth, has been very successful. Mr. Almond has a pleasant home in Elberton, which is always open to his friends.

About 1815, Davis Arnold, a native of North Carolina, with his wife (Elizabeth Wilhite) and family left the "Old North" and located in Elbert county, Ga. He was a farmer and one of the leading early settlers of the county. Joseph, one of his sons, brought up on the farm, and learning the carpenter's trade, early prepared himself for a busy life. He added to the original acreage of the Arnold homestead and became a large slave owner. He served in the late war and died in February, 1895, at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. Joseph Arnold married Sarah K. Thornton, a daughter of Benjamin and Nancy (Payne) Thornton, natives of Virginia. Mr. McAlpin Arnold, son of Joseph and Sarah K. (Thornton) Arnold, was born on a farm in Elbert county, in 1847. His education was obtained from the country schools, and at the age of seventeen he enlisted in the war, serving in the militia and state troops, and was in the fight at Coosahatchie, S. C. In 1875, he married Annie Carter, daughter of James M. Carter, who was born in Hart county. His father was born in Virginia, and belonged to the family of Carters in that state. Mr. Carter is a well-to-do farmer, now living in Hart county. Was in the general assembly in 1860, and was a brave soldier in the war between the states. Mrs. Arnold's mother, Mary Louise Clark, was a direct descendant of the Alston family, originally from Virginia, but whose descendants are now scattered over most of the southern states. They are a family of revolutionary distinction and many incidents of startling interest are connected with this family, both in the remote as well as in the recent history of our country. By this union were born the following living children: Sarah Louise, Julius Y., Edna, and Carter. Mrs. Arnold was born in 1849. The early part of Mr. Arnold's life was spent on the farm, but in 1874 he engaged in the mercantile business with Thomas M. Swift. In 1876 this partnership was dissolved and he joined H. K. Gairdner in the business which has since been continued. Mr. Arnold is president of the bank of Elberton, and is a representative business man of Elbert county. MAJ. J. H. JONES. The latter part of the eighteenth century saw many old Virginian families migrate to the lands beyond the Blue Ridge and Georgia was largely benefited, not only by the number, but the character of the new settlers. Among these families was that of John Jones, a robust Virginian, who had served in the ranks of the patriot army with distinction during the revolutionary war. He was of Welsh descent and a native of Virginia. The original family settled where the city of Baltimore now stands and the creek running through the city called Jorus Falls was named for this family. He had married Ann Shackleford, the daughter of an old Virginia family, and in 1791 brought his wife and family to Elbert county, Ga., where he began the life of a farmer. There were but few inhabitants of the county at that time, but nothing daunted the pioneer, who cleared away the forests and tilled the soil with the energy characteristic of his people. He was one of the founders of Elberton and helped lay the place off. Thomas Jones was a son of this man and was born before the family left Virginia, in Albemarle county. He helped his father in the first years of their life in Georgia and worked as a clerk in the firm of Weston & Chipman of Edinburg. In 1810 he entered business as a merchant on his own account, and continued the same until he died in 1840. At one time he was sheriff of Elbert county. He married Eliza M. Darracotte, a daughter of John and Rebecca (Wingfield) Darracotte. Mr. Darracotte was a native of Virginia and an early settler of Wilkes county, Ga. He was a merchant and died in Abbeville county, S. C. Maj. John H. Jones is a son of this union of old Virginia stock, and is a leading citizen and merchant of Elbert county. He was born in Elberton in 1816, on the lot where he now lives, and is now in his eightieth year. His education was better than that which fell to the lot of the average young man of that period and young Jones was graduated from the university of Georgia at Athens in 1838. He returned to his home and entered into a mercantile business which he has since continued. He served in the late war as a member of the state militia. In 1843 he married Lavonia Hammond, daughter of Alfred and Louisa (Hudson) Hammond. Mr. Hammond was born in South Carolina and first settled in Franklin county, Ga., afterward moving to Elbert county, where he died. He was a merchant and a very successful business man. Mrs. Jones was born in 1827. By the marriage of Maj. Jones to Miss Hammond, seven children are now living: Thomas; Louisa, who married Robert Heard; Ida, married to Capt. J. J. Burch; Lavonia, married to H. K. Gairdner; Mary C., wife of T. J.

Blackwell; Willie O., married Mollie Gairdner, Columbus, Ga., and Norah. The families all belong to the Methodist church. Maj. Jones is an honored officer in the masonic fraternity and was made a member in 1841. He has served his county as judge of the inferior court, but never sought political honors, preferring to devote himself to his business. Notwithstanding he lost 114 slaves by the war, he has managed his large plantation as his business interests dictated, with gratifying success. Maj. Jones is beloved and honored by all who know him, especially so with the women and children. A long business career has shown him to be a man of probity, a sincere friend and a practical citizen with broad views. Far-sighted, quick in discernment and sound in business judgment, Maj. Jones has for years been often consulted on every conceivable enterprise by friends and acquaintances.

In 1891 Dr. Long was chosen mayor of Elberton, serving one term. He has been a member of the town council for years. In 1894 he was elected to the state senate. Through his first experience as a legislator he made a state reputation, serving on the most important committees: Banks, finance, railroad, corporations, lunatic asylum, deaf and dumb and others. Dr. Long enjoys a fine practice in Elberton, and so high is his reputation in his profession that his services are in demand from surrounding towns. He has ever enjoyed the full confidence of his patients, while his standing as an exemplary citizen has always been of the highest. His practice has been general in character and attended with a high degree of pecuniary success.

JOHN W. M'CALLA, farmer, Heardmont, Elbert Co., Ga., descends from revolutionary stock, his great-grandfather, a native of Ireland, having been a brave soldier in the ranks of the patriots. His grandfather was John McCalla, born in South Carolina, and a farmer and slave-holder of that state. He was married to Susan Tenant and to them was born one child, George R. McCalla, the father of Mr. J. W. McCalla. George R. McCalla was born and lived all his life in South Carolina, and, like his father, was a large planter and slave holder. He was a man of great intellectual accomplishments, a thorough student and a classical scholar. He enjoyed the advantage of instruction under the direction of eminent private tutors, and was graduated from the university of Georgia, Athens, taking the second honor. He was a classmate of Hon. T. R. Cobb. He was married to Mary Allen, the beautiful daughter of a neighbor planter, Singleton W. Allen. The latter descended from the old Virginia family of that name, and was born in Elbert county, Ga. He was an active politician and one of Elbert county's foremost citizens. He represented the county in the legislature in both the house and the state senate, and refused further honors in order to give attention to his farm. He died in 1852. Mr. George R. McCalla died in 1885, at an advanced age. He was opposed to the late war, and did all in his power to prevent it, but when the die was cast, and nothing but the clash of arms could follow, he accepted the inevitable and supported the south. Mr. J. W. McCalla was born in the Abbeville district, S. C., in 1850, and was graduated from the university of Georgia. In 1870 he married Francesca Du Pree, daughter of Lewis and Mary (Adams) Du Pree. The latter was a leading business man of Athens, and was a man prominently identified with the political and commercial affairs of the state. Mrs. McCalla was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., in 1850. She died about a year after her marriage, and in 1873 Mr. McCalla was wedded to Mary Allen, daughter of Banaster and Anna (Averby) Allen. Mr. Allen was a native of Virginia and afterward moved to Georgia, thence to South Carolina, where he died. Mr. and Mrs. McCalla have had born to them three children who are now living: Earl, Annie, and Olivia. The mother was born in South Carolina in 1850. The family belong to the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mr. McCalla is a member of the masonic fraternity. He has always been a farmer, and now owns a magnificent estate of about 6,000 acres. Upon this are extensive improvements and much live stock, all constituting one of the finest farms in Georgia. Mr. McCalla is one of the wealthiest planters in southwest Georgia, and his entire possessions are the result of his own individual efforts.

CLARK MATTOX, farmer, Elberton, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., in 1838. He is the grandson of David and Sarah (Hale) Mattox, natives of Virginia, who moved to Georgia about 1800, and settled in Elbert county, where he lived and died. David Mattox was one of the hardy pioneers whose industry and bravery broke down all barriers and rescued Elbert county from the wilderness and peopled her confines with the blood of old Virginia. He was a poor man when he began life in Georgia, and for years his life was a struggle. His indomitable will, however, overcame all hardships and won success, and he died a well-to-do man. He was a brave soldier in the war of 1812. A son, Henry P., was born in Elbert county. He married Sophia Munnelee of Elbert county, and moved to Oglethorpe county, where he lived for several years, returning to Elbert county, where he died. He was a farmer and served in the war between the states. He was a member of the state legislature in 1874-5, and was a successful business man. His wife was a daughter of James F. and Jane (Nash) Munnelee, and was born in Elbert county in 1840. Mr. Munnelee was a native of Virginia, and moved to Georgia at an early day, where he died. Mr. Clark Mattox, son of David, was reared on a farm, and was given the best education afforded by the local educational institutions. In 1861 he enlisted in the war, Company I, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, under Capt. McIntosh. His company was afterward reorganized and he served under Capt. Joseph Smith. He was an active participant in many important battles. He was at Malvern hill, Garnet farm, Manassas, Atlanta, and then with the army to Savannah, as captain of Company C, state troops. He was slightly wounded in the first battle of Garnet farm. In 1858 Mr. Mattox married Frances J. Brawner, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth (Upshaw) Brawner. Mr. Brawner was born in Elbert county and was a leading farmer and large slave owner. To this union were born children, five of whom are living: Joseph H., William C., Mrs. Lizzie Hullguis, Annie, and Clark. Mr. and Mrs. Mattox are members of the Baptist church and he is a Mason. He was justice of the peace for twenty-five years and is now a member of the county school board. After the war Mr. Mattox returned to his farm, which he has since managed prosperously. He owns about 1,600 acres of land and a mill and gin, and is regarded as one of the leading farmers of Elbert county.

D. P. OGLESBY, farmer, Elberton, was born in Elbert county in 1838, and is the son of William and Pelina (Wiley) Oglesby. His grandfather, Thomas Oglesby, was born in Virginia and came to Elbert county, where he located on a farm and passed his life. His son William was born in Virginia and preceded his father to Elbert county one year, he having attained his majority and set out for himself. He married first Mary (Christian) Oglesby, and after her death married Pelina, daughter of George and Mildred (David) Wiley. Mr. George Wiley was a native of Georgia, a successful farmer, and died in Gwinnett county. Mr. D. P. Oglesby has spent a large part of his life on the farm. He received a good education for his day, and in 1862 enlisted in the late war, joining Company G, Ninth Georgia battalion, as a private under Capt. Eberhart. This battalion was subsequently consolidated with the Third Georgia battalion, and made the Thirty-seventh Georgia regiment. He served gallantly and was in several important battles. At Murfreesboro he received a severe wound in the shoulder and was sent home. In three months he was back on duty. By this time his comrades had elevated him to the rank of first lieutenant of his company. After this he was engaged in the battles of Chickamauga, Decatur and Franklin, Tenn. At the latter place he received a severe wound in the leg, and at Chickamauga was injured in the face. His Franklin wound disabled him for months after the surrender. Mr. Oglesby was married in 1860 to Margaret Deadwyler, daughter of Asa and Margaret (Eberhart) Deadwyler. Mr. Deadwyler was a native of Elbert county and afterward moved to Madison county, where he died. Mr. Oglesby and wife have had born to them seven children, six of whom are living, viz: Mary T., who married Dr. B. A. Henry; Cornelia A., married to H. J. Brewer; Gussie F., married to Col. W. F. Jones; Addie, Lena, and John J. Mrs. Oglesby was born in Madison county in 1840. They are both members of the Baptist church, and Mr. Oglesby is a Mason. Like so many others in Elbert county, Mr. Oglesby had little left after the war and had to start anew. The trials of the farmers for the first few years after the conflict were many, but he overcame all and again accumulated a good competency. He owns a fine farm of 1,200 acres and considerable property in Elberton, and beside, he owns a store in Oglesby, a town on the G. C. & N. R. R. named after his family. He is a citizen honored and respected by all.

S. C. STARKE, farmer, Flatwoods, Elbert Co., Ga., was born in Fairfield county, S. C., in 1818, and is the son of S. C. and Anne Mickle Starke. His grandfather, William Starke, was a native of and lived all his life in South Carolina. He and five brothers served in the army of the patriots in the revolutionary war. He was of Welsh descent and a public-spirited and high-minded gentleman. His son, S. C. Starke, was born in South Carolina and moved with his family to Elbert county, Ga., in 1827. He was a big farmer and a respected citizen. He died in Alabama, where he had moved a few years previous. He was married to a daughter of John and Jane Mickle. The latter was of Irish ancestry, and was a native and life-long resident of South Carolina. He was learned and deeply religious, and was one of the best-informed men on the scriptures and scriptural writings in the state. Mr. S. C. Starke was brought up on the farm and received the benefit of an academic education. He taught school for a short time and in 1843 was married to Mary A. Brewer, daughter of Edmund H. and Lucy (Carter) Brewer. Mr. Brewer was born and reared in Elbert county. By this union the following children were born: Mary, the wife of Thomas W. Hill; Sarah, wife of Ex-Gov. B. R. Tillman of South Carolina; E. B., who married a daughter of Dr. Baker; Addie, wife of George C. Grogan. The mother was born in 1824. They are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church. In 1863 Mr. Starke was elected to the state legislature and served four years. He was a very able member of the committee on agriculture, and to his earnest efforts are due many laws which were enacted of interest and benefit to the farmer. He is a self-made man, starting in life as a poor boy; he had accumulated a splendid competence at the breaking out of the war. There was little left of it when the strife ended, but he went to work again and now owns about 1,100 acres of choice land.

A. C. STOVALL, farmer, Oglesby, Elbert Co., was born in Franklin county, Ga., in 1819, and is the son of George H. and Nancy (Christian) Stovall. He descends from old revolutionary stock, his grandfather having served in the war for independence, while his father battled against the English in the war of 1812. James S. Stovall, a revolutionary soldier, of French descent, married a Miss Bradley, daughter of an old Virginia patriot. With his wife and family he left his native state in 1787, and coming to Georgia, settled in what is now Elbert county, where he died from the effects of a wound received in the revolutionary conflict. A son, George, born in Virginia in 1781, married Nancy Christian of Elbert county, a daughter of John Christian, a well-to-do farmer, who had come to Georgia with Mr. Stovall's father in 1787. Mr. Christian was a prosperous farmer and a fine gentleman. Soon after his marriage George Stovall moved to Franklin county, where he bought a farm and passed his life. He served his country in the second war with Great Britain and attained the rank of captain, and was a brave and honest man. His son, A. C. Stovall, was raised on the farm and received his education at the "old field" school. In 1838 he married Mary L. Christian, daughter of Dr. Edward L. Christian, a physician of prominence in Madison county, Ga. By this marriage the following children, now living, were born: Cornelia, wife of John L. Mize; Mary, who married C. A. Brock; Sarah R., who married Ira T. Harbor. Mrs. Stovall was born in Madison county, Ga., in 1822, and died in 1848. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and a most estimable woman. In 1859 Mr. Stovall married Sarah F. Almond, daughter of James and Amanda M. (Fortson) Almond. She was born in Elbert county in 1833. They have four living children: James T., Albert S. J., Minnie L. and Benjamin. Mrs. Stovall is a member of the Baptist church and a woman much loved by her friends. Mr. Stovall began life as a poor boy, and after acquiring considerable property by his industry and energy, he suffered a big loss by the war, but he again set to work and now is again "on top." He owns a nice farm of 560 acres near Oglesby on Dove creek post office.

JUDGE EDMUND BREWER TATE, Elberton, Elbert Co., Ga., was born in the same county April 2, 1841, on his father's farm, four miles south of the city of Elberton, and was the sixth son of Edmund B. and Mahala (Fortson) Tate. His father, Edmund B. Tate, was born in Madison county, Ga., and was a farmer and slave-owner. He died in Elbert county (where he had lived the most of his life) at the age of seventy-seven. Judge Tate's paternal grandfather was Robert L. Tate, who came to Georgia from North Carolina about 1800. Judge Tate was reared on the farm and received the schooling furnished by the public and private schools of his section. Just entering manhood when the war broke out, he hastened to join the army, enlisting in Company C, Fifteenth Georgia volunteers, under Capt. L. H. O. Martin, leaving home for the front July 15, 1861. His record during the great conflict was one of active campaigning and fighting, embracing various bloody engagements and battles; was in the seven days' battle around Richmond, second battle of Manassas, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, besides other minor engagements. He was severely wounded in the battle of Chickamauga, on Sept. 19, 1863, by a minie ball, which entered his left nipple, went through his left lung and came out on left side of spinal column, and near the same; the ball not only pierced his body through, but made sixteen holes through an army blanket, which at the time was rolled up and carried over his shoulders. While the wound was severe and thought at the time to be fatal, yet, by the good nursing of his father, who hastened to his bedside, which was in a large barn on the field of battle which had been converted into a hospital, he so far recovered that his father in the short space of one month carried him home. Judge Tate, not having recovered sufficiently to return to the army, and seeing he would not again be able for active service, in January, 1865, opened what was known in those days as an "old field" school at Asbury Chapel, in Elbert county, which was a success. This, his first venture to set up for himself, gave him two hundred dollars in gold, which was the foundation for his present fortune, which is not very large, but comfortable. Judge Tate has been a lifelong democrat and has been active in the political affairs in Elbert county, having held some office in the gift of his people nearly continuously since 1866. In January, 1866, he was elected clerk of Elbert superior court, which office he held for one term. In 1868 he was elected ordinary of Elbert county, holding that office one term of nearly five years. In 1878 Judge Tate was elected county commissioner of roads and revenue of Elbert county, holding four terms (sixteen years); the last twelve years was honored with the chairmanship of that body, which expired in January, 1895. He was one of the three commissioners who recognized the crying need and necessity of Elbert county for better public buildings to take the place of the old dilapidated ones which she had. They accomplished their object, though not without great opposition by a large percentage of the people. Through these efforts Elbert county now has a splendid $8,000 modern jail and a magnificent $40,000 court house, all of this work being accomplished during the last two years in office—1893 and 1894. In November, 1866, Judge Tate was married to Miss Ella G. Mathews, second daughter of Dr. Albert C. Mathews, one of Elbert's most prominent physicians. Four sons and one daughter blessed this marriage; two sons, Robert Enos and Eddie B., died in their second year. The living sons are Ora

Eugene and Albert Mathews. His daughter, Mrs. Sophia Tate Bigham, wife of E. W. Bigham, died in 1894, leaving one child, a boy, E. B. Bigham. The mother, a most exemplary Christian and loving and dutiful wife, was born in 1849 and died Jan. 10, 1881. Judge Tate was wedded a second time, the latter part of 1881, to Miss Mattie A. (daughter of James C. Wright of Wilkes county, Ga., who was a prominent farmer), born in Wilkes county in 1850. The fruits of this union are two children, a son and daughter: James Wright Tate and Em-Mai Tate. The family are members of the Methodist church, and Judge Tate is also a member of the masonic fraternity. Judge Tate, in the fall of 1870, engaged in the mercantile business and continued therein for twenty years in the city of Elberton. Having, by strict economy and perseverance, accumulated a nice little property, he is now (1895) building one of the nicest and finest residences in the city of Elberton. Judge Tate possesses a remarkably clear and well-poised judgment and is seldom in error upon any business project he has carefully investigated; as a business man there are few men better posted and equipped than he is. He was one of eight brothers who entered the Confederate army, three of whom were killed in the service.

J. N. WALL, farmer, Elberton, was born in Elbert county in 1850. His grandfather was Willis Wall, born in Virginia, and a settler in Elbert county before it was carved out of Wilkes county. He married Martha Page, and was a soldier in the patriot ranks in the war for independence. He was a farmer and a slaveholder. His son, B. C. Wall, married Mattie W. Nunelee, and was a merchant for many years at Longstreet, then a prosperous town in Elbert county. He was a large slave-holder and owned a large plantation, upon which he died in 1878 at an advanced age. His son, Mr. J. N. Wall, the subject of this memoir, was given a good education and attended the Elberton high school, then a leading institution of the state. In 1868 he married Ella Fortson, daughter of Haley and Jennie (Hanson) Fortson. Mr. Fortson was born in Elbert county, but now lives in Florida, where he is a large fruit-grower. To Mr. and Mrs. Wall have been born thirteen children: Elizabeth, Willie, Walter, George, Cassie, James, Sarah, Clarence, Talullah, Janie, Longstreet, Henry and Lee. The mother was born in Elbert county in 1849. The family belong to the Methodist Episcopal church, south. Mr. Wall was a member of the county board of roads and revenue for four years and has been county school commissioner since 1890. His early life was spent on the farm, but in 1876 he was ordained a minister of the Gospel, since which time he has preached regularly. He is a bright and clever gentleman, and one beloved by his flock and respected by the community at large.

GEORGE WOOSTER is of English nativity, and was born in Buckinghamshire in 1853, his parents being James and Sarah (Eggleton) Wooster, the former born in Buckinghamshire in 1802 and died in 1863. When but a youth, not out of his teens, young Wooster, who had been reared on a farm, left his English home to seek his fortune in the western world. He sailed from England for the United States Oct. 17, 1871, came first to Pike county, Ga., and a few weeks afterward finding his way to Meriwether county, where he arrived with but five cents in his pocket. But with true English courage and persevering energy he sought work, willing to do anything honorable for a living rather than be an idler. He worked a year for Daniel Keith, and then rented land from him for five years. After this he rented Mrs. T. P. Atkinson's farm in Oakland for a year, and then the place belonging to Thor Atkinson. He made his first investment in land in the county in 1881, and five years later bought a stock of goods, and set up in the mercantile business. He is a man of marked ability and versatile talent, as is evident from the fact that he has been very successful in several distinct lines of work. His fine farm of 350 acres is well cultivated and well stocked. He also did a thriving business in general merchandise, of which he had an extensive and well selected stock. Moreover, he ran a public gin, a planing mill and sawmill. In spite of the adverse circumstances of his earlier years and the fact that his education was somewhat limited, Mr. Wooster has made a success of his life work and is honored among his fellow-men. He is a notable instance of what pluck and perseverance will accomplish. In 1874 Mr. Wooster married Miss Cynthia Williams, a daughter of Stephen and Nancy A. (Simpson) Williams, who died in 1880. His present wife, who was Miss Pennie Esters, the daughter of David and Elizabeth (Caldwell) Esters, was born in 1859, and reared in Meriwether county. They were married in 1881, and have had three children, none of whom is living. Both Mr. and Mrs. Wooster are members of the Primitive Baptist church. Mr. Wooster has recently removed to Flatwoods, Elbert Co., which is now his home.

EMANUEL COUNTY.

JAMES AMASCUS COLEMAN, merchant and manufacturer, Rountree, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Elisha and Winnie Coleman, was born in Emanuel county in March, 1848. His father was born in Burke county, came to Emanuel county when a young man, married, settled down to farming and made agriculture the pursuit of his life. They are both living, and are respectively eighty-two and eighty-one years of age, and revered members of the Methodist church. Four children were born to them—three living to perpetuate their name and virtues: Matthew, killed at Sharpsburg while serving in the Confederate army; John C., an ex-Confederate soldier, who has been clerk of the superior court of Emanuel county, elected ordinary for several terms, now retired and accounted the wealthiest citizen of the county; Elisha J., Emanuel county, ex-lieutenant Georgia militia during the war, now a successful farmer, and James A., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Coleman was educated at the common schools of the county, and when only sixteen years of age enlisted in the Confederate service and was a participant in battle at Honey Hill, S. C. On his return from the army he engaged for several years in farming, and later engaged in rafting timber. He next engaged with his brother, John C., in a general merchandise business in Swainsborough, which continued four years. In 1888 he formed a partnership with James H. Ellison, and with him embarked in the saw-mill business, and in connection with it carried on a farm, running ten plows and a store, which last commanded a good trade. In 1894 the firm added to their enterprise the manufacture of naval stores. The firm owns the Coleman & Ellison railway, which connects with the Midville & Ellison railway at Midville. The sawmill cuts from 20,000 to 30,000 feet of lumber per day, and their turpentine farm produces 600 barrels of spirits and 2,500 barrels of resin annually, and their pay-roll amounts to more than $30,000 per annum. Confining himself to his business interests he neither desired nor sought office, but in 1894 he was nominated as the only citizen likely to defeat the populists. After one of the hottest campaigns ever conducted in the county he was elected over the strongest man his opponents could present to represent Emanuel county in the general assembly. He started in life without capital, but relying on his own resources, his energy, perseverance and strict business principles and practice, he has made a good business reputation and accumulated considerable property, with prospects of a large fortune in the near future. Mr. Coleman was married in 1884 to Miss Fannie, daughter of Enoch M. and Susan Lake, who has borne him five children: Ruby Pearl, deceased; the second child, not named; John Randolph, Winnie and Cleveland.

ELISHA JORDAN COLEMAN, farmer, Swainsborough, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Elisha and Winnie Coleman, was born in Emanuel county May 6, 1846. (For further particulars of parents and other members of the family, see sketch of James A. Coleman in these Memoirs.) Mr. Coleman was reared on the farm and attended the common schools of the county. At the early age of sixteen he enlisted in the Georgia militia and served in the army, and when twenty years old commenced farming on his own account. As a "starter" his father gave him a horse and enough to feed it a year. Excepting that during the later years he has run a grist mill and operated a ginnery, he has confined himself to farming, at which he has been satisfactorily successful. He is not wealthy, but he has a fine farm under good cultivation, with a pleasant home and a competency, and enjoys to the fullest extent the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Coleman was married July 15, 1874, to Miss Harriett, daughter of Enoch Lake, of Laurens county, by whom he has had twelve children, of whom eight are living: Beulah, Matthew, Otis, Fannie, Elisha, Lester, Sudie, and one not named. Those deceased are: Ada, Charles, Douglas, and one that died in infancy.

HENRY CLAY EDENFIELD, merchant, Swainsborough, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of David J. and Jane (Kennedy) Edenfield, was born in Emanuel county Dec. 29, 1859. His father was a mechanic, was also engaged in farming, and served as an officer in the Confederate army during the war between the states. There were born to Mr. Edenfield's parents the following children: Milton C., deceased; Henry Clay, Julian, Hattie, Jessie, Ida, Eva, Wright, Rufus, Mollie, Bessie and Gilbert. Mr. Edenfield was reared on the farm, and received as good an education as was obtainable at the near-by country schools. When eighteen years of age he entered the employ of Davis & Marks, at Midville, Ga., as a clerk and remained there three years. He then engaged as a clerk with John Coleman, Swainsborough, the largest merchant in the place. Four years later he went to Stillmore, Emanuel Co., and clerked for George M. Brinson until 1889, when he returned to Swainsborough and embarked in a general merchandise business on his own account. He has given his entire attention to his business, keeping abreast with the times, and studying and supplying the wants of the people, so that he has become a leading merchant and is doing a large, if not the largest, business of any merchant in the town. His enterprise and prudence, industrious habits and judicious investments have resulted in the accumulation of a large property—and the promise of a very bright future. Mr. Edenfield was married Feb. 7, 1886, to Miss Fannie, daughter of Thomas and Emma E. Lewis, of Emanuel county, by whom he has had two children: Bertha, born in August, 1888, and Vera, born in September, 1892. He is a member of the town council, a member of the Royal Arcanum and a master Mason.

EPHRAIM A. EDENFIELD, merchant, Stillmore, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of John H. and Jane (Polk) Edenfield, was born in Emanuel county Jan. 23, 1865. His paternal grandparents were natives of North Carolina, and his great-grandfather served in the continental army through the revolutionary war. Some years afterward his grandparents migrated to Georgia and were among the early settlers of what is now Emanuel county. Mr. Edenfield's father was a farmer, and served in the Confederate army during the war between the states. He reared the following children: Elizabeth, deceased wife of W. T. Mooring, Emanuel county; Martha, wife of George M. Morris, same county; Marguerite, wife of Jackson Collins; Viannah, deceased wife of Iverson Lanier, also deceased; John H., merchant and farmer, Bulloch county; George P., bookkeeper, Emanuel county; Thomas Jackson, merchant and farmer. Mr. Edenfield received such education as was obtainable at the common schools of the county, and then buying a farm on credit engaged in farming. He went to Stillmore in 1889, and was the first person to locate there after the mill was started. In 1885, with a cash capital of $35, he went to Savannah to buy a stock of goods and open a general merchandise store. He bought his merchandise, hauled it seventy miles by wagon, and commenced business near where he is at this time. He has been wonderfully successful, and has made money very fast. In 1892-93, in addition to his other businesses, he engaged in the manufacture of naval stores. He now carries a well-assorted stock of general merchandise worth $12,000, the best and largest in that part of the county, and does the largest trade of any store in the place. While he has been thus engaged in merchandising and building up this large and profitable business, he has been conducting his farm. Although he started with so little—of experience and capital—and is now only thirty years of age, he is worth more than $50,000—which it must be admitted is a very remarkable record, and demonstrates the possession of more than ordinary ability. In view of what he has already accomplished it is difficult to set a limit to what he may accomplish. Mr. Edenfield married Miss Wealthy, daughter of Jackson and Roxa Bird, of Tattnall county, who has borne him one son, Samuel, born in September, 1883.

ALFRED HERRINGTON, lawyer, Swainsboro, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Manning and Lucretia (Phillips) Herrington, was born in Emanuel county Nov. 21, 1858. On both sides he is of Irish lineage. His paternal great-grandfather, Ephraim Herrington, was a North Carolinian, a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. He migrated to Robeson county, N. C., and came to Georgia early in the present century and was among the pioneer settlers of Emanuel county. Mr. Herrington's grandfather, James Herrington, was born in North Carolina and came with the family to Emanuel county, in which his father was born. Mr. Herrington's father was a mechanic and enlisted early in the late civil war in Capt. Miller's rangers, which became a part of the Seventh Georgia cavalry. After participating in a number of engagements he was detailed to take charge of the mechanical corps. He died Sept. 11, 1864, from the effects of extreme exposure and hardships suffered while in the Confederate service. Mr. Herrington's mother was a daughter of Anthony Phillips, whose family also came from North Carolina to Emanuel county. They were the parents of six children, all living: Alfred, Anthony M., John C., Melissa, Florence Elizabeth, and Dicey. Mr. Herrington was the eldest son, and his father dying while he was yet young, and devolving upon him the care of the family in straitened circumstances, his educational advantages were of the most meager kind. The first pair of shoes he had after the death of his father he made himself, and then to get money to pay for an education he cut and rafted timber to market. He entered the university of Georgia at Athens in 1872, but he had so little money and the demands on him at his home were such that he was deprived of graduation by leaving the university. Knowing no such word as "fail" he persevered, read law under the preceptorship of Hon. C. C. Kibbee of Hawkinsville (now of Macon), Ga., and was admitted to the bar at Pulaski superior court in December, 1877. He located at Mount Vernon, Montgomery Co., Ga., and practiced law there one year. In 1884 he moved his office to Swainsboro. Although without money he determined to succeed. Possessing a strong mind, an inflexible purpose and superior ability, and withal being a hard student, he soon became the leading attorney and had the largest practice of anyone at the bar. In 1888 he was elected to represent Emanuel county in the general assembly, and after serving the term retired from politics; however, such was the pressure brought upon him, and so urgent were the solicitations of appreciative friends, that he consented to accept the nomination of elector on the democratic electoral ticket in 1892, and of course was elected. He was appointed as one of the U. S. commissioners in the matter of the Cherokee strip, but at the end of three months resigned and returned to the practice of his profession, to which he is an enthusiastic devotee. He is pre-eminently popular in his native county, whose citizens manifest the greatest anxiety to advance him politically. In 1894 a recommendation of him by the democratic executive committee of his county as a candidate for congress received the unanimous endorsement of the county in a primary election, but he peremptorily declined to allow his name to be presented to the congressional nominating convention of the first district. Being young, an enthusiastic democrat, of unquestionable ability and determined will, and already towering professionally above men older than he in years and practice, he undoubtedly has before him a brilliant professional and political career and great pecuniary prosperity. Mr. Herrington was married March 13, 1890, to Miss Annie Lee, daughter of L. H. Wilkins of Richmond county, a union which has been blessed with three children: Thomas Norwood, Pat. Calhoun, and Morris Dawson. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and a Royal Arch Mason.

JOHN JAY MOORE, farmer, Swainsboro, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Thomas L. and Emma Cynthia (Trapnell) Moore, was born in Emanuel county Feb. 2, 1856. His paternal great-grandfather, Arthur Moore, was a Burke county farmer who moved with his family to what is now Emanuel county among its earliest settlers. His grandfather, James Moore, son of the above, was quite small when he came to the county, and followed farming all his life. Mr. Moore's father was born in Emanuel county in 1818 and has been a farmer all his life. He served a short time during the late civil war, but was discharged on account of disability. His wife died in 1879, but he is still living where he has lived for more than forty years, one of the oldest citizens in the county. They were the parents of ten children, eight of whom grew to maturity: Millie, wife of A. T. Durden; James L., farmer; Elijah, deceased; Jennie, wife of L. E. Brinson, Emanuel county; John Jay; Archibald Algernon, farmer; Elizabeth; Mary C., wife of George Dinkle. Mr. Moore was reared on the farm and educated at the near-by country schools. On attaining to manhood he engaged in farming, and also made some money cutting timber and rafting it to market. He had only his own labor and resources to depend on; his father, however, gave him a mule a short time after he started in life for himself. He has worked hard early and late, cultivated frugal habits as well as his land, and judiciously invested his moderate yearly surplus until he has secured a competency and a quite large property—including 2,000 acres of good land. He owns a rice and grist mill and operates a ginnery. He is a good, thrifty farmer, makes good crops, and as to home and farm improvements he is as well conditioned as any farmer in Emanuel county. Mr. Moore was married June 1, 1884, to Miss Cassie Ann, daughter of Richard and Lucretia Edenfield, a union which has been blessed with five children: Thomas Grover, Richard Hilton, John Elijah, and Mattie Cynthia; one died unnamed in infancy. Politically he is an uncompromising democrat.

EDWARD P. RENTZ, naval stores manufacturer, Coven, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Rev. E. J. and Martha (McGehee) Rentz, was born in Henry county, Ala., Jan. 2, 1862. His father was a preacher, a member of the South Georgia Methodist conference and entirely devoted to his ministerial duties for twenty-five years. He was also a member of the Masonic fraternity, and died in 1885, aged fifty-five years. His widow is yet living, her home being in Perry, Houston Co., Ga. This eminently pious and Christian couple were the parents of six children—five of whom survive: Lula, wife of John W. White, Hawkinsville, Ga.; Lilla, wife of J. C. Tanner, Washington county, Ga.; Edward Pierce; George, who married Miss Bessie Rentz, of Houston county, interested in naval stores manufacture in Montgomery county, Ga., and Charles E., dentist, Perry, Houston Co. Mr. Rentz received an academic education, and when sixteen years of age engaged as a clerk in a store at Bartow, Jefferson Co., Ga., and after remaining there awhile, secured a situation with a firm engaged in the manufacture of naval stores, with whom he remained seven years. Leaving the firm, he embarked in the business on his individual account. His success has been phenomenal, giving evidence of sagacity, courage, business qualities of a very high order, and a financial ability rarely equaled. He is actively connected with three firms: Rentz & Roberts and Roberts & Rentz, both in Emanuel county, and Rentz Brothers & Roberts, in Montgomery county. At the two Emanuel county plants they employ 180 hands, and their annual output averages 2,000 barrels of spirits and 7,500 barrels of resin. At the Montgomery county plant they employ seventy-four hands, and average an annual output of 1,000 barrels of spirits and 3,500 barrels of resin. They work forty-three crops in Emanuel county and twenty in Montgomery county, and the amount they pay yearly for labor and other working expenses is about $65,000. They carry on a general merchandise business at each turpentine farm, selling a large amount of goods. Starting in life with no capital but push and pluck, well-directed energy and a determination to succeed, and having accomplished so much while young and in so short a time, a limit can hardly be fixed to Mr. Rentz's future business achievements. He has already acquired a splendid property, with good promise of large wealth. Mr. Rentz was happily married to Miss Kate, daughter of Alfred and Mary Garton, of Eufaula, Ala., Feb. 4, 1886, a union which has been blessed with three children: Joseph Alfred, James Tanner and Mary Gibbs. He is a master Mason and an ardent member of the Methodist church.

JOSHUA R. ROUNDTREE, farmer, Swainsborough, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Manning and Lucinda (Durden) Roundtree, was born in Emanuel county Sept. 11, 1847. His paternal great-grandfather was Joshua Roundtree, who was a native of North Carolina, whose home was on Tar river, in that state, where he lived and died. Two of his sons, George and Joshua, migrated to Georgia and settled in Emanuel county. From these two brothers are descended the very large number of those bearing the name, scattered across and through southern Georgia. They were generally recognized as among the most progressive and successful of the community in which they live in whatever calling they adopt, occupying high social positions, and prominent politically. Mr. Roundtree's father was a farmer, and devoted his life to that vocation, accumulating a large estate—politically unambitious. Himself and wife were very devout and devoted members of the Primitive Baptist church—an almost life-long membership. They were the parents of ten children: Sarah, married Leander Sutton; Mary, married Elder Hudson Temple; Jane, married George I. Burwick; Manning R., Primitive Baptist preacher; Ebenezer D., farmer; Andrew J., farmer; Isaac U., farmer; Washington G., farmer; Joseph B., farmer, and Joshua R., farmer. Mr. Roundtree received his primary education at the country common schools, and afterward attended the academy at Swainsborough, after leaving which he taught school for five years. He then entered in earnest on a farmer's life, and has devoted himself to it almost exclusively, the exception being the response to his fellow-citizens' demand for his valuable services as a county official. His first service was by election to the office of receiver of tax returns in 1871; after which he was a member of the county board of education, until 1880, when he was elected county school commissioner, and held the office continuously by re-election twelve years. Besides being exceptionally prosperous in his farming operations, he has traded some in timber lands, and has acquired quite a large property. Enterprising without bustle, and persevering in whatever is undertaken, he quietly accomplishes his object. He is public-spirited, liberal in spirit and purse, and is a popular and highly-esteemed citizen. Mr. Roundtree was married April 4, 1871, to Miss Dora M., daughter of William and Nancy Sumner, Emanuel county. To them eight children were born: Mary A., Amy E., William M., Julian R., Emma B., George L., Lena E. and Joshua C. Mrs. Roundtree, who, for many years was a working and exemplary member of the Methodist church, died May 14, 1894.

ROBERT J. WILLIAMS, lawyer, Swainsborough, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Stephen M. and Carrie E. (Pughlesy) Williams, was born Sept. 11, 1855. His father was a planter, and died Nov. 1, 1891, aged sixty-five years; his mother is still living at the age of fifty-nine years. They were the parents of ten children, all living: Emma E., wife of J. W. Wright, Bulloch county; Robert James; Sidney S., manufacturer naval stores, Bulloch county; William P., architect and mechanic, Florida; Sallie Gertrude, married Paul Purvis, Bulloch county; Stephen G., manufacturer of naval stores, Bulloch county; Belle, wife of J. Q. Stephens, Emanuel county; George Herschell, lawyer, Mount Vernon, Montgomery Co., Ga.; Nellie, at industrial school for girls, at Milledgeville; J. Carlton, clerk, Swainsborough. Mr. Williams was raised on the farm, and received his primary education in the common schools of the county, and finished at Swainsborough high school in 1874. He read law under the preceptorship of Col. Josephus Camp—during which time he was clerk in the ordinary's office and assistant clerk of the superior court of Emanuel county—and was admitted to the bar at the October term of the court, 1880. That year he was appointed United States census enumerator. Immediately after his admission to the bar he established himself in Swainsborough, and soon secured a large practice. He has been recorder and treasurer of Swainsborough, solicitor of the county court, and is now a member and president of the board of education. A staunch democrat, he was elected alternate delegate from his district to the national democratic convention, held in St. Louis in 1888. He is now the senior of the law firm of Williams & Smith, the leading member of the profession in this county, with a large and growing clientage. The firm is recognized as one of ability, and ranks high with the profession. Mr. Williams conducts a farming interest in connection with his other business. Mr. Williams married Mrs. Mollie E. (nee Camp) Moring, daughter of Col. Josephus and Sarah Camp, who has borne him four children: Lida Bell, Robert Jewel, Roscoe Camp, and John H., deceased. Mrs. Williams has, by her first husband, two children: Nettie and Josie Moring.

Mrs. Williams is a member of the Baptist church; and Mr. Williams is a member of the I. O. O. F., a master Mason, and a member of the Methodist church, of which he is a trustee.

ARCHIBALD A. MOORE, farmer and lumberman, Swainsboro, Emanuel Co., Ga., son of Thomas L. and Cynthia (Trapwell) Moore, was born in Emanuel county March 10, 1858. (For previous history of family see sketch of John J. Moore in these Memoirs.) Mr. Moore grew to manhood on the farm and received a limited education at the common schools of the county. When nineteen years of age (1887) he started in life for himself, beginning with farming on a small piece of land his father gave him, and then taught school some time. In 1892 he embarked in the manufacture of lumber and in the business of cutting and rafting timber to tide-water. He has established a quite large business with Darien, stands well in the commercial world as a man of excellent business qualifications, of strict integrity and may be regarded as on the high road to fortune. He has a very fine 600-acre farm, with 150 acres in cultivation, and raises sea-island cotton, cattle and hogs. He is a democrat in politics, and is one of Emanuel county's best citizens.

FANNIN COUNTY.

THOMAS AVEY BROWN, a member of the Fannin county bar, was born .. at Morganton, in Fannin county, on June 2, 1861. He was reared and educated in Fannin county, where for three terms he taught school. In January, 1882, he went to Texas, where he taught school one year, and returned to his home. Having resolved to prepare himself for admission to the bar, in January, 1883, he commenced the study of law in the office of J. R. Chastain, at Morganton, and on May 28, 1884, he was admitted to practice in the superior court of Fannin county. He began to practice his profession at Morganton, where he has continued to reside. His practice extends throughout the Blue ridge circuit, where he is rapidly rising to merited prominence in his chosen profession. On Feb. 7, 1886, Mr. Brown was married to Alice D., daughter of John A. and Martha Stuart of Fannin county. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown, Thomas Thurman Brown, born on Nov. 19, 1890. The father of Mr. Brown was Charles E. Brown, a native of North Carolina. He moved to Fannin county with his parents in 1848. At the opening of the war he entered the Confederate service, enlisting as a private in Company H, Fifty-second Georgia regiment, which company was commanded by his brother, Capt. W. W. Brown. He died in a hospital at Knoxville on May 20, 1862. The mother of Mr. Brown, Mary Ann Brown, is still living in Fannin county. The paternal grandfather of Mr. Brown was James Brown, born in Wilkes county, N. C., on Feb. 14, 1809. He is still living in Fannin county. His paternal grandmother was Nancy German, born in Wilkes county, N. C., on Feb. 15, 1805. She died in October, 1892, in Fannin county. Mr. Brown has two sisters living: Samantha, Mrs. Jacob Addington, Morganton, and Nancy, Mrs. Perry L. Akins, Morganton. In 1886 Mr. Brown was the candidate of the democratic party for the office of representative in the legislature of this state, and was defeated by William Franklin. He is at present an active populist.

JUDSON RUCKER CHASTAIN, farmer and lawyer, was born at the old homestead in Fannin county, Ga., near Morganton, March 16, 1856, and here he was reared and educated in the public schools, his father dying when he was sixteen years old. Most of his education was obtained and paid for by himself. In 1879 young Chastain entered the law office of H. P. Bell at Cumming, Ga., and in August of that year he was admitted to the bar. He then returned to his home, where he has practiced law and farmed since. In 1891 our subject formed a partnership with Hon. A. S. Clay, who is located at Marietta, and the partnership still continues. In 1884 he ran for representative from Fannin county and tied his republican opponent, B. C. Duggan, but the second race resulted in his defeat by only eighty-four votes in a county usually 300 republican. This same year he was appointed deputy internal revenue collector of the northern district of Georgia (second division), and served as such fourteen months, when he resigned. On March 22, 1893, Mr. Chastain was appointed commissioner of the United States circuit court for the northern district of Georgia. He is a royal arch Mason and was reared in the Baptist church. He was married Feb. 15, 1883, to Emma Greenwood, daughter of Martin Greenwood of North Carolina, and they have seven children: Carleon C., Garnett McMillan, Ophie, Linton S., Judson T., Virgie and Clarissa. Mr. Chastain's father was Elijah W. Chastain, a native of South Carolina, born in 1813 and died in 1874. He came to Georgia at the age of twenty-three. He was a captain in the Seminole war and was made colonel in the same war. He was also made colonel in the Eighth regiment, Georgia state troops, by Gov. Joseph E. Brown, and was presented with a beautiful sword by his officers and men for gallantry and kindness. He was in the Georgia house of representatives from Gilmer county soon after the Seminole war, serving two terms, and later he served in the Georgia senate. In 1856 he went to congress and served two terms. He was attorney for the state railroad for some time before the war, under Gov. Brown. He was a member of the secession convention.

LEVI BURTON CRAWFORD is one of Fannin county's oldest and most respected citizens, and is at present a merchant at Blue Ridge. He was born Jan. 31, 1838, in Jackson county, N. C., at the foot of Caler's hill, on Scot's creek. In February, 1844, he moved with his parents to Union, now Fannin county, in this state, settling upon a farm one mile from the present site of Morganton, where he was reared and where he resided until his marriage. He received a common-school education. From 1858 until 1863 he was engaged in mercantile business at Morganton. Mr. Crawford was a prominent Union man at the opening of the war and strongly opposed secession. In February, 1863, he was pressed into the Confederate service and was enrolled as a private in Company A, Fifth Georgia regiment of infantry. At the date of his enlistment he was colonel of the militia and not subject to the conscript act. But having been arrested for disloyalty to the Confederacy, together with his father, who was imprisoned in the Atlanta barracks, he volunteered for his own safety and for the purpose of liberating his father. Mr. Crawford continued in the service until January, 1864. Shortly previous to the battle of Chickamauga he sustained an injury which disabled him for duty and was sent to Gilmer hospital at Atlanta, and later to Forsyth, Ga., where he obtained a furlough and returned to his home. In October, 1863, he was elected clerk of the inferior court of Fannin county and retired from the military service. In 1867 he engaged in his old business as merchant at Morganton, continuing in business there until October, 1893, when he moved to Blue Ridge, where he now resides, and is engaged in mercantile business. Mr. Crawford became a Mason Feb. 4, 1861. He is a member of Ocoll lodge No. 201 of F. & A. M., at Morganton. He owns several large farms in Fannin county and is the largest taxpayer in that county. On Sept. 19, 1858, Mr. Crawford was married to Sarah Ann, daughter of Jesse R. and Mary Beaver, of Fannin county. Ten children have been born of this marriage, nine of whom survive: Alice, born July 17, 1859, married J. A. Leg, Dec. 12, 1875, on the decease of her husband she married N. B. Cutcher, by whom she had five children, and died at Blue Ridge April 16, 1891. She was buried in the family lot with her infant child at Blue Ridge. Four of her children survive: Ada B., wife of H. D. Gurley of Dahlonga, born Nov. 14, 1861; she has four children: H. Bruce, born July 19, 1864; he is at present a merchant at Blue Ridge, and has never been married. She was born in Rutherford county, Jan. 9, 1810, and is still living with her son at Blue Ridge. Mr. Crawford is a man of high and benevolent character, and throughout his life has been strictly abstemious, never having used spirituous liquors nor tobacco in any form. Mr. Crawford is now mayor of Blue Ridge. He is one of the men that donated the site of the school building in Blue Ridge and he is now engaged in building a Baptist church and masonic hall in the town. It is mainly by his efforts and liberal contribution that the structure is being erected. Mrs. Crawford, a most estimable lady and pious Christian, has seconded her husband in this work. She is a devoted member of the Blue Ridge Baptist church and has been struggling for years to have an edifice built.

L EONIDAS GLENN CUTCHER, of Morganton, Fannin Co., was born in Union county, Ga., on Nov. 8, 1848. In February, 1869, he moved with his parents to Morganton, where he has since resided. During the period from 1871 to 1876 he taught school in Fannin county, and was repeatedly re-elected to that office, serving in all six years as clerk. Retiring from office he next engaged in agriculture until January, 1893, when he was elected ordinary of Fannin county, the duties of which position he still continues to discharge. On Aug. 4, 1878, Mr. Cutcher was united in marriage to Nancy Elizabeth, daughter of Henry and Adeline Smith, of Fannin county. Three children were born to them: Mollie, on May 6, 1879, who died Nov. 21, 1882; Julia A., born Feb. 4, 1881, and died Sept. 24, 1882; and Nellie, born May 6, 1883. The early death of their two children, both of whom were unusually bright, clever and attractive, left a load of sorrow to be borne by the afflicted parents, which has weighed heavily upon them, and of which time alone can relieve them. The father of Mr. Cutcher, James C. Cutcher, was born July 8, 1822, in North Carolina. He moved to Georgia in his youth, settling in Union county with his parents. He is still living and resides at Morganton. The paternal grandfather of Mr. Cutcher was John Cutcher, a native of Baltimore, Md. He died in Union county about 1866, at the advanced age of one hundred years. The mother of Mr. Cutcher was Martha E. Jones, daughter of John Jones of North Carolina, where she was born March 3, 1820. She was married to James C. Cutcher in Union county, Ga., on April 25, 1847. Six children were born to them, all of whom are living: Mary Ellen, Mrs. J. F. Adams, Blue Ridge; Newel B., who resides at Blue Ridge; Martha E., Mrs. Robert P. Smith, now postmaster at Morganton; John, of Ducktown, Tenn.; and James M., of Blue Ridge; and the subject of this sketch.

ADAM DAVENPORT, of Morganton, Fannin Co., was born in that county on Feb. 3, 1845. His early education was obtained in the common schools, and later he finished his literary studies at Fort Hembree, N. C. In February, 1863, he enlisted in Company H, First Georgia state line troops, under Col. Gault, and continued in active service during two years. He participated in the battles of New Hope church, Kennesaw mountain and Sand Town, and in the siege of Atlanta. After the war he taught school and engaged in farming. In 1879 he was elected school commissioner of Fannin county, and has been in continuous service as school commissioner since that time. His work as an educator has met with public approval, as is best evidenced by his numerous re-elections to the office of school commissioner. On Jan. 9, 1868, he married Mary Ann, daughter of Jasper and Margaret Ashworth, of Fannin county. They have ten children: Kara E., wife of E. A. Rivers of Blue Ridge, born April 14, 1869; Sebastian, born Aug. 16, 1871, and married to Estella Gorman of Grand View, Tenn., Dec. 18, 1894; Walter Oscar, born Oct. 30, 1873; Claude Duval, born Feb. 27, 1876; Prescott, born Sept. 19, 1878; Herman, born March 10, 1881; Luther, born May 22, 1884; Tybee, born Sept. 3, 1886; Zetler, born Aug. 15, 1887; Arthur Beals, born Feb. 15, 1889; and Clara Davenport, born July 20, 1894. William Davenport was reared in Virginia and migrated to Tennessee, where he lived about eleven years, and settled in Fannin county, Ga., about 1843. He died at his home in this county on April 17, 1875. The mother of Mr. Davenport was Margaret Speare Rhea, of Rhea county, Tenn., where she married William Davenport July 17, 1832. She died in Fannin county in 1880. The paternal grandfather of Mr. Davenport was a revolutionary soldier who served throughout that struggle. He fought at the battles of Brandywine, Trenton, Monmouth and Princeton, and served under Gen. Lincoln at the siege of Charleston. After the surrender of that city he effected his escape from his guards with five of his companions, making his way through the British lines to friendly territory, traveling only at night. The paternal great-grandfather of Mr. Davenport was born in England and settled in Jamestown, Va., in the early part of the last century.

OLIVER REED DUPREE, of Blue Ridge, and a member of the Fannin county bar, was born Oct. 5, 1854, near Woodstock, in Cherokee county, and was educated at a private school. In 1876 he commenced the study of law in the office of B. F. Payne of the Cherokee county bar, at Canton. In 1877 he was admitted to the bar in the superior court of Cherokee county, and commenced the practice of law at Ellijay, in Gilmer county, where he resided six months. He next located at Morganton, where he practiced his profession with success until 1891, when he moved to Blue Ridge, where he now resides. Mr. Dupree's practice extends throughout the Blue Ridge circuit. He gives especial attention to cases involving the title to real estate. He is a safe counselor and a very capable lawyer. In December, 1882, Mr. Dupree married Henrietta Beaver, of Morganton. They have three children, two girls and one boy: Willie, born Dec. 4, 1886; Marion Grady, born July 2, 1888; and O. R., born Sept. 11, 1890. The father of Mr. Dupree was William Dupree, born about 1810 near Spartanburg, S. C., who moved to Georgia and settled in Gordon county, about 1852. In 1854 he moved to Woodstock, where he resided until his death in 1892. He served as justice of the peace for a period of thirty years. The mother of Mr. Dupree is Miriam, daughter of Timothy Haney. She was born about 1812, near Spartanburg, S. C. She is still living near Woodstock. Mr. Dupree is the eighth of a family of thirteen children, eleven of whom are still living: Joshua, who died while in the service of the Confederacy, just before the first battle of Manassas; Syninimus, who married Thomas Freeman, and resides in Texas; Selena, who married W. P. Dobbs, and resides near Woodstock; Perry Pinkney, a lawyer living in Canton; Sallie, married to Cicero Dobbs, and lives near Woodstock; Caroline, married to a Mr. Petril, and lives in Cobb county; Vesta, who married Reason Dobbs, of Cobb county; Alice, Simanthi, and Robert Lee reside at home in Cherokee county, and Samuel is a lawyer living at Canton.

THOMAS MARTIN GREENWOOD, M. D., of Mineral Bluff, Fannin Co., was born at Morganton June 17, 1863. From 1864 to 1866 his family resided at Carnesville, in Franklin county. His father, who was a tanner by trade and who was employed in that capacity by the Confederate government, died in Union county November, 1866. The family returned to Morganton in the fall of 1866 and settled on a farm. There the doctor lived and attended school until he had attained his nineteenth year. The patrimony of the family, which was large previous to the war, depreciated and diminished with the retiring fortunes of the Confederacy, and Dr. Greenwood was raised and educated by the efforts of his mother and himself. The first labor he performed for hire was binding rye at twenty-five cents per day, receiving pay in rye, at seventy-five cents per bushel, which was used by the family. At the age of sixteen he contracted his services for two summers, for a mule colt of the value of $40. The profits of this bargain having been enhanced by the custom so prevalent among the inhabitants of the mountains of "swapping," he soon accumulated enough money to pay for his schooling ten months. He next taught school during two terms; and after four months more of study, he passed a rigid examination in the English branches. At the end of this term, having since his thirteenth year determined upon preparing himself for the practice of medicine, and being unable for want of adequate means to pursue his literary studies further, he delivered a farewell address to his class and commenced the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. T. T. Fain, of Fannin county, in the spring of 1886. On November 2 of that year he entered the Atlanta Medical college with $35 in his pocket and attired in a suit of homespun clothes. He pursued his studies for four months, when he returned to his home, without having paid for his tuition. He was the first person to engage in the culture of tobacco in Fannin county. He deposited a sample of the plant raised in the agricultural department, which was pronounced to be the finest of its kind ever raised in Georgia. At the request of Hon. Henry W. Grady, of the "Southern Cultivator," he wrote a paper on the cultivation of tobacco which was published in that journal. He was made the beneficiary of a scholarship for the years 1887-88 in the Atlanta Medical college, and in the fall of 1887 he returned to that institution. At the close of the fall term he passed an examination and stood at the head of his class. At the request of the dean, Dr. H. V. Miller, he selected for his thesis the subject of "Milk-sickness," a disease peculiar to the mountain regions of north Georgia, which he wrote, and the substance of this thesis is embodied in the last edition of Flint's Practice. He graduated on March 4, 1888, and returned to his home without a dollar and immediately commenced the practice of his profession, having obtained the necessary supply of medicine as a premium on competition. In April, 1888, he located permanently at Mineral Bluff, where he has since resided and continued his practice with marked success. Dr. Greenwood gives especial attention to the diseases of women and children. He is a man of literary tastes and of very considerable information on subjects of medical literature. With Prof. J. M. Clement, Jr., he is joint author of a work entitled Quintessence of Physiology and Hygiene, a text-book for schools and academies. He is a member of the Georgia Medical association, and at its meeting in 1894 contributed a paper on "Pneumonia," which was extensively read and commented on by the members and the profession generally. At the meeting of the association in Savannah in 1895 Dr. Greenwood read a paper on "Obstetrics" as practiced in the mountains of Georgia. This paper attracted attention all over the country and was copied in the leading medical journals of the United States and Canada. On April 24, 1887, Dr. Greenwood was married to Miss Hattie A. Cook, daughter of Barnard and Caroline Cook, of Fannin county. Dr. and Mrs. Greenwood have four children: Onah Blanche, born Jan. 30, 1888, at Atlanta; Hoke Smith, born April 25, 1890; Glenn McKenla, born Jan. 10, 1892; and Earle Clement, born Nov. 27, 1894. The wife of Dr. Greenwood was born March 20, 1863. His father, Martin A. Greenwood, a native of North Carolina, was born in 1816. The mother of Dr. Greenwood was Sarah Caroline Parks, born Aug. 15, 1830. She is living with him at Mineral Bluff.

ALBERT SIDNEY JOHNSON HALL, a rising member of the Fannin county bar, residing at Blue Ridge, is a native of Ducktown, Tenn., where he was born, March 11, 1867. He was reared on a farm. He commenced the study of law in the office of James G. Parks, of Ducktown, and after two years of diligent study, he was admitted to the bar of Polk county, Tenn., in the year 1887. He commenced the practice of his profession at Ducktown, and in 1890, he moved to Blue Ridge, in this state, where he is fast rising to prominence among the lawyers of the Blue Ridge circuit, and where he is exceedingly popular. In January, 1894, Mr. Hall was elected mayor of Blue Ridge, and he has continued to discharge the duties of his office to the entire satisfaction of the people. On May 3, 1888, he was married to Miss Naomi Jane Swaim, daughter of A. W. and Margaret Swaim, of Ducktown, Tenn. They have two children: Ethel, born Jan. 3, 1889, and De May, born Feb. 21, 1893. The father of Mr. Hall is Jonathan Hampton Hall, born in Macon county, N. C., March 25, 1823. In his youth he settled in Fannin county and engaged in farming. About 1846 he married Miss Zilpha M. McCord. She was the daughter of William and Melissa McCord, both of whom were natives of Scotland, who emigrated to Macon county, N. C., and later settled in Fannin county, Ga. The parents of Mr. Hall settled on a farm near Ducktown, Tenn., soon after the late war, where they still reside. The father of Mr. Hall was a pronounced Union man at the commencement of the war. He entered the Federal service as captain of Company H, Tenth Tennessee cavalry, and served four years, when he was honorably discharged. The subject of this sketch is the representative of a class rapidly pushing to the front in Georgia affairs, and it is well that the future welfare of the state should be cared for by such hands.

The "Post" is a bright and newsy paper, and has a very extensive circulation in North Georgia. Mr. McKinney conducts a job department in connection with the publication of the "Post," and turns out a large variety of work in this line annually. On Jan. 10, 1894, Mr. McKinney was married to Miss Ida Belle Davis, the accomplished daughter of W. H. and Margaret Davis, of Eve Mills, Tenn. Mrs. McKinney is an accomplished musician and a teacher of vocal and instrumental music. Mr. McKinney is an active member of the Methodist church, south, and his wife is a member of the Lutheran church. Mr. McKinney is a young man of fine talents, agreeable manners, and pleasing address. His aim is to furnish the people of North Georgia a good newspaper, the object of which will be to advance the material interests of that portion of the state, already too long neglected. The father of Mr. McKinney is Michael McKinney, born in Monroe county, Tenn., on Oct. 18, 1840. He served one year in the Confederate army during the late war. For fourteen years he was connected with the Marietta & North Georgia railroad, a portion of which he built. He is at present engaged in the real estate and lumber business at Blue Ridge. This paper has a general circulation throughout North Georgia. Its editor is aggressive in advancing the interests of his county, in developing its resources, and in promoting in a general and fitting manner the public welfare. Mr. Smith has four brothers and three sisters living in Fannin county: Benton Latain, Gustavus Braselton, Cora May, Clifford Anderson, Carter Tate, Siddie May, and Minnie Eveline. The father of Mr. Smith is William Dallas Smith. He is a well-known character in Fannin county, where he has filled several official positions creditably and to the advantage of the public. In 1892 he was elected senator from the forty-first senatorial district of Georgia as a democrat. The mother of Mr. Smith, the subject of this sketch, is Emily, daughter of the late Hon. Elijah W. Chastain, who was a well-known member of congress from Georgia in antebellum days. She is still living.

In 1861, he entered the service of the state of Georgia, enlisting in Col. E. W. Chastain's regiment, and saw active service at Savannah, and on the eastern coast. Later, he entered the Sixth Georgia cavalry, commanded by Col. John R. Hart, and continued in the service until captured at Charleston, Tenn., in August, 1864. About six months later he was released on condition that he remain within the Federal lines, and he continued to live in Tennessee during the remainder of the war. At its close he returned to his home and gave his attention to agricultural pursuits, in which occupation he has been engaged ever since. His mother was born in Coweta county, Ga., May 20, 1842, and is still living at the old homestead. Dr. Gable enjoyed very good educational advantages so far as common schools could supply them, and after studying medicine under his father attended lectures at Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in March, 1883. He returned home and was associated in the practice with his father until July, 1893, when his brother became associated with him. He has attained to a wide and well-earned eminence in his profession, has a large and very valuable practice and being on the threshold of professional life may be regarded as having an exceptionally brilliant future before him. He has been an influential member of the county board of education for many years. WILLIAM THORNTON GLOWER, farmer, Fayetteville, Fayette Co., Ga., son of Abel and Zada (Mercer) Glower, was born in Fayette county, June 20, 1831. His father was born in 1792 and died May 7, 1848, and his mother (of old North Carolina families) was born in North Carolina Aug. 10, 1809, and died April 24, 1894. Mr. Glower was raised on the farm, and his schooling was very meager. His father died when he was only seventeen years old and the care of the family devolving on him, his life-battle began early. But he was of the stuff men are made of, and nothing daunted he set about fulfilling his filial obligations and has made a record to be proud of. He worked hard, early and late, kept abreast of the times, saved money and judiciously invested it, maintained his integrity and provided amply for his mother and sisters, and is now comparatively rich, enjoying the sweets of a quiet conscience, the consciousness of duty done, and the respect of his appreciative fellow-citizens. In May, 1862, he enlisted in Company C, of which he was made senior second lieutenant, Capt. Marshburn, Fifty-third Georgia regiment. With his command he was successively engaged in the following important, among other minor, battles during the civil war: Seven days' fight around Richmond, Fort Sanders, Tenn., Wilderness, Spottsylvania court house, second Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Fisher's hill (or Strausburg) and Sailor's creek, where the entire command was captured and taken to Washington, where they were detained until June 17, 1865, when he was released. Lieut. Glower was elected captain of his company in March, 1865, which title he held at the time of the surrender. In 1856 he was elected justice of the peace, was re-elected when his term expired and was in office when he enlisted. In 1872 he was elected a member of the county school board and was continued on it until 1888. In 1876 he was elected county school commissioner and held the office until 1892. When he assumed its duties there were twenty-one public schools in the county; when he retired there were forty-three in a flourishing condition, consequent upon his intelligent administration. At the close of the war he found himself about as poor as when a mere youth he started in life, and what he has has been accumulated since without recourse to trading or speculation. Capt. Glower was married Dec. 30, 1852, to Miss Nancy Simmons, daughter of James Edward and Margaret (Cartwright) Haisten, who were natives of Greene county, Ga. This union was blessed with the following children: Millo Cecillia, born Nov. 10, 1853, wife of John O. Stinchcomb, Fayette county; Riller Callister, deceased, born April 19, 1856; Ludas Luron, born Aug. 30, 1858, deceased wife of Elias B. Adams, Fayette county; Gayson Guthrie, born Feb. 27, 1861, proprietor of steam bakery, Atlanta; Baynard Burling, deceased, born May 1, 1866; Esclodean, born Aug. 28, 1870, wife of Allen H. Jones, Fayette county. The mother of these died March 15, 1878, and Capt. Glower contracted a second marriage May 20, 1879, with Miss Mary Ann Lucretia, daughter of John W. and Alvira (Posten) Parrott, natives, respectively, of Greene county, Ga., and South Carolina. No children have blessed this marriage.

WILLIAM N. T. HARP, farmer, Inman, Fayette Co., Ga., son of Mozee and Sarah (Hill) Harp, was born in Fayette county, Dec. 25, 1849. His paternal grandparents were natives of Virginia; came to Georgia early in life and settled on land included in Henry county when laid off, and now in Spalding county. Here Mr. Harp's father was born in 1819 and raised a farmer. He was a local Methodist preacher and was widely-known as a good and useful man throughout the counties of Henry, Fayette, Spalding and Clayton. He died in 1875. His mother was descended from early settlers of South Carolina, where she was born in 1820. When she was five years old her parents came to Georgia, lived a year in Jasper county and then moved in 1826 to and settled in Henry (now Clayton) county. She is still living. Mr. Harp remained with his parents, attending the common schools while growing up, until he attained to manhood, when he commenced to farm for himself. By close attention, industry and good management he has accumulated a large and valuable property, is a leading farmer and one of the really substantial citizens of the county. He was a member of the board of county commissioners from 1886 to 1890. In 1890 he moved to Seville, Wilcox Co., Ga., where he owned and operated a saw-mill. While there he served as mayor for a period. After about four years' experience he sold out and returned December, 1893, to Fayette county, and is now a member of the board of county registers. Mr. Harp was married Dec. 16, 1876, to Miss Mary Ida, daughter of Edward O. and Sophronia (Glass) North, natives of what is now Clayton county, Ga. To them the following children were born: William E. M., born Oct. 3, 1877; James, deceased, born Aug. 3, 1879; John Pearl, deceased, born Oct. 15, 1881; Harry, born Nov. 7, 1884; Andrew Russell, born Nov. 11, 1886; May Ida, born Jan. 25, 1889; Roy, born May 9, 1891; Hugh, born Nov. 16, 1893.

ROBERT HILLARY HENDERSON, merchant, Brooks Station, Fayette Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Martha (Brooks) Henderson, was born in Fayette county Dec. 1, 1857. Both parents were born in Henry county, Ga., and early in life settled in Fayette county. They had four children: Frank, a farmer in Fayette county; Nannie, wife of B. Mitchell, farmer, Fayette county; Tommy, deceased, and Robert Hillary, the subject of this sketch. His maternal grandparents were Hillary and Nancy (Anderson) Brooks, early settlers. He became a large land-holder and very prominent, and founded and gave the name to Brooks Station. Mr. Henderson remained on the family farm and accepted such education as the common schools of the time and locality afforded until he was twenty-five years old. He then engaged with a merchant as a clerk, and worked as such for seven years. Later, for a number of years, he clerked for others and then embarked in business for himself. Such was his popularity as a business man and the confidence in his probity of character and general business ability, that he was successful from the start and is regarded as one of the most reliable young business men in the county. He is now on the high way to commercial prominence, and starting as he did, a poor boy, and working patiently and as hard as he has, is entitled to all the credit due to well-directed, honest labor. Mr. Henderson was married Dec. 24, 1889, to Miss Nannie Lee, born in Fayette county in 1867, daughter of Dr. Noah W. and Sallie A. (Wilson) Gable, and to them children have been born as follows: Mabel, born Oct. 2, 1890; Tommy Lee, born July 17, 1892, and Sallie Mattie, born March 17, 1894. He is a master Mason and secretary of the local lodge, and is a member of the Baptist church. His wife belongs to the Lutheran church.

JAMES THOMAS LEWIS, merchant, Woolsey, Fayette Co., Ga., son of George Reed and Euzebe Neville (Rosser) Lewis, was born in Henry county, Ga., Jan. 8, 1852. His grandparents were descendants of early settlers in South Carolina, and came to Georgia in the first quarter of the present century. His father was born in Butts county, Ga., in 1822, served as a soldier during the late civil war, and is a prosperous farmer. His mother was also born in Butts county Jan. 26, 1826. Both parents are living in Fayette county. Mr. Lewis remained on the farm and attended the near-by country schools until sixteen years old, when he engaged as a clerk two years. Then, in 1871, he went into a general merchandise business for himself and continued it until 1878. The two years following he combined farming and clerking; and the next four years he engaged as a clerk exclusively. He then (1884) re-embarked in merchandising at Woolsey, and has succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations. His business has steadily increased in volume and value, until he is now the leading merchant of his locality and has accumulated a quite valuable property. His great success is another practical illustration of what industry, fair dealing, and unswerving integrity of character will accomplish. He is one of the mostly promising business men in the county. He is a member and secretary of the county board of education, and has been postmaster at Woolsey since 1885, when the office was established. An excellent record for a ten years' citizenship. Mr. Lewis was married Dec. 24, 1872, to Miss Clemenza Isabella, daughter of Dr. Isaac Gray and Emeline Clemenza (Reagan) Woolsey, who has borne him eight children: Edgar Marcellus, deceased, born Nov. 26, 1873; Lola Adelia, born Dec. 16, 1875, at home; Isaac Woolsey, born March 21, 1878, superintending home farm; Mamie Almanza, deceased, born Aug. 7, 1880; Clemenza Pearl, born Nov. 28, 1882; James Carl, born July 4, 1885; Lillian Jewell, born Nov. 26, 1888; and Luther Forrest, born Nov. 1, 1891. He migrated from North Carolina to Georgia in 1827 and settled in Fayette county, where he died in 1842. His mother was born in Scotland, Dec. 22, 1800, and came to this country with her parents who settled in South Carolina, in 1804. Mr. Lucas received a common school education, and remained on the farm until he was twenty-two years old, when he began farming on his own account and continued it until 1884, when he entered upon mercantile life at Inman, which he has pursued since with results entirely satisfactory to himself. He has done a good and increasing and profitable business, stands well as a reliable merchant in commercial circles, and has the implicit confidence of the people. On May 1, 1862, he enlisted in Company C—of which he was elected first lieutenant—Fifty-third Georgia regiment (Col. L. T. Doyal) which reached Richmond in June. After the last-named battle he was promoted and commissioned as captain, and discharged its duties with fidelity and distinction until the surrender. In 1856 he was elected justice of the peace, but held the office only one year. After the war he resumed farming, and after many years of success supplemented it by a general merchandise store at Inman. Mr. Lucas was married Feb. 2, 1854, to Miss Rebecca Ann—born in Henry county, Ga., May 22, 1838—daughter of Joseph Sanders and Frances Asbury (Sinchcomb) Chambers. Their parents were born in Ireland, and came when young to this country. Mr. Chambers was born in South Carolina in 1804, and died in 1859; and his wife was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1802, and died in 1893. To Mr. and Mrs. Lucas six children have been born: Mary Frances, born in November, 1854, wife of James W. Dixon, Fayette county; Archibald

Joseph, born in July, 1856, farmer, Fayette county; James Andrew, born in October, 1858, farmer—homestead; Martha Jane, born May, 1860; Margaret Ann, born June, 1862; and John Lee, born July, 1866, associated with his father in business at Inman. Subsequently he attended a course of lectures at the medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, from which he was graduated in March, 1871. He soon afterward located where he now lives, and has established an excellent professional reputation, accumulated property, and acquired a wide influence which he has exerted in the interest of the material and moral advancement of the people. ISAAC GRAY WOOLSEY, physician and surgeon, Woolsey, Fayette Co., Ga., son of Zephaniah and Anna (Crouch) Woolsey, was born in Cumberland (now Clinton) county, Ky., Oct. 14, 1828. His paternal grandparents were of English-Scotch lineage, direct descendants of Cardinal Woolsey. His father was born in Greene county, Tenn., Nov. 11, 1783, was a private soldier in Capt. Cross' company and served under Gen. Cheatham's division. During all this time he promptly and gallantly discharged every duty assigned him, acting by detail as surgeon and assistant surgeon of the regiment a part of the time during his connection with it. Resigning his commission as captain on account of his wound, he refueged to Locust Grove, Henry Co. After the surrender he located at Locust Grove, where he practiced until the fall of 1872, when (1872-73) he took a second course of lectures in the Cincinnati college of medicine and surgery, from which he was graduated in March, 1873. After his graduation he resumed his practice at Locust Grove, but remained there only until 1875, when he moved to Fayette county, where, in addition to attending to an extensive practice, he has conducted large farming and mercantile interests. In 1864 he was ordained a minister of the Baptist denomination at Liberty church, Gordon county, Ga. From about that time until 1891 he served three or four churches, but his health failing him then, he resigned all except his home church at Woolsey. During many years of this period he has officiated as clerk of Flint River association, and for five years past has been, and is now, its moderator. He is fully alive to the intellectual and religious advancement of the society and is extensively and influentially useful along these lines. Dr. Woolsey was happily married Feb. 29, 1852, to Miss Emeline Clemanza, daughter of Col. Charles Reagan, of Fentress county, Tenn., who, together with his wife, was a native of Tennessee. He was a colonel of militia, and for many years was clerk of the superior court of the county. The following named children blessed this union: Charles Reagan, born Dec. 6, 1852, farmer, Fayette county; Adela Ann, born Jan. 4, 1854, wife of J. J. Wilson, Butts county, Ga.; Clemanza Isabella, born Dec. 10, 1855, wife of J. T. Lewis, Woolsey; James Zephaniah, deceased, born July 31, 1857, and Isaac Gray, Jr., born Aug. 3, 1861, farmer, Fayette county. The mother of these children died Feb. 1, 1862, from physical exhaustion consequent upon ministering to the relief of Gen. Zollicoffer's troops while encamped near her father's farm after their retreat from the battle of Somerset, Ky. For his second wife he married Mrs. Arvazenia Frances (nee Hutcheson) Wood, daughter of Alfred and Matilda (Sieglar) Hutcheson, descendants of early settlers of Virginia. He was a wealthy planter before the war and was nearly ruined by it. Dr. Woolsey has had no children by his last marriage, but he feels thankful to the Giver of all Good that his wife has been to him an affectionate and devoted companion, and a tender and loving stepmother to his orphaned children. He realizes that in his marital relation he has been doubly blessed.

FLOYD COUNTY.

WILLIAM FANKLIN AYER, agent Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis railway, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Barnwell district, S. C., Jan. 23, 1830. There he received his primary schooling; then, at the age of sixteen, he was sent to Abbeville, and later entered the South Carolina college at Columbia, then under the presidency of Hon. William C. Preston, from which he graduated in 1850. In 1847 his father moved to Floyd county, so when he left college he came to his father's new home and assisted in the management of his plantation interests, in which he continued until the war between the states began. In May, 1861, he enlisted in the Eighth Georgia regiment, Col. Francis Bartow (in whose honor Bartow county was named), of Savannah, who immediately appointed him quartermaster of the regiment. Within thirty days the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth and the Eleventh Georgia and the First Kentucky regiments were organized as a brigade and Col. Bartow was made brigadier-general and placed in command, when he appointed Mr. Ayer brigade quartermaster. Gen. Bartow was killed at the First Manassas battle and was succeeded by Gen. G. R. Anderson, and the brigade assigned to the division commanded by Gen. D. R. Jones, who made Mr. Ayer division quartermaster. He retained this position until August, 1862, when he was transferred to the army of Tennessee, and assigned to duty as post quartermaster at Dalton, Ga., while the army occupied that place as a base. After the evacuation of Dalton, and Gen. Hood succeeded to the command, Mr. Ayer was appointed chief quartermaster of the army of Tennessee, and held the position until the surrender of Gen. Johnston at Greensboro, N. C., in April, 1865. He was in the following campaigns: The Peninsular, in Virginia; the seven days' fight around Richmond, Dalton to Atlanta, the subsequent Tennessee campaign, and finally in the Carolinas. His arduous service during his connection with the army required untiring industry, sound judgment, endurance that could bear any strain, sleepless vigilance, and prompt and strict business methods, combined with superior administrative ability. That he possessed this needed happy combination of qualifications is proved by his continuous promotion and retention, and that he met every emergency incident to his responsible position goes without saying. During the war his family had moved to South Carolina, to a point opposite and not far from Augusta, Ga., where he joined them after the surrender, and remained through the summer of 1865. The latter part of that year he came to Rome, formed a partnership with J. C. McDonald, engaged in the hardware business, which was continued until 1887, when they sold out and retired. Mr. Ayer then accepted the office of agent of the Chattanooga, Rome & Carrollton railway at Rome, and for the Rome railway. When these roads were separated, in 1889, he was appointed superintendent of the Rome railway and held the office until 1894, when the Rome railway was bought by the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis railway, and he was appointed agent and still holds the position. He has served the city of Rome as alderman for two terms and three terms as mayor.

Mr. Ayer was married in 1852 to Miss Sarah Virginia, daughter of the late Rev. J. L. Brookes, of Edgefield district (now Aiken county, S. C.) and they have nine children: Sarah V., wife of Prof. Bothwell Graham; Laura, wife of Royal R. Smith; Julia, unmarried; William F., Jr.; Anna, unmarried; Eliza, Cornelius K., Iverson B. and Mary Celesta. He is an influential member of the Baptist church.

ROBERT BATTEY, physician and surgeon, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Cephas and Mary Agnews (Magruder) Battey, was born in Richmond county (near Augusta), Ga., Nov. 26, 1828. The Batteys are of English origin, and emigrated to Providence, R. I., as Quakers. His father was born and brought up near Keysville, on Lake Champlain, and afterward was a hotel and omnibus proprietor. His mother was of the same family as the distinguished Gen. John B. Magruder, of Union and Confederate fame, and the eminent Dr. Magruder of Washington city, and was a native of Richmond county. Dr. Battey's boyhood schooling was received at the Richmond academy, Augusta, and his later education at Phillips' school, Andover, Mass. When about seventeen he accepted a situation as salesman in a store in Augusta, and subsequently went to Michigan and obtained like employment in Detroit. During his residence in that state he clerked awhile for Zach Chandler, afterward United States senator. Later he went into the drug trade in Marshall, Mich., and studied pharmacy. In 1847 he returned to Rome and engaged a while as clerk in a drug store, and then went into business on his own account, and while conducting his business studied medicine. He then attended lectures at Jefferson Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1857. He soon afterward located in Rome and commenced the practice, was successful from the start, and very soon had an extensive general practice. In August, 1872, he performed what is known to the profession as "Battey's operation," involving a principle elucidative of the change of life in women. In view of his success Jefferson college conferred on him the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1889. In 1882 he established an infirmary in Rome, whose capacity is about 100, where he has successfully treated thousands of patients from both north and south. In 1891 he established the Martha Battey hospital, a benevolent institution, providing for country, town and railway patients, which has been a success from the beginning, and is patronized by the United States marine service. He is an active member of the State Medical society of Georgia, of the American Medical association, and of the British Gynecological society, and is an honorary member of the Obstetrical society of Edinburgh, Scotland, and the Philadelphia college of pharmacy. He has also contributed essays and articles and reports of interesting cases to the various medical periodicals throughout the country. Dr. Battey is universally admitted to be one of the most skillful members of the profession in the south. Dr. Battey was married in Rome, Dec. 20, 1849, to Miss Martha B. Smith, and they have eight children living: Mrs. Gracie C. Bayard; William C.; George Magruder; Mary; Dr. Henry H.; Anderson R.; Mrs. Bessie B. Troutman, and Mrs. E. C. Crichton, of the Atlanta business college.

WILLIAM E. BEYSIEGEL, clerk superior court, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Charles and Catharine (Hummell) Beysiegel, was born in Demopolis, Ala., Nov. 15, 1858. His father was a native of Germany, and by trade a skilled gun and locksmith. When about twenty years old he emigrated to this country, and after stopping awhile in Chicago, came to Alabama, where he prospered in his calling and died in 1877. His mother was a born and bred Alabaman. Mr. Beysiegel received a good common school education, and, though but a boy, started when only twelve years old to work out life's problem. At that age he came to Rome, and when fifteen years old entered the office of A. E. Ross, clerk of the superior court of Floyd county, as assistant. After eighteen years' continuous service with Mr. Ross he was elected in 1891 Mr. Ross' successor, and he has been re-elected at each succeeding election. The office has been bestowed by his fellow-citizens of Floyd county in recognition of exceptional competency and faithfulness in office. Mr. Beysiegel was married Sept. 15, 1893, to Miss Louise Beysiegel, born in Germany, but who came to this country in 1890. He has always been a democrat, but no aspirant for office.

JOHN J. BLACK, county tax collector, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of George S. and Mary (Ralls) Black, was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, June 7, 1844. His father was of Scotch-Irish descent, was born in South Carolina, and came to Georgia when a young man. He moved to Rome about 1856, where he engaged in merchandising. His mother, of English ancestry, was born, reared and educated in Greensboro, Greene Co., Ga. Mr. Black was about twelve years old when his father came to Rome, where he attended a private school taught by Prof. P. M. Sheibley, an educator of ripe scholarship and excellent reputation. He remained at this school until he was seventeen years of age, when, on the occurrence of the war, he enlisted in the Rome light guards, Capt. Magruder, which became Company A of Col. Francis Bartow's regiment. (Col. Bartow was a son-in-law of Hon. John McPherson Berrien, was one of the most popular men in the state, was killed in the battle of first Manassas, and in commemoration of his valor the name of Cass county was changed to Bartow.) With his regiment he participated in the first battle of Manassas, where he was captured, but was so fortunate as to escape. He afterward saw much and arduous service—was in many hotly contested engagements, notably the Yorktown campaign and the seven days' fight around Richmond. During the latter part of the war he was in the ordnance department. After the war he returned to Rome and engaged awhile in soliciting insurance, and in bookkeeping, and afterward traveled two years for a Louisville, Ky., house. In 1876 he was elected tax collector, and has been continuously re-elected since. He is a democrat, and has been chairman of the county executive committee. He was a delegate to the late gubernatorial convention, and supported Gen. Evans. The best and most substantial attestation of his faithfulness as a public officer, and of the appreciation in which he is held, is his continuous re-election to an office of such importance and responsibility. Mr. Black married Miss Belle Findley, of Alabama, who died in 1884 after having borne him four children: Paul S., Duke, Gertrude, and May Belle. In 1886 he married Miss Ella Bailey, of Rome, of the art department of the Presbyterian college, by whom he has had three children: Marion, John J., and Ella. He is a prominent member of the Methodist church.

REUBEN G. CLARK, banker, Rome, Floyd Co., son of Joseph and Martha (Grove) Clark, was born in Grainger county, Tenn., Nov. 10, 1833, and was the first-born of seven children. His father was of English extraction, and was also born in Grainger county. The original members of the family who came to this country were farmers, but their descendants have gradually drifted into mercantile and other pursuits. On his mother's side he is of German descent. Mr. Clark was educated in the common schools of his native county, and at the age of sixteen began life for himself as a clerk in Rutledge, Tenn. In 1860 he went to Knoxville, Tenn., and embarked in a wholesale general merchandise business under the firm name of Clark & Mills. In July, 1861, he enlisted in and was made captain of Company I, Fifty-ninth Tennessee regiment, and entered the Confederate service, in which he remained until the surrender. He was present at the siege of Vicksburg, where he was captured, but was exchanged the following September. He re-entered the service at once, bore his part in all the engagements in which his command participated, and shared all the vicissitudes, privations and hardships incident to soldier-life. In 1866 he came to Rome, and under the firm name of Clark & Harbin embarked in the retail dry goods trade. At the end of five years he formed a partnership with W. F. McWilliams, the firm being W. F. McWilliams & Co., and engaged in the wholesale dry goods business, and continued it twelve years. He then bought the interest of his partner and organized the firm of R. G. Clark & Co., which he conducted six years, doing a business that amounted to $500,000 annually. Selling out at this time he entered upon a private banking business, which he has since carried on most successfully. In addition to his banking interests he owns a great deal of real estate, is one of the safest and solidest citizens of Floyd county, and is considered one of its ablest financiers. Capt. Clark was married in 1868 to Miss Alice Smith, youngest sister of Col. W. H. Smith ("Bill Arp"), who was born and brought up in Rome, by whom he had four children, two of whom, Rosa Lee and Carrie, are living. The mother of these died in May, 1891. In January, 1894, Mr. Clark contracted a second marriage with Miss Mary Joseph King, daughter of J. Burroughs King, of Savannah, Ga., and related to the distinguished Habersham family. In politics Mr. Clark is a staunch democrat, and is an influential member of the Presbyterian church.

FELIX CORPUT, farmer, horticulturist and merchant, Cave Spring, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Brussels, Belgium, April 10, 1840. Ten years afterward his parents emigrated to Georgia and settled near Rome, where they lived four years, moving thence to Cherokee county, Ala., where the son remained until 1858, returning then to Rome. Accepting a situation as clerk in a dry-goods store, he was so employed until May, 1861, when he entered the Confederate service with the Cherokee artillery, of Rome, Ga., of which he had been a member two years. He served with this battery of artillery first as a private, next as corporal, and lastly as quartermaster sergeant. In January, 1865, he was appointed to the quartermaster's department, with the rank of captain, which position and rank he retained until the end of the war. After the war he entered the freight office of the Macon & Western railway at Macon, Ga., where he remained about two years, when he resigned and embarked in the coal trade, following it two years, and then engaged in the produce business, in which he continued about sixteen years. While in Macon he served two years as a member of the city council, during which he was chosen mayor pro tem., and also served the city four years as mayor. In 1886 he moved to his summer home at Cave Spring, where he has since been profitably engaged in agricultural, horticultural and mercantile pursuits, and usefully employed in promoting and protecting the interests of the cultivation of the soil. From 1887 to 1892 he was president of the Floyd County Agricultural society, and during the same period was president of the Floyd County Farmers' alliance (being one of its organizers and its first president), and for five years was chairman of the executive committee of the state alliance. In 1890 he organized the Alliance State exchange and raised the necessary capital for its operation. He was elected president, but resigned after placing the exchange on a working basis. In 1891 the Farmers' Alliance Co-operative company, of Cave Spring, was organized, of which he was then elected and has since continued president. He is a member of the board of directors of the state experiment station near Griffin, and is chairman of the executive committee. He is also president of the board of trustees of the Georgia school for the deaf. In 1892 he was elected to represent his senatorial district (comprising Bartow, Chattooga and Floyd counties) in the general assembly. It will be observed that he has been kept very busy by his appreciative fellow-citizens in filling very honorable and responsible positions—all of them promotive of the general good, and it may be truthfully remarked that he has proven equal to every emergency, faithful to every trust. Capt. Corput was married in Macon, Ga., in April, 1865, to Miss Mattie, daughter of the late John S. Hoge, of that city. To them three children—one son and two daughters—have been born: Joseph, died in 1867; Stella, wife of H. A. Dean, Rome, and Jessie, unmarried. He is a Knight of Pythias, of which he was grand chancellor in 1876; is a member of the I. O. O. F., and was noble grand of the United Brothers lodge No. 5, Macon, from 1869 to 1872. He is also a Knight Templar Mason, and in 1878 was eminent commander of the St. Omar commandery, Macon.

ALFRED CUMMING, brigadier-general Confederate States army, Rome, Floyd Co., was born in Augusta, Ga., in 1829. There he spent his boyhood days and early youth, and received his education preparatory to going to West Point. In 1845 he was appointed to a cadetship and graduated in 1849—two of his classmates being Gen. Quincy Gilmore, U. S. A., and Maj.-Gen. Charles Fields. After his graduation he entered the United States service, in 1855, was made a junior officer of the Tenth United States infantry, and in a few years rose to a captaincy. He was at his home in Augusta on furlough on Jan. 19, 1861, when Georgia seceded, and at once forwarded his resignation as an officer in the United States army, and on the same day he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Augusta Volunteer battalion—five companies—and took charge of the arsenal at that city. Shortly afterward Georgia raised two regiments, and he was made major of the second regiment and assigned to the command at the arsenal, where he remained two months. At the end of that time he went to Richmond and asked for active service, when he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Tenth regiment, regular army, and served as such until October, 1861, when he was promoted to a colonelcy, and served as such until September, 1862, when he was assigned to the command of an Alabama brigade, and led it in the battle of Antietam, where he was wounded and laid up for two months. In October, 1862, he was commissioned brigadier-general, and held the rank until the battle of Jonesboro, Aug. 31, 1864, where he was so severely wounded that he had to retire from the service. Gen. Cumming rendered effective and valuable service during the great struggle, participating among others of less importance in the following battles and sieges: Seven days' fight around Richmond, and was wounded at the final battle at Malvern Hill; Antietam, where he was again wounded; Edward's Station and siege of Vicksburg, Miss.; Missionary Ridge, where his command captured four colors; followed by the engagements in the Atlanta campaign under Gens. Johnston and Hood—his military career closing with the battle of Jonesboro, already mentioned. After the surrender he settled in Floyd county, where he engaged in farming, and in 1880 retired from active life on the farm and came to Rome, where he has since made his home. Gen. Cumming is a devout member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and is a vestryman of the local church.

WILLIAM HARRIS DABNEY, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., was born near Shady Dale, Jasper Co., Ga., in 1817. His father, Anderson Dabney, was born in Virginia about 1774, came to Georgia when a young man, and after living awhile in Greensboro, went to Jasper county, where he died about 1821. In 1829 his mother died also, and then he went to live with his uncle, Garland Dabney, in De Kalb county, Ga. He received his primary education at the "old-field" school, and in 1833 went to Decatur and entered the academy, where he remained three years preparing for college. Four years later he entered Franklin college (now the university of Georgia), at Athens, from which he graduated in 1839. During this period (in 1836) he served in the Creek Indian war three months. Returning to Decatur after his graduation he studied law under the direction of his brother-in-law, Hon. James M. Calhoun—afterward the war mayor of Atlanta—and in the spring of 1840 was admitted to the bar at Greene county superior court. Entering into partnership with Col. Calhoun, he practiced in De Kalb county until 1850, when he moved to Calhoun, Gordon Co., Ga. He remained and practiced law there with the exception of the last two or three years of the civil war until 1873, when he moved to Rome, where he has since made his home and practiced his profession. He was prevented by ill health from entering the Confederate service. In 1854 he was elected senator from Gordon county to the general assembly, and in 1860 was elected to represent the county in the convention which passed the ordinance of secession the January following—for which he voted. Mr. Dabney was admitted to practice in the federal courts both before and after the war. He confined himself to the practice of law and never cared for or sought office, though no citizen, by intellectual endowments, legal training and public spirit, was better qualified for it. At the bar he has been the peer of any, and in private life the embodiment of the true old-time southern gentleman. Mr. Dabney was married in Decatur, Ga., in December, 1842, to Miss Martha B., daughter of Ami Williams, one of the oldest settlers of De Kalb county. Of the children born to them four survive: William A., a Presbyterian minister; Tyree J., at Decatur, Ga; Frank B., civil engineer, and a member of the international commissioners appointed by the United States and Mexico to settle boundary lines, and Mary V., unmarried. His wife died in 1885. Mr. Dabney is a master Mason, and although not a member, affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

RICHARD ALDEN DENNY, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of J. A. and Rebekah (Bonham) Denny, was born in Talbot county, Md., Jan. 15, 1856. His father was of Scotch lineage, and was a civil engineer in the employ of the United States government. His mother was of English ancestry, whose family emigrated to this country in the early days of its settlement. Mr. Denny was principally educated at York, Pa., where, when seventeen years of age, he began the study of law under Levi Maish, a prominent lawyer of that city. When eighteen years old he came to Rome, Ga., and finished his legal studies under Hons. Alexander and Wright; and in 1875 was admitted to the bar in Floyd county superior court. He has since devoted himself exclusively to his practice, establishing an excellent reputation, and a practice which is constantly increasing. He has been a member of the city council, and in 1886 was elected to represent Floyd county in the general assembly, where he rendered efficient and valuable service for his constituents. In 1884 he formed a partnership with John H. Reece, an eminent lawyer, under the firm name of Reece & Denny, which still continues. Mr. Denny was married in 1880 to Miss Theo Scott, daughter of Capt. Dunlap Scott, one of the most distinguished citizens of Georgia in his day. She was born and brought up in Athens, Clarke Co., Ga. To them one child, Mary A., has been born. In politics, Mr. Denny is uncompromisingly democratic.

CHARLES N. FEATHERSTON, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Lucius H. and Maria (Tompkins) Featherston, was born in Heard county, Ga., Oct. 25, 1839. The Featherstons emigrated from England and settled in Virginia. His father was a lawyer of distinction, and at one time was a judge of the superior court. His mother's family was also of English origin, and settled in Georgia at an early date in the state's history. Mr. Featherston was the second born of eight children, was raised in Heard county, and was given the best education the schools of the county afforded. He then entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., from which he graduated with the degree of A. B., and soon afterward enlisted as a private in the Seventh Georgia regiment; but after the first twelve months was on staff duty. He served until the close of the war, and was in every engagement in which his command bore a part after his enlistment; the first two years in the western department, and was paroled in Mississippi. He came to Rome in 1866 and entered into partnership with Judge A. R. Wright (now deceased), which continued twelve years. Since that time he has practiced by himself with satisfactory results as to increase and value of his clientage and his success with causes represented. Although no politician, in the common acceptance of the term, he was elected in 1886 to represent Floyd county in the general assembly, faithfully and efficiently representing his constituents. For the past two years he has given considerable attention to farming, and has a fine and well-equipped farm about six miles from Rome. Mr. Featherston was married in June, 1886, to Miss Sallie Jones, born in Alabama and reared and educated in Selma, that state, by whom he has had one child—Lucius H. He is a prominent member of the Methodist church—with which he has been connected a long time.

I. D. GAILLARD, planter, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Fairfield district, S. C., May 4, 1843. He received his primary education at the old Mt. Zion institute, which he attended until he was fourteen years old, when he went to the military institute at Hillsboro, N. C. In December, 1860, he returned home and studied under private tutor until April, 1861, when he enlisted in the Sixth South Carolina regiment as a private. After eighteen months' service he was promoted to junior second lieutenant; and at the close of the war was holding the rank of first lieutenant of Company G, Sixth South Carolina regiment. He was in numerous engagements—many of them bloody and important battles, of which some were: Drainesville, Seven Pines, Second Manassas, Crampton's Gap, Sharpsburg—where he was slightly wounded by a piece of shell; Shepherdstown, Fredericksburg, Yorktown, Williamsburg, Suffolk, Thoroughfare Gap, Warrenton, Spottsylvania Court House, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Knoxville, Wilderness—where he was wounded by a piece of shell, Cold Harbor, Hanover junction, Deep Bottom, Petersburg, Fort Harrison, Feury's Mill, fight on nine-mile road, on Williamsburg road, Gordonsville, then on the retreat from Richmond to the surrender at Appomattox. Returning from this arduous and faithful service to his home in Abbeville district, he engaged in planting; and after pursuing it there five years he came to Floyd county and bought an excellent 300-acre plantation where he has since been content with the quiet life of a successful planter. Mr. Gaillard was married in 1865 to Miss Kate Watson, of South Carolina—but they have no children. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

THOMAS RICHARD GARLINGTON, physician and surgeon, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of W. H. and Eliza J. (Speight) Garlington, was born in Blakely, Early Co., Ga., Nov. 23, 1859. The Garlingtons were of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and settled, some in Virginia, where by marriage, they became related to Washington, and some in South Carolina. For generations the name has been prominent in the professions of law and medicine. The doctor's grandfather Garlington was a wealthy slave owner in Laurens district, S. C., and there his father was born and educated, and prepared for the practice of medicine. His mother's family was of Scotch descent, and were among the early settlers of Georgia. His maternal grandfather was a very active and influential politician, and represented his county a number of terms in the general assembly. Two of his uncles served through the late civil war as colonels in the Confederate army. Dr. Garlington was raised at Blakely, where he worked on the farm and attended the district school, and, a part of the time, the high school at Columbia, Ala. He then engaged as clerk in a drug store at Gadsden, Ala., where he remained about eight years. Leaving there he took a course at Roanoke college, Salem, Va., where he remained one year. Following this he traveled for several large drug houses a number of years, acquainting himself with business methods and with remedial agents and the details of the drug trade. Retiring from this pursuit, he entered the office of his half-brother, at Rome, Dr. J. B. S. Holmes (now of Atlanta), and began the study of medicine. He entered Vanderbilt university, Nashville, Tenn., in 1887-88, where he took his first course of lectures; and in 1889-90 he attended lectures at Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, from which he graduated in the spring of 1890. Returning to Rome he practiced two years by himself, and then became associated with Dr. Holmes. Although doing a general practice he gave especial study and attention to diseases peculiar to women. In furtherance of his desire to attain the highest excellence, he attended the famed New York polyclinic during the winter of 1892-93, taking a degree. Dr. Holmes moved to Atlanta in 1894, when Dr. Garlington formed a partnership, for general practice, with Dr. Harbin, which partnership expired one year later by limitation. He is local surgeon for the Southern railway, also for the Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus railway. He is a member of Rome medical society, of the State medical association, and of the American medical and National association of railroad surgeons. While giving prompt and conscientious attention to a general practice, he has of late given special attention to general surgery. Dr. Garlington has worked his way steadily, quietly, persistently to his present position in the profession, and is emphatically a self-made man. Being now only at the prime of a vigorous and ambitious young manhood, the promise of a life of exceptional usefulness and an enviable reputation is before him. Dr. Garlington was married on May 15, 1895, to Miss Flora, daughter of Capt. J. A. Peek, of Cedartown, Ga.

DAVID BLOUNT HAMILTON was born in the town of Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., July 30, 1834. His parents moved, when he was an infant, to Cass (now Bartow) county. grocery and cotton factor's business of Hamilton & Co. He is also president of the Trion Cotton Manufacturing company. D. B. Hamilton, Jr., the second son, married Miss Annie Sparks. He is the junior member of the firm of Hamilton & Co., and now manages the business. Harper Hamilton, the third son, married Miss Lena Hiles. He attended the state university, graduated at the law school of Georgetown university of Washington city with distinction. He is now practicing law in Rome, Ga. Alexander Hamilton, the fourth son, is not married. He went to Erskine college, South Carolina. He is the general manager of the Etna Furnace company. The fifth son, Joseph J. Hamilton, went to Bingham Military school, North Carolina, then graduated at Mercer university, and then graduated at the Columbia school of mines of the university of New York. He married Miss Leila Guerry, daughter of Judge Guerry of the supreme court of Colorado, now of Washington City. George Hamilton, the sixth and youngest son, died when fourteen months old. Col. D. B. Hamilton was a member of the whig party, was opposed to secession, but after his state went out of the union his opposition ceased. Although exempted from military duty, he entered the service in Yeiser's legion. On account of exposure he contracted severe tonsilitis and was discharged from the service. Two terms he served in the general assembly of Georgia, 1875 and 1876. Was a member of the constitutional convention of 1877, in which he took a prominent part. He does not speak often, but when he does he speaks to the point, clear, forcible and logical and always commands attention. He takes great interest in all educational interests of the state. He has been a trustee of the state university for ten years, and is again reappointed, and his term does not expire until 1901. He is president of the board of trustees of the flourishing and well-endowed Shorter college, of Rome. He has been engaged in many successful business enterprises, was a director of the Rome and C. R. & C. railroads. When the Rome Land company sold out all its interests he was elected president of the company to wind up its business. He has been president of the Etna Furnace company for a long time and the attorney of the company. Personally he is tall and graceful, a gentleman of fine address, his conversation evidencing a well-cultivated mind.

L EVI PIERCE HAMMOND, physician and surgeon, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Hiram and Emily (Thomas) Hammond, was born in Floyd county, July 28, 1856. The Hammonds are of Irish ancestry, and members of the family who emigrated to this country settled in South Carolina and Georgia. The great-grandfather of Dr. Hammond settled in Eastern Georgia, whence his descendants scattered westwardly. They were principally agriculturists, staid and solid, free from intemperance in its most comprehensive sense, self-respectful, avoiding everything disreputable. Dr. Hammond's father was born in Hall county, where he was raised a farmer, which he made a life-pursuit. His mother was born in Forsyth county, Ga., and was from a family whose name is suggestive of the highest type of American manhood. They reared two children, the subject of this sketch and a brother, both of whom are living. Dr. Hammond received his primary education at the common schools of the county, attended them until he was eighteen years of age, when he entered the North Georgia Agricultural college, at Dahlonega, Ga., a branch of the university of Georgia, where he remained between two and three years, finished his literary course, and studied in the higher mathematics and Latin. Coming to Rome, he engaged with R. V. Mitchell, druggist, as clerk and began the study of medicine under the pre-ceptorship of Dr. J. M. Gregory, of Rome. At the end of a year he went to New York and attended the medical lectures at the university of New York, from which he graduated in February, 1880. The following May he located in Rome, where he at once secured a very good practice, and remained four years. He then moved to the country and practiced five years, after which he returned to Rome, which has since been his home. Of late years he has made something of a specialty of surgery. He is very active, zealous, really enthusiastic as a practitioner, and is wedded to his profession. He is a member and president of the Rome Medical society. Dr. Hammond was married Aug. 28, 1883, to Miss Willie Underwood, of De Kalb county, a granddaughter of Judge Underwood, one of the best and most favorably known, as well as one of the most distinguished jurists that ever served as a judge of the superior court in Georgia. Miss Underwood was born and reared in Meriwether county. To this union six children have been born: Wallace Howard, Helen Nevin, Lucille Marie, Henry Battey, Willie Bertie and Rosa Underwood. The doctor is yet young, has already acquired an enviable reputation for skill, and undoubtedly has before him a career of usefulness and distinction.

JUDGE WILLIAM MADISON HENRY, of Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., the second son of William Warren Henry and Mary (Hemphill) Henry, was born in Walker county, Ga., Feb. 10, 1853. His father's great-grandfather, William Henry, a Scotch-Irishman, immigrated from County Down, Ireland, in the early part of the eighteenth century, settling first on the eastern shore of Maryland, and afterward removing, before the revolutionary period, to the northern part of South Carolina. Judge Henry's father was reared in York district in that state, and when about twenty-five years of age, came to north Georgia, where he became a farmer and schoolmaster. After 1862 he never taught school. Judge Henry's mother, whose maiden name was Cleghorn, was likewise of Scotch-Irish descent. Judge Henry was brought up on his father's farm. His boyhood was passed during the war period, and in a locality much disturbed by war-like movements, so that his early educational advantages were very limited, he having gone to school very little until 1867. In 1870 he attended the academy at La Fayette, the county seat of Walker county, under the instruction of Capt. John Y. Wood. In 1871 and 1872 he taught school, and in 1873 attended school and taught school. In 1874 he attended the high school at Dalton, Ga., and, under the instruction of Dr. W. C. Wilkes, finished his preparation for college. In October of that year he entered the university of Georgia, at Athens, where he became a member of the Demosthenian literary society, and of the S. A. E. fraternity. He graduated with distinction in 1876, being at the commencement both a senior speaker on account of scholarship, and a representative of his society in the champion debate between the Demosthenian and Phi Kappa societies. He then studied law under Hon. Judson C. Clements, at La Fayette, and was admitted to the bar in 1877. In 1878 he located at Summerville, Chattooga Co., Ga. He grew rapidly in the public estimation, and his clientage steadily increased in volume and value. In 1879 he served as mayor of Summerville, and afterward served several years as county school commissioner. In 1886 and 1887 he represented his county in the general assembly. As a legislator he ranked with the leading men of the assembly. Studious, well instructed in the history of the government and political science, logical and oftentimes eloquent in speech, he always commanded the attention and respect of the body. In August, 1892, upon the resignation of Judge John W. Maddox, who had become the democratic nominee for congress for the Seventh district, he was appointed by Gov. Northen to succeed Judge Maddox as judge of the Rome judicial circuit. Fearless in the discharge of the duties of his office, guided alone by his construction of the law, courteous and affable in his treatment of the bar, yet maintaining at all times the dignity of the court, his character as a fearless, just and wise judge, was established. In August, 1894, he removed to Rome, Ga., and, upon retiring from the bench on Jan. 1, 1895, he resumed the practice of law at that point, in partnership with Hon. Seaborn Wright. In politics Judge Henry has always been an earnest democrat, having frequently taken part in the party's counsels—county, district and state. In 1881, Judge Henry was married to Miss Dora Rudicil, the only daughter of Dr. Robert Y. Rudicil, of Chattooga county, one of the most eminent physicians of his section, who is descended from a Prussian family which came to South Carolina during, or just before, the American revolution. They have five children: William Rudicil, Charles Robert, Clara, Roy Oscar, and Evelyn. Their eldest child, Mary Eliza, a bright and beautiful girl, died at four years of age. This sad bereavement brought the one great sorrow of their singularly happy married life.

JAMES H. HOSKINSON, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Floyd county, Nov. 19, 1852. He was reared and educated in the county, excepting some considerable time during the civil war, when he attended school at White Sulphur Springs, Meriwether Co., Ga. In 1866-68 he went to school at Cave Spring, Floyd Co., and then he was with the engineering corps under Col. C. M. Penington surveying the (then) Memphis branch railway about five months. After that he came to Rome and obtained a situation in the postoffice, which he held eighteen months. Then in 1872, having determined to study law, he entered the sophomore class at the university of Georgia, Athens, and pursued the regular course until half way through the senior year, when he dropped Greek and took the law course instead, and graduated in 1875. He soon afterward located in Rome, and after practicing alone for eighteen months formed a partnership with the late C. D. Forsyth, one of the foremost members of the bar in north-west Georgia. This partnership, which secured a fine practice and a large and influential clientage, lasted twelve years. Mr. Hoskinson then practiced alone until 1892, when he formed a partnership with Nathan Harris—the style being Hoskinson & Harris—which still continues. The only public office he ever held was that of mayor of South Rome, two terms in the 80's. In 1880, however, he was a candidate for solicitor-general of the Rome circuit, but was defeated. In 1885 he was appointed attorney for the Georgia loan and trust company for north Georgia and still retains the appointment. The late D. S. Printup and himself were attorneys for the Selma, Rome & Dalton, and the Georgia Southern railways for several years; and his present firm, Hoskinson & Harris, is local counsel for the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railway, now a part of the newly-organized Southern railway. He is not outranked at the local bar as to reputation or success and stands high with the profession and the people in his circuit. Mr. Hoskinson has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Georgia Davis, of Cave Spring, whom he married in November, 1880, and who died in September, 1886, leaving three children: Maude; Henry Warner, who died in December, 1888; and Georgia D. His second wife was Miss Lizzie Dean, of Gadsden, Ala., by whom he has had two children: Dean and Louis D. He is a Knight Templar Mason, and a member of the Presbyterian church.

THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN HOWEL, born March 18, 1845, in Cherokee county, Ala., educated himself, served for three years in the Confederate army—Loring's command, Stuart's division—entered business as a clerk in Rome,

Ga., in 1868, became a cotton factor in 1873; in 1876 a cotton shipper; in 1880 married Mary Park, of Knoxville, and on March 18, 1895—his fiftieth birthday—died in the full esteem of his contemporaries—a model citizen and a recognized founder and controller of one of the largest cotton houses in the world. To many lives—yea, to most of them—the brief epitome is a chant, covering manifold errors, and pointing scant achievement, with the saving grace of brevity. But it would be an injustice to dismiss the brave, sweet years of this loyal life with such terse acknowledgment. The world is better for his living; and should be better for the story of his life. Born in the country, and reaching his majority among its associations, this nature, naturally strong and self-reliant, increased these qualities in its environment, and gathered simplicity and honesty and purity from a pious parentage of the Presbyterian faith. Of a devout temperament, his boyhood and youth were spent in prayer and study far into the nights that followed on busy days at the cross-roads store. This was his education, and these were his surroundings. It is not strange that such a youth should have merged into the loyal and dutiful soldier, making up in steadiness and solemn courage what he lacked in dash and bravado. Although he followed the cavalier Stuart in the three years of his service, he ought, by temper and affiliation, to have marched in the columns of the devout and puritan Jackson. From the day that he entered as a drug clerk in Rome in 1868, the career of this strong, sturdy young puritan was one steady progress to the highest success. The foundations were well laid, the principles were deep-planted as his veins. The convictions of right and honesty were a part of his life. And with industry and determined intelligence added to the equipment the upward march was as logically sure as cause and effect. Five years later he linked himself in a life union with the south's great staple. From this time until the day of his death King Cotton had no abler friend and champion. He was first a cotton factor in 1873; then in 1876, after the progressive fashion of his life, he broadened the sphere of his operations and became a shipper. Every year added to the magnitude of his operations. His courage dared, his industry prospered, and his integrity never wavered. He was a born organizer. His genius of combination was superb. His executive ability was of the highest order. His judgment seemed infallible, and his stock of common sense without limit. Few business men in Georgia have more clearly vindicated the title to extraordinary ability. Every year added to the scope and the repute of his business. The name of his house grew great. The earnest country lad had become the princely merchant, and out of the small scope of its beginning the Howel Cotton company had expanded until its mighty branches had compassed Texas and Tennessee and Arkansas and Alabama, and with headquarters in Georgia, held its eastern station in stately offices in Boston. It will readily be seen that the founder and head of this great establishment was a distinguished and important factor in the commercial life of the times in which he lived. If Mr. Howel had not been a cotton king he would have been an iron master. The development of southern iron had a fascination and an inspiration for him. He watched every step in its triumphal march with keen and thrilling interest, and gave it more than one material impetus from the vantage ground of his own powerful position. He had a reverential and almost tender admiration for Samuel Noble, of Anniston, the great iron man of the south, and this regardful admiration was duly and deeply reciprocated. These two were kindred spirits in the great recuperative battles of the south, and the result of their labors are conspicuous in the aggregate of the marvelous status of today. Chief among the personal influences which pointed this valuable life must be reckoned the wife who survived him. Perhaps no one ever knew Howel as did the brilliant mother of his children. And to her who knew him best, nothing in his character so emphasized it and distinguished it from others as a certain sweet independence shown in every phase of his life. "Emerson," she wrote a friend, "must have had my husband in mind when he said, 'It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion, it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.'" Again, of his mental gifts, she wrote: "He solves the problem of life with a serene and keen intellect, which is competent to get at the heart of things without becoming entangled, and is capable of taking a comprehensive survey of a situation without getting confused—one of those rare men with whom conscience in everything is a prime necessity, and whose greatest pleasure and recompense lie in the laborious pursuit of good and in the absolute discharge of duty." For the rest Theodore Frelinghuysen Howel was the champion of every right cause and the friend of humanity. "To him right was right and wrong was wrong forever. The devil could not invent excuses or make mitigating circumstances to serve him in the least." Once fixed in an opinion he was as immovable as the rock of Gibraltar. He was the intimate friend of many of the greatest developers and reformers of his day. His fraternal relations with Sam Noble have been mentioned. Perhaps no living man was closer to the great evangelist, Sam Jones, who loved him and trusted him as he did few men. Warren Candler, the great preacher of the Methodist church, was also his devoted friend. There were great souls in all these men which recognized and honored the nobler part of each and claimed kinship. In the moral issues of his time the puritan Howel held no uncertain position. He was the dauntless and consistent advocate of temperance, and gave to it freely of his time and munificently of his purse. He was a friend of the old-fashioned religion, and helped without stint or limit all things that ministered to it. He was the stern foe of political and social corruption, and heroic in his opposition. No man of his generation was ever more instant and constant in his firm alignment with the moral side of all great questions. No man of purer and of more single heart ever loved his friends, hated shame and scorned hypocrisy. He enriched his generation with a liberal purse, a steadfast influence and a high example. No man who knew him would deny him the crown of these strong attributes. This judgment is the meed of praise, made unanimous among his contemporaries. Surely this may be his epitaph: "He served his time, developed his country, feared God, upheld the church, kept open heart to charity, and was from first to last the unshaken advocate of Righteousness, Temperance, Virtue and Truth."

WILLIAM D. HOYT, physician and surgeon, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Rev. Dr. Nathan and Margaret (Bliss) Hoyt, was born in Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., Nov. 11, 1831. His parents were of English and Welsh descent; and his father, who was an eminent Presbyterian clergyman, was born, reared and educated in New Hampshire. His mother was born and reared in Springfield, Mass., where she was married. After this felicitous event Rev. Dr. Hoyt came by private conveyance with his family to South Carolina—shortly afterward to Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga.—and finally to Athens, where he was the revered pastor of the Presbyterian church for many years. Dr. Hoyt received his primary education at the very excellent schools in Athens, and then entered the University of Georgia, whence he graduated in 1851. After teaching school two years he went to Philadelphia and attended lectures at Jefferson Medical college, from which he graduated in 1855. After his graduation he located in Philadelphia where he practiced medicine until the war began, when he went to Europe. He traveled in England, France, Switzerland and Germany, and returned late in 1861 to Athens. Later he went to Richmond, where he was examined, and made assistant surgeon on hospital service. He was afterward on duty in Richmond, Va., and subsequently was passed as surgeon. In April, 1863, he was assigned to duty as surgeon of the Seventeenth Georgia regiment, was with it at Gettysburg, and when it went into winter quarters at Orange Court House, Va. He was with the regiment also at Chickamauga; after which he was ordered to Richmond where he served as hospital surgeon until the surrender. In April, 1886, he located in Rome, where he has made his home since, engaged in the practice of his profession. He enjoys an extensive and remunerative practice, his superior attainments and skill securing the entire confidence of the public. He was county physician for many years; has contributed many articles on important medical subjects to various medical publications; and has made some valuable discoveries which have attracted the attention of the profession. Dr. Hoyt was married in March, 1863, to Miss Florence Stevens, of Athens, Ga. Of the children born to them four are living: Mary, in charge of the literary department of Mary's Institute, St. Louis, Mo., who completed her education at Bryn Mawr, near Philadelphia; Florence, now attending the same school preparing for the work of an educator; Margaret, a graduate from Shorter college, Rome, class of 1894; and William D., attending school in Rome. Dr. Hoyt is an exemplary and influential member of the Presbyterian church, which he represented at the general assembly at Nashville, Tenn.

LINDSAY JOHNSON, physician and surgeon, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Lindsay and Mary (Word) Johnson, was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, Aug. 3, 1851. His paternal grandfather was a wealthy Virginia planter, who migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county in the early part of the present century, where he planted on a very extensive scale. Dr. Johnson's father was born in Virginia, and was about fourteen years old when the family came to Georgia. When a young man he moved to Cass (now Bartow) county, where he conducted large planting interests. He was a man of strong will-power, exercised a wide and strong influence, and, withal, was a man of very benevolent disposition. His mother was born, reared and educated in South Carolina, but came to Cass county about the time she attained womanhood, and married. Of the children born to them three survive: Lindsay, the subject of this sketch; Mrs. Meyer, in Texas; and Mrs. McDaniel, on the old homestead. His father died in 1862, and his mother in 1882. Dr. Johnson received a good primary, supplemented by an academic education. At Euharlee he was the room-mate and almost inseparable companion of Rev. Sam. P. Jones, the great evangelist. He finished his literary education at the Memphis, Tenn., high school at the age of nineteen, and then returned to Cartersville and began the study of medicine. He then went to Louisville, Ky., and attended lectures at the University of Louisville, from which he graduated in 1875. From there he went to New York, where, for six months, he received private lectures, and then returned to Cartersville. It was not until 1879 he entered upon the practice of his profession; but almost immediately afterward he was elected professor of clinical surgery and demonstrator of anatomy in the Southern Medical college then just established in Atlanta. After holding this chair two years he resigned on account of impaired health and returned home, where he resumed active practice. He established a very large practice, and remained in Cartersville until 1891, when he came to Rome—now his home. Although engaged in general practice, he is giving particular attention to surgery, especially abdominal surgery, and has a very satisfactory patronage. During his professional life he has had the management of some of the most dangerous and difficult of operations in surgery, in all of which he has been phenomenally successful. He has also made many valuable contributions to medical periodicals, particularly the "Southern Medical Record," and to professional knowledge. He is a prominent and progressive member of the County and State Medical societies. Of recognized unquestioned scientific knowledge and practical skill, his professional eminence is a matter of choice with him. Dr. Johnson was married in 1876 to Miss Mary Curry, sister of D. W. Curry, Rome, Ga., who, dying in 1885, he afterward married Miss Valentine Goulon, born and educated in New Orleans, La. He has two sons—William Henry, and Yandell—and one daughter, Marguerite, at Boscobel college, Nashville, Tenn.

J. LINDSAY JOHNSON, lawyer and planter, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Floyd county in September, 1855. His grandfather, Col. Lindsay Johnson, of Scotch lineage, was a native of Virginia, who early in life migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county, afterward—about 1833—moving to Cass (now Bartow) county, and was an officer in the Creek Indian war of 1836. Mr. Johnson's father was born in Elbert county in 1818, and was fifteen years old when his father moved to what is now Bartow county. In 1842 he moved to Floyd county and engaged in planting, and so successful and prosperous was he that he was reputed to be the largest planter in North Georgia, cotton being the predominant production. Although he never sought or held office, he was a very warm and active partisan, was an old-line whig and anti-secessionist before the war, but after Georgia seceded he sustained her action, and although incapacitated by physical debility from active military service, was untiring in contributing, gathering and forwarding provisions, etc., for the soldiers. He was a very charitable man and universally popular. He was married about 1846 to Miss Mary, daughter of Col. Smiley Seabrook, of Jones county, Ga., the fruit of which union was four children, three of whom survive: Smiley S., large planter, Floyd county; J. Lindsay, and Millard F., planter, Floyd county. He died in 1887. Mr. Johnson was raised in Floyd county, in whose schools he received his primary and preparatory education, and when seventeen years of age he attended Washington and Lee university, Lexington, Va., where he took a special course, and afterward a special course in the law department of the university of Georgia, Athens. In 1875 he located at Rome and entered upon the practice of law, doing more or less as he could not neglect his large planting interests in Floyd, Bartow and Chattooga counties. In 1884 he was elected to represent Floyd county in the general assembly, and served on the following committees: Special judiciary, corporations, military and special local legislation. He was also one of the prime movers for the establishment of the Technological school, and did all he could in every way in his power to secure favorable legislative action, and has done all he could to sustain it since. He has always been the ardent friend and supporter of all measures, local and general, calculated to promote the industrial interests and the development of the state's resources. In 1888 he was again elected to represent the county, and during this term worked and used his strong influence against the "betterment" claims of first lessees of the Western & Atlantic (State) railway. He also took a prominent part in favor of what is known as the "Berner bill," which was intended to prevent the consolidation of certain railroads, and also in what is known as the "Glenn bill," the purpose of which was to enable each county traversed by a railway to collect a tax on the miles within its limits—a law which is of great benefit to the counties. This bill's constitution-ality was attacked, but was affirmed by the supreme court. Mr. Johnson is an active member of the Floyd County Agricultural and Horticultural society, and is chairman of the executive committee of the American Cotton Growers' Protective association. He is a gentleman of scholarly tastes and attainments and speaks fluently the French and Spanish languages, and it is gratifying to know that one so extensively read and well informed, possessed of large wealth, takes the active interest he does in the material and moral development of his immediate locality and the state. Mr. Johnson was happily married in 1876 to Miss Annie E., daughter of the late J. D. C. Gillespie, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and to them three children have been born: John Gillespie, Letitia Patterson and J. Lindsay, Jr. He is not a member of any social or fraternal organization, nor any church, but is proud of being known as a "working democrat," and thoroughly American in sentiment and action.

JOHN W. MADDUX, member of congress, Rome, Floyd Co., was born in Chattooga county, Ga., June 3, 1848. He was raised and educated in the county, and in 1863, when a little more than fifteen years old, he enlisted in the Sixth Georgia cavalry (Col. Jack Hart), and from that time was in continuous, active, arduous and oftentimes hazardous duty until February, 1865, when he was so severely wounded at Aiken, S. C., as to be invalided from service. His first experience was at Chickamauga, whence his command went to Knoxville, where there was fighting almost every day for three months. He next participated in the battle of Resaca, and in the obstinately fought campaign thence to Atlanta and in the battles of July 19 and 22, 1864, at Atlanta. He was next with his command on the famous raid of the army through Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee, a regular three months' series of fights. The command was next employed in covering Hood's retreat from Dalton, Ga., to Gadsden, Ala., and after that was in the engagement at Griffin, Ga., and thence in front or on the flanks of the Federal army in Georgia and South Carolina until he received his disabling wound at Aiken, S. C. In November, 1864, he was wounded in the face while on the skirmish line at Turkeytown. From Aiken he was sent to the hospital at Augusta, and later to Madison, Ga. On his restoration to health he returned to his Chattooga county home, where he farmed three years and then went to school a year at Summerville, the county seat, and then at Bethel. Following this he engaged as a clerk in a grocery store in Rome, and then took charge of a branch store in Summerville, where he remained about eight months. The next twelve months he spent in traveling, and traveled in Texas, Nebraska, Colorado, etc. On his return home he joined a corps of engineers who were surveying the line of the North and South railway from Rome to Columbus, Ga., now known as the Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus railway. About six months afterward he took some contracts for grading on the line, which he continued until the panic of 1873, when he went to his home in Chattooga county. He remained at home twelve months and then entered the employ of the Round Mountain Iron company, Round Mountain, Ala., which suspended in about a year, and he went home again. A few months later he was engaged by the Stone Hill Copper Mining company to take charge of their mining plant. After a year's service—a part of 1874-75—he returned to Summerville and commenced the study of law, and on completing his studies in 1877 was admitted to the bar at Chattooga superior court. He located in Summerville and was extremely successful from the start. That year he was elected mayor of Summerville, and the next year was elected county commissioner. In 1880 he resigned that office and was elected to represent Chattooga county in the general assembly, and was re-elected in 1882. In 1884 he was elected to represent the forty-second senatorial district (composed of Bartow, Floyd and Chattooga counties) in the general assembly. In November, 1886, he was elected judge of the Rome circuit, for a term of four years, and in November, 1890, was re-elected for another term. In 1892 he was elected to represent the seventh congressional district of Georgia in the fifty-third congress, and in 1894 was elected to succeed himself in the fifty-fourth congress over a strong opponent and after a heated canvass. Judge Maddox removed to Rome in 1890, which has been his home since that time. His steady and uninterrupted advancement since he first entered public life, now nearly a score of years, affords the very strongest and highest evidence of sound practical judgment, great ability, personal excellence and official integrity that could be presented. He is a member of the national democratic committee. Judge Maddox was married Aug. 15, 1872, to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of H. B. C. Edmondson, of Summerville, and to them have been born six sons and one daughter. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and a Knight Templar Mason; although not a member, his predilection is for the Presbyterian church.

MAX MEYERHARDT, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of D. J. and Esther Meyerhardt, was born in Germany, Oct. 24, 1855. When he was about a year old his father emigrated to Georgia and settled in Rome, where he continued his life-time business of dry goods and clothing merchant. They raised four children, two sons and two daughters, the father dying in May, 1890, and the mother in February, 1891. Mr. Meyerhardt was educated principally in the public schools of Nashville, Tenn., and when sixteen years of age went into the office of the clerk of the superior court of Floyd county as his deputy. During the years he filled this position he began the study of law, continued it afterward under Col. C. Rowell, of Rome, and at the October term, 1876, of Floyd superior court was admitted to the bar and entered at once upon the practice. In 1881 he became a partner of Judge A. R. Wright, and his son Seaborn, under the firm name of Wright, Meyerhardt & Wright, which continued until the death of Judge Wright in 1891. In 1881 he was elected city attorney, and was continuously re-elected until he resigned in 1886, when he was appointed judge of the city court by Gov. John B. Gordon. He held this office until 1891, and the next year he was elected attorney for the county, and is now serving his second term. In 1882-83 he filled the appointment of United States commissioner, and for eleven years has been a member of the Rome school board. He has filled every office with acknowledged ability and unswerving fidelity, and enjoys the sincere esteem of the profession and his fellow-citizens. Mr. Meyerhardt was married in the spring of 1890 to Miss Nettie Watson, formerly of Alabama, then a teacher in the public schools of Rome, who has borne him three children: Rebecca, David, and Hester. He is a very enthusiastic and prominent member of the masonic fraternity, being now worshipful master of Cherokee lodge, No. 66, high priest of Rome chapter, No. 26, and deputy grand master for the seventh district of Georgia. In religious faith he is a Hebrew of the Hebrews.

J. P. M'CONNELL, sheriff, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Floyd county in 1845. When he was twelve years of age his parents moved to Cherokee county, Ga., where he was educated. In September, 1862, he enlisted as a private in the Sixth Georgia cavalry, Col. Hart commanding, and as such served through the war, and was almost all the time in continuous arduous service. With his command he participated in the engagements at Dandridge and Philadelphia, Tenn., at Chickamauga, Dalton, Resaca, New Hope church, Noonday church, where he was shot in the leg. In fact, he was engaged all through the busy Atlanta campaign—a fight almost every day—the battles around Atlanta and Macon, at Aiken, S. C., and finally at Bentonville, N. C. After the surrender he went to school a year at Acworth, Cobb Co., Ga., and afterward farmed and merchandised in Cherokee county until 1880. That year he returned to Cobb county and carried on a general merchandise business until 1886, when he moved to Floyd county and engaged in farming until 1891, when he was made deputy sheriff of the county, and served in that capacity two terms, four years. In January, 1895, he was elected sheriff. Sheriff McConnell is a man of determined character, excellent business habits and qualifications, and superior executive ability, besides being very popular. Mr. McConnell was married in 1870 to Miss Julia, daughter of Raymond Sandford, deceased, by whom he has three children; Lena, wife of John A. Foster, Floyd county; James Raymond, and John E. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., a master Mason, and a member of the Missionary Baptist church.

WILLIAM J. NEEL, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Joseph L. and Mary A. (Swain) Neel, was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, Ga., Feb. 15, 1861. His paternal ancestors were natives of Ireland, and when they emigrated to America settled in Maryland and Pennsylvania, some of them afterward locating in Virginia and Georgia. His maternal ancestors were Scotch, and settled in South Carolina. His father was born in St. Clair county, Ala., and married his wife in Gordon county, Ga. His principal occupation was farming, but in connection with it he carried on a general merchandise business, and was prosperous and popular, and attained to some political prominence prior to the war. In 1857 he represented Cass county in the general assembly of Georgia, and has represented it in the same body since the war. He is still living, and is chairman of the democratic executive committee of Bartow county. He raised and commanded a company in the Fortieth Georgia regiment during the civil war, and rendered efficient and valuable service during that conflict. They reared four children, of whom the subject of this sketch was the youngest. James M., the oldest, is a prominent lawyer at Cartersville, Ga., and has also been judge of the city court. Another brother, Joseph N., is a member of the Eads-Neel company, Atlanta and Macon, the largest retail clothing house in Georgia. Mr. Neel's educational advantages were at first very limited. He attended the common county schools at Adairsville until he was eighteen years old, when he entered the North Georgia agricultural college at Dahlonega, at which he was a student two years. He then read law some months under the direction of his brother at Cartersville, and edited "The American," the local paper. Later he went to Washington, D. C., and in 1885 entered the Georgetown university law school, where he took a three years' course, and was graduated in 1888 with first honors, besides winning a $100 gold prize for the best scholarship record. In 1887 he was appointed chief of division in the treasury department at Washington, which he filled until the change in administration in 1889, when he voluntarily resigned. He then came to Rome and became a member of the law firm of McHenry, Nunnally & Neel, which continued until September, 1894, since which time he has practiced by himself, confining his practice principally to commercial causes. His clientage, already large, increases steadily in volume and value, as well as influence. No member of the profession as young as he has brighter prospects for professional distinction or political preferment. In 1892 he was elected to represent Floyd county in the general assembly, and served his constituents with credit to himself and acceptably to his fellow-citizens. While a member of that body he secured the passage of a bill establishing an industrial department for the deaf and dumb at Cave Spring, Floyd

Co., and secured an appropriation for a building for that purpose. He declined to serve another term. In 1893 he was elected a member of the city council, of which body he was chosen mayor pro tem. He is still a member of that body and chairman of the finance committee. Mr. Neel was married in June, 1892, to Miss Isa Williams, at Murfreesboro, Tenn. His wife was born in Georgia, educated in part at the Mary Sharpe college in Winchester, Tenn., and then went to Europe and completed her education in Paris and Dresden. She is one of the most accomplished linguists in Georgia. Mr. Neel comes of a line of democrats and is himself an active and zealous member of that party. He is an earnest member of the First Baptist church of Rome.

MITCHEL ALBERT NEVIN, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Augusta, Ga., April 10, 1842. His father, James Nevin, was a native of South Carolina, and came to Georgia and established himself in his early manhood, where he died about 1846. Mr. Nevin received a good education and grew to manhood in Augusta; and when twenty years old went to Columbia county, Ga., where he taught school two and a half years. He then left there and came to Floyd county, which he made his permanent home. After teaching school between two and three years he bought an interest in the "Rome Commercial" newspaper, and later bought the entire plant and conducted the paper until 1869, when he sold out. Four years afterward he repurchased it and ran it until 1876, when he sold out to the "Rome Courier," and shortly afterward established a book and job printing establishment. He successfully conducted this for a number of years, and then disposed of it and commenced improving some valuable real estate he owned in Rome, the building of the fine opera house which bears his name being due to his enterprising spirit. Public spirited and intelligently progressive he has been quite influential in promoting the growth of the city and its industrial interests, and is one of the most popular of its citizens. In 1884 he was elected school commissioner of the county, and held the office twelve years, and in 1878 he was elected mayor of Rome, and twice successively re-elected. In 1882 he was elected clerk of the city council and held the office continuously until 1894. Mr. Nevin was married Dec. 20, 1866, to Miss Helen A., daughter of the late distinguished Judge John W. H. Underwood. Of the children born to them three survive: Ida, wife of W. A. Patton, Rome; James B., and Mary M. Mr. Nevin is a member of the I. O. O. F., Royal Arcanum, Knights of Honor, and of the Methodist Episcopal church south.

HUGH BARRY PARKS, retired merchant, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of William and Elvira (Allgood) Parks, was born in Pontotoc county, Miss., March 8, 1851. Both his parents were natives of South Carolina, and early in life migrated to Mississippi. Mr. Parks grew to manhood on his father's plantation and was educated at the schools in his native county. When he was twenty-one years old he came to Tryon, Chattooga Co., Ga., and engaged as clerk in the store of the Tryon manufacturing company, in which his uncle, A. P. Allgood, was a large stockholder. He remained in the employ of the company until 1874, when he came to Rome and entered the employ of the dry goods firm of W. T. McWilliams & Co., with whom he remained two years. He then organized the dry goods house of H. B. Parks & Co., which soon commanded a large and profitable business, and continued until 1894 when they sold out and Mr. Parks retired from business. He came to Chattooga county a poor young man—his only capital industrious habits, a resolute will and moral rectitude—qualities which have won him his way to wealth, honorable social distinction and the confidence of the community; eminently elevated intellectually, and noted for deep-seated moral sentiment. When he retired his firm had been doing an annual trade of $85,000. Mr. Parks was an important factor in the organization of the municipal government of East Rome, about 1880, and with the exception of a year or two has served on the council ever since. He is a public-spirited, progressive and useful citizen, wide-awake to everything calculated to promote material prosperity and advanced morality. Mr. Parks was married in Chattooga county, December 25, 1877, to Miss Mary E., daughter of the late John W. Penn, a union which has been blessed with two children: Mary Alice, and Hugh Barnett. Mr. Parks takes no especial interest in the partisan politics of the day, but he is an uncompromising prohibitionist and a wide-awake, working and influential member of the Methodist church.

MULFORD MARSH PEPPER, postmaster, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Savannah, Ga., July 14, 1850. About two years after he was born his parents moved to Cass (now Bartow) county, where they lived until 1860, when they removed to Rome. Here he was reared and received what education he has. When fifteen years old he went to Waynesboro, Burke Co., Ga., to clerk for a grocery firm, and remained with them eighteen months, when he came back to Rome and entered the hardware store of Ayer & McDonald. After clerking for this firm six years he went with J. & S. Bones, in the same business, and remained with this firm six years also, and afterward one year with their successor in the business—S. G. Hardy. Then, about 1880, he entered the employ of the Towers & Sullivan manufacturing company, as secretary and treasurer, and remained with them three years. The Rome hardware company being organized, he was elected a director, and was manager of it two years. After this he formed a partnership with Park Harper—the firm being Harper & Pepper—and went into the crockery business and carried it on two years. He now entered the Merchants' National bank as bookkeeper and filled the position two years when, in April, 1893, he was appointed to his present position of postmaster. Mr. Pepper was married in 1875 to Mrs. Judith M. (nee Christian) Terrell. He is a Knight of Pythias and a Knight Templar Mason, and affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

JOHN H. REECE, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Dr. Alired Burton and Sarah W. (Varner) Reece, was born in Floyd county, Ga., Aug. 29, 1840. His paternal grandfather, Pope Reece, came from Wales, England, in the colonial times, settled in North Carolina, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Reece's father was born in North Carolina, migrated to Georgia in 1834, and settled among the Cherokee Indians in the territory north of the Chattahoochee river. He officiated as surgeon under Col. Nelson, in command of the troops which accompanied the Cherokees to their reservation west of the Mississippi. His maternal grandfather, Matt Varner, was a wealthy and influential planter in Oglethorpe county, Ga. Mr. Reece was the eldest of four children, received his primary education at the common schools, and then entered the old Cherokee Baptist college at Cassville, where he was when the civil war was precipitated. He enlisted in the Eighth Georgia regiment, and was elected lieutenant of his company; and when Col. Cook was killed at the battle of First Manassas, he was promoted to a captaincy. He was afterward captain of a company in a regiment commanded by Col. George A. Smith, of Macon, Ga., was captured in April, 1864, and was kept a prisoner at Johnson's island until June, 1865. After the war he spent about two years on his farm in Floyd county and then came to Rome and entered upon the practice of his profession. In 1876 he was elected to represent Floyd county in the general assembly and took an active interest in calling the convention of 1877, which framed the present constitution of Georgia; and was elected to the first general assembly under it. Since then he has neither desired nor sought political position. For many years he was associated in his law practice with Col. Forsyth; but in 1886 he formed a partnership with Richard A. Denny, under the firm name of Reece & Denny, which still exists. The firm does a general practice in Rome circuit and others contiguous, in the state supreme court, and in the United States courts. Mr. Reece ranks high with the members of his profession and the public, has a large and influential clientele, and is so popular he could have almost any office in the gift of the people if he would accept it. Mr. Reece was married in 1871 to Miss Corry A. Armstrong, of Macon county, Ala., daughter of Maj. Henry Armstrong. She was educated at Mrs. Colwell's college, better known as Rome female college, presided over by Mrs. Colwell. Four children—two sons and two daughters—blessed this union. The eldest son, Henry, was killed by the Mexicans at Monte Vista, Col.; the other son, Burton A., and the daughters, Bessie and Mamie, are at home; the daughters are students at Shorter college, Rome. He is a working and influential member of the Baptist church, and in October, 1894, was one of the three delegates from Floyd county elected to the Baptist state convention.

JOHN J. SEAY, capitalist, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Rufus M. and Laura (Wadsworth) Seay, was born in De Kalb county, Ga., Nov. 10, 1843. His father was born in Appomattox, Va., but grew to manhood in Knoxville, Tenn., where, in after life, he became a prominent merchant, and died in 1851. Besides himself, the family consisted of another brother, and a sister. His mother was born in Decatur, De Kalb Co., where she grew to womanhood and was married. She is still living, something over seventy years of age. Capt. Seay enjoyed very limited educational advantages in his boyhood and youth. In 1861, when only seventeen years old, he enlisted in a company under command of Luther J. Glenn, which formed a part of the famous Cobb legion, and served until the surrender. Among other hotly contested battles he participated in were those at Malvern hill, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Harper's Ferry, and Chancellorsville, and he was with Gen. Longstreet at Knoxville, where he was wounded. He was not in active field service the last year of the war. After the war he went into the stove and hardware business in Atlanta, but in a short time sold out and started for Honduras, Central America. Yellow fever breaking out he abandoned the trip and went into business in West Point, Ga. At the end of three years he sold out (1872), and went to Rome, where he engaged in the manufacture of stoves—a pioneer in Georgia in this very important industry. He continued this business until 1883, when he sold out and embarked in steamboating on the Coosa river. He built one steamboat and bought four more, and established lines between Rome, Ga., and Greensport, St. Clair Co., Ala., which transported scores of thousands of bales of cotton and thousands of tons of miscellaneous freight. In 1890 he engaged in railroading as soliciting agent. In 1891 he built a dummy, three-mile-line street railway, which later he sold, and was elected president of the Consolidated street railway company. He was also elected president of the Rome land company, and secretary of the New Rome land company. In 1891-92, by way of recreation and to employ his leisure time, he edited the city daily paper. In 1892, when the alliance captured the state, he was elected on the straight democratic ticket to represent Floyd county in the general assembly. The appreciated compliment of a tender of re-election was declined. Overflowing with public spirit, of irrepressible energy, and aggressively progressive, Capt. Seay is a most useful citizen, and is of the sort that projects and pushes to successful termination great enterprises and builds up cities. Capt. Seay was married July 17, 1867, to Miss Frances S. Wood, Canton, Ga., by whom he had four children: Charles M.; Laura L., Mabel B., and Susan L. The mother of these children died, and he contracted a second marriage with Miss Florida Bayard, of Sewanee, Franklin Co., Tenn., who has borne him two children: Clifford B. and Flory R. Capt. Seay is a life-long, uncompromising democrat, always loyal, and a prominent member of the Presbyterian church.

HALSTED SMITH, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., was born in Savannah in November, 1849, and moved to Rome in November, 1873, and practiced law until 1879. In 1877 he was elected a member of the city council after a sharp contest. The mayor and entire council were re-elected without opposition for a second term. On account of impaired health he removed to the country, being at the time a law partner of Hon. D. B. Hamilton. He returned to the city in 1890, having previously entered into partnership with Mr. L. A. Dean in 1887, which continued until 1894, when he was elected city attorney and clerk of the council. He has filled these two responsible positions most admirably and still continues the practice of law, having made a splendid reputation as a real estate lawyer. He is general counsel for the Rome Mutual Loan association and represents the legal department of other loan associations in the city, and is familiar with corporation law, of which he has made an exhaustive study. He has always taken an active interest in politics, and has been for several terms chairman of the democratic county committee. Few citizens are more popular, and none stand better for integrity of character, professionally and socially. Mr. Smith was married May 8, 1871, to Miss Caroline Timanus, of Fernandina, Fla., by whom he has had seven children. His first presidential vote was cast for Horace Greeley. He is a member of the Presbyterian church.

WALLER T. TURNBULL, judge of the Rome circuit, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Richard and Margaret (Bellamy) Turnbull, was born in Monticello, Fla., Sept. 9, 1860. His paternal grandfather, Dr. Theodore Turnbull, of English extraction, was a native of South Carolina. Judge Turnbull's father was born in Florida. He was a lieutenant in the Confederate service during the civil war, first in the western army and later on detached duty on the Florida coast. He was afterward a member of the Florida legislature, and was one of the Florida commissioners to the world's fair. His mother is a lineal descendant of Arthur Butler, who was a colonel in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and led the charge at the battle of King's Mountain, and also of Pierce Butler, a member of the convention that framed the constitution for the young republic. Judge Turnbull passed his boyhood and early youth in the city of his birth and received his primary and preparatory education there. In 1877 he entered Emory college at Oxford, Ga., from which he graduated in 1880 with the fourth honor and the degree of A. B. He was also awarded the Boynton prize medal for the best essay of the year. After his graduation he returned home, and the ensuing year was principal of the Monticello high school. He then attended a law course at the university of Virginia, and in 1883 was admitted to the bar in that state. He then located in Atlanta, in which city he practiced his profession with pronounced success until 1889, when he moved to Rome, where his personal merit, professional attainments and superior ability being recognized and appreciated, he has been very successful. On Oct. 6, 1891, Gov. Northen appointed him judge of the city court of Rome, which position he creditably held until January, 1895, when he was elected judge of Rome circuit. Judge Turnbull was married April 26, 1889, to Miss Cornelia, daughter of W. I. and Martha

SEABORN WRIGHT.

Brookes. He is a member of the order of Red Men, a Knight of Pythias, and a member of the Methodist church.

J. D. TURNER, deputy sheriff, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., was born in Floyd county in September, 1854. He was a son of John W. Turner, who was born in Lincoln county, Ga., in 1830, and came to Floyd county in 1847, where he acquired considerable property and became very prominent and influential. He was a captain in the Twenty-ninth Georgia regiment and served through the war, and who had the distinguished honor of representing Floyd county in the general assembly twenty years. He died in 1893. Mr. Turner was educated in the near-by country schools, and after receiving his preparatory education entered the university of Georgia at Athens. After finishing his junior year he returned home and engaged in farming until January, 1887, when he was appointed assistant postmaster of Rome, moved to the city and served two years and a half. After this he went on the road for D. W. Curry, druggist, Rome, for eighteen months—until January, 1891—when he was elected deputy sheriff, J. C. Moore being elected sheriff. He was re-elected in January, 1893, and 1895, the terms being two years, and has made an excellent record. Sheriff Turner was married in 1879 to Miss Susie, daughter of the late H. Bunn, of Cedartown, Ga., and to them four children have been born: Eugene D., Alfred Colquitt, Hugh Bunn and Catherine. He is a Knight of Pythias, a Knight Templar Mason, and a member of the Baptist church.

SEABORN WRIGHT, lawyer, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Hon. Augustus R. and Adeline (Allman) Wright, was born near Rome, Nov. 29, 1856. His father was of English extraction, born in Screven county, Ga., and came to Floyd county about 1850, having previously graduated from the Augusta school. He was a brilliant and impressive orator, and served with distinction in both the Federal and Confederate congresses and as a judge of the Superior court. His mother was of Scotch descent, having been a Miss Adeline Allman, and was born and raised in Chattooga county. They had ten children, of which the subject of this sketch was intermediate, and seven of whom are living. Mr. Wright received his primary and preparatory education in the schools of his county and then entered Mercer university, Macon, Ga., from which he graduated with distinction in 1878. He took great interest and an active part in the college society debates, and was commencement orator of his class. He read law under his father and was admitted to the bar at the January term (1879) of Floyd superior court. As soon as he was eligible, in his twenty-first year, he was elected as an independent candidate over the strongest candidate the democrats could nominate to represent Floyd county in the general assembly, and was re-elected to serve a second term. He made a fine record in the legislature and introduced many bills of importance. Since then he has been a candidate for no office. When Dr. William H. Felton announced himself as an independent candidate for congress in 1874 he allied himself with the movement and stumped the district for Dr. Felton. He did this for three successive campaigns, his boyish appearance and brilliant oratory drawing large audiences everywhere and imparting extraordinary effectiveness to his work. Mr. Wright has always been independent in politics. Believing the great evils of American politics to be the result of extreme partisanship, he has contended for greater independence and a higher degree of political responsibility. He believes that the overwhelming ascendancy of the democratic party in the south since the war, coupled with the blind obedience of the masses to the dictates of party action, made it possible for politicians to manipulate party conventions, thereby frequently nominating for office candidates without character or ability. This he fearlessly and eloquently denounced, holding with Robert Toombs that the action of political conventions are simply advisory. That the rights of the people are higher than the dictates of party. These have been his political principles from boyhood, and from them he has never swerved for an instant. He has been repeatedly urged by the people of the seventh district to run as an independent candidate for congress, but declined to do so, although his election seemed assured, assigning as a reason that men in office become political cowards and soon lose the fearless freedom of thought and speech which alone render them useful to their people and their country. He has been prominent in all reform movements, especially the efforts to regulate and suppress the liquor traffic. Recognizing that the safety and integrity of the government rest largely upon free and fair elections, he has bravely denounced election frauds of every character. Believing in white supremacy in the south, because of the superior intelligence and virtue of the white race, he has nevertheless always demanded absolute justice for the negro, arraigning in the press, and on the hustings, the wholesale corruption of the negro by local politicians. This has drawn down upon him the wrath of the small politicians, but has correspondingly endeared him to the common people, who regard him as their champion and the defender of their rights. Since his service in the general assembly Mr. Wright has devoted himself to his profession, giving special attention to anti-corporation and criminal law. He has taken an active part, principally as an advocate, in most of the important criminal cases in northwestern Georgia. In the case of the State vs. Dr. J. B. S. Holmes, charged with the murder of De Forrest Allgood, he made the concluding argument, which was a masterpiece of eloquence and was one of the finest addresses ever delivered in the court house of Floyd county. He also made the leading arguments in the cases of the state vs. Ora McKee and Frank Wilkerson, cases famous in Georgia jurisprudence, and in all these there were verdicts of acquittal. Of magnetic personality, a strong and brilliant mind and oratorical ability of the highest order, should he so desire, Mr. Wright will no doubt attain the highest honors within the gift of his state. Mr. Wright was happily married in Atlanta, Feb. 28, 1882, to Miss Annie E., daughter of William A. Moore, of that city, a union which has been blessed with four children: Barry, Lewis, Max and Graham. He is a prominent and influential member of the Presbyterian church.

FRANK A. WYNN, physician, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of J. A. and Olivia (Borders) Wynn, was born in Cedartown, Polk Co., Ga., Oct. 19, 1870. The members of the Wynn family, related to the Howes, emigrated from England to Virginia, whence some of the descendants came to Georgia. His father was born in Chattooga county, was at one time in the wholesale trade in Cedartown, Polk Co., and afterward moved to Rome, where he did a large dry-goods business until 1891. Dr. Wynn's grandmother, Anna Bird, was well known in Georgia. On his mother's side he is of Scotch-English extraction. His parents raised four children—two sons and two daughters—of which he is the eldest. Dr. Wynn was educated in the schools at Rome, where he completed his education in 1888. He at once began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Drs. Holmes and Garlington, and then attended lectures at the Atlanta Medical college, entering in 1891 and graduating in 1893. Immediately afterward he located in Rome and entered upon the practice under encouraging auspices and with unusually flattering success. While engaged in a general practice, he is giving special attention to the eyes, ears and throat. Studious, sympathetic and bestowing attentive nursing on patients, he is sure of building up a large practice. He is a member of the County and State Medical associations, genial and of popular manners. He is a genuine lover of fine stock, especially horses.

HAMILTON YANCEY, insurance, Rome, Floyd Co., Ga., son of Hon. Benjamin C. Yancey and Sarah P. (Hamilton) Yancey, was born in Edgefield district, S. C., Sept. 27, 1848. His father removed from South Carolina to Alabama in 1850, resigning from the South Carolina legislature and practically declining a nomination and election to congress. In 1855-56 he was president of the Alabama state senate, was appointed in 1857 United States minister to the Argentine confederation, and in 1859 declined the proffer from President Buchanan of the appointment of minister to the court of St. James. In later years he was an active and influential member of the Georgia State Agricultural society, and for a number of years was its president. He was a brother to the Hon. William L. Yancey, who bore so conspicuous a part in the politics of Alabama before the war between the states began, and until his death in 1863, while serving the state in the Confederate states senate. Hamilton Yancey's maternal grandfather was Thomas Hamilton, a large planter, and one of the wealthiest citizens of Clarke county, Ga. Mr. Yancey was principally reared and educated in Athens, Ga., and was graduated from the state university in 1868 with the degree of A. B., his alma mater subsequently conferring upon him the degree of A. M. He next took a literary course at the university of Virginia, after which he spent a year in attendance on the law department of the university of Georgia. In 1871 he located in Rome and commenced the practice of law, and continued it with great success until 1887, when he retired from active practice to accept the management of the Rome Fire Insurance company, and later of the Commercial Union Assurance company, of England, for the southern states. During his professional career he was a solicitor for the city court, also attorney for the city of Rome, and alternate democratic elector on the Tilden and Hendricks ticket. His professional record brought to him substantial results and emoluments, he having been successfully engaged in many very important cases, not only in Georgia, but in the chancery courts of Alabama, having contested successfully with such leading and able attorneys as Senator John T. Morgan, and Chancellor Foster of Alabama, in the noted Round mountain and Cornwall iron works cases. Probably his most satisfactory work was done in the leading case of Mitchell vs. the city of Rome, in which case he elicited the unusual compliment from the court of having his brief adopted in part as the decision of the court, with especial credit and recognition therefor. Mr. Yancey for a number of years has been an active member of the Methodist church, of whose Sunday school he was superintendent for twelve or fourteen years, and has served his town, East Rome, as an alderman ten or more years without salary.

FORSYTH COUNTY.

HIRAM P. BELL, lawyer, Cumming, Forsyth Co., Ga., son of Joseph S. and Rachel (Phinazee) Bell, was born in Jackson county, Ga., Jan. 19, 1827. His paternal grandfather, of English descent, was a native North Carolinian, and a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. About the beginning of this century he migrated to Georgia, and settled in what is now Jackson county.

Mr. Bell's father was born in North Carolina, when a boy came with his parents to Georgia, and grew to manhood in Jackson county. Subsequently he moved to Forsyth county, where he became prominent as a farmer and citizen. His mother was of a well-known old Georgia family, of Scotch extraction. Mr. Bell received a good primary education at the near-by common schools of the county and then attended the academy at Cumming. After leaving the academy he taught school and commenced reading law; and Nov. 28, 1849, was admitted to the bar. He advanced very rapidly in his profession, and was soon at the head of the local bar. In 1862 he formed and organized a company, of which he was made captain, and which became Company I of the Forty-third Georgia regiment. When the regiment was organized he was commissioned as its lieutenant-colonel. He was with his command as such and participated in the battle of Chickasaw Bayou, Miss. He was so seriously wounded in this battle as to be disabled from further service and came home. Recognizing his services and his superior ability his fellow-citizens elected him to the second Confederate congress, whose arduous and onerous duties Col. Bell discharged with characteristic devotion and fidelity. He was the first senator elected for the thirty-ninth senatorial district of Georgia, and represented the ninth congressional district in the forty-third and forty-fifth congresses of the United States; was a member of the electoral college in 1868 that cast the vote of the state for Seymour and Blair, and was a delegate to the St. Louis convention that nominated Tilden and Hendricks in 1876. Since the war he has given his attention almost exclusively to the practice of his profession, enjoys a large practice and influential clientage. He is reputed to have been engaged in more murder cases than any member of the bar in the circuit. Col. Bell is very public-spirited, and takes great interest in every enterprise or movement promising to develop and add to the material prosperity of his county and section. He is exceptionally active and exercises an almost potential influence in education and religious advancement and in the temperance movement. In all these matters his light is not hid under a bushel. Col. Bell was happily married Jan. 22, 1850, to Miss Virginia, a sister of the late George N. Lester, who died while holding the office of attorney-general of Georgia. This union was blessed with four children: Mary R., widow of Rev. George E. Gardner, deceased, preacher of the Methodist church south; Julia L., wife of Hon. Farris Carter Tate, member of congress, ninth congressional district of Georgia; George L., principal clerk, United States district attorney, northern district of Georgia; and Virginia. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died April 30, 1888. Col. Bell contracted a second marriage, June 11, 1890, with Miss Anna A. Juhan. Col. Bell is a pronounced and very influential democrat, a worker and leader; he is also a master Mason and a very prominent and active member of the Methodist church.

JOHN HOCKENHULL, physician and surgeon, Cumming, Forsyth Co., Ga., was born in Stockport, Eng., Jan. 22, 1832. He was the son of John and Mary (Kemp) Hockenhull, both of whom were natives of England. His father emigrated to the United States and settled at White Plains, now Dalton, Whitfield Co., Ga., where he remained some time. Subsequently he moved to Lumpkin county, Ga., where he engaged in mining, and was remarkably successful. He died in 1880. The subject of this sketch was nine years old when his parents came to this country, and the ship was ten weeks and two days making the passage; they ran short of provisions, and suffered almost intolerable hardships and privations. His parents reared a family of nine children: John, the subject of this sketch; Charles H.; James F.; Emma, wife of Robert McClure; Ellen, wife of Sidney Hays; Anna, wife of William J. Barrett; Sarah J., wife of William Looper; Elizabeth, wife of George Roker; Louise, wife of John Edwards. Dr. Hockenhull spent the years of his boyhood in Lumpkin county, where he received such primary education as the period and the locality could afford. He then began the study of medicine in Cleveland, Tenn., under G. P. Thompson. After thus preparing himself, he attended lectures during the winter of 1852-53 at the university of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia. He next attended lectures at the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, from which he was graduated in 1855, and entered at once upon the practice of his profession with uninterrupted success. In 1871 he located in Cumming, where he has steadily added to his reputation and built up a large and very profitable practice. No physician in Forsyth or adjoining counties stands higher with the profession or the people, and his friends far outnumber his acquaintances. During the war he served as assistant surgeon of the Fifty-second Georgia regiment in the Kentucky campaign under Gen. Bragg. Dr. Hockenull was married July 5, 1859, to Miss Mary A., born Nov. 2, 1841, daughter of Allman and Margaret A. Hutchins, a union which has been blessed with eight children: Mary J., born June 23, 1860; John H., born Feb. 8th, 1863, successful physician; Sarah A., born Jan. 19, 1866; James T., born June 18, 1868; Victoria E., born Sept. 18, 1870; Walter L., born April 9, 1875; Willie F., born Dec. 10, 1877, and Allman G., born April 29, 1880. The doctor is a stanch democrat and an ardent master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

RUFUS E. GUTHRIE, farmer, Cumming, Forsyth Co., Ga., son of Nehemiah and Nancy (Turner) Guthrie, was born in Walton county, Ga., Sept. 14, 1841. His paternal grandfather, Beverly Guthrie, was a native of Virginia, and when quite young came to Georgia with his parents, and was one among the early settlers of that part of the state. Mr. Guthrie's father moved to Walton county in 1830, where he bought a farm and engaged in farming. He acquired considerable property, and attained to some prominence. His father died Dec. 22, 1859, and his mother died June 10, 1890. They were the parents of eight children, of whom four are living: Sarah E., wife of Richard S. Easley; Robert C.; Catharine, wife of Richard Stansell, and Rufus E., the subject of this sketch. Those deceased are: James B., Thomas W., killed in the battle July 22, 1863; Martha A. and Francis D. Mr. Guthrie was raised on his father's farm and received but little education. He has profitably continued farming as his principal pursuit, but has dealt quite largely in live stock. In 1862 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. Nunnally, Eleventh Georgia regiment, with which he participated in the battles of Yorktown, Malvern Hill and second Manassas. In this battle, Aug. 30, 1862, he received six shots in the body and was left on the field for dead. After remaining there several hours he was discovered and taken to a hospital, where one of his legs was amputated. After remaining in the hospital four weeks he returned home, and as soon as he was able resumed his farming operations and general trading in live stock. By his industry, shrewdness and good judgment he has made money and secured for himself a comfortable competency. Mr. Guthrie was a popular county official for a long time, having been elected tax receiver in 1876, and re-elected for five consecutive terms, never having been defeated for the office. He was one of the best, if not the best, tax receivers the county ever had, and could be elected to that office again if he desired it. Mr. Guthrie was married Dec. 6, 1860, to Miss Lucy, daughter of Frederick and Emily (Cook) Vaughn. Mr. Vaughn was of an old Georgia family and a prosperous farmer. Twelve children blessed their union: Mary V.; Nancy, wife of James E. Vaughn; John W.; Sarah C., wife of John H. Adams; Frederick N., deceased; Beverly A.; Glenn, Millie, Velvie, Rufus S.; Una, deceased, and Augustus, deceased. Politically Mr. Guthrie is a populist and he is a member of the I. O. O. F. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

ANSEL STRICKLAND, physician and surgeon, Cumming, Forsyth Co., Ga., son of Henry and Elizabeth (Smith) Strickland, was born in Cherokee county, Ga., May 19, 1858. His paternal grandfather, Hardy Strickland, was a native of Virginia, whence he emigrated to Georgia and settled in Jackson county. Dr. Strickland's father was one of the most successful miners in north Georgia and died in 1863. His mother was a native of Massachusetts. She died in 1859. His parents raised five children. Dr. Strickland was left an orphan when only five years old, and was reared in Cherokee county, Ga., where he received his primary education. After further pursuing his studies he read medicine and then attended lectures at Atlanta medical college from which he graduated in 1880. He engaged in the practice for a while, and then attended lectures in New York medical college, from which he graduated in 1885. He immediately located in Cumming, where he has remained ever since and has established an enviable reputation for skill, based on unusual success. Besides attending strictly to his increasing practice he operates a tannery at Cumming, and is a stockholder in the shoe manufacturing company at Gainesville. He is very popular, and the promise of his future is of the most encouraging character. Dr. Strickland was married in 1879 to Miss Julia, daughter of Dr. John Hockenhull, by whom he had four children, only one of whom—Charlotte—born in 1888, is living. The mother died in 1889, and for his second wife Dr. Strickland married Miss Manie L. Rogers, daughter of Capt. R. N. Rogers, of Milton county, Ga., in 1891, who has borne him one child—Roy—born Jan. 27, 1894. He is a strong democrat, and a royal arch Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Methodist church.

FRANKLIN COUNTY.

WILLIAM F. BOWERS. There are many families in Franklin county, Ga., who may justly claim to be sprung from the "oldest settlers," and many persons have been born there who have become distinguished. But few, if any, families can prove earlier settlement or a clearer, more reputable record—though not as conspicuous or distinguished as some—than that of the family of which Hon. William F. (familiarily known as "Uncle Billy") Bowers is now the living head. Simple as a child in friendly intercourse, altogether devoid of ostentation, and conscious of entire rectitude, he is always self-poised. For stern and steady, and inflexible adherence to what he deems correct principles, and conscientious conviction, he is almost without a peer. Mr. Bowers was the son of Job and Elizabeth (Ballinger) Bowers, and was born in what is now Hart county, in 1825. His paternal great-grandfather, Job Bowers, was of Welsh extraction, was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war; and who, while at home "on furlough," was killed by the tories. He was actually one of the earliest settlers on or near the Savannah river in that part of Georgia. His grandparents were William and Mary Bowers, and his grandfather was born in what is now Elbert county, and lived there a farmer until he died. Mr. Bowers' father was born in Elbert (now Hart) county, taught school and farmed, and later became a merchant. For many years he was surveyor of the county, and also served his fellow-citizens as justice of the peace for more than a score of years. "Uncle Billy's" mother was a daughter of William Ballinger, a farmer, and another of the oldest settlers of the territory now known as Elbert county, and was a prosperous farmer. "Uncle Billy" was brought up on the farm, and as he expresses it, "in the store room," his only education being obtained at the dirt floor, puncheon-seated log school house, with not a nail in it, and stick-and-mud chimney. He began life as a farmer, and afterward engaged very much to his pecuniary advantage, in merchandising. None of his family would ever own a slave; and from earliest life he was an uncompromising Union man. He claims to be, and probably is, the only man then a resident of Georgia now living, who voted for Abraham Lincoln in 1860. He did not swerve from his Union principles during the war; was a member of the constitutional convention of 1868, and served on the committee on the bill of rights and other committees. Subsequently he represented his senatorial district in the general assembly. In 1884 he established the "American Union" newspaper, still published, which reflects his political opinions, and sometimes his religious convictions. In 1890 he was a district supervisor for taking the United States census. He is remarkably intelligent, his intellect bright and clear, very robust physically, and possessing the progressive spirit and vigor of a man of half his age. He enjoys the unquestioning confidence of the people of the large extent of territory in which he is known. Mr. Bowers was married in 1851 to Miss Christiana—born in Franklin county in 1825—daughter of Ellis and Dorcas (Attaway) Cheek. Mr. Cheek was a native of South Carolina, a farmer, and came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county about 1820. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Bowers six survive: Bunyan, Naomi, Pink, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Lois. He is particularly proud of his family, all of whom are strictly pious and none ever having taken a drink of intoxicating liquor. Himself and wife are devoted and working members of the Church of Christ. He is an ordained minister and goes about doing good and carrying the glad tidings of great joy, having worked in the ministry more than fifty years, and is one of the most entertaining talkers of that part of Georgia.

WILLIAM M. BOWERS, merchant-farmer, Royston, Franklin Co., Ga., son of T. W. and Alpha A. (Glover) Bowers, was born in what is now Hart county in 1850. (For some particulars in lives of his great-great-grandfathers, Job and William Bowers, see sketch of William F. Bowers in these memoirs.) His grandparents, William and Polly (Holbrook) Bowers, were descendants of the early settlers of the same name in Elbert (now Hart) county. He was a large planter and land-holder, and very influential. His wife, "Aunt Polly," was the only "female doctor" in all that region, and on supreme occasions was the sole reliance of families for miles around. Mr. Bowers' father was born in what is now Hart county, was a successful and influential farmer, and was a major of the militia when it was an envied local distinction. His mother was a daughter of William and Elizabeth (Pullum) Glover. Her father was a native of Virginia and enlisted in the patriot army during the revolutionary war when only sixteen years of age. He came to Georgia when about twenty-five years old and settled in what was then Franklin county, where he became a large land-owner and died in 1836. Mr. Bowers was reared on the farm, and his educational advantages were very meager. When twenty years old he began life for himself by working on a farm. In 1877 he bought his first piece of land, and since then has added to it until now he has 500 acres of as good land as the county contains. In addition he owns and operates a ginnery, a grist mill, a smithery, and has an interest in the general merchandise store of Nelms, Bowers & Co., Royston, Ga. He conducts his farm on progressive lines, and is not only a believer in diversified crops, but takes great interest in improved stock-raising. He is a man of fine practical business capabilities, and very enterprising, and is one of Franklin county's most solid and substantial, as well as most highly-esteemed citizens. For a time he served the people of Royston as mayor. Mr. Bowers was married in 1874 to Miss Mary J.—born in Madison county, Ga., in 1856—daughter of Robert and Sarah C. (Bowers) Berreman. Mr. Berreman was a native of Virginia, came to Georgia when a young man; was a farmer and trader and owned a large amount of land. When the war between the states began he enlisted and went to the front, and died when in the service. Eight of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Bowers are living: Robert S., Jennie E., Shadrack S., Harley B., Gifford E., Maura J., Joe, and Tabor B. Himself and wife are prominent and working members of the Baptist church, of which he has been a deacon for many years.

JAMES L. BROWN, farmer, Cadiz, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Isham and Elizabeth (Burrus) Brown, was born in Anderson, S. C., in 1816. His paternal grandparents were James and Susan (Kane) Brown, who moved first to North Carolina and thence to South Carolina, where he died in 1837. He was a large farmer and a preacher of some note. His grandparents were George and Rachel (Felton) Brown. They were natives of North Carolina, where he followed farming. Mr. Brown's father was born in Pendleton district, S. C., where he grew to manhood, and later moved to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. Mr. Brown was reared on the farm and received only the limited education obtainable in that locality at the time of his boyhood. He started in life as an overseer, then for some years rented land, and finally, in 1839, he bought a farm, on which he has since lived a happy, contented life, and raised a family. He has an excellent farm in fine condition, with a comfortable dwelling and substantial outbuildings. He has served as bailiff and as a justice of the peace. Mr. Brown was married in 1839 to Miss Jane M.—born in South Carolina in 1822—daughter of William and Annie (Love) Bailey. He was a native of South Carolina and a farmer. Eleven children blessed this union: Martha C., Eliza, William F., Asa M., Elizabeth N., John T., Anavastine, Isham, Newton, Susan L. and Lawrence S., of whom seven survive. The mother of these, a devoted member of the Baptist church, died in 1882. Subsequently he married Miss Eleanor—born in Elbert county in 1837—daughter of Thomas Black, who was born in Union, S. C., and followed farming and carpentering. Mr. Brown and his wife are consistent members of the Baptist church.

CARTLIDGE. Unostentatious, useful members of society and communities seldom receive the meed of praise or the consideration their merits and quietly-rendered services justly entitle them to. Disdaining to seek, they often shrink from notoriety, avoiding the appearance of seeking it. Of this class is the Rev. G. H. Cartlidge, a Presbyterian clergyman of Franklin county, Ga. He was the son of Samuel and Agnes W. (Groves) Cartlidge, and was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1820. His paternal grandfather was a native of Wales, whence he emigrated to America and settled in Virginia before the revolutionary war, but subsequently moved to North Carolina. His grandparents, Joseph and Dillie Linders (nee Page) Cartlidge, were natives of North Carolina, and migrated to Georgia and settled in what is now Columbia county in 1788. He was a farmer and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Cartlidge's father was born in Columbia county, was raised a farmer, and adopted farming as his life pursuit. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, and was an earnest member of and worker in the Baptist church. His mother was a daughter of Stephen and Isabella (Weekly) Groves. He was a native of England, emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, and settled in Pennsylvania, where he married an Irish lady. He was a farmer and tanner, and before the revolutionary war owned large tracts of land around Vicksburgh, Union Co., Pa. He served in the revolutionary army during the war, after which he migrated to Georgia and located in what is now Madison county, where he died in 1839, in the one hundredth year of his age. Mr. Cartlidge received his primary and preparatory education at the near-by schools and then entered Oglethorpe university, Midway, Baldwin Co., Ga., in 1841, from which he graduated in 1845. Having taken a course of study at a theological school, he was called to the pastorate of the church at Woodstock, Oglethorpe Co., Ga. A short time afterward he moved to Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., where he was pastor of the church, and taught school in the academy two years. From there he went to Madison county, where he remained four years, whence, in 1852, he was called to the pastorate of Hebron church, Franklin county, where his home has been ever since. For six months during the war he was captain of Company A, Toombs' brigade. In addition to his pastoral work he looks after his farm, and while working earnestly and zealously in the vineyard of the Master, is calmly and expectantly awaiting the summons to lay aside the "armor," lay down the "cross," and ascend to receive his "crown"—his only regret being to leave a flock which so loves and reveres him. Mr. Cartlidge was married in 1847 to Miss Annie M.—born in Portland, Me., in 1824—daughter of Joseph and Sarah (Whitemarsh) Lane. Mr. Lane was a native of New Hampshire, and was a contractor and builder. He invented the original nail cutting machine, on which those now in use are improvements. He came to Georgia and settled near Milledgeville, where he died in 1842. Of the children which were the fruit of this union nine are living: George R. G., farmer; Charles W., farmer; Joseph M., mechanic; John H., farmer; Annie Dora, wife of James M. King; Sarah A., wife of Isaac M. Johnson; Luther H., physician, graduate of the Southern Medical college, Atlanta; Thomas D., Presbyterian clergyman; Samuel J., Presbyterian clergyman.

ELIJAH CRUMP, farmer, Henry, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Richard L. and Elizabeth (Kesler) Crump, was born in Franklin county in 1837. (For particulars respecting families of parents on both sides see sketch of Russell J. Crump in these Memoirs.) Mr. Crump was reared on the farm and received only a limited education at the near-by country schools. In 1862 he enlisted in Company I (Capt. Chitwood), Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment, and gallantly participated in many of the most important battles of the war, continuing in the service until the surrender. He bore a part in the battle of Baker's Creek and the siege of Vicksburg, where he was captured, paroled and sent home. Rejoining the army he was with the forces in front of Gen. Sherman, south of Dalton, and in the defense of Atlanta. Although young, he discharged his duties as a soldier with conspicuous faithfulness and gallantry. On his return from the battlefield he rented land and engaged in farming—making and saving money. He made his first purchase of land in 1868, to which he has since added until now he has an excellent tract of 350 acres, on which he is successfully farming. Progressive, yet cautious, and a judicious manager, he stands among the foremost of Franklin county's farmers, and is one of her most substantial citizens. Mr. Crump was married in 1859 to Miss Harriett—born in what is now Banks county in 1839—daughter of William and Judy (Nason) Crow. Her parents were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. He was a well-to-do farmer and was a soldier in the Seminole war. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Crump four are living: Martha J., wife of Matt Willy; Mary C., wife of William Kesler; Ida L., wife of James Looney, and Richard L. Mr. Crump is a member of the masonic fraternity and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

A. R. JONES, physician and surgeon, Lavonia, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Charles A. and Sarah N. (Aderhold) Jones, was born in Gordon county, Ga., in 1859. His paternal grandfather was a native of Floyd county. His father was born in what is now Gordon county, and was a well-to-do farmer. In 1862 he enlisted in the Confederate service, and was taken sick at Calhoun, where he died. Dr. Jones' mother was the daughter of Isaac Aderhold. Dr. Jones was reared on the farm and received a very limited education. He began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Drs. Osborn and Tucker, and afterward attended lectures at the Southern Medical college, Atlanta, from which he graduated in 1882. He earned the money with which to defray the expenses of his professional education. He at once located near Lavonia, and after practicing there with excellent success five years moved to Lavonia, where he has practiced for the last eight years, had all the patronage he could reasonably serve, and has enjoyed professional and financial prosperity. He owns and operates a quite large farm and conducts a general merchandise store and canning establishment. He is not only skilled as a physician, but is generally enterprising and possesses fine business qualifications. Dr. Jones was married in 1884 to Miss Mary M., born in Gwinnett county, Ga., in 1866, daughter of Jesse and Mary M. (Caldwell) McGee. He was a native of South Carolina, was a farmer, moved to Georgia and settled in Gwinnett county, where he died. He was a Confederate soldier during the war. Two of the children born to them—William O. and Charles D.—are still living. The mother of these, a devout member of the Presbyterian church, died in 1891. The following year he married Miss Gertrude, born in Hart county in 1874, daughter of Pruett and Eliza (Holbrook) Gulley. He was born in what is now Hart county, and served in the Confederate army during the late civil war. He has been a merchant, but is now a farmer in his native county. Dr. Jones is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the Presbyterian church.

LITTLE. Of the many excellent families who may justly be classed as "first settlers" of Northeast Georgia, few, if any, can claim precedence as to time of coming or probity of character over that of the Littles. A worthy representative of the family is W. R. Little, lawyer, Carnesville, Franklin Co. Ga., son of Crawford and Lucinda (Neal) Little, who was born in Franklin county in 1850. His great grand-father on his father's side was a native of Virginia who came to Georgia in the latter part of the last century and was among the first settlers of Elbert county. His paternal grandfather, James H. Little, was born in Elbert county, was a farmer all his life, and was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. Early in life he moved to Franklin county where he ended his days. Mr. Little's father was born in Franklin county, and made farming his life-occupation. He was a volunteer soldier during the late civil war, and after serving for some time was discharged. He served the county faithfully and efficiently as tax receiver, and also as sheriff, and after a useful life died in 1889. A brother of his, Robert G., was a very prominent man, and was a member of the state senate a number of years. His grandparents on his mother's side were natives of North Carolina, who came to Georgia and settled first in Elbert county and moved thence to Franklin county, where they died. Mr. Little was raised on the farm and received his primary education at the near-by country schools, and afterward attended the high school at Jefferson, Jackson Co. He then in 1870, read law under the preceptorship of Col. John B. Estes, Gainesville, Ga., one of the most eminent lawyers in that part of the state; and in October of that year was admitted to the bar. He at once located in Carnesville, where he has lived ever since, and stands at the head of the local bar, with an increasing reputation and practice in the circuit. In 1880 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, where as a member of the committees on corporations and enrollment, and the special judiciary committee he performed valuable service. In 1884 he was again elected and served on the committees on general judiciary, railways, etc. In 1888, and again in 1894, he was elected to represent the senatorial district in the general assembly, and was appointed on the committees on general judiciary, privileges and elections, and public roads, of one or more of which he was chairman. Mr. Little has devoted himself almost exclusively to his profession, and has achieved the fine success and secured the influential clientage such devotion deserves. He has few equals in success at the local and circuit bar. Mr. Little married Miss Dudley, born in Clarke (now Oconee) county, Ga, in 1854, daughter of Clemillis and Susan O. (Swinney) Few. Mr. Few was born in Jackson county, moved to Oconee county, and is now living in Madison county, Ga. He served some considerable time during the late civil war. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Little nine are living: Omar, Lamus, Leland, Julian, Ovie, Crawford, India, Iline and Neal. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and himself and wife are prominent and valued members of the Presbyterian church. He has five brothers: Thomas A., who lives in Jackson county, Ga.; James M., Crawford E., Payton B. and Neal, all of whom are successful farmers living in Franklin county, and one sister, Anna, who also lives in Franklin county.

DANIEL M'KENZIE, county ordinary, Carnesville, Franklin Co., Ga., son of William and Lucretia (Gardner) McKenzie, was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1842. His father was a native of Scotland, came to America in 1819, and settled in Canada. After teaching school there a number of years he emigrated to the United States and settled in New Jersey. There he engaged as a machinist, and in the course of business was sent to Georgia to put up the shafting and set up the machinery in the old Georgia factory, four miles below Athens, Clarke Co., one of the first factories built in the state. He followed his trade as a machinist until 1881, when he died. His mother was born in Clarke county, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, whose family was among the earliest settlers in the county. Mr. McKenzie was reared in Athens, where he received a very good education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. H. C. Billups, Third Georgia regiment, and went to the front. With his command he was in the second battle of Manassas, in which his arm was so badly shattered by a shot that it had to be amputated. As soon as he was able to do so he reported for duty and was detailed for service in the quartermaster's department in which he faithfully discharged his duty until the surrender. Returning to Athens he was elected clerk of the city council for some years, and then went to Banks county, where he taught school. Subsequently he moved to Franklin county, where he taught eighteen years. In 1889 he was elected ordinary of Franklin county, has since been re-elected, and is discharging the duties of the office with the same efficiency and conscientious fidelity that has characterized him all his life. He is public spirited and progressive, alive to the interests and development of the county, and is held in very high esteem. Mr. McKenzie was married in 1871 to Miss Martha E., born in Franklin county in 1846, daughter of John and Susan (Tabor) Pulliam. Mr. Pulliam was born in Franklin county and was a farmer. Eight children have blessed this union: John S., Mary E., Susan A., Martha D., Robert E., Ida A., Lucy Ellen and Nora Lee. Mr. McKenzie is a member of the I. O. O. F., and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

COLUMBUS L. MIZE, farmer, Henry, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Henry J. and Mary E. (Mize) Mize, was born in Franklin (now Banks) county in 1850. His paternal grandparents, Thomas and Lovinia (Cape) Mize, were natives of Franklin county, whose families were among the early settlers. He was a large land holder, and a farmer and merchant, prominent and influential. Mr. Mize's father was also born in Franklin county, in 1829, was raised on the farm, and when grown engaged in farming and merchandising. In 1861 the father enlisted and went to the front, doing good service until wounded at Jonesboro in July, 1864. He died the following month and was buried at Jonesboro. His remains were afterward moved to the Soldiers' cemetery through the care and direction of Miss Sallie Candler, sister of Hon. Allen D. Candler, of Atlanta. Henry J. Mize owned and operated the first cotton gin put up in the county. The maternal grandparents of C. L. Mize, Warren and Elizabeth (Clarkston) Mize, were also natives of Franklin county, and he was a farmer, and volunteer soldier in the Indian war. Mr. Mize was reared on the farm and schooled himself. He started in life with nothing, but has worked hard and saved up until he has bought and now owns 400 acres of good land, and is a good and prosperous farmer. He was tax collector of the county many years, and is now postmaster at Henry. He stands well in the community, and has the friendship and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Mize was married in 1873 to Miss Mary S., born in South Carolina in 1851, daughter of Himer and Millie (Pickrell) Aderhold, native South Carolinians, who early in life came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. His wife's grandfather, John Pickrell, came to South Carolina from Nantucket, Mass. Of the children which blessed this union six survive: Eugene J., Arrilla, Henry S., Thomas L., Ida B. and Oscar C. Mr. and Mrs. Mize are active members of the Baptist church.

N. H. NELMS, farmer, Carnesville, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Jesse and Alice (Duncan) Nelms, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1834. His paternal grandparents, David and Unity (Holbrook) Nelms, were natives of North Carolina, who emigrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county in the beginning of this century. He was of Irish descent, and a prominent farmer. Mr. Nelms' father was born in Elbert county, followed farming as his chief pursuit, but taught school in connection with it, and also served the people as a justice of the peace many years. In 1845 he died in the county of his birth. Mr. Nelms' mother's parents were Moses and Betsy Duncan. He was born in Elbert (now Hart) county, was a good farmer, and died in Elbert county. Mr. Nelms was reared on the farm and received only a limited education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. P. E. Davant, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment, and participated in the following among other battles: Yorktown, seven days' fight around Richmond, South Mountain and Sharpsburg. He was wounded in this battle while serving as sergeant and sent to the hospital, where he remained about ten weeks, when he was granted a furlough and came home, being too feeble for field duty. Subsequently he served on the home guard or state militia. After the war he resumed farming, has worked early and late and managed judiciously, so that now he has a good, well-equipped 400-acre farm, and is prepared to spend the closing years of his life in peace and plenty. Besides farming he operates a ginnyery. Mr. Nelms was married in 1868 to Miss Sarah, born in Madison county, Ga., in 1847, daughter of James and Louisa (Moore) Powers. He was born in Madison county, was a well-to-do farmer, preached in the neighboring "meeting houses," and finally died in Madison county. Six of the children, who were the fruit of this marriage, are living: Margaret, Louisa, Julia Ann, John H., Ida and Gordon. He is a Master Mason, and himself and wife are consistent members of the Baptist church.

IRA W. RANDALL, merchant and capitalist, Martin, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Onie and Susan (Wilkerson) Randall, was born in Franklin county, in 1839. His paternal grandfather was a native of England, ran away from home, and came to the United States, and settled in Virginia. His name was John Bull, but he applied to the courts and had it changed to John Randall. Subsequently he migrated to South Carolina, whence, after a few years he moved to Georgia and settled in Franklin county, where he lived until he died. Mr. Randall's father was born in South Carolina, and came to Georgia early in life. He was quite a large and prosperous farmer, and a member of and an earnest worker in the Baptist church. He died in 1854. His mother's parents were natives of North Carolina, who early in life came to Georgia. Mr. Randall grew to manhood on the farm, receiving but little education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company H (Capt. Mosely), Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment. He was in some of the hottest engagements early in the conflict, and in the seven days' fight around Richmond had his arm shot off. He was sent to the hospital, where he remained about a month and then came home. He had nothing when the war closed, but in a few years by farming and trading he saved $300 with which, with Richard Yow, he embarked in a general merchandise business. A few years later he went into partnership in the same business with O. G. Childs, and was soon afterward burned out, by which he lost heavily. By farming and trading he has accumulated quite a large amount of property, including much fine farming land, and is also a money-lender. In addition to what he owns in Franklin county, he owns a good block of stock in one of the strongest of the Atlanta banks. He was elected tax collector of the county and served one term. He keeps well posted on political and financial matters, and has excellent business capacity, which he has put to remarkably good use. He is progressive and enterprising, and exercises a strong influence. Mr. Randall was married in 1866 to Miss Jane—born in Franklin county in 1846—daughter of Jerry and Clara (Isbell) Cleveland. Mr. Cleveland was born in South Carolina, came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county early in life, and followed farming and milling. He served the county one term as sheriff—was very much respected—and died at the age of eighty-three years. Of the children born to them five survive: Louana, Lizzie, Fannie, W. R., and O. R. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died in the early months of 1878. Late in the same year he married Miss Sarah Cleveland—born in Franklin county in 1842. He is a member of the Royal Arcanum and Knights of Honor, and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

L. N. TRIBBLE, farmer, Carnesville, Franklin Co., Ga., son of John and Essie (Clinkscales) Tribble, was born in South Carolina in 1832. His paternal grandparents were L. W. and Elizabeth (Crowder) Tribble. He was born in Virginia of English extraction, was a large land and slave owner and a wealthy planter. He was an ardent working member of the Baptist church. Mr. Tribble's father was born in Abbeville district, S. C., was a planter and quite rich, and died in 1839. His mother was a daughter of John and Polly (Pales) Clinkscales. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, a native of South Carolina, and a large land and slave owner. Nearly all of the above parties and their numerous descendants were and are firm adherents of the Baptist church. Mr. Tribble was reared on the plantation and received but a limited education. In 1862 he enlisted in Company G, Capt. Jones, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment. He participated in many hard-fought battles, among them Baker's creek, Vicksburg, where he was captured and held two months. As soon as he was exchanged he returned to his command, with which he remained until the surrender. He was under Gen. Bragg in the battles at Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge; under Gen. Johnston in those noted and hard-fought battles from Dalton to Atlanta; and was with Gen. Hood in his Tennessee campaign. On his return home he found his farm and buildings in very bad condition, but he commenced the work of restoration with energy and now has a large 900-acre farm of as good land as is in northeast Georgia, with substantial improvements. He was elected ordinary in 1877 and held the office three terms, doing excellent service for the county at a time when sound discretion and good judgment combined with forethought and energy were needed. That he proved equal to the emergency is sufficiently attested by his repeated re-elections. He is tolerably rich, owning, besides his large plantation, a number of houses in Carnesville, and exercises a wide and strong influence. Mr. Tribble was married in 1852 to Miss Jane—born in South Carolina in 1831—daughter of Richardson and Elizabeth (Ellis) Tribble. He was a South Carolina farmer and spent his life in the state. To Mr. and Mrs. Tribble the following children have been born: William O., Essie E., James A., Elmina J., Jasper N., George W., Samuel J., Alice A., and Ella R. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died early in 1877, and late in that year Mr. Tribble contracted a second marriage with Miss Jane, daughter of Abraham and Christina (Owens) Riley. He was a native South Carolinian, who moved to Georgia in 1872. Mr. Tribble and his wife are prominent and influential members of the Baptist church.

RICHARD D. YOW, merchant-farmer and capitalist, Avalon, Franklin Co., Ga., son of Thomas A. and Melissa (Dean) Yow, was born in South Carolina in 1844. His paternal great-grandfather was a native of Germany and emigrated to this country in 1750. His grandparents, Dempsey and Jennie (Davis) Yow, were natives of North and South Carolina respectively. He was a farmer in Pickens county, in which he died. Mr. Yow's father was born in South Carolina and moved to Georgia and settled in Franklin county in 1851. He engaged in farming, and also conducted a general merchandise store, in both of which he was financially successful. He was elected surveyor of the county and served one or two terms. When the late war began he enlisted and went to the front, where he was taken sick and sent to the hospital at Richmond, where he died. Mr. R. D. Yow's maternal grandparents were Richard and Cynthia (Jenkins) Dean. He was a native of Anderson district, S. C., and was a rich planter and large land-owner. Mr. Yow was reared on the farm and received a limited education at the time-honored log school house where so many other of Georgia's prominent and distinguished citizens "graduated." In 1863 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. Patrick (later Capt. Mosely), First Georgia regiment, state line. He was a participant in most of the engagements from New Hope church to Atlanta, where during the siege he was captured and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he was detained until April, 1865. On his return home he went to work on the farm, and farmed three years. He then embarked in the general merchandise business at Goodwill, Franklin Co., whence he went to Carnesville, where he did business two years. From there he went back to Goodwill, then to Toccoa, Habersham Co., whence, after doing business two years, he moved to Avalon and established a large general merchandise business and became postmaster. Here he carried a very large and heavy stock of general merchandise, and does a very large and profitable trade with the surrounding country. He has been exceptionally successful; owns in addition to his merchandise between six and seven thousand acres of good farming land, three grist mills, and a large interest in the Toccoa bank, and is the wealthiest man in Franklin county. Mr. Yow has served his fellow citizens as justice of the peace many years, as county school commissioner, and as a member of the boards of education and jury commissioners. In 1872 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and was appointed on the committees on finance and corporations. In 1882 he was elected to represent the senatorial district in the general assembly, and was appointed on the committees on finance and banking. He has discharged all the duties of the various public positions he has held faithfully and to the best interest of the people, whose confidence he fully enjoys. He is a man of large business capacity and qualifications and unusual financial ability. He is fully abreast of the time and progressive in everything. Mr. Yow was married in 1870 to Miss Mary—born in Franklin county in 1852—daughter of Dr. Henry D. and Amanda (Patrick) Aderhold. Dr. Aderhold was reared in Franklin county, in which he has practiced medicine successfully, professionally and financially, for fifty years. Of the children with which this union has been blessed four survive: S. B., Myrtle, Morris, and Jones D. Mr. Yow is a member of the masonic fraternity and Mrs. Yow is a working member of the Baptist church.

FULTON COUNTY.

HON. BENJAMIN F. ABBOTT, of Atlanta, who has long been recognized as one of the leading members of the bar of the state, is a native Georgian. He was born in Cherokee county on July 3, 1839. His early life was spent on the farm, and having received a good academic education he removed to Atlanta in 1860 and began the study of the law under the direction of the late Green B. Haygood, Esq. He was admitted to the bar in October, 1860. He immediately opened an office and practiced law until June, 1861, when he enlisted as a volunteer in Company F, Twentieth regiment, Georgia volunteers, army of northern Virginia. That company was commanded by Capt. E. M. Seage, and it was perhaps the only company in the Confederate service which marched on foot more than 125 miles to take the cars for the seat of war in Virginia. The company was not wholly made up in Atlanta and in order to recruit and fill the ranks they marched from Atlanta to Roswell, thence to Hickory Flat and Orange, in Cherokee county; Frog Town in Forsyth county, Jasper in Pickens, Ellijay in Gilmer county, Spring Place in Murray county and on to Dalton, Ga. The company had a wagon for the transportation of the baggage, etc. At the various points named a halt was made and recruits procured, and when the command reached its destination it was nearly one hundred strong. Mr. Abbott remained with his regiment until 1863, when ill health forced his retirement. In the meantime he saw much hard service.

He was with his regiment in the battles of Malvern Hill, Sharpsburg, Fredricksburg, Thoroughfare Gap and a number of smaller engagements. After leaving active service he was assigned duty in the quartermaster's department. At the close of the war Mr. Abbott was engaged for a short time in successful mercantile pursuits, and then resumed the practice of the law. In this, his chosen profession, his success was almost phenomenal. In a very few years his clientage embraced many of the leading business firms and corporations of the country, and his practice was quite as remunerative as that of many of the oldest and ablest practitioners, notwithstanding the Atlanta bar was then the equal of any in the state. On the retirement of the Hon. H. K. McCay from the supreme bench Mr. Abbott formed a partnership with him, which continued until dissolved by the appointment of Judge McCay to the Federal bench for the northern district of Georgia. At successive periods he practiced law in partnership with Mr. J. R. Gray and Mr. Alexander W. Smith, respectively. At present he is practicing with his son, Mr. Charles A. Abbott. Though strictly wedded to his profession and having but little desire to mingle with politics, he consented to make the race for the general assembly and was accordingly elected as one of the representatives of the county of Fulton in that body in the session of 1884-5. He was one of the leading members of the house, serving on many of its most important committees. As a member of the finance committee he gave special attention to the bill for raising funds to build the new capitol and was chairman of the committee on part of the house to arrange for and to conduct the ceremonies at the laying of the corner-stone. It is not invidious to say that Mr. Abbott did more than any one man in procuring the appropriation for the erection of the capitol. In 1874 Mr. Abbott was one of the committee of seventy to prepare a new charter for the city of Atlanta, and was one of the sub-committee of seven to draft and submit the bill to the general assembly for that purpose. On behalf of the sub-committee he prepared the bill which became a law and was the author of many of its best provisions. He was a member of the executive committee of the international cotton exposition held in Atlanta, Ga., in 1881, and was its legal adviser. As a lawyer he does a general practice and represents various corporations and monetary institutions, besides individuals. He has been for many years the attorney of the Atlanta National bank. In 1893 Mr. Abbott was urged by the leading members of the bar to accept the appointment as judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit, which he declined, and in 1893 he was similarly presented to the governor for appointment, which he likewise declined. He is a man of liberal culture, a forceful, eloquent and humorous speaker. He has been a frequent contributor to the public press on political and other subjects, all of which have been widely read and copied. He is a loyal and consistent member and deacon of the Baptist church. For many years he has been a delegate to the State Baptist convention and the Southern Baptist convention, and is a member of the Home Mission board of the latter body. Mr. Abbott has been twice married, first to Miss Isabella Kendrick, the accomplished daughter of the late Mr. S. S. Kendrick, of Atlanta, Ga., with whom he lived in perfect domestic happiness for more than a quarter of a century and until her death; and second to Mrs. Josephine A. Richards, of Atlanta, his present wife, and who presides with grace and elegance over his home.

GEORGE W. ADAIR, the foremost real estate dealer of Atlanta, is the son of John F. Adair and Mary Slavin, and was born in Morgan county, Ga., March 1, 1823. His father followed the trade of a wheelwright, and settled in De Kalb county, five miles south of Decatur. He resided here until the death of his mother in 1835, and was then sent to Decatur, Ga., to enter the employ of G. B. Butler. His bright, winning ways soon attracted the attention of those about him and in 1840 Col. J. M. Calhoun, William H. Dabney, Hon. Charles Murphy and Dr. Ephraim M. Poole, desiring to forward his interests, advanced the necessary amount for a two years' course in the Decatur academy. After completing this, young Adair studied law in the office of Judge John J. Floyd and Gen. J. N. Williamson, of Covington, Ga., and after two years' application was admitted to the bar. Being young and inexperienced he found progress slow, and having a debt of several hundred dollars to cancel, he withdrew from his profession and accepted a position tendered him by J. Edgar Thomson, chief engineer, as conductor on the Georgia railroad, running between Social Circle and Augusta, and was in charge of the first train that entered Atlanta. After leaving the employ of the railroad he moved to Covington, Ga., thence to Charleston, S. C., and located permanently in Atlanta in 1854. Under the firm name of Adair & Ezzard he conducted a mercantile store for two years, and then entered the general trading and real estate business, which he still continues. Col. Adair, originally a whig in political belief, vehemently opposed the idea of secession, and was defeated in the race for the secession convention. When, however, war was declared, he placed himself beside his southern comrades, ready to assert the claims of his people. He established in 1860 the "Southern Confederacy," being assisted by J. Henley Smith. This daily journal, issued until the battle of Chickamauga, was bold and decisive in its advocacy of the southern cause. In the last year of the war he volunteered as an aid on the staff of Gen. N. B. Forrest. This association developed a strong and lasting friendship that was broken only by the death of that gallant leader. When the war was over he returned to find his home destroyed and his accumulated fortune well-nigh vanished. In partnership with Messrs. Clayton, Adair & Purse he opened a general commission house, and at the same time resumed his interest in the real estate business. In 1865 he retired from the firm and has since confined himself to real estate and auctioneering. In the latter avocation he has conducted large sales with marked success in Atlanta, Birmingham, Sheffield and Chattanooga, and in all his transactions has never lost a dollar through irregularity of procedure or defective title. Col. Adair has ever manifested his loyalty and love for Atlanta and Georgia. He has been prominently connected with numerous important enterprises, especially the building of railroads. His zeal and energy gave a decided impetus to the rapid growth and prosperity of this city. He was an earnest promoter and vice-president of the Atlanta Street railway in 1870, being associated with Richard Peters. In the financial panic of 1873, followed by the resumption of specie payment, Col. Adair was compelled to make an assignment of all his property. With indomitable determination, possessing the respect, confidence and sympathy of the community, he again began at the foundation, and by honesty, tenacity and ability, has erected a large and handsome fortune over the wreck of his former accumulation. Col. Adair has been connected with the Atlanta Cotton factory, the Atlanta Cotton exposition, director of the Kimball House company, president of the Georgia Western railway, director of the Piedmont exposition and director of Mrs. Ballard's Female seminary. He is a member of the constitutional convention in 1865, of the city council, the board of water commissioners and the board of county commissioners of roads and revenues. He has never sought political honors, but naturally takes a devoted interest in both state and national affairs. Col. Adair as a writer is terse, convincing and logical; as a speaker eloquent and witty, with a gift for repartee seldom equaled; as a business man active, energetic and far-seeing, and a gentleman of kind and attractive disposition, and a character stainless and honorable. He married Mary Jane Perry, a daughter of Josiah Perry, and has a happy family of four sons and three daughters: Robin, Jack, Forrest and George, and Sallie, Annie and Mary, the oldest, the wife of G. A. Howell of Atlanta. Col Adair is of Irish and French origin. His ancestors came to America in 1711, landed in Charleston and then separated to different sections of the country.

A. D. ADAIR is one of Atlanta's most progressive and enterprising citizens. For a number of years he has been identified with the commercial interests of that city, and no man in Atlanta exercises a more potential influence for good. Mr. Adair was born in Talladega county, Ala., on July 17, 1835. Like many other successful men in Atlanta whose talents have commanded the respect of the business world, Mr. Adair was reared on a farm and spent the period of his boyhood in the furrows. It proved a splendid discipline, however, and gave him a robust constitution. By reason of the vigorous out-door work to which he was accustomed when a boy he has enjoyed life to the fullest extent, as only those can enjoy it whose health has never been impaired by indiscreet habits. Mr. Adair remained on the farm until he reached his twentieth year. He then taught school in the county for one year, after which he began to clerk in a dry goods store. He came to Atlanta in 1858, entering the dry goods emporium of Salmonds, Mathews & Co., the leading merchants of the city at that time. Though his salary was only $20 a month, he managed by strict economy to live within his means and to lay by a few dollars from his monthly earnings. He remained in the employ of this firm for three years, after which he formed a partnership with his cousin, Col. George W. Adair, and Mr. A. T. Anderson, of New York, the style of the firm being that of Anderson, Adair & Co., the subject of this sketch being the company. The war, however, prevented the prospects begotten of this enterprising partnership from being realized. Two years after going in business for himself Mr. Adair enlisted as a private in the Confederate army, and was assigned to Gen. Forrest's body guard. He served in this capacity until the surrender of Gen. Forrest at Gainesville, Ala. Mr. Adair was in the following engagements: Franklin, Tenn., Murfreesboro, Fort Pillow, Selma, Ala., and forty or fifty skirmishes. During his military experience Mr. Adair was in quite a number of perilous situations, and his life was more than once saved, as it seemed, by miraculous intervention. He was captured at Memphis, Tenn., and held for twenty-four hours. After the war he returned to Atlanta on horseback, and, though he found the city reduced to ashes, he lost no time in devoting himself to the rebuilding of his shattered fortunes. Engaging in the commission business with his two brothers, G. B. and Walter Adair, under the firm name of Adair & Bros., he soon established himself securely in the confidence of the mercantile world as well as in the patronage of Atlanta's returning population. The firm of Adair & Bros. continued to operate successfully until 1885, a period of twenty years, and was then changed to that of Adair Bros. & Co. Mr. G. B. Adair left the firm in 1891 and the business has since been carried on under the name of A. D. Adair & McCarty Bros. In 1885 Mr. Adair purchased an interest in the Furman Farm Improvement company of East Point, Ga., of which he has been for several years the president. The products of this enterprising factory are sold by the firm of which Mr. Adair is the leading member, and the satisfaction they have given is demonstrated by the yearly increasing business of the firm. Mr. Adair has also been in the fertilizer business since 1866. Mr. Adair has few superiors as a skillful financier and his talents in this direction have brought him before the public in various positions of trust and responsibility. He is the president of the Merchants' and Mechanics' bank of Atlanta, a director in the Merchants' bank, and also a director of the Cotton States and International exposition. Mr. Adair has never sought or held political office, preferring the simpler avocations of private life, to the glare and turmoil of the public service. He is always ready, however, to discharge his full duty as a citizen, and is well informed on all the topics of the day, financial and political. A close observer, nothing escapes his attention, and his views on all public questions are carefully formed before he ventures to express them. Mr. Adair is a man of deep religious convictions, and for a number of years has been one of the most influential members of the Baptist denomination in the state. As the treasurer of the home mission board of the southern Baptist convention for nine years he made one of the most efficient and devoted officers of that body. He is now the chairman of the committee on appropriations, and is the senior deacon of the Second Baptist church of Atlanta. He is also president of the Baptist state mission board. Mr. Adair was married in 1868 to Miss Octavia Hammond, the daughter of the late Judge Dennis F. Hammond of Atlanta. Four children have sprung from this union, as follows: Adeline, the wife of Mr. Julian Field, of Atlanta; Laura, Barbary, and A. D., Jr. The home life of Mr. Adair is picturesque and beautiful. No man is more devoted to his family or takes a deeper interest in the affairs of his household. The name of Mr. Adair's father was Capt. James Adair. He was a native of Georgia and was born in Morgan county. He was a son of Capt. John Adair, who was a soldier in the revolution. The Adair family in all of its generations has been noted for its sterling characteristics and for the strength and value of its contributions to the state and to the community.

DR. JAMES FRANKLIN ALEXANDER, was born in Greenville district, S. C., May 28, 1824, on a farm belonging to his father, Dr. Thomas W. Alexander. He came with his parents to the state of Georgia when a little child, the family settling in Lawrenceville, where he received the principal part of his education at a school taught by Rev. James Patterson. Dr. Alexander also attended Oglethorpe university two years and completed his education at Lawrenceville. In 1846 he began the study of medicine with Dr. James Gordon and was graduated at the Medical college of Georgia, Augusta, in 1849. He attended his first course of lectures in 1847 at Augusta, but his father dying that year he was compelled to devote the remainder of that twelve months to the administration of the estate, studying at home. He resumed his college course in 1848 and graduated the year following. In April, 1849, a man was attacked with small-pox, and Dr. Alexander, though he had just graduated, thought he saw an opportunity to establish himself at Atlanta. He immediately went there, thinking, as he says, "that it was no worse to run the risk of catching small-pox than to have no practice." Arriving in Atlanta he met Dr. E. C. Calhoun, of Decatur, Ga., a former classmate, who had come on the same errand and who had secured the refusal of the only room then to be had that would serve as an office. Dr. Calhoun, however, finally decided that the rent asked for the little office (it was only $6 per month) was too great, and Dr. Alexander at once secured it. The small-pox patient was lying ill at the old Thompson house, which stood where the Kimball house now stands and was conducted by Dr. Thompson, who soon after erected a little board structure outside of the city limits, to which the patients, two men and one woman, were removed. There Dr. Alexander took charge of them and under his efficient care and treatment they all recovered. This made Dr. Alexander's reputation at once and he immediately entered upon a large practice, which has increased until for years he has had more than he could attend to. For forty-five years he has practiced in Atlanta, his practice growing with the growth of the city. In May, 1861, Dr. Alexander entered the Confederate service as surgeon of the Seventh Georgia infantry, of which regiment L. J. Gartrell was the first colonel. He served six months in the field but returned to Atlanta and was there detailed on hospital duty, in which he was actively engaged until the war closed. He was a member of the secession convention which carried Georgia out of the union in January, 1861, favoring and voting for the ordinance of secession. In fact he was the second man who recorded his vote for that historic measure. He has been a member of the Atlanta city board of health about ten years, being elected its president in 1893 and re-elected in 1894-95. He is also a member of the American medical and Georgia state medical associations and has served as president, vice-president, treasurer and censor of the latter. Dr. Alexander is the only living member of the state medical association who helped to organize that society. In addition to his professional honors he has enjoyed political preferment, having served on the Atlanta city council. He is also a prominent member and steward of the Methodist Episcopal church. Dr. Alexander was married in 1855 to Miss Georgia, daughter of Richard Orme, editor and proprietor of the "Southern Recorder" at Milledgeville. She died in 1876, and in June, two years later, Dr. Alexander married Miss Ada Reynolds, daughter of Permedas Reynolds, Covington, Ga., who was also a member of the secession convention above mentioned. Dr. Alexander's oldest child, Jeannie, the daughter of his first wife, is now the wife of J. P. Stevens. To his second marriage were born a son and a daughter—J. F. Alexander and Ada. Dr. Alexander's father was Dr. Thomas Williamson Alexander, who was born in Greenville district, S. C., in 1791, and was married in Pendleton district of that state to Martha, daughter of William Walker, and some seven or eight years later moved to Lawrenceville, Ga., where he lived until 1847. He was killed in an accident caused by his horse running away. Dr. T. W. Alexander had seven children who lived to maturity, of whom six were sons: John R., now living at Thomasville, Ga.; William W., deceased; Elizabeth, widow of W. W. Lowrey; D. J. F. Alexander; Thomas W., now a lawyer in Rome, Ga.; Wilson R., deceased; and Cicero N. The oldest son, John R., was a soldier in the Seminole war of 1836. Thomas W. was adjutant of a Georgia regiment during the war of the rebellion. Cicero N. entered the Confederate service in a Texas regiment, being a resident of the lone star state when the war broke out. He was mustered in with the rank of captain and was wounded at Fort Donelson. He was then placed on provost marshal duty and served in that capacity until the close of hostilities. Dr. Alexander's grandfather was John R. Alexander, the emigrant ancestor who was of Scotch-Irish parentage. He settled in South Carolina, married a Miss Williamson, and in the service of his country during the revolution attained the rank of major. At a subsequent date he, with his son, Dr. Thomas Williamson, located in Georgia, the grandfather dying in Lawrenceville, about 1830. Dr. James F. Alexander is one of the most famous physicians of Atlanta, holding the respect of the entire business and social circle of the city in which he practices.

MARTIN F. AMOROUS, the prominent lumber dealer of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Savannah, Ga., Oct. 23, 1858. Here his childhood days were passed and here he attended school until about fifteen years of age, when he went to Eastman, Dodge Co., situated in the pine belt of Georgia, and accepted a position in a saw-mill. In 1877 he came to Atlanta and entered the employ of Anthony Murphy, then transacting the largest lumber trade in the city. After five years' service with Mr. Murphy, having gained much experience by his constant contact with the traffic, Mr. Amorous received the agency for several large lumber firms, for whom he acted until 1885, when, in connection with Mr. D. C. Bacon of Savannah, another conspicuous dealer in Georgia's great natural product, he organized the Atlanta Lumber company, with a capital stock of $25,000, since increased to $50,000. When the company was permanently established Mr. Bacon was elected president and Mr. Amorous general manager. Prosperity has followed in the wake of this enterprise since the day of its organization, and it is now mentioned among the foremost substantial and reliable commercial institutions of the city. In the private walks of life, as well as in the throbbing, thrifty circles of business activity, Mr. Amorous enjoys an enviable reputation for integrity and marked ability. He is a director of the Amoskeag Lumber company of Dodge county, and has other interests that require time and attention. Possessing as he does a nature yearning for progress and advancement, and an enthusiastic advocacy and substantial support of everything promising the forward growth and welfare of the city, it is not surprising that he is one of Atlanta's most popular citizens. This fact is fully attested by his being chosen a director and a member of the executive committee of the Cotton States and International exposition. As another instance of the esteem in which Mr. Amorous is held, he was elected and served one term—two years—as member of the general council of the city. Though a young man, his talent and executive ability were appreciated and he faithfully performed the duties of a city father. During this time he introduced the ordinance, now in force, regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors within the incorporated limits. Under its operation the traffic has been as unobjectionable as it could well be if tolerated and legalized. Mr. Amorous was the original promoter of the electric light company organized in Atlanta; was one of the organizers of the Home bank, now known as the Southern Banking and Trust company, and served some time as its president, was also one of the original members of the Capitol City club of Atlanta. Mr. Amorous was married in 1887 to Miss Emma Kate Williams, daughter of W. H. Williams of Columbus, Ga. Their lives have been blessed with two children: Clinton B. and Emma Kate. Intellectual vigor, energy and generosity have characterized Mr. Amorous' life, and to complete his personality, a genial disposition and an open-hearted nature commend him as an invaluable friend.

DR. LUDWIG AMSTER was born in Iglo, Austria, Nov. 11, 1863, and received his education in the public schools and gymnasium of that city, taking the degree of A. M. at the latter institute in 1880. After graduating he went to Vienna and there took up the study of medicine at the university, attending five and a half years and graduating in 1886. That same year he came to New York and at once took a course of lectures at the university of that city, receiving the degree of M. D. in 1888. Dr. Amster remained in New York over two years, and in January, 1890, went to Macon, Ga., removing from that city to Atlanta in October, 1892, having practiced his profession continuously since taking his degree. He is a member of the Atlanta society of medicine, of which he is a censor and is medical examiner for the following insurance companies: The Northwestern Mutual Life of Milwaukee, Wis.; the Travelers and Mutual Life of Hartford, Conn. He also holds the position of physician to the Hebrew Orphans' home of Atlanta. He is a Knight of Pythias and is affiliated with the B'nai Brith. He was married Feb. 7, 1893, to Fannie, daughter of M. Dinkemspiel, Rochester, N. Y. Dr. Amster is a general favorite and occupies a high social position.

NEDOM L. ANGIER, ex-state treasurer and ex-mayor of Atlanta, deceased, who was born in Acworth, N. H., Nov. 10, 1814, was of Huguenot extraction, his father being an early settler and distinguished citizen of Acworth. Mr. Angier came south about the time Hons. W. H. Seward, Lyman Trumbull and other renowned New Englanders reached Georgia, and like them, taught school, studying medicine at leisure intervals. In Coweta county he prosecuted the profession of schoolmaster for four years. In 1843 he attended lectures in the New York Medical university and began practice in Randolph county, removing to Atlanta, then a small village, in 1847, and acted as both druggist and physician. In 1850 the "gold fever" induced him to seek a fortune in California. Here he remained one year and was made a member of the vigilance committee in a rough mining-camp that resorted to summary matters in dealing with the desperate, lawless characters of the Pacific slope, but this wild life was unsuited to him, so he returned to Atlanta and by 1860 had amassed a competency by trading in real estate. In 1843 Dr. Angier married Miss E. A. Angier, a cultivated lady of an influential southern family. He was a Douglas democrat and strenuously opposed secession. He left the Confederacy in 1863 and ran the blockade on a steamer to Havana, Cuba, and from there took ship to New York, continuing to the state of Iowa, but returned to Georgia in 1865. While north, having a nephew who was assistant attorney general, he had frequent interviews with President Abraham Lincoln, entreating him that when hostilities ceased, there be no crusade of prosecutions, confiscations, etc., against his old southern neighbors, but that a policy of conciliation and rehabilitation be pursued; being a New Englander it was believed his pacificatory views had great weight with the president and that he would have adopted them had not Booth's murderous bullet aggravated the trouble and incensed northern leaders. Because of his pronounced stand for the Union, Dr. Angier was appointed collector of internal revenue for Georgia by Andrew Johnson, but resigned after nine months because the "test oath" precluded so many worthy men from holding Federal office. He was directly instrumental in having this act repealed. He was elected a member of the constitutional convention of 1868, and many of the beneficent provisions were due to his clear forethought. He was elected republican state treasurer of Georgia in 1868 and as such saved the state millions of dollars. Ex-Congressman W. P. Price, when speaking of his efficient service, said: "Many men have claimed the honor of saving Georgia, but if I were to single out any special man who did signal service to the state when she so sorely needed help, I would select Dr. N. L. Angier, who won the proud title of 'watch dog of the treasury' when hordes of plunderers sought to pillage an already impoverished people." An ardent republican from conviction and principle, Dr. Angier, in a time of general moral laxity and the disorder consequent upon the close of a great civil war, held his personal integrity and official honesty pure and unsullied, and bitterly fought to a successful issue all the misdeeds of his party colleagues and stood unflinchingly by the honor of the state and the interests of its people. When the contest was adjourned to congress on the "prolongation bill," Dr. Angier was in the front battling for popular, representative government, and so favorably impressed the house that the bill was defeated. His letter to Senator Beck of Kentucky was considered the ablest exposition of self-government and often called for by both houses. Soon after the expiration of his term as state treasurer of Georgia, having gained so much praise and confidence, he was elected mayor of Atlanta, and although sectional prejudices were rife, and a democrat with a war record his opponent, yet the city was financially depleted and desired a tried, true and capable financier to assume control, and Dr. Angier, with a brilliant career behind him, was chosen by a democratic constituency. But wise administration fully justified the confidence and met the expectations of the people. While mayor he contracted a disease that resulted in his death. Dr. Angier possessed a big heart as well as a mighty brain, and instances of his benevolence and charity were of daily occurrence.

EDGAR A. ANGIER, ex-assistant United States attorney, was born in Atlanta, Ga., in a house adjoining John Ryan's old shoe store, on Nov. 26, 1861. His father being a physician he frequently accompanied him to administer medicine and to alleviate the suffering of the Federal and Confederate soldiers, who were brought wounded and sick to his native city. As Dr. Angier was a prominent Union believer and his wife a daughter of an old Georgia family, the son would not fight against the south, and in consequence was compelled to refugee to Iowa during the last year of the war. He ran the blockade with his family, but was under severe cannonading on several occasions from Federal gunboats. After returning to the south in 1865 Edgar entered the common schools of Atlanta, and on leaving them went to the state university at Athens, Ga., graduating a few years later. Then, determining upon law as his professional choice, he went to Crawfordville, Ga., and studied at "Liberty hall" under that eminent jurist and statesman, Alexander H. Stephens. Besides being taught by the great commoner he was schooled at home in the whig doctrines of Henry Clay. Returning to his home he entered upon the active practice of his profession. Mr. Angier's first publicity as a speaker was when Mr. Stephens was a nominee of the democratic party against Gen. L. J. Gartrell, representative of the independent ticket. There he displayed decided oratorical ability, and his voice played no inconspicuous part in his candidate's election. Mr. Angier was elected city attorney of Atlanta in 1883, and chosen a member of the city council three years later. While a member of this body he was also one of the "Big Four," the others being C. A. Collier, J. T. Cooper and A. L. Greene. This designation referred to the opinions held by these gentlemen on the liquor question. They were all strong advocates of anti-prohibition, and resisted the municipal enactments to extend the local-option law. During his service in the city council he made three speeches that attracted wide attention and gave their author a favorable reputation both north and south; they were: "A Treatise on Mr. Blaine's Paris Interview," "A Plea for the Salary System, as Against Fees and Perquisites," and "An Objection Against Convict-Made Material in Public Works." Until 1888 he affiliated with the democratic party, and was a zealous supporter of Samuel J. Randall for president, but when the Carlisle-Morrison faction, with the platform of free trade, came into power, he transferred his allegiance to the republicans. He married Annie P. Isham in 1877, and has eight children. He is a member and earnest worker in the St. Phillip's church. In 1889 he was appointed assistant United States attorney by President Harrison, but resigned that office when Grover Cleveland ascended to power. In 1894 Mr. Angier was appointed special master in chancery by Judges Don A. Pardee and W. T. Newman of the United States court, and still holds this position.

DR. WILLIAM SIMPSON ARMSTRONG, physician and surgeon, Atlanta, Ga., was born on his father's plantation in Wilkes county, Ga., Oct. 9, 1838. He was brought up on the old homestead until he was seventeen, receiving his education in the private school taught by R. M. Wright, in Washington, Ga. When at a later date Prof. Wright took charge of the academy in Washington, Ga., young Armstrong continued his studies under him. Having completed his studies under Prof. Wright, he commenced to study medicine at Washington, Ga., under Dr. J. H. Lane. He left his preceptor in 1857 and took a course of lectures in the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, and then went to the university of the city of New York, where he graduated in the medical department in 1859. Then he returned to Washington, Ga., and began the practice of medicine, remaining there until the spring of 1861, when, the war breaking out, he enlisted in the Irwin guards, organized in Wilkes county, Ga., at that time. He was mustered into service as a private, and as the Irwin guards and other companies met in Atlanta June 9, 1861, and were merged into the Ninth Georgia infantry, he served subsequently as a member of that regiment, and went with it to the valley of Virginia, where he remained until ordered to join Beauregard, whose command he reached at Manassas, July 21, 1861, the day of the great battle fought at that point. He was at Manassas until March of the following year, when his company, which was still composed of members of the old Irwin guard, was made an artillery company and transferred to Gen. Pendleton's artillery corps. That same month they were sent to Richmond and there drilled in artillery maneuvers. Soon after reaching Richmond, and at the earnest solicitation of his friends, he went before the board of medical examiners, passed his examination, and was appointed surgeon, and assigned to the Second Georgia hospital in Richmond. There he served till the battle of Sharpsburg was fought, when he was ordered to report to Winchester, Va., at which place he was appointed to take charge of the Taylor hospital. Later he was appointed to supervise all the hospitals at that point—some five or six in number. He remained at Winchester until December, 1862, when he reported again to Richmond, and was assigned to duty examining conscripts at Montgomery, Ala., where he remained about two months, and was then transferred to Mobile in the same state. At the latter city he was assigned to hospital duty, and served until the evacuation in March, 1865, when he placed his patients on board a vessel and carried them to Columbus, Miss., surrendering there somewhat later. Returning to Wilkes county, Ga., he remained there until Nov. 28, 1865, and then removed to Atlanta, where he commenced the practice of medicine, which he has carried on ever since. In 1866 he was elected demonstrator of anatomy in the Atlanta Medical college. A year later he went to Europe, studying in London and Paris, widening his field of observation and coming in contact with the greatest physicians of those countries. Upon his return he was elected professor of anatomy in the Atlanta Medical college, and has held that chair ever since, except an interval of several years, when he resigned his chair. In 1890 clinical surgery was added to the chair of anatomy, and Dr. Armstrong since then has been professor of anatomy and clinical surgery. Dr. Armstrong is a member of the Medical Society of the State of Georgia, and of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the American Medical, and surgeon to the Grady hospital. He is well known in the medical world, having contributed numerous articles to the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical" and other leading medical magazines. While a resident of Mobile, Ala., he affiliated with the F. & A. M., but has not since been in active membership. He is also a member of the Second Baptist church. In 1869 Dr. Armstrong was married to Miss Myra Grant, daughter of Col. L. P. Grant, who died in Atlanta in 1893. Mr. Grant was the owner of what is now known as Grant park, in Atlanta, but with princely munificence donated it to the municipality. Dr. Armstrong has two children: Laura L. and William B. Dr. Armstrong served as president of the Atlanta city health board fourteen years in succession, resigning in January, 1893. His father was Francis Cavoisieur Armstrong, born in Savannah, Ga., in 1800, who went with his parents to Wilkes county, Ga., in 1812, leaving Savannah at the time of the British invasion. The father was a planter and died in 1876. His wife was Frances Amanda Simpson, a native of Georgia, and in their family were four children: William S., the subject of this sketch; Victoria, wife of Frank Slaton, Wilkes county, Ga., who lives on the farm occupied by her mother's ancestors when they emigrated to Georgia from Maryland before the revolution; Alice, unmarried; James, who lives on the old homestead in Wilkes county. The grandfather was James Armstrong, who was born in Hempstead, N. Y., married there, and was the father of two children. His wife dying he removed to Savannah, Ga., with his family, and there married the widow Butler, and through her Dr. Armstrong is descended. James Armstrong located subsequently in Wilkes county, Ga., and died there in 1836. He was a planter and a Baptist minister. His father with twenty others was killed by Indians in New York state while they were attending divine service in a small church. James Armstrong was born after this sad accident, and was brought up in Hempstead, N. Y., by a Presbyterian minister, Rev. Joseph Barbour. Dr. Armstrong is highly esteemed in social as well as professional circles, having gained and retained the respect of the entire community.

COL. REUBEN ARNOLD, one of the most talented lawyers of Atlanta, is a native of Greeneville, Tenn. Born on Aug. 7, 1833, he was reared in this town until fifteen years old. In the fall of 1848 he entered the university of Tennessee, whence he graduated in 1851. He then began the study of law with his father, Gen. Thomas D. Arnold, a member of congress from the first district. His father fought throughout the war of 1812 and was appointed brigadier-general of the East Tennessee militia. Mr. Reuben Arnold was admitted to the bar in 1854, and located at Greeneville, Tenn., where he prosecuted his profession until the opening of the war. In 1861 he organized the Twenty-ninth Tennessee infantry, and was elected lieutenant-colonel, and acted in this capacity while doing active service, except during the interval between the battle of Fishing Creek in January, 1862, and the battle of Shiloh in April, 1862. For these four months he commanded the regiment. From May, 1862, to May, 1863, he was unable to accompany his command on account of illness and was compelled to leave it. When health and vigor were fully regained he took his seat in the Tennessee legislature, to which he had been overwhelmingly elected, and consequently never rejoined his regiment. In May of 1863 he enlisted in the partisan rangers, an independent company commanded by his brother, John Q. Arnold. He entered and continued a private until the close of the conflict. Col. Arnold participated in the following battles: Rock Castle, Ky., Eastport, Tenn., Shiloh, Farmington, Tenn., Fishing Creek, and innumerable skirmishes and minor engagements. After leaving his comrades he tramped to North Carolina and made a crop on a farm in Rutherford county, remaining there until November, 1865, and then removed to Atlanta, Ga. Having received a full pardon from President Johnson, who was an intimate friend of his father, he began the practice of law. He formed a co-partnership with Col. E. N. Broyles, and later was associated with his brother, Frank. At present the firm consists of himself and his two sons. During the year 1867 he held the office of city attorney of Atlanta. He is a Knight Templar, Mason, Red Man, and affiliates with the Episcopal church. Col. Arnold was married in 1863, while the war was in progress, to Virginia, a daughter of the late Col. Wm. M. Lowry. She died in 1879, leaving six children, as follows: Vernon, Reuben R., Lowry P., Virginia, Thomas B., and Daisy. Col. Arnold is a practitioner of the old, fast-fading type. He possesses a just conception of the lofty principles and aims of his high calling and never stoops to a low or contemptible action. He believes in construing the law in its true, common-sense light, and raising it to the loftiest plane, above reproach and ignoble slander. He is minutely acquainted with all departments of the law—a well-developed, symmetrical disciple of Blackstone and Chitty. His success in managing difficult and sometimes desperate murder cases has been phenomenal. At cross-questioning he is adroit and cunning, and before the jury almost irresistible. Humor and pathos are alike at his command. As a popular man, an eloquent speaker, and a logical, convincing lawyer Col. Arnold is without a superior.

HENRY MURRELL ATKINSON. One of the most successful of Atlanta's younger financiers is Mr. Henry Murrell Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson is a native of New England, and was born in Brookline, Mass., on Nov. 13, 1862. His father, George Atkinson, was a man of distinguished talent, and belonged to one of the oldest and best families of New England. Theodore Atkinson, his progenitor, seven generations removed, was a native of Bury, Lancashire, England. He came to this country in 1634, among the earlier pioneers of the New England coast, settling in Boston, Mass. Mr. Atkinson's great-grandfather, Amos Atkinson, was a minute man in the historic battles of Concord and Lexington, taking a gallant part in the opening struggle of the American revolution. He afterward served in the patriot army as an officer in the Seventeenth Massachusetts regiment, one of the first raised. The maiden name of Mr. Atkinson's mother was Elizabeth Staigg. She was born in Yorkshire, England, and belonged to one of the best families of that cultured section. Her brother was a celebrated portrait painter and many fine portraits were painted by him. In addition to these works of art he executed quite a large number of fine miniatures. The union between George Atkinson, the father of the subject of this sketch, and Elizabeth Staigg occurred at Newport, R. I. Mr. Atkinson received his primary education from the private schools of Boston. These have always ranked among the best in the United States. After leaving the Boston schools Mr. Atkinson became a student of Harvard university, leaving that institution in 1882. For three years he was engaged in the cattle business in the west, after which he came to Atlanta, believing that here he could find a better opening than at any other point in the south. He had not been a resident of Atlanta long before he acquired the spirit of enthusiastic devotion to his adopted city. For three years after coming to Atlanta he was connected with Messrs. S. M. Inman & Co. in the cotton business. In 1889 Mr. Atkinson organized and established the Southern Banking and Trust company, with a capital stock of $300,000, of which he became the vice-president. At this time he was only twenty-seven years of age. Subsequently, in 1890, he assumed the duties of president, and managed the entire business of the bank. Under his superior financial management this institution became one of the strongest and most prosperous banking enterprises in the city. Recently this bank consolidated its deposit business with the Atlanta Trust and Banking company, and the combination has produced one of the strongest monetary institutions in the south, the Southern Banking and Trust company continuing as a trust company with $300,000 capital. Two years after organizing the bank of which he became president, Mr. Atkinson, in 1891, organized the Georgia Electric Light company, of which he was made the president. In this way Mr. Atkinson has rendered valuable service to Atlanta by placing her in the front rank of those cities using electricity for illuminating purposes, as well as for transportation and manufacturing motive power. As a progressive and enterprising business man, promoting the material growth and welfare of the city, Mr. Atkinson has been a valuable addition to Atlanta's citizenship. It is entirely safe to say that no young man has ever come to Atlanta, like Mr. Atkinson, a comparative stranger, and, within the brief space of only ten years, produced such an indelible impress upon the community. He has not only demonstrated the brilliant enterprise of a promoter, but the sober judgment of a wise manager and safe counsellor. Mr. Atkinson, by reason of his influential business connections in New England, has been the means of bringing large sums of money to Atlanta. His influence has been constantly exerted in an effort to bring northern and eastern enterprises to this city, and he has succeeded in this endeavor to such an extent as to make Atlanta deeply indebted to him. Though Mr. Atkinson has never sought political preferment or self-aggrandizement of any kind, he has always been a careful student of politics, especially in their bearing upon the business and financial situation. He is a close and watchful observer, and nothing escapes his attention. In view of the success already achieved in Atlanta by this brilliant young scion of New England it is safe to predict that his future will be one of splendid revelation. Mr. Atkinson is a member of the leading clubs of the city, notably of the Capital City and the Commercial, and is also a member of the Reform and the Harvard clubs of New York city. Mr. Atkinson was married in April, 1888, to Miss May Peters, a daughter of Mr. Richard Peters, who was a member of the engineering corps that located and superintended the construction of the Georgia railway. He was a pioneer resident of this city; the originator and builder of the first street railway, and among the foremost in every enterprise calculated to advance Atlanta's prosperity. Mr. and Mrs. Atkinson have two children. Mr. Atkinson, as agent for eastern money lenders, represents $2,500,000 capital invested in the south. In addition to his management of the Southern Banking and Trust company, he is president of the Georgia Electric Light company, vice-president of the Atlanta Trust and Banking company, president of the Tripod Paint company, and director in several other associations.

HENRY L. ATWATER, formerly president of the Southern Mutual Building and Loan association, and an energetic, reliable and respected citizen, was born in New Haven, Conn., in the year 1833, and lived there until twenty-five years of age. In this city he received his education, passed the days when manhood is molding into symmetry, and undertook the fundamental labors of his self-delegated vocation. At the age of seventeen he commenced to learn the craft of carriage-making in the factory of his father, John S. Atwater, and three years later was placed in entire charge of an important and responsible department. In 1859 the family migrated from their home on the eastern coast of America to Columbus, Miss., and there established a carriage factory and repository under the firm name of John S. Atwater & Sons, which they continued in active operation until 1876. During the war Henry managed the business exclusively, manufacturing ambulances, equipments and vehicles of every description for the Confederate army. His brother enlisted in Gen. Joe Wheeler's cavalry, a company of which was organized in that locality. In 1876 Henry left the factory in Columbus and went to Memphis, Tenn., to accept the agency of the Milburn Wagon company. He remained for two years, and in 1878 came to Atlanta to establish a branch house for the same wagon company, and acted as their agent in this city until 1886. He then transferred his connection to the Standard Wagon company, and served their interests for three years. About 1889 he and other influential gentlemen formulated and organized the Southern Mutual Building and Loan association. In 1890 Mr. Atwater was elected president, occupied this office until July, 1894, and since then has held the vice-presidency, having the co-operation and good-will of all associated with him. He was also one of the directors of the State Savings bank. Mr. Atwater was united in marriage on Oct. 5, 1857, to Delia V., daughter of Julius Tyler, of New Haven, Conn. He takes a laudable and unswerving interest in aiding religious endeavor. He is a member of the Methodist church and treasurer of the St. John's Methodist church of Atlanta. He united with the Masons, the Odd Fellows and the Red Men. Mr. Atwater is indefatigable and earnest in all he undertakes. He is possessed of a genial disposition and singularly pleasing manners. He heartily endorses public spirit, thrift and industry and has been a cogent factor in Atlanta's rapid development.

JAMES BOZEMAN BAIRD, a prominent medical practitioner of Atlanta, Ga., was born Jan. 5, 1849, in Columbus, Ga. He was reared and received his early education in that city on the banks of the Chattahoochee river. He exhibited remarkable precocity in his primary studies and advanced from grade to grade in the common schools with wonderful rapidity. At the age of fifteen years, though hardly able to carry a musket, he enlisted in the Confederate army in 1864, and served irregularly until the surrender. During the first four years of reconstruction he was engaged in various mercantile employments, devoting his leisure hours at night to the study of medicine. In 1869 he was enrolled in the Bellevue Hospital Medical college of New York city, and was graduated after a two years' course of diligent application. Having moved to Atlanta in 1868 he returned after obtaining his diploma, in the spring of 1871, to pursue the active practice of his profession. In acquiring the knowledge of his chosen science Dr. Baird's advancement has been phenomenal, covering a wide scope and embracing many branches. He is a member of the State Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the American Medical association, the Atlanta Obstetrical society, member of the regular medical examining board of the state of Georgia and other medical organizations, has served as secretary and orator of the State Medical association and secretary of the health board of Atlanta. The last position he occupied for seventeen years—a splendid testimonial of the confidence reposed in his superior ability. Dr. Baird for several years was lecturer on physiology and nervous diseases and performed many operations in surgery in the Atlanta Medical college. Subsequently he filled the chair of principles and practice of medicine in the Southern Medical college of Atlanta. His talents have not been confined to practice alone, but he has written numerous articles that commanded widespread interest in different medical journals of the country. Dr. Baird was married in 1879 to Elizabeth, daughter of Gen. L. J. Gartrell, who was a member of both the Confederate and national congress, as representative from Georgia. Dr. Baird's father was Dr. John B. Baird, a native of Charleston, S. C., born in 1806. He graduated when twenty-four years old at the Charleston Medical college, moved to Columbus, Ga., a few years later, practiced there for fully forty years and came to Atlanta in 1868, where he continued practice a year or two, and died in 1871. His wife was Mary L. Bozeman, a native of Scottsboro, Ga. Dr. Baird's grandfather was Capt. James R. Baird, who fought in the war of 1812, and is buried in Charleston, S. C. Dr. Baird is highly esteemed for his long experience and extensive learning, and has frequently been requested by the state to pass judgment on the sanity of criminals.

His testimony is clear, concise and convincing, spoken with a candor and precision that leave no doubt as to the logical deduction of its conclusions.

JAMES JETHRO BARNES, present sheriff of Fulton county, Ga., was born in Fayette county (now known as Clayton) on April 10, 1840. He resided in this locality until nineteen years old, attending school in the adjoining town of Jonesboro. In 1859 he accompanied his parents to Bowdon, Ga., and there entered Bowdon college. In June, 1861, he left the recitation room for the camp and bivouac. At the first approach of war he enlisted as a private in Cobb's legion and served as such in that command throughout the conflict. At South Mountain, Md., Mr. Barnes received a painful gun-shot wound, being shot through the left knee and was captured and held prisoner for three months. On recovering he immediately rejoined the army, but after an examination the leading surgeons pronounced him totally unfit for field service and he was given light duties in a hospital at Richmond, Va. This indolent, inactive, routine life proved of great annoyance to his restless, patriotic spirit. He refused to stay, and eluding the vigilant watch of those in charge availed himself of a favorable opportunity and made his escape, and by much exertion reached his command about one week before the battle of Gettysburg, in which he participated. He then destroyed the discharge he had received before this battle, which granted a furlough on the grounds of physical disability, because of his reluctance to leave the army, and remained with his company until the same was captured at the close of the last campaign. At Cold Harbor, Drewry's Bluff, Petersburg and in many other minor engagements Mr. Barnes conducted himself in a fearless, daring manner that elicited the praise of his comrades. When the surrender betokened peace and union, he was furnished transportation from Newport News to Savannah, and walked from there to Waynesboro, Ga., and there received additional transportation to Augusta, Ga., and on to Atlanta. From this city he returned to Carroll county and found his father bankrupt, having lost everything. Thinking a more encouraging business outlook could be found in Atlanta he came back and worked three months for his board alone, and afterwards secured a position with Peter Lynch, who kept then, as now, a general store at 95 Whitehall street, at seventy-five dollars per month. He worked in this establishment for nine months, and on leaving Mr. Lynch entered into partnership with W. M. Middlebrook, the style of the firm being Middlebrook & Barnes, which continued through the year 1872. Early in 1873 he went into the wholesale produce and commission business. This is still operating in his name. In 1879 Mr. Barnes was elected to the city council and served two years as representative of the First ward. In 1891 he was made deputy sheriff under J. W. Morrow, and during 1893 was placed in the office of sheriff, and re-elected in the fall of 1894. Mr. Barnes was married in 1868 to Miss Cornelia V., daughter of John T. Hall of Atlanta. They have a pleasant family, consisting of three sons and one daughter, as follows: William H., Mary H., James J., Jr., and John S. Mr. Barnes is a member of the I. O. O. F. and the encampment. He belongs to the camp of United Confederate Veterans of Fulton county and rejoices in a reunion where, with friends and old messmates, he recounts the glories and hardships and humor of camp-life. Mr. Barnes is a sturdy supporter of right and honor, and believes that only useful, capable and honest men should hold public office.

DAVID A. BEATTIE, president of the board of education of Atlanta, Ga., is a native of Argyle, Washington Co., N. Y., having been born May 19, 1833. Until twenty years of age he resided in the place of his nativity, studying in the common schools and academy of Argyle, Hebron, and showing an aptitude for educational training that promised a future of rich returns. During 1853 he came south, located in Henry county, Ga., and for the succeeding five years taught school in Henry, Fayette and Newton counties. With a hope of increased financial prosperity he went to La Grange, Tenn., entered the mercantile business, and conducted the same with profit for several years. He was compelled to suspend when the hostilities of war became imminent, and thereupon engaged in general trading, which continued until the close of the civil conflict. Then Mr. Beattie returned to Georgia, settled in Atlanta, interested himself in the live stock business, and now follows that occupation. He was one of the initial promoters of the Union Stockyards Dairy and Manufacturing company, and held the presidency for one year. He was one of the original stockholders in the Capital City Land and Improvement company, and when this combine was succeeded by the Capital City bank, Mr. Beattie was chosen a director. He has been a distinguished factor in Atlanta's growth and improvement since the war. In the city council his efforts met with a hearty co-operation, and numerous improvements were completed. He served as a member of this body in 1873, again in 1875-76, 1881-82, 1885-86, and 1893-94, and is now the honored presiding officer of the board of education, having been elected to this board four separate times. His work for the developing of the public school system has been effectual and continued, and gathering for him friends and admirers by the score. Mr. Beattie belongs to the Presbyterian church, was superintendent of the Sunday school for a number of years, and after holding the office of deacon for many years, was elected elder, and fills that responsible position with a devout religious enthusiasm. Mr. Beattie was married, on August 30, 1860, in Newton county, Ga., to Mary Letitia, daughter of Alfred Livingston. Her father is still living at the age of ninety-two years. To this marriage were born seven children: John L., William D., Etta L., Edward B., James T., David L. and Nellie M. Mr. Beattie's father was John Beattie, born in the state of New York, and an officer in the war of 1812. His mother's maiden name was Hannah Lytle. His grandfather was a native of north Ireland, who emigrated to New York in his early manhood, and by thrift and perseverance made a record that posterity will envy.

MR. L. H. BECK. One of Atlanta's most successful and enterprising business men is Mr. L. H. Beck, the president of the Beck & Gregg Hardware company. Mr. Beck is a native of this state, and was born at Griffin, Ga., in Spalding county, on Aug. 5, 1848. He resided in Spalding county until he reached his eighth year, and then moved to Newton county, locating about four miles from Covington. Here he received his rudimentary education, dividing his time between the school-room and the plantation. At the age of sixteen the subject of this sketch became a member of the state troops, and served under the command of Col. Joel A. Billups. After the war he came to Atlanta, without friends or prospects, to begin the struggle of life. This was in 1866. The city presented a cheerless picture of desolation, on account of the destructive march of Gen. Sherman; but trade was beginning to revive, and the outlook for the future was one of encouragement. He secured a clerkship in the hardware establishment of Tommey & Stewart, and having gained a start, he experienced no difficulty in holding his own. By reason of his push and energy he was several times promoted, and finally, in 1870, succeeded to a partnership in the business, the firm becoming that of Tommey, Stewart & Beck. Mr. Stewart retired in 1878, and Mr. W. A. Gregg became a partner, changing the name of the firm to Tommey, Gregg & Beck. Mr. Tommey withdrew in 1880, and the firm of Beck, Gregg & Co., W. M. Crumley making the Co., continued the business. Three years later the enterprising firm applied for a charter, which was promptly granted. The establishment was incorporated under the name of Beck & Gregg Hardware company, the first mercantile company ever incorporated in the south. The trade of this house extends all over the country, and every year a banquet is held at which all the clerks and salesmen meet together in social intercourse with the owners of the business. Mr. Beck is the president of the Atlanta Machine works, having successfully organized that enterprise several years ago, and is also connected with several other important operations. Mr. Beck is socially a most delightful gentleman, and belongs to the Capital City and Piedmont driving clubs. He was united in marriage, on Jan. 1, 1874, to Miss Sallie E. Speer, sister of the late Maj. D. N. Speer, for many years the treasurer of the state of Georgia, and his home life is one of ideal felicity. Mr. Beck has always taken a deep interest in public affairs, but has never sought political honors, being satisfied with the quiet life of an unobtrusive citizen. He is a member of the First Methodist church, and takes a deep interest in all that concerns the welfare of his denomination. From every point of view his life has been a successful one, and no citizen of Atlanta is more deserving of popular esteem.

CHARLES BEERMAN, who is perhaps as well known as any citizen of Atlanta, not only for his long residence, but enterprising spirit, was born in Hanover, Germany, April 17, 1833. During the first twenty years of his life he remained in his native country, attending the educational institutions of that highly civilized nation, and prepared his mind for the graver duties of the future. He emigrated in 1853 to America, landing at Charleston, S. C., with a large number of rare singing birds that commanded a good price and ready sales. He traveled over Georgia, South Carolina and Alabama, disposing of this stock. In January, 1855, having sold his last songster, he removed to Atlanta and engaged in the cigar business for five years. Then he undertook the manufacture of cigars in connection with a retail store. When the war was over he resumed the wholesale and retail cigar trade and prosecuted this with signal success until August, 1882, when he disposed of his interest at a good price and took a lease of the old Kimball house, and began its control under the most favorable circumstances, but on the eleventh day after assuming this responsible management the house was destroyed by fire. He immediately organized a stock company to rebuild, but the enterprise failed, and, together with Gen. Robert Toombs, Joseph Thompson, L. W. Scoville and H. I. Kimball formed a syndicate and erected the present Kimball house, at a cost of $643,000. When completed, Messrs. Scoville, Beerman & Co. took charge, and a year later Mr. Scoville retired, and Charles Beerman & Co. have conducted it since January, 1885. In 1889 Mr. Beerman leased the Markham house, another Atlanta hotel, and Beerman & Co. (the "Co." being Joseph Thompson) manage this in connection with their other interests. For a long while these were the only prominent hostelries in the city. The Kimball house, especially, has gained a favorable reputation throughout the southern states. Mr. Beerman is president of the Atlanta Brewing and Ice company, having begun as treasurer; a director of the American Trust and Banking company, and largely connected with several building and loan associations, now paid out. He served in the city council as alderman for three years, and acquired great popularity and respect. Mr. Beerman has been married three times, and has four children: Margaret, wife of John Elvers, of Atlanta; Henry C., Mamie, wife of H. Haupt, of Hamburg, Germany, and Walter B., child of his last wife. Mr. Beerman united with the Lutherans in religious faith, and belongs to the Capital City and Concordia clubs of Atlanta. Mr. Beerman has few equals as a strong-minded business man, possessed of a disposition that invites companionship, and the courage, energy and boldness of adventure that attain success.

ALBERT BELLINGRATH, Atlanta, Fulton Co., Ga., son of Leonard Bellingrath, was born in Prussia, April 26, 1838. His father emigrated to the United States in 1848, and settled in Fayetteville, N. C. He died in 1874. In 1852, when fourteen years of age, Mr. Bellingrath came to this country and joined his father in North Carolina. He engaged in the building of steamboats and other seagoing craft, remaining there until 1856, when he came to Atlanta. In October of that year he commenced work in the shops of the Georgia railway, in Atlanta, remaining there until 1863, having been detailed to that work by the Confederate government. In 1865 he was ordered to Cuthbert, Ga., to make spirits of nitre for the government, and continued there until the surrender. Immediately after that event—May, 1865—he returned to Atlanta and entered into the firm which has since expanded into the great plumbing and heating and house-furnishing firm now known as the Hunnicutt & Bellingrath company, of which he is manager of the mechanical department. Retiring and unassuming, and of irreproachable private life, and occupying a front position in his specialty as an artisan, he is justly esteemed as a mechanic and in the commercial world. Mr. Bellingrath was married, Oct. 17, 1861, to Miss Mary G., daughter of William H. McMillan, Quincy, Fla. Of eight children born to them, seven survive: Carrie M., wife of Dr. W. D. M. Mason, Fort Worth, Tex.; Katie S., Albert F., Helen M., Herman W., Julia M., Henry L. Mr. Bellingrath is an exemplary and highly esteemed member of the Presbyterian church.

DR. CHAS. F. BENSON. While the shock of internecine warfare thrilled with awe and dread suspense the heart of the nation, and hurrying armies rushed to bloody conflict, the subject of this sketch entered upon the battlefield of life. On July 28, 1861, Dr. Charles Francis Benson was born near Aiken, S. C. His father, Chas. F. Benson, was at the time a gallant officer of the southern Confederacy, whose fortunes he shared throughout the four years' war; while his mother, nee Elizabeth Fitzsimmons Trotti, with the Spartan courage characteristic of the southern women of that day, managed her husband's large estate for the maintenance of his family, and the benefit of the soldiers in the field. Dr. Benson's paternal grandparents were Lawrence S. Benson and his wife, Elizabeth Fastbender Shafner, of Charleston, S. C.; while he traces his lineage on his mother's side to Dr. Lawrence J. Trotti, an eminent M. D. of Barnwell, S. C., and his wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Collins, of Richmond county, Ga. When the embryo doctor was six years old, his parents moved from South Carolina to Atlanta, Ga., where the family lived until he was thirteen years of age, when they became residents of Lake Weir, Marion Co., Fla. During the family's residence in Atlanta, Charles F. Benson, Jr., passed meritoriously through the grammar schools and, after remaining in Florida three years, he returned to Atlanta and entered Prof. T. De Means' high school for young gentlemen, where after three years of studious application to his books, he completed his academic education. With characteristic energy he immediately began his medical instruction under Dr. W. S. Armstrong, professor of anatomy in the Atlanta Medical college, which institution he entered later, and where, after two years, he graduated with distinction in 1882. After this the young doctor returned to Florida, where he expected to locate permanently, and was at once appointed United States surgeon to examine applicants for pensions. His appointment as demonstrator of anatomy in his alma mater the same year (1882) caused a reversal of his decision, and he returned to Atlanta to accept the responsible position offered him. After filling this appointment for three years Dr. Benson entered actively and aggressively upon the practice of his profession, with constantly increasing success. On Oct. 11, 1893, Dr. Chas. F. Benson was united in marriage to Miss Stella Clare Carr of Atlanta, daughter of Elias R. Carr, of Logan county, Ky., and Jane F. Carr, nee Redding, of Macon, Ga. Genius is irrepressible, and the implanted germ of greatness, patiently and persistently cultivated, ultimately attains to perfect growth. Dr. Benson, although a young man, is far on the road to deserved success in its highest sense, and his native trend, supplemented and assisted by indomitable will, untiring energy and earnest integrity of heart and mind, which, looking above and beyond mere selfish considerations, seek the good of mankind, prophecies for him deserved greatness in his chosen profession.

JOHN S. BIGBY, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., president of the Eagle and Phoenix Manufacturing company, of Columbus, Ga., was born in Coweta county, Ga., Feb. 13, 1833, and is a son of John and Susan L. (Powell) Bigby. John Bigby, his father, was a native of Abbeville district, S. C., and died in 1865. He was for many years a minister in the service of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, and afterward became a farmer and planter in Coweta county. He was a devout follower of the "meek and lowly Nazarene," and a man of much native talent and mental strength. His wife was a native of Glynn county, Ga., the accomplished daughter of James M. Powell, a prominent citizen of that section of the state. John S. Bigby was reared and received his earlier education in Coweta county, and later became a student of Emory college, Oxford, Ga., graduating from that institution with the degree bachelor of arts in the class of 1853. Soon after his graduation he was admitted to the bar at Newnan, Ga., and practiced his profession there for more than thirty years. The rising young attorney was not long in having his talents recognized, and was appointed solicitor-general of the then Tallapoosa (now Coweta) circuit in 1867. He was also a delegate to the constitutional convention held in Atlanta, Ga., in 1868. Mr. Bigby was also chosen as a delegate to the national convention, held in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1876. Judge Bigby was appointed United States district attorney for the northern district of Georgia in 1881, and served until that administration laid down the reigns of power, four years later. He served as judge of the Tallapoosa (now Coweta) circuit for two and a half years, having been appointed in 1869 for eight years, but resigned in 1871. In 1870 Judge Bigby was elected a member of congress, and after serving one term resumed the practice of law, in which he has continued with remarkable success, having some years ago established himself in Atlanta. In 1891 Judge Bigby was chosen president of the Eagle and Phoenix Manufacturing company of Columbus, one of the largest manufacturers of cotton and woolen goods in the southern states. During the civil war his term of service as a member of the Georgia state troops was limited to a period of about six months. Aside from his profound legal knowledge Judge Bigby is one of the most successful business men in Georgia, occupying numerous positions of trust and importance, among which it may be mentioned that he is a member of the board of directors of the Atlanta & West Point Railroad company, a director and vice-president of the Newnan National bank and of the First National bank of Newnan; he is also a member of the board of directors of the Fidelity Banking and Trust company, a director in the West View Cemetery company and vice-president of the West View Floral company, all of Atlanta. Mr. Bigby is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. He has been twice married, his first wife being Miss Mary C. Dougherty, of Newnan, Ga., to whom he was united in 1853. She was a daughter of John Dougherty, deceased, who was one of Newnan's prominent citizens. She departed this life in 1870, leaving as issue of her wifehood two sons and one daughter. In 1872 Judge Bigby was married to Miss Elizabeth K., daughter of John J. McClendon, of Newnan, Ga. The fruits of this union consist of one son and five daughters, all of whom are now living.

THOMAS L. BISHOP, a promising and popular young attorney of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1861, and, with his parents, came to Atlanta in 1867. He was educated in the public schools, and after graduating, having determined when a mere boy to become a lawyer, entered the office of Mr. Julius L. Brown, with whom he studied law for several years. He was admitted to the bar in 1885, to the supreme court of Georgia during April, 1890, and to the United States district and circuit courts in December of the same year. In 1889 Mr. Bishop was elected a member of the board of education of Atlanta, being the youngest member who ever served in this responsible position. Feeling and understanding the need and influence of the schools, he was useful in laboring for their interests, and worked hard to increase the efficiency of the system. In 1880 Mr. Bishop was employed by Senator Brown to take charge of the renting of his real estate in Atlanta, and the executors of Senator Brown still continue him in charge of it. This is a splendid indication of the trust and confidence placed in his ability and integrity by one whose judgment of men is proverbial. Mr. Bishop was married in 1886 to Stella, daughter of W. M. Thomas, of Fayette county, Ga. He belongs to the order of Knights of Pythias, the Odd Fellows, and Red Men, but affiliates with no church. In the capacity of a business man his interests are manifold and guarded with a sagacity that assures success. He is president of the Snow Church Collecting agency, the Excelsior Steam laundry, the Atlanta Real Estate and Investment company, director and attorney for the State Building and Loan association, and acts as attorney for several other corporations. Mr. Bishop is a logical, aggressive lawyer, full of enterprise and energy. He is genial and generous, hating shams and shallow pretenses, and appreciates genuine merit. His practice is constantly increasing, and it is doubtful if any lawyer of his age in Atlanta has better clientage. His youth, quickness of perception and affability guarantee a bright future. He is a member of the law firm of Bishop, Andrews & Hill. Mr. Bishop has declined public office and sought no prominence in politics, yet his reputation is spreading, and if he had done nothing better than improve the public school system of the city he would be endeared to its thinking population.

DR. BENJAMIN WILLIAMS BIZZELL, a very successful physician of Atlanta, was born on Feb. 27, 1866, on his father's cotton plantation in Greene county, Ala., and received his primary education in the schools of that vicinity. In 1883 he matriculated at the university of Alabama at Tuscaloosa, but was obliged to leave college two years later on account of ill health, although he had reached his senior year. He graduated from the Southern Medical college at Atlanta in 1887 and went immediately to the college of physicians and surgeons in New York city, graduating therefrom in 1888. He passed the following six months in the New York polyclinic and then, having landed interests in Arcola, Miss., went to that city and there practiced his profession until February, 1892, at which time he located in Atlanta, Ga. Dr. Bizzell is a member of the Georgia state medical association, the Atlanta society of medicine, the southern surgical and gynecological association, the national association of railroad surgeons, and is a member of the Atlanta board of United States examining surgeons. While in Arcola, Miss., he was medical examiner for the New York

Life and the Mutual Life insurance companies of New York. Dr. Bizzell has contributed numerous articles to the leading medical journals, among them one on super-vaginal hysterotomy, which was published in the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal." Dr. Bizzell is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. His father, James C. Bizzell, was born in South Carolina, and came to Green county, Ala., when a child. James C. Bizzell was a planter and married Mary, daughter of Benjamin Williams, a native of Virginia. They had three sons and three daughters, all three of the sons choosing medicine as their profession and graduating with first honors from the colleges which they attended. The first, Dr. William D. Bizzell, attended the Mobile medical college and practiced a few years in Mobile, during which time he was elected to the chair of chemistry in his alma mater. Coming to Atlanta in 1881 he was elected by the faculty of the Southern medical college professor of the principles and practice of medicine. which honorable position he held until his death in June, 1890. The second son was a graduate of the Mobile medical college, also of the Southern university of Greensboro, Ala., and is now a practicing physician in Arcola, Miss. The third son is Dr. Benjamin Williams Bizzell. The father died in February, 1891. Dr. Bizzell's grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812 and his maternal great-grandfather Williams was killed serving his country in the war of the revolution.

JUDGE LOGAN E. BLECKLEY. No state in the union surpasses Georgia in the quality of her judicial talent as illustrated in the records of the supreme court of this state; and of all the public men who have adorned the bench by the splendor of their legal gifts and the purity of their exalted lives, no one is more conspicuous than ex-Chief Justice Logan E. Bleckley, whose recent retirement from the bench is more than ordinary loss, if, indeed, it falls short of a calamity. In forming the legal mind of Judge Bleckley it is not improper to assume that generations had been at work. Endowed by nature with peculiar gifts, the early development of these unusual qualities admit of no other explanation. His legal turn of mind began to assert itself in early childhood, and on one occasion, much to the amusement of his grandfather, it declared itself in a manner both precocious and amusing. His grandfather, who had taken him in charge, as he was too young to be sent away from home, being only five years old, decided to apply the rod to his young pupil one day, and accordingly made known to him his intention. The quick mind of the boy, in order to escape the rod, seized upon an idea and he resolved to make a plea of insanity. He told his grandfather that his mind was not sound and for this reason he did not think he ought to be whipped. This circumstance in the life of Judge Bleckley is significant. It shows that his success at the bar and on the bench is not merely the result of discipline, but chiefly the fulfillment of nature's own prediction based upon the rare gifts committed to him at his birth. In his firm grasp of a legal proposition and the clearness of his judgment in arriving at the principles of right and justice involved in any issue brought before him, Judge Bleckley has never had a superior, and perhaps few equals, on the supreme bench. Judge Logan E. Bleckley was born in Rabun county, Ga., among the picturesque mountain views of the extreme northeast corner of the state, on July 3, 1827. At this time the cataracts and waterfalls that plunged through the chasm at Tallulah were in the possession of the Cherokee Indians, together with all that unbroken wilderness. The county of Rabun had been organized but a few years at the time of Judge Bleckley's advent, and the dangers incident to pioneer life in that section of the state were neither trifling nor far apart. The courage of a brave man was needed to battle with the solitudes of that remote wilderness and the heart of a less heroic man than Judge Bleckley's father might have given up in helpless alarm. Judge Bleckley has written a charming sketch for one of the law magazines in which he gives a lengthy account of himself in a letter addressed to posterity. In this letter he says: "At eleven years of age I commenced writing in the office of my father, who at that time was a farmer without any lands and tenements and with only a few goods and chattels. He lived on a rented homestead, just one mile from Clayton, the county town, and was clerk of three courts—the superior, inferior and ordinary. He was a man of strong intellect, fair information and some business experience. He had been sheriff of the county. A more sterling character was not in the world—certainly not in that large group called the middle class to which he belonged. Loyal to the truth, he scorned sham, pretense and mendacity. He was a native of North Carolina, as was my mother also. His blood was Irish and English combined; hers German." In his father's office the young clerk soon acquired a marked familiarity with legal forms and as he grew in usefulness larger shares of work were given him to do. He soon acquired a fondness for law and, strange to say, for an immature boy, found great stores of pleasure, if not romance, in the tedious volumes of the law. He made himself familiar with the constitution of the state and of the United States, and at the age of seventeen borrowed a copy of Blackstone, and a few other legal text-books. There being no resident lawyer in the county, the young applicant for admission to the bar toiled away by himself and explored unaided the deep mysteries of legal science. Now and then he made excursions for the purpose of being catechised, into the adjoining counties, and received encouragement from a number of prominent lawyers in this way. Among these the late Judge Underwood took a deep interest in the young student, and the kindness of the great jurist was never forgotten by Judge Bleckley, who paid a beautiful tribute to his memory, a few years ago, from the bench. In April, 1846, at the age of nineteen, the young applicant stood his examination and was formally admitted to the bar. The business of the county, however, failed to support him, and after struggling two years he accepted employment as a bookkeeper for the Western & Atlantic railroad. This brought him to Atlanta in 1848. In this connection it is interesting to observe that, in after years, when the honors of the highest judicial office in the state rested upon him, Judge Bleckley prepared his decisions within a few rods of the spot in which he toiled away, an obscure youth, at the books of the Western & Atlantic railroad. In this position he remained for three years, his salary ranging from $40 to $66 a month. He then gave up the position to become the governor's secretary at Milledgeville with a salary of $1,200. He retired from this position in 1851, having saved enough money to provide himself with a small library, and to keep him above water for several months. He opened a law office in Atlanta and found to his satisfaction, by reason of his late connection with the railroad, that he was largely in demand. His practice grew and his fees with it. In 1853 he was elected solicitor-general of the Coweta circuit, then embracing eight counties. His term of service lasted four years and at the expiration of this time he was married. He continued the practice of law in Atlanta until 1861. Touching upon his military experience during the late war, Judge Bleckley gives this amusing account of himself: "The first battle of Manassas, alias Bull Run, occurred while I was in a camp of instruction, endeavoring to acquire some skill in the noble art of homicide. By nature I am pacific. The military spirit has but a feeble development in my constitution. Nevertheless I tried the fortunes of a private soldier for a short time in behalf of the southern confederacy. I was discharged on account of ill-health, after a few months' service in western Virginia, without having shed any one's blood or lost any of my own. When I consider how destructive I might have been, had my health supported my prowess, I am disposed to congratulate 'gentlemen on the other side' upon my forced retirement from the ranks at an early period of the contest. After my discharge from the army, I served the Confederacy in much of the legal business in and around Atlanta. In 1864, about the time Gen. Sherman left Atlanta on his march to the sea, I was appointed to the office of supreme court reporter. After reporting two volumes, the Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Georgia, I resigned the office. This was in the spring of 1867. From that time until I was appointed to the supreme bench in 1875, I practiced law continuously in Atlanta." Judge Bleckley remained on the bench until 1880, and then resigned on account of impaired health. He closed his term of service with a brief judicial poem, found in the Sixty-fourth Georgia, entitled "In the Matter of Rest." In this connection Judge Bleckley observes in his letter to posterity: "Perhaps I ought to confess that divers other poems, happily none of them judicial, may be laid to my charge. During most of my life I have had a strong and to me unaccountable tendency to metrical transgression. Over and over again I have suffered the pains and penalties of poetic guilt. Besides a score or two of convictions I have had many trials and narrow escapes. But even now I am not a hardened offender for a bashful hesitation always tempers my gallantry with the muses." Remaining in private life until 1887, Judge Bleckley was recalled to the supreme bench to succeed the late Chief Justice Jackson. His term of office expired in 1892, but, in spite of the hardships of his office, becoming daily more burdensome with the weight of advancing years and increasing litigation, he consented to a re-election with the hope that by a constitutional amendment an addition might be made to the judicial group on the supreme bench. This would be a great relief to him and would enable him, without personal sacrifice, to remain in the service of the commonwealth. The amendment, however, failed, and he was forced to send in his resignation to Gov. Northen to take effect on Oct. 29, 1894. The resignation was accepted by Gov. Northen with great reluctance, and he took occasion, in behalf of the state, to commend his able and patriotic services and to express his estimate of the state's loss in his retirement from the bench. From a lengthy editorial which appeared in the Atlanta "Constitution," the following is taken: "The resignation of Chief Justice Bleckley will excite sincere regret throughout the state. Full of years and honors, this eminent and learned judge retires from the bench because he believes that it is an impossibility for three men to deal with the rapidly increasing volume of business in the supreme court. The resignation of this great jurist is a public calamity. He has been so wise, so clear in his great office, so just and so lovable that all classes of our people regard him with veneration and affection. He has been not only a great lawyer and a just judge, but he has proved himself a philosopher whose practical wisdom and benevolence have left their impress upon our legislation, our literature and our morals. Chief Justice Bleckley hardly seems to belong to our day and generation. When we measure his scholarship, his purity and noble simplicity of character, he reminds us of such judges as Matthew Hale—wise and good men who devoted their lives to justice and the interests of mankind. Such a man is not seen more than once in a century. If he had been at all ambitious he would have been one of the most famous of Americans, and notwithstanding his modesty and his quiet mode of life, he is to-day one of the most notable figures that ever adorned the bench, and in every state in the union his decisions are quoted and held in the highest esteem." The reputation of Judge Bleckley as a jurist is co-extensive with this entire country. His opinions are models of precision and perspicuity, and are characterized by their sound judgment and correct apprehension of the law. Explaining the preparation of his decisions Judge Bleckley says: "I reconsider, revise and scrutinize; then I revise the scrutiny and then I scrutinize the revision." Judge Bleckley has never sought the accumulation of riches, and the lesson of his life may be summed up in his own noble declaration: "Service is better than salary and duty more inspiring than reward." Judge Bleckley has been twice married. He was first married in May, 1857, to Miss Clara Caroline Haralson, who died in March, 1892, leaving five children, three boys and two girls, one of the latter dying in infancy. His second marriage was to Miss Chloe Herring, in August, 1893, who has borne him two sons.

CAPT. W. W. BOYD, formerly of the firm of E. Van Winkle & Company of Atlanta, is a native of Spartanburg, S. C., and is of Scotch-Irish ancestry. When a child he removed with his father to Marietta, Ga., and attended the primary schools of that prospering little north Georgia city. When he reached a suitable age and when he was sufficiently advanced he was enrolled among the members of the Georgia Military institute, then in its flourishing condition, with an attendance of nearly two hundred cadets. He obtained a splendid education, but his studies were interrupted by the outbreak of the civil war. When only eighteen years of age he enlisted in the Sixty-fourth Georgia regiment, commanded by Col. John W. Evans. His courageous conduct is known to all his comrades and friends. He was captured immediately before the surrender, but suffered little inconvenience, as he remained in captivity only two days. Returning home, with a determination as strong as his heart was brave, he began to reconstruct his fallen fortunes. During 1880 he bought a half interest in the E. Van Winkle Manufacturing company, which, without the aid of municipal or national backing, has acquired a magnitude and prominence that is not felt by a similar industry in the state. It is a prodigious industry, employing about 150 hands, and supplying the states west of the Mississippi with their cotton-presses, cotton-gins and like machinery used in the preparation of market cotton. So rapid has been the growth of the business that a branch house was lately established in Dallas, Tex., to facilitate and supply the increasing demand. Mr. Boyd is an officer in the First Presbyterian church, and lends his aid and wealth to the furthering of religious labors, and especially the mission work. His heart goes out in sympathy to those in poverty and distress, and his open charity is a specific characteristic. During his life from earliest youth he has prominently interested himself in stock raising and now owns one of the largest Jersey farms in the south, on which may be found the finest stock, both native and imported. His wife was a beautiful, talented lady from the old north state, and the seven children who survive her are justly the pride of their father. Mr. Boyd's father was a gallant colonel of the Nineteenth Georgia regiment, attached to Phillips' legion, a stalwart command that left traces of their heroism on the hills of northern Virginia. Mr. Boyd has lately served on the board of aldermen of the city government, and his popularity may be inferred when it is known that he polled the heaviest vote on the citizen's ticket, composed of many popular candidates. He is public-spirited and generous and bears for the community a genial affection.

H. A. BOYNTON, one of Atlanta's best known wholesale grocers, is a native of Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga. He was born Oct. 12, 1842, and resided in that city until thirty-three years of age, when he came to Atlanta, where he has since lived. He received his early education in the schools of Stewart county, and attended these until 1858, and then accepted a position as clerk in a retail store. During May, 1862, he entered the Confederate service, enlisting in Company K of the Third Georgia cavalry as a private, but in 1863 was appointed sergeant-major of the regiment and occupied this office throughout the war, frequently acting in the capacity of adjutant. Mr. Boynton fought bravely in the following battles: Munfordville, Ky.; the skirmishes around Murfreesboro and Chattanooga, Chickamauga, the campaign of East Tennessee with Gen. Longstreet, Knoxville and Dandridge; the engagements in Virginia; then back into Georgia, at Dalton; Resaca, Rocky Fall, Calhoun, Kennesaw Mountain, Atlanta, numerous raids in the rear of the Federals, extending south to Florence, Ala., and then followed Sherman in his memorable march to the sea, fighting at Griswoldville and Waynesboro, Ga. After his first battle Mr. Boynton was taken prisoner and held in confinement for thirty days. This was the greatest mishap that befell him during the four years' conflict. With the surrender of the Confederates and the cessation of hostilities, he returned to his home in Lumpkin and entered the general merchandise business, which he conducted until 1875, and then moved to Atlanta, where he established a large wholesale grocery house, of which he is still owner and manager. Shortly after his locating in Atlanta he married Miss Louise, daughter of the late Lucius Mansfield of Lumpkin, Ga. In 1888 Mr. Boynton was elected to the city council of Atlanta from the second ward and held this office with credit for two years. In the same year he was honored with the appointment by the county commissioners of tax collector of Fulton county, to fill an unexpired term of six or eight months. Mr. Boynton's father and mother were natives, respectively, of New Hampshire and Virginia. The former was Hollis Boynton, a gallant soldier in the war of 1836, and died in 1847. The latter was Clara M. Rawson. To this tie were given four children: William W., lieutenant of Company K, Second Georgia infantry, who was killed at Sharpsburg; Charles E., a lieutenant in Company E of the Third Georgia cavalry, who survived the war and died in 1890; George H., of Atlanta, and Hollis A., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Boynton is a member of Trinity Methodist church of Atlanta. He is a broad-minded, experienced business man, and stands at the head of one of the oldest and most reliable grocery houses in the city.

MR. MORRIS BRANDON is one of the leading lawyers of Atlanta's bar, though one of its younger members. He was born in 1863, in Stewart county, Tenn., where his people before him have lived for a hundred years or more. He spent the entire period of his boyhood on his father's plantation, and by a judicious admixture of out-of-door work and recreation he succeeded in laying the foundation of a strong constitution, which was essential to the studious life that was to follow. The Brandon family is of English extraction. The grandfather of the subject of this sketch, Christopher Brandon, was a native of North Carolina, to which state his father emigrated early in the history of the colonies, and several of his sons, of whom there were a number, brothers and half-brothers of Christopher Brandon, distinguished themselves in the war of the American revolution. The name is a familiar one among old revolutionary annals. Early in his life, and in the pioneer days of that state, Christopher Brandon removed to Tennessee, where his son, Col. Nathan Brandon, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born. Col. Nathan Brandon was a prominent lawyer and successful business man. During the late war he served as lieutenant-colonel of the Fourteenth Tennessee regiment of infantry volunteers, remaining in the field until the battle of Fort Donelson. In this engagement he was so severely wounded as to be disqualified for further active duty. His gallantry as a soldier was recognized no less by his superior officers than by the men who fought under him, and his disabilities were regarded in the light of a calamity. Col. Brandon was a prominent figure for many years in the political life of Tennessee, and before the war was elected to the general assembly of that state as a Union man, and afterward served in both branches of the assembly a number of times. In 1870 he was a member of the constitutional convention held at Nashville. Col. Brandon died in April, 1891. The subject of this sketch, after receiving his preliminary education from the schools of Stewart county, entered a private institution at Elkton, Ky., for the purpose of preparing himself to enter college. He also carried on his studies for a while at Clarksville, Tenn., and in the fall of 1880 entered Vanderbilt university. After completing his academic course in that institution, he entered the law school at Yale, and graduated in 1884, with the degree of LL.B. Returning to his home in Stewart county, Tenn., he remained there until the winter of 1886, when he came to Atlanta and opened a law office, believing that he could make no better selection for the practice of his profession. He subsequently formed a partnership with Judge Henry B. Tompkins, the firm being that of Tompkins & Brandon. This firm enjoyed a fine practice, but the partnership was dissolved in 1889, and in 1893 the present firm of Brandon & Arkwright was formed, Mr. P. S. Arkwright, one of the most brilliant young lawyers of Georgia, being the junior member of the firm. Mr. Brandon, since locating in Atlanta, has made a splendid success of the practice of his profession. He is known as a hard worker, and the method, skill and patience with which he conducts his business won for him early in his professional career an enviable reputation with the courts and in the business world. Socially, he has always occupied a leading position, due to his elegant manners and his ripe intellectual and scholarly attainments. Genial and obliging, yet always dignified and reserved, Mr. Brandon inspires respect and makes permanent friends of those who come in contact with him. He is a member of quite a number of secret organizations, among them being the F. and A. M., the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Red Men. In each of these organizations he holds an influential position, and is universally esteemed for his sterling character and pre-eminent ability. In June, 1892, Mr. Brandon was united in marriage to Miss Harriet Inman, daughter of Mr. Walker P. Inman, of Atlanta. In his home life his disposition is portrayed in the genial light of those domestic qualities that indicate a thoroughly noble and splendid character.

WELLBORN MITCHELL BRAY, a practitioner of zest, earnestness and superior worth at the Atlanta bar, was born in Henry county, Ga., Aug. 29, 1835, and in 1847 moved with his parents to Atlanta. Here his mind was drilled in the primary branches and prepared for a higher education. He spent two years in the state university at Athens, Ga., and in 1855 graduated from Emory college, Oxford, Ga., with the degree of A. B. He read and studied law with Col. James Milner, of Cartersville, Ga., and was admitted to the active practice of his profession in 1858, at Cassville, Ga., and afterward located in Calhoun, Ga. During April, 1862, he enlisted in the Fortieth Georgia regiment, as a private. Earlier in the war he was elected captain of the Toombs volunteers, organized at Calhoun, but by reason of severe illness was unable to accept the command. After serving six months in the Fortieth regiment, he was authorized by the secretary of war to raise a siege artillery company. This he accomplished near Savannah, Ga., was chosen first lieutenant, and served in this capacity until early in 1865, when by reorganization this was changed into an infantry company, and Mr. Bray made captain of it. The close of the conflict found him in that position. He fought with laudable valor in the following battles: Dalton, Resaca, Rocky Ford, Kennesaw mountain, Atlanta, Franklin, Nashville and Pulaski, Tenn., and at New Hope church. In this last-named engagement he was wounded by the explosion of a shell. After the surrender Capt. Bray returned to Atlanta and established the first school in the city's limits. This he continued with unusual success and popularity, being associated with Prof. W. A. Bass and other noted instructors, until the public school system was founded. He was then elected principal of the Ivy street grammar school, taught there through the year 1873, and then resumed the practice of law. In 1886-87 he represented Fulton county in the state general assembly. While a member of this body he was appointed on the finance, educational and the committee on corporations, and bitterly opposed the convict lease system. His argument was termed "able, eloquent and masterly," and elicited the approval of the entire commonwealth. The peroration of his speech contained these memorable words: "No man is utterly irredeemable. But if you extinguish within him the light of hope, you educate him in crime. The lease system is an educator in crime, denying all the principles of humanity. Treat the convict as a human being and you may reform him." Capt. Bray was elected a member of the board of education in 1889, and was lately re-elected for a second term. He is a master Mason, a Red Man and a member of the Atlanta Pioneer society, and warmly co-operates with each. He is a city father who has guarded Atlanta's welfare faithfully.

COL. P. H. BREWSTER. It has been observed of the subject of this sketch that no lawyer in North Georgia is better equipped for the practice of his profession. A profound student, he has mastered by patient application, the great principles of the law, and is able to hold his own in controversy with the most distinguished talent of the land. Col. Brewster has practiced law in Atlanta for only a few years, but the extent of his qualifications for the practice was discovered as soon as he appeared in court for the first time, and his reputation as a lawyer has steadily grown until now he commands a large and lucrative practice, and in addition to this is a general favorite with the members of the Atlanta bar. Col. Patrick H. Brewster is a native Georgian, and was born in Campbell county, on his father's plantation, on Sept. 9, 1846. During his early childhood he moved with his parents to Coweta county and continued to reside in that county until his removal to Atlanta a few years ago. The father of Col. Brewster, whose name was James Brewster, was born in the state of South Carolina. He came to Georgia, however, during his early manhood, and died in this state in 1893. The family is noted for its longevity. The father of Col. Brewster died at the patriarchal age of ninety-four years. His grandfather, William Brewster, lived to be a hundred years old. If heredity furnishes any indication the subject of this sketch, though now in the prime of life, faces a vital prospect of fully half a century. The boyhood days of Col. Brewster were spent after the usual fashion of country boys in Coweta county. He received his primary instruction from the schools in Newnan, and acquired, by diligent application to his books, a fairly good education, as the basis of his subsequent career in the practice of his chosen profession. The subject of this sketch was too young to enter the Confederate army at the breaking out of hostilities. In the fall of 1863, however, being then only seventeen years old, he shouldered his musket and went to the front, enlisting as a private in Company A of the Fifty-sixth Georgia regiment. He served as a private soldier until the close of the war, surrendering with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in North Carolina. Col. Brewster was in the fight at Dalton, Ga., and the battles of Resaca and Kennesaw Mountain, receiving a severe wound in his arm at the latter place. He was also in the battles around Atlanta, Lovejoy Station and Jonesboro, and in all the fights that occurred on the way back to Nashville, Tenn., Gen. Hood having decided upon that route after the evacuation of Atlanta. He saw quite a lot of fighting after this at Columbia, Franklin, a two days' engagement at Nashville and a stubborn fight along the road to Pulaski. After reaching Jonesboro, N. C., the army surrendered. Returning to Newnan after the war the young soldier prosecuted his studies for a short while and then began to teach school. He continued in this latter occupation for about two years and then entered the university of Virginia, graduating from the law department of that institution in 1870 with the degree of bachelor of law. Returning to Newnan, Ga., he entered immediately upon the practice of his profession, remaining in that prosperous little Georgia town until 1891, when he came to Atlanta, becoming a member of the firm of Dorsey, Brewster & Howell. In 1877 Col. Brewster was elected to the state senate as a member from the Thirty-sixth senatorial district, for a term of four years. He was prevented, however, from serving for the full term on account of the action of the constitutional convention reducing its length. His career in that body was characterized by patriotism and ability. He was jealous of the welfare of his constituents and yet at the same time he allowed no selfish or local interests to interfere with the discharge of his public duty as a servant of the commonwealth. Col. Brewster was subsequently elected mayor of Newnan and filled that office acceptably for one term. Though not having any fondness for politics his regard for his party has impelled the subject of this sketch into many political campaigns. He has always been loyal to the principles of the democratic party, and has labored with sleepless devotion to rout, in every election, the organized forces of the opposition. His eloquence on the hustings has often revived the drooping hope of his party and urged its despairing members to an overwhelming victory. He has never been in any sense a political office-seeker, and all the honors that have come to him have been bestowed in the grateful appreciation of his fellow-countrymen. Col. Brewster belongs to no secret organization, but is a loyal and consistent member of the Methodist church, having been reared from boyhood in the faith of that denomination. Col. Brewster was united in marriage to Miss Laura Leigh, daughter of Anselm Leigh, of Newnan, Ga., in 1874. They have nine children, six boys and three girls, and the family group constitutes a delightful and interesting household. Five brothers of Col. Brewster, in addition to himself, served in the Confederate army, making a splendid contribution for one family. These brothers were William, who served in several regiments throughout the entire war; Daniel F., who served until the surrender; James P., who was major of the Fifty-sixth Georgia regiment, losing a leg at the battle of Kennesaw Mountain; Blake D., who served all through the war in several regiments, and Angus P., who served during the latter part of the war. They all made gallant soldiers, and displayed those characteristics that indicated a common brotherhood. No man in Atlanta is more highly esteemed than Col. Brewster, and it requires no prophetic ken to predict that abundant honors are in reserve for him in the practice of his profession. The opinion of a legal associate is considered of paramount value in forming a correct estimate of a lawyer's professional ability. The value of this opinion increases with the extent of this association and the opportunities afforded for reliable observation. One who has been closely associated with Col. Brewster for several years recently observed in conversation: "Col. Brewster is a lawyer pure and simple. In my judgment he is one of the ablest lawyers in the state. His knowledge of the law and his ready grasp of legal principles command my unbounded respect and admiration."

GARY SHERIFF BREWSTER is another of Atlanta's bright young business men. He is a Georgia boy, having first seen the light of day at Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., Nov. 5, 1858. His father's home was in Esom Hill, Polk Co., Ga., and there he spent his boyhood days, receiving his education at Hearn school, a branch of Mercer university, located at Cave Spring, Ga. He paid for his own schooling and is thus a self-made man. In 1880 he entered the employ of Barr & Leake, dry-goods merchants at Cedar Town, Ga. He remained there about two years, when he came to Atlanta and entered the employ of D. H. Dougherty & Co., with whom he was associated for about one year. He then accepted a position with A. M. Robinson & Co., wholesale notions and importers, and after two years as an employe, owing to his diligence and knowledge of the business, and without any solicitation on his part, he was made a member of the firm. In 1891, after six years of successful connection in this relation, Mr. Brewster retired and went into the real estate business with Col. W. A. Osborn, under the firm name of Osborn & Brewster. This partnership was continued very profitably two years, when Mr. Brewster joined Mr. John T. Moody in a private banking and fertilizer business under the name of Moody & Brewster. In May, 1895, the name was changed to the Moody Loan and Banking company. Mr. Brewster was for some time president of the Fulton Land Improvement company, and is now vice-president of and director of the concern. Mr. Brewster was married in Atlanta, Sept. 2, 1886, to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of the late William C. Redwine, of Heard county, Ga., and they have three children, all daughters: Jennie Beatrice, Elizabeth and Mary. He is a member and past grand of the fraternal order of Odd Fellows and I. O. R. M. and belongs to the Baptist church. Mr. Brewster is one of the progressive spirits whose energies wisely extended the past few years have pushed Atlanta to the front as a city possessing every facility for the manufacturer and merchant. Particularly useful has he been when in the real estate business in bringing to the city manufacturing enterprises and concerns. In a nut-shell, in a business way everything he touches turns to gold. He has been frequently solicited to accept political office, but has invariably declined, and has attended strictly to his business. Mr. Brewster has traveled extensively all over the United States and is thoroughly posted, and yet he still keeps up his studies, acquiring fresh knowledge every day, and is destined to be one of the financiers of the south.

WILLIAM H. BROTHERTON, dry goods merchant, Atlanta, Fulton Co., Ga., son of Rev. Levi and Winnie (Epperson) Brotherton, was born near Benton, Polk Co., Tenn., in 1839. His father was born in Greene county, Tenn., in 1810, and died Nov. 22, 1893. He was a devout and devoted member of the Methodist church, and as an ordained minister preached sixty or more years in Tennessee and Georgia. His mother, also, was a native of Tennessee. Capt. Brotherton came with his father in 1848 to Dalton county, where he was educated and grew to manhood. When fifteen years of age he engaged as a clerk with John F. Senter at Varnell's Station, Ga., on the E. T., Va. & Ga. railway, ten miles north of Dalton, Ga. At the end of a year he entered Brown & Crawley's drug store, Dalton, and remained a year or so, and then went into the dry goods store of C. B. Wellborn, Dalton. Soon afterward he was appointed to a position on the W. & A. road, which he retained until the election of Gov. Brown, who appointed John W. Lewis superintendent of the road, when he returned to the employ of Mr. Wellborn. At the age of nineteen (1858) he embarked in the dry goods business on his own account at Tilton, Ga., and continued until 1862. That year he enlisted in Company C—of which he was made second lieutenant—

Thirty-ninth Georgia regiment, at Big Shanty. With his regiment he served with Gen. E. Kirby Smith through the Kentucky campaign, after which he was made commissary, with the rank of captain, serving as such until the evacuation of Vicksburg. While in that city the Confederate congress abolished the office of regimental commissary. Capt. Brotherton, however, was re-appointed to the same service and rank by the secretary of war, and ordered to report to Maj. J. F. Cummings, general commissary, at Atlanta. He was first assigned to duty in Atlanta; afterward was transferred to Albany, Ga., where he built two packing houses and an abattoir, received all cattle from southwestern Georgia and Florida, and slaughtered and pickled them for the use of the army. From here he was sent to West Point, Ga., where he acted as post commissary for both West Point and La Grange, and issued provisions to troops in transit, and to those in hospitals at West Point and La Grange. Here, also, he received all "tax in kind" from north Alabama and Georgia, and disposed of it under orders, until the surrender. In April, 1865, immediately after the surrender, he came to Atlanta with $260, with which he bought goods of a Federal sutler, and under the firm name of W. H. Brotherton, began business on the spot where it is to-day. His excellent judgment and business sagacity are demonstrated by his owning the property now—one of the most valuable business corners in Atlanta, with a spacious and substantial brick business house upon it equal to any in the city for the business conducted in it, wholesale and retail dry goods and notions. Such a man as Mr. Brotherton could not well be ignored or overlooked in city affairs—so in 1868, he was elected a member of the city council, serving one term. In 1873 he was again elected, and, again in 1882-3. Afterward he was elected a police commissioner, and served seven or eight years. Being comparatively young, ambitious and energetic, wide awake and progressive, it may safely be assumed that, in some capacity, he will again be called into the public service, and that the service will be valuable to the city and county. Capt. Brotherton was married in his nineteenth year to Miss Paralee, who was only fifteen, daughter of the late W. M. Williams, of Dalton, Ga.; of the children which blessed this union the eldest, Emnia, who died at the age of twenty, was born before our subject was twenty-one. The following survive: Jimmie, wife of Frank A. Small, New York city; William M.; Frank M.; Charles H.; Paralee, wife of George I. Walker, Atlanta; Robert L.; Edgar; Libbie; Harold. Capt. Brotherton is a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church; a steward and trustee of Trinity church, Atlanta, the strongest Methodist church in Georgia, whatever point viewed from. On March 4, 1895, Capt. Brotherton was re-elected to the Atlanta police commission. A beloved and promising brother of Capt. Brotherton's—James M.—who was a lieutenant in Company C., Thirty-ninth Georgia regiment, was killed at Baker's Creek, near Jackson, Miss., April 19, 1863.

BROWN. In the opinion of the late Chief Justice Hiram Warner, the ablest argument ever made before the supreme court of Georgia was made by Julius L. Brown, of the Atlanta bar. The value of this high compliment, proceeding from the most distinguished jurist in the state, is still further increased by the fact that Mr. Brown at this time was one of the youngest members of the profession. Mr. Julius L. Brown was born at Canton, Cherokee Co., Ga., on May 31, 1848. His early boyhood was spent at the country home of his illustrious father, Hon. Joseph E. Brown, subsequently chief justice of the state, governor of Georgia and United States senator. Fired with patriotic love for the south, which had been overrun and devastated by the Federal army, young Brown, though only a lad of sixteen years, entered the Confederate service, in the ranks of the Georgia cadets, in 1864, and suffered the hardships and reverses of a soldier until peace was eventually declared between the north and south. Prior to the war, Mr. Brown resided in Milledgeville, Ga., his father having been called to the gubernatorial chair in 1857. Returning to Milledgeville after the war, the question of completing his education was the first one to present itself to the young soldier. He had been a student at the university high school, in Athens, a military institution of high grade, before entering the Georgia military institute. He was afterward in the Confederate service, and his first resolution on returning home was to enter the state university and complete his studies in that institution. Before doing so, however, he took a preparatory course under that eminent scholar and author, Richard Malcom Johnson, of Sparta, Ga. Entering the junior class of the state university in 1866, young Brown took an excellent stand from the very beginning, and was graduated with high distinction in 1868, having been honored with a speaker's place in both his junior and senior years. He began the study of law in his father's office immediately after leaving college, and in September, 1869, was admitted to the bar in De Kalb county. Before entering upon the practice of his profession, however, he decided to round his legal studies by taking a course of lectures at the Harvard law school. Here he acquitted himself with credit, bearing away one of the honors of the institution, in June, 1870. A pleasure trip of two months followed the arduous labors of the young law student, after which he located in Atlanta, becoming assistant United States attorney to Hon. John D. Pope, and remaining in that position until 1872. His partnership with Judge Pope was dissolved on account of the latter's removal to the state of Texas. Mr. Brown was subsequently made the sole general counsel for the Western & Atlantic railroad, retaining that important advisory position, and doing all the road's legal work, until 1891. Being a thorough student, Mr. Brown was diligent and painstaking in the preparation of his cases, and his abilities soon forced their way into general recognition. At his suggestion, the line of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railway was extended through Georgia, and as general counsel of the road for Georgia he drew up the bill which subsequently, in spite of overwhelming odds against him, secured a liberal charter from the general assembly. Though richly endowed with the social and personal characteristics that contribute to popularity, Mr. Brown devoted himself to the practice of his profession without seeking, or giving thought to, political preferment. Though frequently urged by his friends to represent the senatorial district and to allow the use of his name in the race for mayor of the city, he modestly but persistently declined. He also refused to become an applicant for the judgeship of the United States court for the northern district of Georgia in spite of urgent and general solicitation. Applying himself with zeal to the practice of his profession, which was steadily growing each year, Mr. Brown distinguished himself in quite a number of legal controversies, and came out with victorious laurels in nearly all of them. A promoter of the Metropolitan Street Railway company, Mr. Brown procured the charter for that corporation. As president of the mystic organization that gave street pageants each year and closed with a magnificent carnival, Mr. Brown became one of Atlanta's social leaders. But his versatility of enterprise and the spirit of promotion that made him one of the chief factors in Atlanta's development, did not end here. He became one of the leading spirits of the North Georgia Fair association, and as president of the Young Men's Library association of Atlanta he contributed largely to the growth and success of that institution. An elegant building on Decatur street was erected for the library during his administration. He organized the large coal and iron plants which have prospered under his control, and which are as follows: The Castle Rock coal company of Georgia, the Georgia Mining, Manufacturing & Investment company, the Dade Coal company, the Georgia Iron & Coal company, the Chattanooga Iron company, the Bartow Iron & Manganese company. As a lawyer Mr. Brown has successfully contended for these propositions: that the Western & Atlantic railroad is not taxable; that any railway may build telegraph lines in Georgia, and that common carriers may separate passengers by color. Each of these legal conventions has brought the abilities of Mr. Brown before the highest tribunal of the state and of the United States, and before the Interstate Commerce commission, and has added materially to his professional reputation. Notwithstanding these important and far-reaching legal questions, and the great business enterprises that have occupied his thought and time, Mr. Brown has found time to travel extensively, and to cultivate and gratify a taste for literature and art, and the gathering of relics of the past. His travels cover the United States, Canada, Mexico, the islands, Brazil and Europe, while the number, variety and rareness of his accumulation of works of art, antique and modern, and of valuable curiosities are indeed remarkable, and display an industry and tasteful discrimination truly wonderful. He has already 5,000 coins and 4,000 autographs; the original of Moore's Lalla Rookh, and photographs of persons of distinction and scenes of interest without number. No field has been left unexplored or ungleaned that promised to add to the value or interest of his vast and varied collection. As a host he stands unexcelled, has entertained the most eminent in the nation, including President Cleveland and Vice-President Hendricks, and entertains royally. His elegant and delightful home is charmingly presided over by one of the most accomplished of Georgia's daughters. Mr. Brown was married Nov. 3, 1871, to Miss Fannie G., daughter of Hon. Tomlinson Fort, eminent as a physician and medical author, and a member of congress—the only representative, it is said, to whom John C. Calhoun ever asked for an introduction. In 1880 Mr. Brown was admitted to the United States supreme court, being introduced by the late lamented senator, Benjamin H. Hill. Several years prior to this he was appointed standing master in chancery by Judge W. B. Woods and Judge John Erskine. Mr. Brown is now counsel for the Lowry Banking company. He was at one time counsel for the Citizens' bank and the Dollar Savings bank, both of which are now extinct. Mr. Brown was also attorney for the lessees of the Western & Atlantic railroad in the winding up of its affairs. Mr. Brown is one of the most distinguished Masons in the state. He has risen to the thirty-second degree in the rank of that ancient fraternity. He is a past high priest of Atlanta Zion chapter, royal arch Masons of Atlanta; eminent commander of the Coeur de Lion commandery, Knights Templar, of Atlanta; worshipful master of Georgia lodge, No. 96, of Atlanta; thrice illustrious master of Jason Burr council, No. 13, and grand principal conductor of the Grand council of Georgia; grand senior warden of the grand commandery of Georgia, and grand conductor of the high priesthood. Mr. Brown is a member of the Second Baptist church of Atlanta. He is still in the prime of life, and his career promises much in the way of continued honors to this useful and distinguished Georgian.

COL. EDWIN NASH BROYLES. In the judgment of his colleagues at the bar no lawyer in the state possesses a stronger legal faculty or is more familiar with the great underlying principles of the profession than Col. Edwin Nash Broyles. For more than forty years Col. Broyles has been successfully identified with the practice of the law, and though he has never held judicial office, his position at the bar has nevertheless been one of honor and respectability. The subject of this sketch was born in the famous county of Buncombe, N. C., on Nov. 14, 1829. His father, Maj. Cain Broyles, was a man of exceptional worth and character, who believed in rearing his children according to pious admonition and who especially enjoined upon them by way of example as well as parental precept the importance of acquiring industrious and economic habits. Though admitted to the bar of South Carolina, his native state, he gave up the practice of the law to engage in other pursuits. At the time of his son's birth he was engaged in constructing a turnpike road across the Tennessee line into Buncombe county, N. C., having moved with his family into that section of the state. Maj. Broyles was a militia officer in the war of 1812 and was stationed for quite a while at Fort Hawkins, Ga. He married Miss Lucinda Nash, a descendant of Col. John Nash, who was killed at the battle of Germantown during the American revolution, and from whom the city of Nashville, Tenn., was subsequently named. She was a lady of great worth in every sense. Nine children resulted from this union, the subject of this sketch being the seventh in the order of birth. His two youngest brothers died during the late war. One of them was killed at the battle of the Wilderness and the other one died in the hospital at Lynchburg. The birthplace of Col. Broyles was notable for its scenery and traditions. It was known as Painted Rock and was located on the French Broad river, one of the most picturesque and romantic streams in the state of North Carolina. This portion of the state is still a favorite resort of travelers, being diversified by the peaks of the Great Smoky mountains and situated only four miles south of the famous Hot Springs. The boyhood of Col. Broyles was spent along the border line of the two states. After leaving North Carolina his father took up his residence in Greene county, Tenn., living for a while at Greeneville, and afterward in the country on the turnpike road. From the schools in the neighborhood and from his parents, especially his mother, the subject of this sketch derived his early training. As soon as he was old enough to enter college he became a student at Washington college, Tennessee, then under the control of that able instructor, Prof. A. A. Doke. Prof. Doke was a graduate of Princeton college, New Jersey, and a gifted Presbyterian clergyman. The influence of his life and example upon the young students of Washington college was wholesome and inspiring. Under the instruction of this earnest man Col. Broyles increased his fondness for logic and philosophic reasoning, which led him at once into the practice of the law and has since characterized his career at the bar. Beginning the study of his chosen profession at Greeneville, he applied himself to his books with great diligence, though he lacked the aid of special instruction. For several months he filled the position of assistant clerk of the court and this brought him into gifted and distinguished company. Among the lawyers who practiced before the court of Greeneville were: Gen. Thomas D. Arnold, Judge Samuel Milligan, Wm. H. Sneed of Knoxville, and Thomas R. R. Nelson of Jonesboro. In listening to the eloquence of these strong advocates and watching their movements in the courtroom, the zeal of the young student was aroused to emulation and he resolved to devote himself with greater diligence than ever to the mastery of his profession. One of his favorite books was Nicholson's Encyclopaedia, a volume which had formerly belonged to his grandfather, Aaron Broyles. This book contained two articles on logic and philosophy, which deeply impressed his young mind and from the impetus thus given he was induced to read other volumes bearing upon the same subjects. Anthon's Classical Dictionary was another favorite companion of the young student. For more than a year after his admission to the bar Col. Broyles remained at his father's home in Tennessee and continued to prosecute his studies without interruption. He made no effort to secure clients, preferring to equip himself thoroughly for his life's work before entering the actual practice of his profession. Leaving Tennessee Col. Broyles came to Cedartown, Ga., in 1853.

He left Greeneville with the intention of locating in Dallas, Ga., but on his way to that place he spent the night with a man in Polk county who induced him to locate at Cedartown. He soon made friends at this place and met with no slight encouragement in his practice. In the spring of 1855 he was induced by some residents of the county to teach school for ten months in the year, which he consented to do, thereby adding several hundred dollars to his purse. Two years later he was appointed by Gov. Brown to compile the legislative statutes for 1857, which work he performed to the satisfaction of the chief executive and members of the bar. During his leisure intervals Col. Broyles devoted himself to legal and miscellaneous reading and began to build up a library, legal and literary, which has since grown to be among the largest in the state. At the outbreak of the war, Col. Broyles returned to Tennessee and wedded Miss Elizabeth N. Arnold, the daughter of Gen. Thomas D. Arnold. This gifted lady, who died several years ago, was one of the most cultivated and brilliant women of this generation. Her literary productions were eagerly read all over the south and her talents were recognized by many of the leading publications of the country. She was richly endowed with all the true womanly virtues. During the war Col. Broyles served on the governor's staff and rendered much valuable aid to the Confederacy. In 1865 he located in Rome, Ga., being associated with Hon. Augustus R. Wright. During his residence in Rome his firm brought suit against the railroad in behalf of Mr. James D. Waddell for $20,000. After filing the suit, plaintiff's counsel asked for the privilege of increasing these figures to $50,000, which was granted them. The case was tried before the jury and a verdict awarding the plaintiff $35,000 was returned, the largest award ever known at the time. A compromise, however, was subsequently effected between the defendant and the railroad. Col. Broyles came to Atlanta in 1868. For several years he was associated in the practice with his brother-in-law, Col. Reuben Arnold. Since his removal to Atlanta his career at the bar has been a successful one, and many important cases have been entrusted to his management. No lawyer at the bar possesses the faculty of discrimination to a more conspicuous degree than Col. Broyles. His grasp of legal principles is quick and accurate and his judgment is seldom at fault in matters of law and equity. His reputation at the bar is that of a profound legal scholar and a man of absolute and unimpeachable integrity. Col. Broyles was married the second time in 1883 to Miss Sallie Trippe Hardy, the daughter of Dr. Weston Hardy, of Bartow county, and granddaughter of the late Judge Turner Trippe of that circuit. Though frail in health Mrs. Broyles is a lady of culture and refinement and possessed of many amiable and charming qualities. By his first wife Col. Broyles has four children: Hon. Arnold Broyles, alderman from the south side and mayor pro tem. of the city of Atlanta; Judge Nash R. Broyles, United States commissioner; Mrs. Loyd Parks and Bernard C. Broyles, deputy city tax receiver. By his second wife he has only one child, Harold Hardy Broyles. The home life of Col. Broyles is a pleasant and happy one. In addition to this he commands the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens and the universal regard of the bench and the bar.

COL. ALFRED E. BUCK, Atlanta, Fulton Co. Among the citizens of Georgia who have taken a leading and influential part in the upbuilding of the commonwealth since the late destructive war between the states quite a large number have come from the north. It is a striking illustration of the fact that sectional strife is at an end to see the cordial manifestation of friendship on the part of the people of this state in extending the right hand of fellowship to those progressive and enterprising recruits from the north. Col. Alfred E. Buck may not improperly be classed among these adopted citizens of Georgia. He has now been a resident of this state for more than twenty years, and, in spite of his staunch republican leadership, which served for a number of years as a wall of isolation between his democratic neighbors and himself, no man is to-day more universally respected on account of his personal qualities and his exalted character as a man. Col. Buck is a native of far-off Maine, and was born at Foxcroft, in that state, on Feb. 7, 1832. His father, Benjamin T. Buck, was a Baptist deacon, and a man of deep piety. His great-grandfather, in whose veins the blood of old England coursed, settled in Buckfield, Me., to which locality his own name was subsequently given. The family of Col. Buck's mother, whose maiden name was Elmira Todd, came from Connecticut and settled in New Brunswick. Possessed of a strong ambition that asserted itself early in boyhood, the subject of this sketch, without visible means at his command, made up his mind to secure a collegiate education. As the result of this determination he managed to raise the money and to pay his own way through college, graduating in 1859 from Waterville college, now Colby university, as Latin salutatorian, one of the highest honors of the institution. He taught school at Hallowel, Me., in 1859-60, and was principal of the Lewiston high school at the breaking out of the late war. He was not accepted on his first enlistment in the Federal army, but having made up his mind to serve, he raised a company at his own expense and went into camp in November, 1861. Being chosen as the captain of this company, he was assigned to duty in the Thirteenth regiment of Maine volunteers. He served on the Mississippi coast, at Ship Island, Fort Pike and Fort McComb. After this he organized the Ninety-first Colored infantry, and was chosen as the lieutenant-colonel of that regiment in 1863. In the following year he was appointed lieutenant-colonel in command of the Fifty-first Colored infantry. He was ordered to Vicksburg in November, 1864, and assigned to duty as the second officer on the board of examination to select white officers for colored regiments. Col. Buck led his regiment in the capture of Fort Bleckley, at Mobile, when the Federals captured 2,500 men. He was breveted colonel for this assault and made division inspector-general in April, 1865. Two months later he was made inspector-general for Western Louisiana, and in this capacity he inspected troops and located depots for supplies furnished by the government to the people made destitute by the floods of that year. He was a member of the military commission at New Orleans for the department of the gulf during the winter of 1865-66, and was released from military service in 1866. He engaged for a short while in the manufacture of turpentine on Montgomery Island, in Mobile Bay, but he sustained the loss of his outfit by fire in 1867. Col. Buck was a delegate to the reconstruction convention of Alabama, and was made chairman of the committee on preamble and bill of rights. In December, 1867, he was appointed by Gen. Pope clerk of the Mobile county state court, and was subsequently elected a member of the city council of Mobile in 1868. Higher political honors awaited the industrious suitor for distinction. In 1869 he took his seat as a member of the forty-first congress and secured the first $50,000 appropriation from the government for the Mobile harbor. He declined to be a candidate for re-election. Again in 1873 Col. Buck became a member of the city council of Mobile, and was chosen to serve as president of that body. He resigned this position, however, and moved to Atlanta, becoming the clerk of the United States circuit and district courts of Georgia. He resigned the district clerkship in 1887, and two years later was appointed marshal for the northern district of Georgia under President Harrison. He remained in this office, filling the position acceptably to the citizens of the district, until his successor under President Cleveland was duly qualified.

Col. Buck was a Grant presidential elector from Alabama in 1868, and a member from Georgia in the national republican conventions of 1880, 1884, 1888 and 1892. He has been the chairman of the state delegation in the last three conventions. Since 1882 Col. Buck has been the chairman of the Georgia state central republican committee. He has been a director, secretary and treasurer of the Tecumseh Iron company, Cherokee county, Ala.; president of the Wilson Ridge Ore company, Calhoun county, Ala., and president of the South Atlanta Land company. Though Col. Buck has frequently been a target for his political enemies and many unkind things have been said of him by reason of his influential connection with the dominant party in the gloomy years that followed the war, no aspersion has ever been cast upon his personal honor and no one has ever questioned his loyalty either to principle or to party. Atlanta is jealous of his citizenship and Georgia is proud to own him as her adopted son. Col. Buck was united in marriage to Miss Ellen B. Baker, daughter of Judge H. K. Baker, of Maine, in 1864. He is an attendant of the Presbyterian church, of which his wife is a member, and his home-life is that of a man who believes in doing all he can to make it a paradise on earth.

RUFUS BROWN BULLOCK, ex-governor of Georgia, Atlanta, was born in Bethlehem, Albany Co., New York, March 28, 1834. When he was six years old his parents moved to Albion, Orleans Co., New York, where his education was completed by graduation from Albion academy in 1850—of whose Alumni association he is now a member. Just at that time the electric telegraph was being constructed and operated through New York state. He became deeply interested in the House printing telegraph system, rapidly gained the mastery of the process, and although only seventeen years of age, took a leading position as an expert. Prescott's History of the Telegraph, and Reid's The Telegraph in America, give extensive flattering notices of him as an expert operator and organizer. It is said that he was the first operator able to read by sound. He was the inventor of the combination printing telegraph instrument, and was the electrician, operator and manager inaugurating the printing telegraph system in New York city, Buffalo, Rochester, Utica and Albany, New York; Springfield, Mass., and Philadelphia, Penn. His special ability as an executive officer forced him to the front, and he was soon found in Philadelphia in charge of a rival line which broke down the monopoly and brought about a more general use of the telegraph in business and social intercourse. His persistency and untiring industry and energy and his wonderful ability as an organizer attracted the attention of the managers of the express service. His services were secured by Mr. Dinsmore, president of the Adams Express company, and in 1857 he was appointed assistant superintendent of the Adams Express company, to extend that service in the south, with headquarters at Augusta, Ga. Just prior to the late civil war the Southern Express company was organized with H. B. Plant as president and Mr. Bullock as secretary, and the new company purchased all of the Adams Express company's interests in the southern states. By reason of heavy domestic affliction and impaired health Mr. Plant was compelled to seek rest and relaxation in Europe; and Mr. Bullock, who was made trustee, secretary and superintendent on the organization of the company in 1860, was in the active control of its affairs. Under his direction telegraph lines were constructed on interior routes—primarily to promote the efficient management of that service; but when the regular telegraph lines along the coast were captured by the Federal forces, the interior lines established by his foresight, proved of inestimable value. It was over these wires that communication was maintained between President Davis and Generals Lee,

Beauregard and Johnston and, also, it was over these same wires that the restraining order was telegraphed by Gen. Sherman from Greensborough, N. C., to the Federal forces which were marching to destroy Macon and Augusta. Under Superintendent Bullock's orders the Southern Express company's agents all over the south took charge of contributions of food and clothing for Gen. Lee's army, which were forwarded free and distributed to the persons to whom directed. Under an order of the war department he was appointed acting assistant quartermaster-general of the Confederate states army in charge of railroad transportation, with the rank of colonel—and as such was paroled at Appomattox in April, 1865. Gov. Bullock's war experience in the telegraph and express business seemed to have imbued him with the spirit of internal improvement—the main spring of his subsequent career. His first service after the war was looking to the welfare of Augusta and Georgia. The war left the south without currency. The land was left, and crops were in the ground, but there was no money with which to move the products. Commercial stagnation prevailed. Gov. Bullock went to New York, where he secured capital, and went thence to Washington city, where he obtained a charter, for a national bank which was soon organized in Augusta, of which he was made a director. Thus Augusta by having $500,000 in bank notes in circulation a few months after the surrender, gained a vantage ground which gave the boom that placed her in the front rank of southern industrial centers. Not long afterward he became president of the Macon & Augusta railway, and found its affairs were in such a state of prostration he could do nothing without money; so he again applied for aid to his moneyed friends in the north. But the antagonism between President Johnson and Congress as to the methods of reconstruction was so strong and bitter, that the prevailing sentiment was one of opposition to investments in the south. Said New York capitalists: "We prefer not to put our money into a country where there is no civil government. In fact, from one standpoint Georgia is not back into the Union. If you will go home and bring Georgia into the list of well ordered states within the Union, you can have all the money you want." This was the occasion of Gov. Bullock's embarking on the sea of politics. He allied himself with a number of progressive men—a constitutional convention was called and he took an active part in its proceedings. The controlling idea in his mind was to provide state aid to railways with a view to the speedy development of Georgia's resources. The new constitution (1868), embodying and vitalizing his idea by authorizing state aid; a broad, comprehensive and liberal policy in behalf of public schools; and other progressive lines of policy, was framed and afterward adopted by the people. Atlanta was made the capital of the state, and he was elected governor, and a general assembly returned favorable to liberal, progressive legislation. The long and permanent strides Georgia has made are directly traceable to the enactments of that general assembly and Gov. Bullock's administration—an impetus was imparted which subsequent inertia, and attempted obstructive measures have been powerless to impede. Hundreds of miles of railway were very soon built, which, later, stimulated such enterprise in this direction as to advance Georgia to the front in the south. To the legislation of this period is largely due the building of the Georgia Air Line, Brunswick, Albany & Georgia Pacific and the rehabilitation of the Macon & Brunswick. Under his direction as governor and ex-officio president of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, a scheme was inaugurated by which thirty-three railways in the south made a two-cents-a-mile prospecting rate over their lines which brought thousands south to "spy out the land," with a view to settlement and investment; and under it the famous press excursion in the summer of 1869 was projected. These two excursions did more than had ever been done before to attract attention to the vast and varied wonderful resources of the south—particularly of Georgia—the empire state of the south. In accordance with his recommendation the general assembly authorized the lease of the Western & Atlantic railway for twenty years—which being consummated brought into the state treasury $6,000,000—the road on the termination of the lease being in better condition and more valuable than when leased. Following out his wise and statesmanlike policy the road has again been leased—this time for $35,000 monthly rental, which in twenty years will give an income of $8,400,000. When at the ensuing election—1870—it was found that the general assembly would be overwhelmingly against him, he resigned. At this time, without just cause, he was probably the most hated of men. Two indictments were found against him—one for alleged conspiracy to defraud the state; the other for failure to account for certain bonds alleged to have been delivered by the city to the executive department. For seven years he announced himself ready and vainly endeavored to have the cases tried. Meanwhile he was living in Atlanta, working for her interests, his general bearing and uniform courtesy and true manliness of character breaking down the hate and animosity borne toward him and when at last the cases were tried Gov. Bullock was completely and triumphantly vindicated by a formal verdict of the jury; and to-day no citizen more fully enjoys the respect and confidence of the people who see and associate with him daily, and to whom he is best known. A scrutinizing investigation conducted by those inimical to him, proved that instead of conspiring to defraud the state by the payment of money under his order to a “bogus corporation for imaginary cars,” the corporation was a bona-fide enterprise, one of whose managers was the late Major Campbell Wallace, which actually delivered the most substantial cars and in excess of the money paid them. On trial of the other indictment for failure to account for certain bonds it was proven that they never reached the executive department, much less Gov. Bullock—but were passed directly from the mayor to Mr. H. I. Kimball, whose property they were, in payment for the old capitol building. For more than a score of years Gov. Bullock has been a very valuable and important actor in, and the promoter of every movement intended to advance the interests of Atlanta and of Georgia and the south. He was among the foremost and most prominent of those who conducted the exposition of 1871; still more active and influential for good in the International Cotton Exposition of 1881; and was one of the most efficient members of the committee conducting the arrangements for the great Cotton States and International Exposition, held this year (1895). He opposed the expulsion of the colored members from the general assembly, maintaining their right to hold office, and was sustained by the United States congress, under whose decision they were resealed and received their per diem. He was largely instrumental in building the Atlanta Cotton mill (the first) in the city, of which he was president and treasurer ten years, 1881-1891—an enterprise which has been followed by two others of much larger capacity. He was for years a director in the chamber of commerce, and for two years recently its popular president; has been president of the Commercial club and vice-president of the Capital City club; and for four years was government director of the Union Pacific railway. Gov. Bullock was married in 1860, and has two sons and a daughter who were born in Augusta. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church, of which he has been junior and senior warden, and is now a delegate-elect to the national convention of the church to be held in Minneapolis this fall.

MR. W. H. BURDEN. One of the most successful business men of Georgia, who has recently become identified with the Gate City of the south, is William H. Burden of the wholesale establishment of Coleman, Burden & Warthen company. Mr. Burden is of Scotch descent and many of his sturdy characteristics have been derived from his Caledonian ancestry. His great-grandfather, Thomas Burden, emigrated to this country from Scotland in 1730 and settled in Caroline county, Va. He continued to reside at this place until 1770, when he moved to Newberry district, S. C. He subsequently figured in the war of the revolution. His son, William Burden, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Newberry district in 1771 and died in Twiggs county, Ga., in 1836, leaving four children, of whom Thomas L. Burden was the oldest. He was born in Newberry district on Jan. 25, 1809, the anniversary of the birth of Robert Burns, the peasant poet of Scotland. On Feb. 6, 1834, he was united in marriage to Miss Sarah Barfield, the daughter of Richard and Sarah Barfield, of Jones county. Seven children resulted from this union. They were as follows: Nancy, the widow of Rev. John Jarrell, of Jones county; Sarah J., the wife of Richard Barfield, deceased; Wm. Henderson; Chapman, who was in Company F, Forty-fifth Georgia regiment, and killed at the battle of Manassas; Thomas J., living in Houston county, Ga.; Rhoda C., died at the age of eighteen years; Richard F., a merchant of Macon, Ga. William Henderson was the eldest son and third among the children in order of birth. He first saw the light of day in Jones county on May 26, 1839. The father of this large and promising household was a man of exceptional character. He exercised a strong influence over the community in which he lived, occupying many important positions, and died on Jan. 28, 1867, greatly beloved by all who knew him. His marriage with Sarah Barfield was a very fortunate alliance. This charming and cultivated lady was attractive not only in her manifold personal charms, but for the additional reason that she belonged to one of the oldest and most respectable families of the state. Young William's boyhood was passed amid the rural scenes of Jones county. As soon as he was old enough to attend school he began to apply himself with great diligence to his books, and divided his time between the school-room and the plantation. His opportunities for learning were not the best in the world, but he made the best use of them. His father was a great sufferer from rheumatism and this frequently compelled the lad to take the lead and give directions as to the management of the farm. Though reared among the furrows, so to speak, the lad's ambition was not satisfied with his narrow lot. His restless spirit yearned for a broader field of activity and his ardent young fancy pictured to him as he toiled away at the plow the busy life of a city merchant. He read the newspapers and kept himself thoroughly posted on all the current happenings of the day. In the midst of these day dreams and preparation a messenger came to the farm bearing him a letter from a man whom he had never met. As the result of this correspondence he became a clerk in the house of Samuel Griswold, a wealthy manufacturer, who had come to Georgia from Connecticut, settling about four miles from the Burden farm. The duty of the young clerk was to manage the postoffice and look after various important matters connected with the factory. He remained in the service of Mr. Griswold for four years, and during that time enjoyed his absolute confidence in all matters pertaining to the business. Realizing his need of a better education, he decided, after the expiration of this time, much to the regret of his employer, who offered to increase his salary, to give up his position. Accordingly in 1859 he matriculated as a student in Prof. Scudder's academy at Midway. His progress in his studies was rapid and he soon ranked among the leading members of his class. Just at this time, however, a second surprise in the shape of a letter came to him from a business firm in New Orleans offering him a responsible clerkship at a splendid salary. The offer was such a handsome one that he felt constrained, under the advice of his teacher and his own good judgment, to alter his original plans and accept this flattering proposition. He was only twenty-one years of age at the time of setting out for New Orleans. He remained with the house until the spring of 1862 and then left for the front to encounter the hardships of a soldier's life. The martial spirit of New Orleans was very deeply stirred on account of the fact that Gen. Beauregard, who commanded in the battle of Fort Sumter, was a resident of that city. The men for whom Mr. Burden worked, however, were of northern birth, though friendly in their attitude toward the south. Regarding it his duty, and having the welfare of his state and country at heart, in 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Forty-fifth regiment, Georgia volunteers. Leaving the local troops at New Orleans, he set out for Virginia and joined the above regiment, commanded by Col. Thomas Hardeman. He remained at the front until the fall of Petersburg in 1865. Among the battles he participated in were: Mechanicsville, Cedar Run, Second Manassas, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, the Wilderness and Petersburg. For quite a while he served on the staff of Gen. Thomas as a special aide to that officer. On his way home after the war the young soldier passed through Atlanta, then a heap of smoke and ashes, little dreaming that he would ever become one of the citizens and participate in the prosperity of its resurrection. After reaching home he applied for a position on the Central railroad and was made assistant treasurer of the road. This position he filled until 1869. He was then tendered a position in the house of Ross & Coleman, at Macon, Ga., becoming the bookkeeper and credit man of that establishment. After two years in that position he was admitted into a partnership, the firm's name being changed to Ross, Coleman & Co. In 1876 Mr. Ross withdrew, after which the business was continued by S. T. Coleman & Co. Two years later it was changed to Coleman, Burden & Co., and again in 1889 it was incorporated under the name of the Coleman & Burden company. In 1893 a new charter was obtained and the establishment has since been known by the mercantile name of the Coleman, Burden & Warthen company, the principal headquarters being in Atlanta. The house is one of the largest in the southern states, and the business is restricted entirely to the sale of boots and shoes. Mr. Burden is in charge of the financial affairs of the establishment, and under his able management the business has steadily grown each year. Mr. Burden was united in marriage Sept. 27, 1867, to Miss Sarah D. Barnes, of Clinton, Ga., a daughter of James G. and Susan Barnes. This union has been blessed with seven children, three sons and four daughters, viz.: Ida S., now Mrs. G. W. Coates; Annie M., died at the age of seventeen; William Chapman, now connected with the firm of his father; Pauline, wife of Mr. P. B. Murphey, cashier of the Newnan Banking company; Emmie May, Dudley H., Albert J. Their home life is a very happy one. Mr. Burden has never sought political honors nor cared for public office of any kind. He takes a deep interest, however, in all that concerns the welfare of the state and nation. Though rigid in the enforcement of all the rules pertaining to his large establishment, Mr. Burden is a kind-hearted and considerate man and is greatly beloved by all the clerks in his employ. He is a member of the First Methodist church of this city and believes strongly in the doctrines of that denomination. Atlanta is proud of the influence and prestige of this upright citizen.

For many years the captain of the Gate city guard, one of the oldest military organizations in Atlanta, he extended the fame of that company into one of national reputation and earned for himself the distinction of commanding the crack company of the south. Col. Burke is a native of the state of South Carolina. His extraction is Norman-Irish, and the martial spirit that dominates his life and character is derived from his Norman ancestry. It was the Normans who introduced the tournament into England and the various exercises of the sword and lance belonging to the lists of chivalry. The original name of the family was Du Burgh. This, in course of time, was Anglicized into Burke. The American pioneer of this distinguished family emigrated from England to Pennsylvania in 1658. The family subsequently divided into branches, one settling in the state of Maryland and the other locating in South Carolina. Hon. Adams Burke, the chancellor of South Carolina during the revolution, was a member of this branch of the family. The subject of this sketch was a resident of South Carolina at the beginning of the late war. He had barely completed his studies and was still a mere youth at the time. He promptly enlisted, however, in the ranks of the First South Carolina regiment, and just eleven days after the withdrawal of that state from the union he went on duty on Morris island, in Charleston harbor. This place was subsequently the scene of one of the most terrific battles of the war. It was from this island that the first gun, in the hands of Maj. Stevens, who was then in command of the company, fired the opening salutatory of the struggle. On Jan. 9, 1861, the "Star of the West," a United States vessel, bearing troops, provisions and ammunition for Fort Sumter, made an effort to enter Charleston harbor. It was fired on, however, by the battery erected on Vinegar hill, and several lives were lost on board. The behavior of Col. Burke throughout the entire war was gallant and meritorious. In 1867 the United States government, by an act of congress, apportioned a large part of the public lands to the different states for educational purposes. Georgia, under this apportionment, received 243,000 acres. The management of the sale of this land was intrusted by the governor of the state to Col. Burke, who realized from its sale the sum of $250,000, which was paid into the state treasury. Col. Burke was united in marriage to Miss Cotting, the daughter of Judge David G. Cotting, at that time the secretary of state, in 1868. Since then he has resided in Atlanta without interruption. The command of the Gate city guard was offered to Col. Burke in 1877. His first impulse was to decline this high compliment, but, after mature deliberation, he decided to accept it. Shortly after assuming the active command he conceived the idea of making an extensive tour of the United States in the interest of peace and reconciliation. The company was composed of Atlanta's flower, and every profession and pursuit was represented. The members of the company took eagerly to the suggestion of Col. Burke, and the trip was decided upon with great enthusiasm. The trip is known in the annals of the company as "The Tour of the Guard." It was made in the fall of 1879, and embraced the northern and eastern states of the union. From the hour of departure until the moment of arrival the trip was one continuous ovation. In every city the company was greeted by the populace, and public receptions were given to its members. Richmond, Washington, Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Hartford, Boston, Lawrence and Poughkeepsie were among the places visited. In New York city the enthusiasm was so great that hundreds of people, including prominent business men, joined the procession and marched in rear of the guards. From housetops and windows handkerchiefs were waved in joyful salutation as the company passed along the streets under the banners of the Seventh regiment of New York. The patriotic mission of the company in undertaking this tour of the country is distinctly set forth in one of the eloquent speeches of Col. Burke, delivered in the city of Boston. Said he: "It may be asked, why do we come here clothed in the trappings of war? I will tell you. Our garb is not unknown to you. You have seen it before. You have seen it in war; it is brought to you in peace. It recalls memories that are sacred to both of us. You do not ask us to bury these memories; we do not ask you to obliterate yours. There is not a vacant chair in our southern homes that has not its counterpart in northern households. We come to test the temper of our countrymen; to sound their patriotism and sacrifice their animosities on the altar of fraternal peace. Good will in our hearts and the national emblem in our hands is all we have to offer; will you accept them? (Cries of yes, yes, and cheers.) We come to shake your hands in fraternal greeting; we come to break bread with you, and to say to you in the words of Ruth to Naomi, 'Henceforth thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.'" The delivery of this speech was greeted with loud acclaim, and for several minutes the wildest enthusiasm prevailed. The tour of the guard occupied three weeks. Returning to Atlanta a warm reception awaited them at home. It was realized from the reports that came back to the city that a long step had been taken in the direction of reconstruction, and the credit for this better feeling of brotherhood was due to Col. Burke and to the members of his company. But Col. Burke was not satisfied with this accomplishment. He decided to put forth his efforts to secure the erection of a handsome building to be known as the Memorial armory, and to be commemorative of the trip. A large fair was projected, and the military organizations of the state were invited to be guests of the city. Two hundred ladies agreed to contribute their influence and efforts to promote the success of the undertaking. The fair was a brilliant success. Military organizations came to the city, representing the states of Alabama, Connecticut, South Carolina, Massachusetts, New York, Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, Georgia and Illinois. After a successful continuance of the fair for two weeks enough money was realized to purchase a lot and insure the success of the undertaking. Col. Burke resigned the command of the Gate city guard in 1883 to become the chief officer of the staff of Gov. Alex. H. Stephens. He occupied that position until the death of Gov. Stephens a few months later. Subsequently induced to accept the command of the guard for a second time, Col. Burke conceived the idea of making a tour of Europe, and to this end received flattering invitations and assurances of courtesy from France, Germany, Belgium and other European countries. A vessel was chartered and every preparation was made for the trip, when finally the consummation was defeated by official objection. England refused to allow the troops to land on her soil and the enterprise was abandoned. A graceful and ready speaker, Col. Burke has had abundant opportunities for entering public life, but he has never cared for such honors. In a quiet way, however, and in military circles, he has accomplished a great deal in behalf of the city. He was one of the projectors of the first benevolent home ever organized in Atlanta, and fostered the enterprise from which the first $5,000 was realized for the building up of the Young Men's Library association. His associates on the board of directors were Henry W. Grady, Julius L. Brown, Benjamin H. Hill, Jr., Marshall J. Clarke, and Henry Hillyer and others. Col. Burke is a practical church member. His example is that of a dignified, useful, conscientious citizen, successful in his undertakings, and in this light he is admired and respected by all classes in the community.

GEORGE AUGUSTUS CABANISS. In the western limits of Forsyth, the county seat of Monroe county, Ga., stands an old ante-bellum house of the better class, erected in 1842 by Judge Elbridge Guerry Cabaniss. This old building, considered a very fine one fifty years ago, is still a comfortable dwelling, and, as it properly should be, is yet in the Cabaniss family, being owned and occupied by the Hon. Thomas B. Cabaniss, ex-representative of the Sixth district in congress. It is surrounded by a magnificent grove of ancient oaks, ten acres in extent, which may well be considered historic ground, for many of the most memorable debates ever heard in Georgia occurred in the shade of these old trees. Here, in 1848, Walter T. Colquitt and Herschell V. Johnson, champions of democracy, and Robert Toombs and Alexander Stephens, upholding the standard of the whigs, moved the assembled hosts by their eloquence; and here, in later days, the matchless tongues of B. H. Hill, John B. Gordon and others thrilled the listening crowds. Within one hundred yards of where the old Cabaniss homestead now stands was born on Dec. 12, 1832, Mr. George Augustus Cabaniss, the subject of this short sketch. He was brought up and educated in Monroe county, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1855, and practiced in Monroe county until April, 1861, when as first lieutenant Quitman guards, Company K, First Georgia regiment, he enlisted and served twelve months. He was in the famous retreat from Laurel Hill, in which Gen. Garnett was killed. On the expiration of his twelve months' term he was assigned to post duty with the rank of first lieutenant in the enrolling service. On Dec. 16, 1856, five years before the civil war began, Mr. G. A. Cabaniss married Miss Juliet McKay, of Monroe county, a lady who must have been very beautiful in her younger days, judging from her appearance now; and certainly her refined manner and kindly disposition have endeared her to all so fortunate as to be numbered among her friends. This happy union has been blessed with three children: Edward H., a prominent and rising lawyer of Birmingham, Ala.; Daniel M., cashier of a large national building and loan association; and Miss Juliet, a very bright and attractive young lady, now at the Lucy Cobb institute, Athens, Ga. After the war, Mr. Cabaniss returned to Forsyth, and engaged first in mercantile, then in the cotton warehouse business. He remained in Forsyth until 1885, when he was appointed to the revenue service, with headquarters in Macon, Ga., where he remained until 1889. In the fall of 1889, Mr. Cabaniss removed with his family to Atlanta, Ga., and was immediately thereafter appointed acting secretary of a national building and loan association, "The Southern Home," just then organized. Not long after the organization of the foregoing institution, Mr. Cabaniss was elected a director in the same; and subsequently its general manager, which highly responsible position he still occupies. By his close attention to business, and conscientious discharge of the weighty duties devolving upon him, Mr. Cabaniss has contributed very much to the wonderful growth and extraordinary success of this association, which now has assets amounting to over $1,250,000, and local branches throughout the southern states. In 1882, Mr. Cabaniss was appointed trustee of the state lunatic asylum by Gov. Colquitt, and has been one of the trustees ever since, except two years, when pressing engagements prevented him serving. He is now president of the board and has been since 1889. Mr. Cabaniss is a Knight Templar Mason, and a prominent member of the Baptist church. Mr. Cabaniss is a large man, not only in body, but also in the possession of the greater and nobler qualities of heart and soul, which go to make up the full stature of a man. Of hasty temper, quick to resent an injury, he is equally ready to forgive and forget a wrong, or to make the "amende honorable" when convinced that he has done injustice to another. Generous to a fault, no one in distress ever appealed to him for sympathy or aid in vain. Mr. Cabaniss loves his family, his friends, and good living, which he has always had. Genuine, unstinted southern hospitality is always found at his home, a handsome new house at Copenhill, one of the prettiest suburbs of Atlanta; and here may a kind Providence bless him with health, happiness and many years.

JUDGE WILLIAM LOWNDES CALHOUN was born in Decatur, Ga., Nov. 21, 1837, where he lived until fifteen years of age, attending school and then came to Atlanta in company with his parents. Here he continued his studies and completed his primary education. At the age of sixteen years he entered the law office of his father, and after three years' application was admitted to the bar. He immediately formed a partnership with his father, which lasted until the death of the latter in 1875. Judge Calhoun practiced alone from 1875 to January, 1881. In March, 1862, he took up arms in defense of the south, enlisting in Company K, Forty-second Georgia volunteers, and received the appointment of first lieutenant, but was soon after advanced to the captaincy when the regiment was permanently organized. He held this rank throughout the four years' conflict. His bravery in battle was unquestioned and rewarded by substantial recognition since the "days of '65." He was at Cumberland Gap; in the struggles around Vicksburg, lasting for six months, and forty-seven days in the trenches there; at Baker's creek and the bridge across Big Black river; in the skirmishes on the memorable retreat from Dalton to Resaca, including heavy onsets, in which Judge Calhoun commanded four companies, and the battle of Rocky Face, and at Resaca, where he fought two days continuously and was severely wounded. When the surrender occurred he was en route to Greensboro, N. C., having partially recovered, and with the intention of rejoining his command. As soon as his injuries permitted a long journey, he returned to Atlanta, and resumed the practice of law. In 1872 he was elected to represent Fulton county in the state legislature, and served during the sessions of 1873-74, and 1875-76, being re-elected after the expiration of the first term. In the first session he was appointed on the following committees: General judiciary, corporations and finance; in the second he retained the former appointments. In 1878 he was elected mayor of Atlanta, serving two years. When he went into office there existed a floating debt of $600,000, on which a high rate of interest was being paid. He funded this at 6 per cent. during his administration, and also improved the sanitary and street paving systems. From 1889 until 1894 he was president of the Confederate Veterans' association of Fulton county. When elected the membership numbered only twelve or fifteen, but when he retired it has increased to 700, and greater interest was manifested in the organization. Judge Calhoun is a master Mason, an Odd Fellow, and was made lieutenant-colonel of the Fourth Georgia battalion in 1890, resigning after a service of three years. In September, 1857, he was united in marriage to Mary J. Oliver, a native of South Carolina. To this union have been given six children: James M., of Ennis, Tex.; Emma C., wife of S. N. Connally, of Atlanta; Mamie Lowndes; William Dabney; Lowndes, an attorney of Atlanta; and Nettie A. One of his brothers, James T., served throughout the war as a private in his command. His father was James M. Calhoun, a native of Calhoun settlement, Abbeville district, S. C., who moved to Georgia about 1835, locating in Decatur, where he read law and was admitted to the bar. In 1852 he came to Atlanta, resumed practice, and died in 1875. In the Creek war of 1836 he commanded a cavalry company, and subsequently served in both branches of the legislature, and was mayor of Atlanta in 1862-3-4 and 5. Judge Calhoun's mother was Emma Eliza Dabney, daughter of Anderson W. Dabney, a native of Virginia, and a resident of Georgia. They were blessed with six children. Judge Calhoun was elected ordinary of Fulton county in 1881, and has been re-elected, without opposition, ever since. We might say his career is without a flaw. He is highly respected as a citizen, a lawyer and an honorable gentleman.

MILTON A. CANDLER. One of the leading members of the Georgia bar, and a man who has frequently been honored by the people of the state is Hon. Milton A. Candler. Mr. Candler is a native of Campbell county, where he was born Jan. 11, 1837, but his boyhood days were spent in the neighboring county of Carroll. Here the subject of this sketch received his primary education, and remained until reaching the years of mature manhood. In 1852 he became a student at Franklin college, now the state university, graduating with the degree of A. B., in 1854. Being an excellent debater and fond of intellectual employment, having received a great stimulus from his literary course at the university, and especially his debating society, the young student resolved to enter the legal profession. Accordingly, soon after graduation, he began the study of law in the office of Warren Aikin, at Cassville, Ga. He was subsequently admitted to the bar in Pickens county in 1856, launching out into the practice of law at Cassville. In 1857 he located at Decatur, Ga., a small town about six miles from Atlanta, on the Georgia railroad. Here he remained in the peaceable enjoyment of a large and lucrative practice until the spring of 1863, when the martial spirit prevailed over the demands of his profession and he entered the Confederate army as captain of Company A, Tenth Georgia state guard. He remained in the service until the spring of 1864. Mr. Candler, by reason of his strong inherent love of politics, has frequently been forced into the political forum, and numerous honors, in the gift of the democratic party, have rewarded his aspirations. During the years of 1861-62-63 he occupied a seat in the state legislature at Milledgeville. He was also a member of the convention that met at the state capital in the fall of 1865. From 1868 to 1872 he occupied a seat in the state senate. Two years later he was elected to the forty-fourth congress as a representative from the fifth congressional district. He served on several important committees, notably the committee on private land claims and elections. Mr. Candler was recognized as one of the ablest speakers on the floor of congress. In 1876 he was re-elected to the forty-fifth congress, and his record in that body was equally as brilliant and patriotic. Returning home from Washington at the close of his second term, Mr. Candler devoted himself exclusively to the practice of his profession. He had located his office in Atlanta in 1867, though he still continued to reside in Decatur. Many important cases were voluntarily brought to Mr. Candler on his resumption of the active practice, and his reputation as an advocate daily increased with the repeated announcements of his victories in the courts. Mr. Candler has few equals at the Georgia bar to-day, and his eloquence is still as fervid and impassioned as when his boyish face first appeared on the stump in Georgia. In 1893, though not a candidate, Mr. Candler was chosen to represent his home county (De Kalb) in the state legislature. Mr. Candler has never connected himself with any secret organization, but is an influential member, and for several years has been a leading elder in the Decatur Presbyterian church. In 1857 Mr. Candler was married to Miss Eliza C. Murphy, the daughter of the late Hon. Charles Murphy, of Decatur, an ante-bellum congressman, and a delegate to the secession convention, who died on the day that body convened. Mr. Candler has five living children: Charles M., who has been a member of the state legislature, and is now connected with the George W. Scott Manufacturing company in Georgia; Samuel C., who now resides in California as special agent of the United States land service; Florence, wife of C. A. Cowles, of Decatur; Claude and Ruth, unmarried. The father of Mr. Candler, who was a native Georgian, served for several terms in the state legislature before and after the war. His name was Samuel C. Candler, and during the greater part of his life he devoted himself to mercantile pursuits and farming. He was a man of superior intelligence, who carefully observed the times, and believed in giving his children a good education as far as his means could afford. He was a man of commanding influence in his community and his death—which occurred in 1873 at the age of sixty-four years—was deeply deplored.

COL. JOHN SLAUGHTER CANDLER, of Atlanta, Ga., ranking colonel of the Georgia state troops, and the solicitor-general of the Stone mountain circuit, was born in Carroll county, Ga., Oct. 22, 1861, being the youngest child of Samuel Charles and Martha B. (Beall) Candler. Hon. Samuel Charles Candler was born in Columbia county, Ga., on Dec. 6, 1809. His father was Daniel Candler, who married Sarah Slaughter, by whom he was the father of seven children, viz.: William Love, Elizabeth Anthony, John Kingston, Frances Mary, Samuel Charles, Daniel Gill, and Ezekiel Slaughter. Daniel Candler, paternal grandfather of John Slaughter Candler, was the youngest of William Candler's children. He was only ten years old when his father, William Candler, died. Of the early history of William Candler, family tradition gives but little information. There are, however, scraps of recorded history, scattered here and there, which taken together and interpreted, the one in the light of the others, enable us to arrive with reasonable accuracy at a correct conclusion as to his origin and ancestry. There is now in the possession of the Candler family a manuscript, written sixty years ago in his family Bible by Rev. Ignatius A. Few, D. D., LL. D. (the first president of Emory college, at Oxford, Ga.), which manuscript may be relied on for correctness as far as it goes, for its author, Dr. Few, was born a hundred years ago; lived, in point of time, near to his grandfather; was a man of profound learning and piety; and came fully up to Cicero's definition of a good historian, "a man too brave to tell a lie and brave enough to tell the truth." The manuscript says: "William Candler was probably born in Ireland; his parents certainly were. He held the rank of colonel in the American army during the war of the revolution, and died and was buried in Columbia county, Ga., in 1779, four miles east of Mount Carmel." Lyman C. Draper, LL. D., secretary of the State Historical society of Wisconsin, says: "Maj. William Candler, who, with Capts. Carr and Johnson, commanded the small party of Georgians at the battle of Kings mountain, was born of English parents in Dublin, Ireland, in 1738, and was brought to North Carolina when a mere child. He married, in 1761, Elizabeth Anthony, and the next year migrated to Georgia. In 1771 he was a deputy surveyor. During the war he served under Col. Clarke, was in the attack on Augusta, at Kings mountain and Blackstocks, and rose to the rank of colonel. He was a member of the legislature in 1784-5; was appointed a judge, and died at his seat in Columbia county, in 1789, at the age of fifty-one years, leaving several children, his oldest son, Henry, having served in the army with him." These two accounts from sources so far apart in point of time and distance agree substantially as to the main facts. Col. William Candler was, as Draper says, in the siege of Augusta, and in all the other affairs in upper Georgia, and those in which Sumter was engaged in his campaign in South Carolina, in 1780. With the return of peace and the establishment of the independence of the colonies, the Candlers returned to their devastated homes in Columbia county, on Little river. William Candler and William and Benjamin Few were named in the act of the royal legislature of Georgia, in 1780, proscribing certain prominent rebels in that colony who were especially obnoxious to the crown, and disqualifying them from holding office, from sitting on juries, and even from testifying as witnesses in the courts; but this ostracism continued for only a short time. The patriots soon recovered possession of the state, and these ostracised rebels, in their turn, passed laws confiscating the property of those who had mustered under the flag of the enemies of their country, and making the name of tory so odious that to-day, after the lapse of more than a hundred years, is a stench in the nostrils of the great-grandchildren of the heroes of Savannah, Augusta, Kings mountain, Cowpens, and the numerous other less noted fields on which they shed their blood in defense of their homes and firesides. William Candler was a member of the first general assembly of Georgia that met in that state under the constitution after the close of the war of the revolution. Subsequently he became a judge of the highest court then known to the judiciary of that state, and died at his seat in Columbia county, Ga., in 1789. He married, in 1760, Elizabeth Anthonv, whose grandfather was a Genoese Italian and her mother a Clark. She was the eldest of a numerous family, and one of her nephews was governor of Kentucky. William Candler and his wife, Elizabeth Anthonv, had children: Mary, Henry, Falby, William, Charles, Elizabeth, John Kingston, Amelia, Joseph, Mark Anthony and Daniel. We will now proceed to speak more at length of Daniel, the youngest of the children of William Candler, as he was the progenitor of most of the Candlers who still live in Georgia, Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas. He was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1779. Samuel Slaughter came with his brother, Reuben, from Virginia to Georgia, prior to the war of the revolution, and Daniel Candler was married to his daughter, Sarah Slaughter. Samuel Slaughter was a very successful planter of Baldwin county, Ga., and both he and his brother were ardent patriots and both served in the armies of the colonies during the war of the revolution. Both reared large families, and their descendants are to be found scattered all over the south, especially in Georgia. Daniel Candler died in Columbia county, Ga., in September, 1816. Cut off at that period of life before which few men ever accomplish much, his life was devoid of special incident. He and his wife, Sarah Slaughter, had seven children, viz.: William Love Candler, born in Milledgeville, Ga., Sept. 1, 1801. He married Martha Moore in Upson county, Ga., about 1824. He died and was buried in Bienville parish, Louisiana, in 1868. He had eight children. Elizabeth Anthony Candler, born on March 30, 1803. She was twice married, first to Owen H. Myrick, by whom she bore a son, and after his death to Corley, by whom she had five children. She died in Bienville parish, Louisiana, Dec. 20, 1872. All of her children in life reside in Louisiana except the Rev. Daniel G. Myrick, who has been for many years a leading Methodist minister. John Kingston Candler was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1804. He married Caroline Smith in Baldwin county, Ga., in his twenty-second year. He reared a numerous family, and all, if alive, are thought to be in Louisiana. He is a substantial farmer, unostentatious and unambitious. He still lives in Bienville parish, La., and is ninety-one years old. Frances Emily Candler was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1806. She was married in her eighteenth year to Wilson Simpson, a native of Tennessee, by whom she was the mother of ten children, some of whom reside in western Texas and others in Louisiana. She died near the Brazos river, in western Texas, about 1856. Hon. Samuel Charles Candler, father of the distinguished gentleman whose name heads this sketch, was born in Columbia county, Ga., on Dec. 6, 1809. At the age of twenty-four he married Martha B. Beall, a daughter of Noble B. Beall, of Cherokee county, Ga., a niece of Gen. William Beall, for a long time prominent in the history of Western Georgia. Samuel Charles Candler represented at different times two different counties in the Georgia legislature; first, Cherokee, in 1835, and afterward, for several terms, Carroll, in which he spent most of his life. He was also, for two terms, a member of the state senate. In his earlier life he was a merchant, and, later, devoted much of his time to politics. He was a member of the convention which met at Charleston, S. C., was an ardent supporter of Douglas, and, together with Absalom H. Chappell, of Muscogee;

Hiram Warner, of Meriwether, and James L. Seward, of Thomas, was burned in effigy at Macon, Ga., by the supporters of Breckinridge and the other presidential candidates for having refused to withdraw from that convention. He was also very prominent in Masonic circles, and was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church south. He served as a soldier in the war with the Seminole Indians in Florida in 1836. He died on Nov. 13, 1873, but his widow is still living and resides in Atlanta. He left eleven children, of whom we shall speak more particularly hereafter. Daniel Gill Candler was born in Columbia county, Ga., Feb. 22, 1812, and married Oct. 8, 1833, to Nancy Caroline Matthews, of western Georgia. He was a lawyer and at one time a judge, served in two Indian wars, in the army of the United States, and was the captain commanding the famous Banks county guards, one of the companies of the Second regiment that left Georgia in the army of the Confederate states. He was thrice elected mayor of Gainesville, Ga., and died in that city Oct. 17, 1887. He left twelve children, the eldest being Hon. Allen Daniel Candler, who was a colonel in the army of the Confederate state, for five years a representative in the Georgia legislature, for two years a senator in the same state, for eight years a member of the United States congress, and is now serving his second term as secretary of state for the state of Georgia. Ezekiel Slaughter Candler, youngest of the children of Col. William Candler and his wife, Sarah Slaughter, was born in Columbia county, Ga., Aug. 5, 1815, married Miss Jane Williams, a native of Tennessee, in Coweta county, Ga., Aug. 19, 1839, and died in Atlanta, Ga., January 12, 1869. He was sheriff of Carroll county, Ga., when a very young man, subsequently represented that county in the Georgia legislature, and, in 1851, was elected comptroller-general of Georgia, holding that important office twelve years. He left seven children, who, if in life, reside in Georgia. The foregoing are the lineal descendants of Daniel, the youngest son of Col. William Candler, of the American revolution of 1776. The descendants of his brothers are not so numerous. They live in the counties of Columbia, Talbot and Muscogee, in Georgia, and in the state of Alabama; some of them probably live in other states. Having thus traced the history of William Candler, of Richmond county, Ga., and his descendants from his first appearance, in 1771, as a land surveyor under the royal government, we will now proceed to speak more particularly of the descendants of Samuel Charles and Martha B. (Beall) Candler, of whom there were eleven, viz: The Hon. Milton A. Candler, born Jan. 11, 1837. He is a lawyer and lives in Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga.; has represented his county several times in the state house of representatives, his district in two constitutional conventions and once in the state senate, and his district in the forty-fifth and forty-sixth congresses of the United States. He married Eliza, daughter of the Hon. Charles Murphy, at one time a member of congress from Georgia. They have several children, most of whom are living, and the eldest of whom, the Hon. Charles Murphy Candler, was a member of the legislature of Georgia during the session of 1889-90; Ezekiel S. Candler, a lawyer and Baptist minister, of Mississippi; he married Miss Julia Bevel, of Hamilton county, Fla. They have several children, of whom the eldest, E. S. Candler, Jr., is a prominent lawyer of Iuka, Miss.; Julia Florence, wife of J. Watt Harris, of Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga.; Noble Daniel, who was much afflicted from youth and died since the death of his father; Sarah Justana, married J. J. Willard, deceased, of De Kalb county, Ga.; she has several children, the eldest of whom, Samuel, is in business in Atlanta, Ga.; William Beall Candler, of Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga.; he is a merchant, and married a daughter of Dr. Slaughter, of that county, by whom he has several children; Elizabeth Frances, who married H. H. Dobbs; she has several children; Asa Griggs Candler, a very prominent druggist of Atlanta, Ga.; he married Miss Howard, daughter of his former partner in business, by whom he has several children; he is now president of the Georgia Sunday-school association, and is exceedingly prominent in the lay service of the Methodist Episcopal church, south; Samuel Charles Candler, a merchant of Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga.; he married a Miss Bevel of the state of Florida; the Rev. Warren Akin Candler, D. D., of Oxford, Ga., of whom a sketch appears elsewhere in these Memoirs; he is president of Emory college, of which his second cousin, Rev. Ignatius A. Few, LL. D., was the first president more than half a century ago; he was a doctor of divinity at less than thirty years of age, and is probably the youngest man in the service of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, who has ever been prominently mentioned in connection with the highest office in the gift of that denomination, that of a bishop; Col. John Slaughter Candler, whose name heads this article, is the ranking colonel of the Georgia state troops; he resided in Carroll county until thirteen years of age, receiving his earlier education in the rural schools of that county and at Cartersville, Ga., under the tutorage of his sister, Mrs. Florence Harris. November, 1876, he entered the boys' high school, at Atlanta, Ga., and was graduated therefrom in June of the following year; attended Emory college, at Oxford, Ga., for three years and was graduated from that institution, with the degree of bachelor of arts, in 1880. For two years next after his graduation, he taught school in the county of De Kalb, studied law while not engaged in his school duties and was admitted to the practice at Decatur, Ga., but removed soon thereafter to Atlanta, Ga., and has since pursued his profession at that city. In 1883 he was admitted to practice in the state supreme court, and in 1892 he was admitted to the United States supreme court. On Nov. 26, 1887, Mr. Candler was appointed by Gov. John B. Gordon solicitor-general of the Stone Mountain circuit, to fill an unexpired term, and in November, 1888, he was elected by the state legislature to the same position for the full term of four years, and in November, 1892, re-elected, without opposition, by the same body. His recognition by the state's executive dates back, however, to 1882, when he was appointed lieutenant-colonel and aide-de-camp on the staff of Gov. Alexander H. Stephens, holding that rank under Govs. Boynton and McDaniel until the office of judge-advocate general was created by act of the legislature. He was then appointed to that important post by Gov. Henry D. McDaniel, re-appointed to that place by Gov. John B. Gordon, and again held it four years under the administration of Gov. William J. Northen, resigning in 1893 to accept the command of the Fifth regiment of infantry, Georgia Volunteers, of which regiment he is colonel at the present time. In December, 1894, Col. Candler was appointed on the commission organized for the purpose of codifying the military laws of Georgia, and is chairman of that commission. Probably no officer of the state's militia has devoted as much valuable time to the thorough organization and equipment of the militia as has Col. Candler. He has ever been a champion of the establishment of an annual encampment of the state forces, for the two-fold purpose of perfecting those forces in the battalion and regimental drills and for the mutual companionship in arms arising from such annual association. He has frequently appeared before the finance committee of the state legislature in advocacy of an appropriation to defray the expenses of such encampments, and it is to his efforts, probably, that several measures looking to those annual appropriations have been carried through the legislature. Col. Candler is prominent in politics, being elected a member of the state democratic executive committee from the fifth congressional district in 1884, and upon the assembling of that body, was made secretary of the committee; and is now a member of that committee from the fifth congressional district. He has acted at various times as chairman of the congressional executive committee, as chairman of the thirty-fourth district senatorial committee, and of the democratic executive committee for De Kalb county. He has also been prominently mentioned in connection with the congressional seat of the fifth district, and his friends say that his services to the democratic party have been of such character as to deserve reward at the hands of his fellow-citizens. Col. Candler is an able lawyer, quick of perception, profound in his knowledge of the law, a thorough master of the science of pleading and practice and precedent, and always courteous to opposing counsel. He was married Jan. 16, 1884, to Miss Lula Garnier, a daughter of the late Col. Isadore V. Garnier, a native of Charleston, S. C., and a grandson of Gen. Joseph Garnier, who was one of Napoleon's generals. This union has been blessed by the birth of two interesting children, viz.: Asa Warren Candler and Allie Garnier Candler. Col. Candler is a steward of the Edgewood Methodist Episcopal church, south, of Atlanta, and was a member and chairman of the lay delegation to the general conference which met in St. Louis, Mo., in May, 1890.

E. P. CHAMBERLIN. Among the enterprising and successful business men of Atlanta who shared the vicissitudes of her early misfortunes directly after the war to enjoy, in a well-bestowed measure, her subsequent prosperity, is Mr. E. P. Chamberlin. Mr. Edward Payson Chamberlin was born in St. Lawrence county, N. Y., in the little village of Parishville, on Sept. 16, 1832. His parents, on both sides, were of English descent, and coming to America during the colonial era, his ancestors distinguished themselves by their gallant behavior in the revolutionary struggle. His mother was a near relative of the famous patriot, Ethen Allen, who made perhaps the most romantic record of any soldier in the American revolution. The death of Mr. Chamberlin's father occurring in 1836, at which time the subject of this sketch was only four years of age, he was left dependent upon a widowed mother who had five fatherless children to support. At the age of seven the young lad was bound out to a farmer in the neighborhood, and remained with him, doing the rough work of the plantation, and living on intimate terms with adversity until reaching his seventeenth year. During the period of his service he was permitted to attend school for a few months in each year, and this was the full extent of his educational advantages. Possessed of a bright mind, however, and one that was quick to receive impressions, he acquired many valuable lessons by observation, and these increased as his opportunities extended. Having relatives in this state, young Chamberlin turned his face toward Georgia in 1849, and came to Stewart county, locating in the little town of Lumpkin. He commenced to clerk for his cousin, Mr. E. E. Rawson, receiving the meager sum of $150 for his services the first year. Five years later, by reason of his diligent application and faithful devotion to his business, he had not only mastered the details of the establishment, but was offered a partnership in the firm, which he accepted. Though only a mere youth, he had shown a shrewd business sagacity that was far beyond his years, and Mr. Rawson realized that he had made a good investment by taking the young financier into his employ. A year after this combination was formed, however, the partnership was dissolved, young Chamberlin going into business with Mr. W. W. Boynton, in the general merchandise line. The interference of the war prevented the realization of the hopes begotten of this partnership, and Mr. Boynton, who entered the Confederate service, was subsequently killed at the battle of Antietam. Being of a delicate constitution, Mr. Chamberlin remained in Lumpkin, taking care of the widows and children, and rendering valuable aid to the Confederacy. During the last six months of the war he acted as agent for the government in purchasing supplies for the southern army. At the end of the war Mr. Chamberlin, in winding up the affairs of his old business, found that his firm was indebted to New York merchants to the sum of $18,500. He determined to pay this debt in spite of the fact that he had lost nearly all his merchandise by the war. Having saved a hundred and thirty bales of cotton, he started to New York for the purpose of disposing of it, and there found to his intense satisfaction that cotton had risen from twenty cents a pound in Georgia to sixty cents a pound in New York. He was enabled therefore to cancel the debt with only half the cotton, and returned home with the proceeds of the other half in his pocket. He subsequently embarked in the cotton business and became one of the largest shippers in the state. Mr. Chamberlin began his career as a merchant in Atlanta in July, 1866. The city was just beginning to emerge from the smoke and ashes wrought by the annihilating torch of Gen. Sherman. He purchased a home on Washington street and rented a store on the corner of Whitehall and Hunter streets, organized the firm of Chamberlin, Cole & Boynton, the latter member of the firm being a younger brother of his former partner. The dimensions of the store were only 25x100 feet, and they commenced business on a small scale. The establishment grew, however, and after the expiration of two years Mr. Cole withdrew. Subsequently, in 1870, Mr. H. S. Johnson was taken into the business under the firm name of Chamberlin, Boynton & Co. The firm remained unchanged until 1884, when Mr. Boynton retired, and Mr. E. R. Du Bose was admitted, changing the style of the firm to that of Chamberlin, Johnson & Co. In 1878, in order to meet the demands of a rapidly advancing trade, the building was enlarged to double its former capacity, and again in 1885 the present commodious building was erected, and stands to-day as one of the finest mercantile emporiums in the south. It is only due to Mr. Chamberlin to say that the growth of the establishment is largely due to his strict business integrity and to his shrewd financial sagacity. For two years Mr. Chamberlin represented his ward in the city council, serving as chairman of the committee on sewerage. It was during his administration that the present excellent system was inaugurated. Mr. Chamberlin was a director in the first cotton factory ever started in Atlanta, and was also a director and promoter of the first cotton exposition in 1881. When elected a director of this exposition he was lying upon a bed of sickness in the state of Wisconsin. He hurried home, and at the second meeting of the board asked if it was the intention of the directors to limit the exposition to cotton, cotton fabrics and cotton machinery. On being informed that it was he very promptly refused to serve on the board unless it was made more general in its character, prophesying failure to the enterprise if this was not done. Such was the strength and fervor of his argument that his views were adopted by the board and the result has become a matter of history. Mr. Chamberlin, by reason of his progressive ideas, was made a director in the Piedmont exposition of 1887, and is now a member of the board of the Cotton States and International exposition, the most stupendous enterprise ever started on southern soil. On the reorganization of the Chamber of Commerce in 1883 Mr. Chamberlin became one of the most active members of that body. The site of the present building was secured mainly through his efforts as chairman of the committee on location. As an evidence of Mr. Chamberlin's patriotic sense of duty, he had purchased the lot on Marietta street on which the custom house now stands for his own private use, but very promptly surrendered it to the city as a suitable location for a government building. For a number of years Mr. Chamberlin has been a steward of Trinity Methodist church, and has actively identified himself with the religious affairs of that denomination. His influence has always been on the side of morality and good order and he has always been a loyal and helpful friend to the young men of the city. As a director on the board of the Young Men's Christian association he has demonstrated a profound interest in their behalf. To the young men in his employ his manner is that of a chivalrous Christian gentleman. His ear is always opened to their petitions, and his hands are always ready to serve them. Perseverance and faithful attention to business never fail to receive due recognition from him, and by all the men in his employ he is held in grateful and affectionate esteem. Mr. Chamberlin has one brother, Augustus Y., who lives in San Jose, Cal., and one sister, Clara, who is the widow of Lewis E. Hudson, of Whitewater, Wis. For several years Mr. Chamberlin has been a trustee of Emory college. Mr. Chamberlin is a member of the masonic fraternity and belongs to the Capitol City club, and also to the Commercial club. He was married in 1857 to Miss Levisa Catchings, daughter of Dr. Seymour Catchings, of Lumpkin, Ga. Five children were born to them, only two of whom are now living, a son and daughter, E. P., Jr., and Eva G. In his home life Mr. Chamberlin is kind and affectionate. He is fond of the domestic pleasures of his own fireside and prefers them to the more popular amusements of the world. His career in all its phases is full of encouragement and inspiration to young men, crowning the successful enterprises of the merchant with the more ennobling spirit of the ideal citizen.

DR. JULIUS ARTHUR CHILDS, one of Atlanta's most famous physicians, was born on a farm belonging to his father in Mitchell county, N. C., Aug. 13, 1858, and resided there until he was seventeen, attending the schools of the county. In 1875 he went to Lincolnton, N. C., and accepted a mercantile position with a relative, in which capacity he was occupied until 1881, when he went to Chester court house, S. C., and engaged in the marble business for four years. In October, 1885, he entered the medical college of South Carolina at Charleston, graduating therefrom in March, 1888. Immediately after graduating he entered the Charleston city hospital and remained there one year. He then located in Greenville, S. C., for a short time; but in October removed to Atlanta, where he has since practiced his profession. Dr. Childs is a member of the medical society of Atlanta and has served as its vice-president and secretary. He has contributed articles to the leading medical journals of the country and holds the chair of venereal and skin diseases in the Atlanta polyclinic. Dr. Childs was married January, 1892, to Susan, daughter of the late Daniel Pittman, for many years ordinary of Fulton county. He is a respected member of the Methodist church and highly esteemed in social circles as well as in the business world. He is of northern extraction, his father having been born in Massachusetts, where he died at the age of seventy-seven. Dr. Childs' mother, Delia Osborn, was born in New York, the daughter of Obadiah Osborn, who was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and who, when he died, was one hundred and three years of age.

JUDGE MARSHALL J. CLARKE. If the character of the legal profession is determined by the qualifications of its leading members, it may be safely asserted that the culture of the Atlanta bar is well illustrated in the professional attainments of the subject of this sketch. Judge Marshall Johnson Clarke, who has occupied for a number of years a leading rank among the lawyers of the state, is a native of Georgia, and was born in the little village of Lumpkin, in Stewart county, on June 28, 1839. His father, James Clarke, was a man of commanding influence in that section of the state, and was a successful planter as well as a lawyer of prominence and ability. He was a member of the Georgia platform convention of 1850, and one of the most influential and active members of that body. The Clarke family is of English extraction, the ancestors of Judge Marshall J. Clarke coming to this country in the early days of its colonial life. The boyhood of Judge Clarke was spent in Stewart county. In this connection it may be observed that many of the best families of the state were identified with that section of Georgia. Here the subject of this sketch remained until 1855, when he became a student at Mercer university, one of the finest educational institutions of the south, under the patronage of the Baptist denomination, and then located at Penfield, Ga. He applied himself with diligence to his collegiate studies and manifested that eagerness for truth that has since characterized his legal investigations and made him one of the foremost members of the Georgia bar. Graduating with distinction from Mercer university in 1858 he returned to Lumpkin, Ga., and immediately began the study of law in his father's home, he having then retired from the practice. After some months of preparation, under the advice and direction of his father, he was admitted to the bar. His father removed to Atlanta in April, 1859, and Mr. Clarke being then yet under age went with him. Some time after he settled in that city, being somewhat scholarly in his tastes and having no natural fondness for the contests of the courtroom he decided to establish there a select school for boys. That he might be the better qualified for this undertaking he determined to teach a year and then spend a year in Europe in the study of the modern languages. He accordingly took charge in January, 1861, of a school in Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga. Having taught there ten months he returned to Atlanta. The country being then involved in war he abandoned the purpose of going abroad. In the early spring of 1863 he entered the Confederate army as a private in Company H of the Fifty-sixth Georgia regiment. He was subsequently attached to Gen. Tom Taylor's staff as private secretary, and served in that capacity for several months. In December, 1863, Mr. Clarke's health being entirely broken down by the hardships and exposures incident to the Kentucky campaign through which he had just passed, he came to Atlanta under the direction of the surgeon of his regiment and there he remained confined to his bed by extreme illness for three months. On recovering he was offered and accepted an appointment in the office of Gen. Ira R. Foster, then the quartermaster-general of the state of Georgia, and continued to discharge the duties of such appointment till the war closed. After the departure of Gen. Sherman from Atlanta only a few buildings remained standing, but the people lost no time in rebuilding their wasted homes. Mr. Clarke was among the first to cast their fortunes with the struggling young city, then slowly emerging from the ruins. He now resolved to devote his life to the practice of his profession and opened an office for the purpose in March, 1866. Diligence and perseverance soon brought his talents into recognition, and influential clients began to avail themselves of his professional services. He remained in the active practice until January, 1885, when he was appointed to the judgeship of the city court of Atlanta. The honor was all the more appreciated because it came unsought and unsolicited. He held this position for eleven months and, after the expiration of this time, he was appointed to the bench of the Atlanta circuit. This position he held from Dec. 1, 1885, to Sept. 15, 1893. At the time of his resignation he had still three years and a half before him, having just entered upon a new term. The resignation of Judge Clarke was very reluctantly accepted by Gov. Northen, and many sincere expressions of regret proceeded from the members of the Atlanta bar. Judge Clarke's administration of justice was characterized by a fearless discharge of duty and a blind disregard of person. His legal decisions were rendered in a clear and comprehensive style, and never without careful research and deliberation. His legal intuitions served him as splendid aids in the determination of all issues, and his grasp of the real merits of the various cases that came before him was both rapid and tenacious. His own views, however, were always supported by sound authority, illustrating his marvelous capacity for work and his fidelity as a judicial officer. No judge of the superior court in Georgia ever donned the sacred ermine with less fear or more pronounced fidelity. Few of Judge Clarke's decisions were ever reversed by the supreme court. As an evidence of the exalted opinion in which his attainments as a judicial officer were held by the members of the bar, he had no sooner resigned his seat on the bench than he was urged to make the race for associate justice of the supreme court, in anticipation of an increase in the number of judges on the supreme bench. The amendment to the constitution failed to pass, however, but on the resignation of Chief Justice Bleckley, a few weeks later, his claims were stoutly renewed by his countless admirers all over the state. Judge Clarke has never aspired to political office. His ambition has been purely legal and judicial. In 1868, however, he held for one day the position of secretary of the electoral college. Judge Clarke was one of the early promoters of the Young Men's library association, and, for a number of years, a director in that institution. He has always been the friend of culture and intellectual development, and no enterprise of this character has ever failed to meet his indorsement or receive his active support. The late Judge John T. Clarke, of the Patula circuit, whose sad death in 1889 was the result of a railroad accident, was a brother of the subject of this sketch. As one of the ablest and purest officers on the circuit bench he illustrated, in a marked degree, the same high and conspicuous order of talent that characterized this remarkable family. Judge Clarke, on retiring from the bench, immediately returned to the practice of his profession, and has since established himself in a large and growing civil practice. The duties of his position as judge of the Atlanta circuit were too onerous and exacting and, under the pressure put upon him by increasing litigation and his conception of the duties of a judicial office, he was forced to send in his resignation. Judge Clarke has never married. He is an active and influential member of the Second Baptist church of Atlanta, and to the lofty attainments of the scholar he had added the graceful simplicity of the Christian religion.

REV. DR. THOMAS PARMELEE CLEVELAND, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian church of Atlanta, was born in Washington, Ga., Nov. 19, 1837. He received his early instruction and training at the place of his nativity. He afterward entered the college at Columbia, S. C., remaining there, however, only a few months, and in 1856 went to the famous educational institution at Princeton, N. J., applied himself sedulously to the appointed tasks, and graduated in 1858. Immediately afterward he returned to Georgia, established a small school which he conducted a short time, and then was elected principal of the academy in Washington, Ga., holding this place for one year. Dr. Cleveland now feeling called on to become a minister of the gospel, gave up teaching and decided to enter at once upon preparation for the gospel ministry. He studied at the theological school in Columbia, S. C., for eighteen months, but his mental labors were interrupted by the clamors of secession and disunion. In 1862 his heart, then aflame with the same loyalty that now characterizes his personality, he entered the Confederate service, enlisting in the Tenth Georgia regiment, Semmes' brigade, as a private soldier, and remained in this humble station until he secured his parole at Appomattox court house, Va. He was on detailed duty with the commissary of the brigade, and later with the quartermaster of the brigade. During the last year of the war the clerk of the adjutant having deserted, he was appointed his successor, and remained in this position until the surrender. In the battle of Savage station he acted as courier for Gen. Paul J. Semmes. When the clouds of disruption disappeared Dr. Cleveland returned home and then went to Madison county, Ga., and preached in that section for the seven succeeding years, and then went to Gainesville, Ga., where he resided twelve years. In 1885 he came to Atlanta and has since lived in that city. Dr. Cleveland served as school commissioner for both Madison and Hall counties, the first one, the latter four years. On moving to Atlanta he resigned this, as well as his pastorate and the state clerkship of the Athens presbytery. He served as a member of the examining committee of the state university for two years under Gov. McDaniel. Dr. Cleveland was married in 1866 to Helen A., daughter of the late Andrew Howard, of Atlanta, and a niece of John H. Newton, of Athens, Ga. Their lot has often been one of sadness and bereavement, for of the twelve children born to them only four survive. They are: Lillian H., wife of H. P. Ashley, of Atlanta; Mary P., Thomas C., and Fannie H. Dr. Cleveland is a devoted Confederate veteran, and was elected chaplain of the Fulton county camp in 1890, and has been re-elected five times. He had three opportunities of becoming chaplain, but owing to the fact that he had not been licensed and could not get a furlough to go home for that purpose, he failed in the first two appointments. During his visit home on a thirty days' furlough he was licensed by the presbytery of Hopewell at Sparta, Ga., April 3, 1864, and then on his return received an appointment from two regiments combined, and would have received his commission but for the closing of the war. He is a deep, scholarly thinker, an old soldier "to the marrow," a minister, earnest, conscientious and consecrated, a gentleman of the old southern type, and a friend, genial in disposition, lovable in commanding sympathy and generosity, whose hearty hand-grasp assures you that its cordial touch is but a slight response to the soul of love and honor that actuates and prompts it.

ANDREW J. COBB, son of Howell Cobb, was born in Athens, Ga., April 12, 1857. He was brought up and educated in that city, receiving the degree of A. B. at the university there in 1876, and graduating from the law department a year later with the degree of B. L. Aug. 12, 1877, he was admitted to the bar in Athens by Judge George D. Rice, and at once opened an office there, forming a partnership with Capt. A. S. Erwin, which continued until 1879, when Capt. Erwin was elected judge of the superior court of the western circuit. Mr. Cobb then practiced his profession alone until 1891, when he re-entered partnership with Judge Erwin. In 1893 he moved to Atlanta and a year later Vasser Woolley was added to the firm, which is now Erwin, Cobb & Woolley. Judge Erwin resides in Athens and represents the firm there. Mr. Cobb was city attorney of Athens, Ga., 1887 to 1891, president of the Athens board of education in 1888, and trustee for the city of Athens of the state university during the years 1891, 1892 and 1893. He was professor of law in the state university from March, 1884, to June, 1893, and is now lecturer on constitutional law, pleadings and contracts in that institution. He is also dean of the Atlanta law school and lecturer on constitutional law, equity and wills. Mr. Cobb is a member and deacon of the Baptist church. He was married March 3, 1880, to Miss Starkie Campbell, daughter of Col. Jesse M. Campbell, a prominent lawyer of Griffin, Ga., and they have five children, three boys and two girls. Mr. Cobb is a democrat, but has never taken a very active part in politics. In 1894 he was prominently mentioned for associate justice of the supreme court in the event that the constitutional amendment increasing the number of judges should be adopted.

CHARLES A. COLLIER is the son of John Collier, descended from the sturdy pioneers of North Georgia, who fought his way to fame through the many obstacles that cluster about an inexperienced country lawyer, but dauntless perseverance has never yet met defeat. In the spirit of this adage he labored and was rewarded by a career of honor and a superior judgeship. He moved to Atlanta when a young man, and there Charles A. was born July 19, 1848. His father was liberal in his education and placed before his aspiring ambition the use of the best schools and tutors in the state. These were readily grasped and employed in mental development. Graduating from the state university, and being admitted to the bar, he gave promise of a brilliant future, and seemed fit to grace any profession or occupation, for his talents were varied and developed. Mr. Collier was married Jan. 7, 1875, to the daughter of the late William A. Rawson. This formed an epoch in his life, for this queenly woman, of charming personality and refinement, shed an inspiration on his work, and from that happy moment his real success began. Mr. Collier is of retiring disposition and shrinks from notoriety. He has never sought political office, and yet on more than one occasion the people have demanded his services. He was elected alderman by a large majority, served as mayor pro tem., and chairman of the finance committee of the council. He was also chairman of the democratic executive committee of Fulton county. As a servant of the people his legal knowledge, firmness of character and general executive ability were thoroughly tested. He is president of the Gate City Gas Light company, of the Refrigerating Constructing company and director in the Capital City bank and the Bank of the State of Georgia. Among the many enterprises in Atlanta's history that have given a valuable impetus to her growth and prosperity, was the Piedmont exposition. This was suggested only 100 days before the gates were opened and the feasibility of its plan considered. Mr. Collier was elected president, and by untiring energy, devoted unselfishness and a heart for Atlanta's welfare alone, with the assistance of the directors completed this weighty undertaking in the appointed time and made of it the greatest attraction the south has ever offered to her neighbors. Mr. Collier's very superior executive and administrative ability caused him to be chosen president of the Cotton States and International exposition, when a weightier task confronted him. But with the present glowing status of affairs and the absolute confidence and lofty admiration of his fellow-citizens the success of this worthy attempt in displaying southern products and genius is assured. His administration so far has been magnificent. Mr. Collier is a power in the community. He loves money only for the good it does. He devotes much time to the pursuit of literature, science and art, with a cultured intellect, a charitable heart and a gift for extensive enterprise. He is a cogent factor in the promotion of Atlanta's interests.

MR. JAMES R. COLLINS is a member of one of the oldest and most distinguished families of Atlanta. The pioneer of the family, James A. Collins, was a man of sturdy character and independent ideas. He came to Atlanta in 1844, among the first immigrants who turned their faces in the direction of the sprightly young village that was destined, in a few years, to become the acknowledged metropolis of the south. Mr. Collins had great faith in Atlanta's future and he devoted himself with patriotic zeal to the furtherance of all her public enterprises. He was not only the pioneer merchant of the city, engaged in the general merchandise business, but occupied a seat in the first legislative councils of Marthasville, as the village was then known. Mr. Collins was a native of the state of North Carolina, but emigrated to Georgia during his early manhood. The subject of this sketch, Mr. James R. Collins, was born on a plantation in Cobb county in 1866. His father, William J. Collins, had served the Confederacy for four years, proving himself a gallant officer by his courage and daring as a lieutenant in the Ninth Georgia regiment of infantry. He was the son of Mr. James A. Collins, and was born in Atlanta shortly after his father's removal from Cobb county. After the war Lieut. Collins returned to his plantation in Cobb county, where his son was born. Here he spent his boyhood days. His education was chiefly derived from the schools of Cobb county, and those of the adjoining county of Fulton. He developed a strong and vigorous constitution and was proficient in all athletic exercises, performing great feats of strength and displaying marked physical endurance even as a boy. Mr. Collins completed his education in Atlanta. At the age of eighteen, Mr. Collins, who was possessed of strong business ideas, reinforced by a resolute ambition that was ready to grapple with any difficulty that might thrust itself in his way, decided to go into business for himself. It was a bold venture for one of his years and inexperience, but he resolved to make it. He became the proprietor of a large and flourishing business, supplying the wants of the public with coal and wood, and demonstrating the fact that he was equal to the responsibility of managing a large establishment successfully. Mr. Collins remained in the wood and coal business until 1885, when he was elected to the office of deputy city marshal. He served in this capacity until 1892, when he was elected to the office of city tax collector for two years, serving the public, for that length of time, with marked zeal and fidelity. In 1891 Mr. Collins organized the Home bank, a successful enterprise planned by the young financier. He became the president of this institution and displayed great financial skill and foresight in the administration of its affairs. Mr. Collins is also vice-president and director of the Fidelity banking and trust company, organized in 1892. Mr. Collins was united in marriage to Miss Catharine Carey, the daughter of Mr. John Carey, of Atlanta, in 1890. Two years later his wife died, leaving an only daughter, Louise. In 1894, Mr. Collins was married, a second time, to Miss Eleanor A. Sullivan, the daughter of Mr. Daniel Sullivan, of San Antonio, Texas. The martial spirit is strongly emphasized in the taste of Mr. Collins for military life. He holds membership in both the Gate City guards and the Hibernian rifles, two of the leading military organizations of the city. In addition to these Mr. Collins is identified with nearly all the social organizations of Atlanta, being a prominent member of the Brotherhood of Elks, the Capital City club, the Commercial club, the Concordia club, and the Driving club. Mr. Collins is richly endowed with that peculiar gift known as personal magnetism. Perhaps no young man in Atlanta enjoys a more extensive popularity, and this has been fully demonstrated by the successful aspirations of Mr. Collins for public office. The combination of rare qualifications for business and the social graces that render a man pleasing is one that is seldom witnessed in such a marked degree as that possessed by Mr. Collins, and the judicious exercise of his endowments will no doubt result in continued honors to himself and to the community. Mr. Collins is a member of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, and is loyal in his adherence to the tenets of the Catholic faith.

BENNETT JONES CONYERS, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., son of Christopher B. and Fanny (Bullock) Conyers, was born in Atlanta, Feb. 23, 1864. The family is of English extraction, and is related to Sir Gerald Conyers, one of the promoters of the colony of Georgia. His great-grandfather, Ross Conyers, was a citizen of North Carolina, a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and sheriff of Granville county in that state. He was a planter, and came to Georgia in 1801. His grandfather, Bennett H. Conyers, was born in Granville county, N. C., in 1800, and when an infant was brought to Georgia with the family. Mr. Conyers' father was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1832, and raised a farmer. During the war he was in the Confederate service as a member of Phillips' legion. After the war he went to Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., where he successfully engaged in merchandising, dying in 1885. Mr. Conyers' mother was a daughter of Nathaniel Bullock of Bartow county. To this worthy couple ten children were born, of whom seven are still living: Bennett J., the subject of this sketch; James T., Christopher B., Abner J., James H., Elizabeth, and Arthur C. Mr. Conyers was raised in Cartersville, where he was educated and prepared for college; and in 1882 entered the junior class of the state university, Athens, Ga. Graduating in 1884 with the first honor and the degree of A. M., he taught school six years: One year as professor of Greek and mathematics in the Martin institute, Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga.; one year as principal in the Perry (Houston county) male and female college; and four years as principal of the high school, Seale, Ala. In 1890 he came to Atlanta, was admitted to the bar, and connected with the law department of the R. & D. (now Southern) railway for about sixteen months—to Nov. 1, 1891. He then entered into partnership with Judge E. C. Kontz—firm name Kontz & Conyers—which partnership still exists, having already won an extensive and remunerative clientage, which is constantly increasing in extent and value. Professionally and socially, Mr. Conyers ranks high. He is a master Mason, and a member of the Baptist church—being clerk of the Jackson Hill Baptist church, Atlanta.

GEN. PHILIP COOK, deceased secretary of the state of Georgia, was born July 30, 1817, on the farm belonging to his father, Philip Cook, in Twiggs county, Ga., where he resided until he gained his majority, his father dying there three years later. Gen. Cook attended the "old field" schools of Twiggs county until he was fifteen years old, when he went to a noted school at Jeffersonville taught by Milton Wilder, a Massachusetts man. He then went to Forsyth, Monroe Co., Ga., to school for a year or so, and in 1836, at the age of nineteen ran away from this school and enlisted at Forsyth in Capt. W. A. Black's company—one of five companies raised for the Seminole war. He was mustered into service at Pecolata, Fla., and served three months as a private, in which capacity he enlisted, and was one of Gen. W. A. Scott's command which rescued Gen. Gaines, who was surrounded by the Seminoles. He was mustered out in 1836 and returned home, going from there to Oglethorpe university at Midway, Baldwin Co., Ga., where he remained three years and then went to Charlottesville, Va., going from Macon, Ga., by stage—the journey taking a week's time, and costing about $75. He attended the university of Virginia until 1841, when he returned to his home on account of his father's death. Leaving his brother, John R. Cook, on the old homestead he soon after began the practice of law in Forsyth, Ga., in partnership with Zachariah Harman, then solicitor general of Flint circuit. This partnership continued about three years, when Gen. Cook sold out and moved to Sumter county, Ga., where his health being poor, he bought a farm, living thereon from 1846 to 1850. The Southwestern railroad being then completed from Macon to Oglethorpe, and the prospects for a good town at the latter point being promising, he removed to Oglethorpe and commenced the practice of his profession, forming a year later a partnership with Col. T. W. Montfort, which continued about six or seven years, when it was dissolved. Gen. Cook remained in Oglethorpe until the war broke out, and in May, 1861, responded to the call of Gen. Joseph E. Brown for troops. Being an honorary member of the Macon county volunteers

he went with them, which with nineteen other companies was mustered into service by Gen. Brown at Augusta, Ga., May, 1861. These twenty companies were ordered to the navy yard at Portsmouth, Va., and soon after, this company was assigned to the fourth Georgia infantry, Private Cook being appointed adjutant of the regiment and serving as such until after the seven days' fight around Richmond; when upon the unanimous recommendation of the regiment's officers he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Fourth Georgia. He was shortly afterward commissioned colonel, serving in that capacity until the death of Gen. George Doles at Cold Harbor, and then on the recommendation of Gen. R. E. Rhodes and Gen. Jubal A. Early he was promoted to be brigadier-general in June, 1864, and served as such until the war closed. Gen. Cook was in the battles of Malvern Hill, where he was badly hurt by the fragments of a shell; at Fredericksburg; at Chancellorsville, where he was wounded in the leg by a minie ball and was laid up three months, part of the time at the hospital in Richmond, Va., and then at his home. Upon his recovery he rejoined his command at Orange Court House, Va., and next saw service at Winchester in two battles under Early, and at Harper's Ferry, skirmishing from Staunton to Williamsport, Va., almost every day. After being in battle with Early at Cedar Creek he went down to Petersburg where he was wounded in his right elbow and captured, lying in the Petersburg hospital July 30, 1865. Upon his recovery, Gen. Cook returned to Oglethorpe, Ga., and resumed the practice of law. From there he removed to Americus, Ga., in 1870 and practiced his profession at that point for ten years. In the latter part of 1870 he formed a partnership with Hon. Charles F. Crisp, now speaker of the United States house of representatives, which partnership continued until Mr. Crisp was elected to the bench, when his place was filled by Col. B. P. Hollis, this partnership continuing until 1880, in which year Gen. Cook sold his library, gave up the practice of law and retired to his farm. Gen. Cook's first political office was that of state senator, to which position he was elected from Macon county, Ga., in 1859, serving for two years. In 1863, while at home recovering from wounds received at Chancellorsville he was elected to the state senate from the thirteenth district, which comprised the counties of Macon, Sumter, and Schley. He served in the senate of 1863 for forty days and then rejoined his command as its colonel, returning and serving in the session of 1864, again rejoining his command after adjournment. In 1882, while on his farm in Lee county, Ga., he was appointed by Gov. McDaniel one of five commissioners to erect the present state capitol which was completed in 1889. The appropriation for the construction of the state house was $1,000,000. Out of this $20,000 was paid for a portion of the site and when the building was completed the commissioners covered back into the treasury $118.50. Gen. Cook then returned to his farm, where he remained until February, 1890, when he was appointed secretary of state by Gov. John B. Gordon to fill the unexpired term of Maj. M. C. Barnett, whose death vacated the office. October, 1890, Gen. Cook was elected to the same office and re-elected October, 1892. He was elected to the thirty-seventh congress, but was refused his seat. In 1872 he was elected to the forty-second congress from the third district and was returned three times, his last term expiring in 1882, when he was succeeded by Hon. Charles F. Crisp. Gen. Cook was married in 1842 to Sarah G., daughter of Henry H. Lumpkin (brother of Gov. Lumpkin), of Monroe county. She died in 1860, leaving three children, of whom two survive, Lucy, wife of W. L. Peel, of Atlanta, and Philip Cook, Jr., now on the old home farm in Lee county. Gen. Cook's father was Philip Cook, son of John Cook, who was born in Brunswick county, Va., and was a farmer all his life. Philip Cook, Sr., was born in 1775 and in his early youth came to Georgia with his parents from South Carolina. He was also a farmer and was one of the first sheriffs of Baldwin county, Ga. He was one of the commissioners appointed by the governor to explore the Ocmulgee river. He served in the war of 1812, first as captain and afterward as major of the Eighteenth United States infantry, which rank he held at the close of that war. Soon afterward he resigned and settled on his plantation in Twiggs county, Ga., where he died in 1841. He married Martha, daughter of John Wooten, a native of South Carolina, and to this marriage were born five children, of whom Gen. Cook was one. His only brother, John R. Cook, entered the Confederate service in 1862 as assistant surgeon and served through the war. He died in 1886. Gen. Cook's grandfather, John Cook, who was born in Brunswick county, Va., afterward migrated to South Carolina, where he was married and after the revolutionary war came to Georgia, where he died in Hancock county. He was a soldier in that war, participating in the battles of Cowpens and King's Mountain. Gen. Cook's great-grandfather was Henry Cook, who was probably the family's ancestor, who emigrated from Scotland. Gen. Cook, in spite of the hardship and perils he had endured, remained mentally and physically active to the day of his death; his judgment was mature and sound, and his kindness of heart well known to those who had the privilege of his acquaintance.

DR. HUNTER POPE COOPER, one of Atlanta's most competent physicians, was born May 16, 1860, in Atlanta. A year later he was taken by his parents to Washington, Ga., and there he lived until fourteen years of age. He attended the schools at Washington until 1873, when he was sent to Kirkwood, four miles from Atlanta, and placed under the instruction of C. M. Neel, now principal of the Georgia Military institute at Edgewood, near Atlanta, and W. J. Northen, ex-governor of Georgia. He remained two years with these able instructors and then entered the university of Georgia at Athens; there he attained his senior year in 1877, but left that institution to take a special course at the university of Virginia preparatory to studying medicine. He continued his studies at the latter institution for three years, going from there in 1880 to the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, and earning the high honor of graduating among the first ten in 1883. The following year he served as interne at the Forty-second street hospital in New York, and the succeeding year in the same capacity in the Presbyterian hospital. In 1885 he went to Vienna and devoted himself for five months to hospital work there. After thus thoroughly and conscientiously preparing himself for his life work, Dr. Cooper in January, 1886, returned to Atlanta, where he has since practiced. He is a member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, of which he was president in 1890, of the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association and the National Association of Railway Surgeons. Dr. Cooper has contributed numerous articles to the various medical journals; among those which have appeared in the Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal were those on "The Treatment of Hemorrhoids," "The Modern Treatment of Fractures," "Diagnosis and Treatment of Potts' Disease of the Spine," and "The Treatment of Coccygodynia." He is medical examiner for the Provident Savings Life Assurance society of New York, chief surgeon of the Atlanta & West Point railroad, the Western railroad of Alabama, local surgeon to the Georgia railroad, to the Central railroad of Georgia, and visiting surgeon to the Henry W. Grady hospital. For four years he was professor of chemistry in the Atlanta Medical college. His father, Thomas L. Cooper, was a Georgian and a lawyer, who, before the war, was solicitor-general of the Atlanta circuit. He entered the Confederate service in 1861 as captain of the Atlanta Grays, and at the time of his death was colonel of the Eighth Georgia regiment. He married Miss Mary, daughter of Alexander Pope, a native of Virginia, who came to Georgia with his parents when a child. Dr. Cooper's grandfather was Mark Anthony Cooper, who was born in Georgia, and for many years was prominent in public life. He was a member of congress in 1839-41-42-43, served in the state legislature, and was a major in the Seminole war in 1836. Dr. Cooper's great-grandfather was a Virginian, who came to Georgia in his early manhood and died there. His maternal ancestors were Scotch-Irish.

MR. JOHN TYLER COOPER is one of Atlanta's most useful and honored citizens. An aristocrat in blood, having been reared in the purple, so to speak, Mr. Cooper is intensely democratic in his feelings and believes in giving to all men that show of deference and respect to which they are properly entitled. No citizen of Atlanta, in this regard, has ever surpassed the subject of this sketch in presenting to the rising generation the pattern of a dignified and gentle chivalry. The antecedents of Mr. Cooper deserve mention. His grandfather, Thomas A. Cooper, was born in Ireland, though of English stock. He came to America in early manhood and espoused the heart of Mary Fairlie, a noted New York belle, who was the original Sophia Sparkle in Washington Irving's Salmagundi. He was one of the leading tragedians of that day and served as second to Ecker in the latter's duel with Alexander Hamilton's son. This was prior to the famous Burr-Hamilton duel. Mr. Cooper died in 1850, being at that time in the Philadelphia custom house. He was a man of singular talents and as an actor enjoyed a wide popularity. Mr. James Fairlie Cooper, the tragedian's son, and the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in New York city. He graduated from the military school at West Point, and coming to Georgia a short while afterward, was employed in the construction of the Western & Atlantic railroad as civil engineer. At Cassville, Ga., on that road, he was married to Miss Sarah F. Spier, daughter of John Pittman Spier, a native of Virginia. He was lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh Georgia regiment during the late war, serving in that capacity for six months. He was then appointed tax-in-kind quartermaster, locating first at Marietta, Ga., and then at Columbus. After the war he returned to his profession as civil engineer and located in Atlanta. For two years he was the city engineer of Atlanta. Mr. Cooper died in 1869. His death was followed by that of his wife in 1875. His sister, Priscilla Cooper, married Robert Tyler, son of President Tyler. She was the lady of the White House until the marriage of President Tyler, which occurred during his term of office. A daughter was born to her while a resident of the White House as a result of this union. The subject of this sketch, Mr. John Tyler Cooper, was born in Marietta, Ga., on March 26, 1844. After a preliminary course of study in the primary schools of that place he entered the Georgia Military institute and in June, 1862, having recently attained his eighteenth year, he enlisted as a private in Company E, of the Ninth Georgia battalion of artillery, commanded by Maj. A. Leyden. He served in this capacity for a year, after which he was successively promoted to corporal, sergeant, ordnance sergeant and battalion quartermaster-sergeant. At the close of the war he was on Maj. Leyden's staff. Mr. Cooper was in the two battles at Knoxville and the one fought at Star Fort, near that city; also in the hard fighting at Campbell's Station, Ringgold, and the two days' fight on the road to Chickamauga, and the terrific engagement which subsequently took place at Chickamauga. After the war Mr. Cooper rode from Lynchburg, Va., to Athens, Ga., on horseback, disposing of his animal for $3,500 in Confederate money. Coming to Atlanta, he purchased at auction, with two or three other gentlemen, a bale of cotton yarn for $10,000 in Confederate money. The yarn was afterward sold for $150 in greenbacks, netting Mr. Cooper $50 as his share of the proceeds. In a few months after his arrival Mr. Cooper entered the office of Judge Daniel Pittman as clerk to the ordinary of Fulton county, remaining in that office until 1881. The board of county commissioners was organized at this time and Mr. Cooper was made the clerk of that body, a position which he has since continued to occupy. In 1884 the subject of this sketch was elected to a seat in the city council as a representative from the sixth ward. His career in that body was able and conservative, and accordingly in 1885 he was promoted to the dignity of an alderman. In the following year he was nominated as a candidate for mayor of the city of Atlanta and triumphantly elected. During his term of office he kept a close watch upon the interests of the public and gave to the city a wise, conservative and patriotic administration. On the night of his retirement from office he was elected to a seat on the city board of health and served until September, 1894, when he resigned. Mr. Cooper is a member of the Ancient Order of Odd Fellows, the Masonic fraternity, the Knights of Pythias, and the Red Men. Recently, however, he has not affiliated with the brethren in any of these mystic organizations. Mr. Cooper is a consistent member of St. Luke's Episcopal church of this city, and is thoroughly familiar with the government, principles and traditions of the Episcopal faith. Mr. Cooper was married in Montgomery, Ala., in 1875 to Miss Mary Crain Marks, a beautiful and cultured lady of that city. Two children were born to them who are still living: Samuel M., a student in the Bellevue high school at Lynchburg, Va., and Sarah F., in school at Montgomery, Ala. Mrs. Cooper died on Dec. 4, 1894. Mr. Cooper's brother, Charles F. Cooper, who enlisted in the Seventh Georgia cavalry, was a courier for Gen. P. M. B. Young. He was a brave and gallant officer and commanded the unbounded confidence of Gen. Young. He died in Houston, Tex., in 1893. By inheritance Mr. Cooper is a member of the Order of Cincinnatus. His maternal grandfather, James Fairlie, was a second lieutenant in the Second New York regiment and was afterward on the staff of Baron Steuben, with the rank of major. He subsequently married a daughter of Chief Justice Yates of the supreme court of New York. As the clerk of the board of county commissioners, Mr. Cooper has served the county for many years, and the duties of his office have been discharged with unremitting zeal, patriotism and fidelity.

CHARLES W. CRANKSHAW controls one of the largest jewelry establishments in Atlanta. Mr. Crankshaw was born in that city Dec. 23, 1856. In his young boyhood he entered the public schools of Atlanta; at the age of seventeen years he discontinued attendance and accepted a position with a jewelry firm as salesman, holding this place for several years; and then formed a partnership with J. C. Freeman, the firm being Freeman & Crankshaw, jewelers. This joint interest continued until 1892 when it was dissolved. Since that year Mr. Crankshaw has conducted business alone, with no small degree of success. Holding the confidence of the people he has easily secured their patronage and built up a large, increasing trade. In 1894, Mr. Crankshaw was united in marriage to Miss Mary Marsh, daughter of E. W. Marsh, Esq., but on May 14, 1895, sustained an irreparable loss in her death. Mr. Crankshaw is popular, entertaining and possesses a personality that engenders friendships. He is one of the prominent clubmen of the city—a member of the Capital City club, and chairman of the house committee, which office he has filled for six or seven years; a member of the Piedmont Driving club, and for seven years president of the Cotillion club, which club has given the most elegant entertainments in the history of social Atlanta. Mr. Crankshaw has long been a participant in Atlanta's social gaieties and wears with befitting grace the wreath of popularity.

MAJ. JOHN CALHOUN COURTNEY, the subject of this sketch, is a typical Virginia gentleman. He was born in the city of Norfolk, in that state, on Aug. 16, 1834, and resided in Norfolk until reaching his majority. His father, Richard Courtney, was also a Virginian and a native of King and Queen county. He served for a while in the United States navy, after which he entered the journalistic field and assumed an editorial pen on the staff of the "American Beacon," a whig paper published in Norfolk, Va. He was associated, in this capacity, with the late William C. Shields, one of the most distinguished exponents of Virginia's newspaperdom. Young Courtney, at the age of fifteen, decided to master the science of telegraphy, and entered the service of the Virginia telegraph company, and before the close of the year 1849 was reading the Morse system by sound. He is perhaps the first person that ever accomplished the feat of receiving telegraphic messages by sound. In 1855 he went to Petersburg, Va., and accepted a position as telegraph operator with the Washington & New Orleans telegraph company. In 1857 he was appointed agent for the Norfolk & Petersburg railroad company. He left Petersburg in 1862 for Burlington, N. C., to assume charge of the telegraph lines belonging to the Southern express company, and after remaining a year in Burlington he next removed to Charlotte, and became the superintendent of the telegraph department, holding the position until 1866. During the first year of the war Maj. Courtney was in frequent consultation with Gen. Robert E. Lee in regard to the telegraph service. Later on he corresponded with Gens. Beauregard and Johnston and delivered to Gen. Beauregard, in advance of all other dispatches, the news of Gen. Lee's surrender at Appomattox. Maj. Courtney also delivered to President Jefferson Davis the dispatch from Gen. John C. Breckinridge, announcing the assassination of President Lincoln. He was subsequently taken to Washington to corroborate this dispatch before the court martial engaged in the great assassination trial. From May, 1862, until the close of the war, Maj. Courtney was in charge of the telegraph lines from Danville, Va., and Weldon, N. C., to Columbia, S. C. This position was not given to him directly by the Confederate government, but it brought him into frequent communication with the leaders of the Confederacy, and in this way he rendered valuable service to the country. Maj. Courtney remained in Columbia, S. C., from 1866 until 1870 as the assistant superintendent of the Southern express company for North and South Carolina. In October, 1870, he came to Atlanta as the superintendent of the telegraph lines between Atlanta and Chattanooga, Tenn., and from Dec. 27, 1870, was in the employ of the Western & Atlantic railroad company. He served in this capacity until 1873, when he was elected by the executive committee of the Western & Atlantic company to the office of auditor of the road, vacated by the death of Owen Lynch. He continued to occupy this position until the expiration of the lease, and still holds this office under the receivers of that company to the close of 1895. For a long period Maj. Courtney acted as secretary and treasurer for the Monteagle assembly, of Monteagle, Tenn., though still residing in Atlanta, and did much to build up that institution. In 1880 he was commissioned as a delegate to the Robert Raikes memorial convention in London, England, held in honor of Robert Raikes, the founder of the system of Sunday schools. Maj. Courtney had been an active Sunday school worker for many years, and going to London as the representative of the state of Georgia, he took an active part in the deliberations of the convention. For nearly fifteen years Maj. Courtney was the superintendent of the Sunday school of the First Methodist church. He is still a member of that church. For a long time prior to 1890 he was secretary and treasurer of the state Sunday school association. Since 1890 he has acted as special examiner in quite a number of railroad matters and has been chairman of the auditing committee of the Southern railway and steamship association: Maj. Courtney was united in marriage on May 10, 1859, to Miss Mary E. Williamson, the daughter of the late George Williamson, of Petersburg, Va. Their marriage life has been a signally happy one and three children were born to them: John R., agent for the N. C. & St. L. R. R. at Macon, Ga.; Richard B., agent for the M. K. T. railroad at Houston, Texas; and Mary Stuart Courtney. Since February, 1891, Maj. Courtney has been the secretary and treasurer of the Capital City club, of Atlanta, Ga., having been elected each year without opposition. Honest, conscientious and straightforward, Maj. Courtney has made a useful citizen and a model member of the community. Full of energy and resources he has never allowed himself to be idle and has always taken a leading part in all movements which he has had anything to do with. In this respect he has been a conspicuous example of progressive enterprise and persevering industry.

DR. LOGAN M'LEAN CRICHTON, professor of diseases of the nose and throat in the Southern medical college, Atlanta, and of diseases of the eye, ear and nose in the Atlanta polyclinic, was born near Tampa, Fla., Dec. 29, 1864, and two years later moved with his parents to Jacksonville, Fla., where they resided until 1872, when they came to Atlanta. Dr. Crichton attended a private school at Jacksonville, the public schools at Atlanta, and the military school at Kirkwood, Ga., for several years. He read medicine with Dr. J. B. Baird for a year, and then took the graded course of study at the Bellevue hospital medical college in New York city, graduating in 1888. He returned to Atlanta and practiced his profession for twelve months; going again to New York city in 1889, where he attended the polyclinic, and for six months acted as assistant, receiving special instruction in the diseases of the eye, ear and nose at the New York eye and ear hospital. He also attended Mt. Sinai hospital, and the New Amsterdam eye and ear hospital in New York city. Since his return to Atlanta he has made eye, ear and nose work a specialty. Dr. Crichton is a member of the State medical association, the Atlanta society of medicine, and of St. Luke's Episcopal church. He was married in October, 1893, to May, daughter of Charles Irvin. Dr. John P. Crichton, the father of Dr. L. M. Crichton, was born in St. Marys, Ga., in 1821. He was a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, and practiced in Florida, retiring from practice when he moved to Atlanta in 1872. He married Adelaide, widow of Kennedy. They had four children: Addie, wife of I. T. Calloway, Atlanta; Eugene C., Atlanta; Dr. L. M. Crichton; and Maud D., wife of Dr. C. G. Giddings, Atlanta. Dr. Crichton's grandfather Crichton emigrated from Scotland.

DR. WALTER ANDREW CROWE, one of Atlanta's leading physicians, was born on a farm in Washington county, Va., May 7, 1857, and was there brought up, receiving his primary education in the schools of that district. In 1875 he matriculated at Emory-Henry college and was graduated in 1879. He then went to Bellevue Hospital Medical college, New York city, and for three years remained there, graduating in 1881. Returning to his native county, he located at Glade Springs, where he practiced four years and then spent the winter of 1884-85 at the university of Pennsylvania, acting at the same time as assistant to H. F. Formad in the pathological department of that institution. During the winter he took a course in the hospitals at Philadelphia and the following summer (1885) came back to Atlanta and established the practice which he now enjoys. Dr. Crowe was in 1885 appointed lecturer to the Southern Medical college on physical diagnosis and diseases of children, which chair he held until 1891, when he was elected lecturer on abdominal surgery, which position he now holds. Prominent amongst his fellow practitioners, he is a member of the State Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association and is president of the Atlanta Obstetrical society. He is also a member of the Virginia State Medical association and the Academy of Medicine at Abingdon, Va. Equally a favorite in social circles, Dr. Crowe has affiliated with W. D. Luckie lodge No. 89, F. and A. M., and is past master of Liberty Hall lodge, of Liberty Hall, Va. He is likewise a member and attendant of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and his name is enrolled in the lists of the National Scotch-Irish society. He was twice married; first to Miss Flora Theresa Thompson, in 1882, and they had one son, Samuel. His second wife was Mary Lyons, with whom he was united in 1886, and to this second marriage have been born three children: Flora Marie, Walter A. and Arthur L. Dr. Crowe's father is James Crowe, who was born in Washington county, Va., in 1821. He is a farmer and stock-raiser, priding himself on the individual excellence and breeding of his animals. He served during the war in defense of his state. He has been elected to many offices in the gift of the people, representing his district in the state legislature and his county as supervisor. He married Eliza A. Edmanson and they had three children, of whom Dr. W. A. Crowe is the youngest. The others are: Elizabeth, wife of W. W. Prunee, Friendship, Va., and Mattie J., wife of Rev. W. H. Price, Glade Springs, Va. James Crowe's father was also James Crowe, and was born either in Scotland or soon after his parents landed on American shores. They settled in Pennsylvania and James Crowe came in early manhood to Virginia, where he lived a prosperous life and died at a ripe age. Dr. Walter Andrew Crowe is well known in the journalistic branch of his profession, having contributed many widely read articles to the medical magazines and read many papers before the societies of which he is a member. Among his best works are the following: "The Treatment of Abortion and Some of the Complications Incident Thereto," which was read before the State Medical association in Columbus, Ga., May, 1892; "Some Important Considerations in the Management of Cases After Coelotomy," which was read November, 1893, before the meeting of the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association at New Orleans; "Cancer of the Uterus, the Remote Results of Operative Interference," which was read before the State Medical association, April, 1894, and a paper on "Treatment of Some of the Most Common Forms of Pelvic Congestion in the Female," read before the meeting of the Georgia State Medical association, at Americus, 1893.

MR. LAURENT DE GIVE, consul for Belgium, and owner of the Grand and Marietta street theaters, of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Belgium in 1828, and there resided until thirty-two years of age. He applied himself studiously in the schools of his native country and graduated from the university of Liege in 1853 with the degree of LL. D., having passed with highest honors through the law department. He began the practice of law in Namur, Belgium, and continued for seven years, meeting with steady and growing success. During this period he was for four years a member of the provincial council, an elective body corresponding to the state legislature in the United States. In 1859 Mr. De Give was appointed by his government consul at the residence of Atlanta and commissioner to assist in establishing direct trade with the south. He soon discovered the great future of this country and resolved to make Georgia his permanent home. Since 1860 he has resided in Atlanta, and he has held to this day his position of consul. On arriving in Atlanta he had in his possession a small fortune, and believing in Atlanta's future growth to a metropolis, invested largely in real estate. After the war he sold to the Masons the site of the opera house on Marietta street, their intention being to erect a magnificent Masonic temple. But their plans failed when only half realized, and Mr. De Give was compelled to purchase the half finished building, and out of it built Atlanta's first complete theater. Though popular with all classes of people, amongst whom he has lived over thirty-five years, he has never held office because he is not a naturalized citizen. In 1857, while yet a resident of Belgium, Mr. De Give was united in marriage and has had seven children, three of whom died in infancy, and one, Paul, passed away in February, 1894, at the age of twenty-seven years, on the very verge of manhood. He was loved and admired by all, with an intellect to grasp and solve the weighty problems that beset mankind. His death was deeply deplored. The three other children are as follows: Louise, wife of Edward Horine, of Atlanta; Henry, a graduate of the Troy, N. Y., Polytechnic school, who is at present a civil engineer, and Julius, a graduate of the Georgia Technological school of Atlanta, and a mechanical engineer. Mr. De Give has frequently been interested in large business enterprises and has demonstrated a capacity for financing that has placed him among the moneyed men of the city. He is a Roman Catholic by faith and a member of the Elks. Mr. De Give has been continually honored by his sovereign, the king of Belgium. In 1880 the cross of the order of Leopold was bestowed on him, and lately the cross of the order of Merit-Civil was added to the first in recognition of his long and splendid service. The Grand theater, which ranks among the first in America for beauty and exquisite finish, is proudly spoken of by Atlantians and stands a monument to Mr. De Give's pluck and energy and his exalted opinion of Atlanta's culture. He has the development of his city at heart.

DR. KINSMAN CLINTON DIVINE, one of the foremost medical specialists of Atlanta, was born on his father's plantation in Jefferson county, Mississippi, Sept. 27, 1833, and there resided until he was four years old, when his parents took him to Madison county, same state, and brought him up there. He gained his education in Madison college, of Sharon, in the latter county, and began the study of medicine with the late Dr. O'Leary when he had finished his academic course. From the outset he determined that his instruction in medicine should be most thorough, and the history of his collegiate and hospital course shows that he carried out his determination to the very letter. First he attended lectures at the Louisville medical college in the winter of 1854-5, and then entered the university of New York, from which he graduated in March, 1856. Fulfilling his original desire to gain as thorough a knowledge as possible of his subject, he sought a vast amount of private instruction during his attendance at this institution. His private instructors were Drs. P. A. Aylette, T. G. Thomas and Donega. He was on the private clinical staffs of Prof. G. Gunning, S. Bedford, Dr. W. H. Van Buren, and of Dr. C. E. Isaacs—the last named being then considered one of the best anatomists living. After his graduation, and in connection with his other work, he acted as house surgeon in King's county hospital, Flatbush, N. Y., for one year. In May, 1857, he was elected by the King's county hospital board to represent it at the meeting of the United States medical association, which convened at Nashville, Tenn. Dr. Divine subsequently began the practice of general medicine at his old home, Sharon, Miss., and continued there until the opening of the war. He entered the Confederate service as surgeon in May, 1861, and afterward displayed in his military life the same indomitable energy he exhibited in his collegiate days. First, he was assigned to the Eighteenth Mississippi regiment and was with it at the first battle of Manassas, and at Leesburg, Va.; after which fight he was transferred to Pensacola, Fla., where he served until 1862, when that city was evacuated. Sent then to Mobile, Ala., he was very soon afterward at his own request dispatched to the front, going to Corinth, Miss., with the army of the Tennessee with which he remained until the autumn of 1863. At that time he was ordered to relieve Surgeon Cowan, at Pulaski, Tenn., where the latter was post surgeon. Dr. Divine stayed at this point about six weeks only. After the battle of Perryville, Ky., he was left in charge of all the army surgeons in the Confederate service then in that state, being located two miles northeast of Perryville at McDowell's Place for two weeks. He was ordered to Louisville, from there to Memphis, and finally to Tullahoma, Tenn., where he rejoined Gen. Walthall's staff on which he served until the spring of 1863. Then he was transferred to Pulaski as above noted and from there to Newnan, Ga., where he had charge of the hospital. The scene of his next duty was Macon, Ga., where he was again placed in charge of the hospital, Fair Ground No. 2, and subsequently he was kept going from place to place until the war closed, at which time he was serving at Cuthbert, Ga., having just made arrangements to treat all wounds requiring particular care that had been received by soldiers under his charge. After the surrender he journeyed without a dollar in his pocket to Canton, Miss., where he began the practice of his profession afresh, and remained until 1872, in which year he removed to Newnan, Ga., and entered into partnership with Dr. A. B. Calhoun, with whom he was associated for two years. On account of ill-health, however, he was compelled to relinquish his profession, so he retired to a plantation near Newnan, living in the country eight years. In 1882 he determined to resume active work, and locating in Atlanta began again the general practice of medicine, which he carried on until 1892, when he contracted the field of his labor and now makes a specialty of general surgery and treatment of rectal diseases. Dr. Divine is a member of the Georgia State Medical association, and the Atlanta Society of Medicine. He is a Knight Templar, a Knight of Honor (being an examiner of that order), and is an honored member of St. Phillips' Cathedral Episcopal church. He married in May, 1863, Martha Frances Calhoun, a daughter of Dr. A. B. Calhoun, and they have two children, Kinsman C., and Frances D., wife of Arnold Broyles, a prominent attorney of Atlanta. Dr. Divine's father was Kinsman Divine, a native of Connecticut, who was a soldier in the Seminole war and afterward married Elizabeth Saunders. The grandfather was William Divine, a revolutionary soldier, who was born in New York, and after the revolution settled in Connecticut and was married there, moving at a later date to Mississippi. Dr. Divine is now surgeon of Fulton county post, Confederate Veterans, and shortly after his graduation from the university of New York was appointed surgeon in the Russian army to serve in Russia, but declined the appointment.

JUDGE RUFUS T. DORSEY. No lawyer in Georgia is more splendidly equipped for the practice of his profession than Judge Rufus T. Dorsey, of Atlanta. Not only as an advocate before the jury, displaying the rich and varied qualifications of the orator, but as a pleader, in the legal sense of that expression, Judge Dorsey has no superior in the state and perhaps few, if any, in the south. The combination of these rare gifts, in such an eminent degree, has frequently been the subject of admiring comment among his brethren and associates at the bar. By reason of these versatile accomplishments, Judge Dorsey feels equally at home in the trial of both criminal and civil issues and is alike convincing in his arguments, both to the court and to the jury. Judge Dorsey has always been a deep student and is loyal to the principles and ethics of his profession. The subject of this sketch was born in Fayetteville, Ga., on Oct. 2, 1848, and is therefore a native Georgian. His father, Solomon D. Dorsey, was also a native of this state and for many years a resident of Fayette county. He was a farmer by preference of occupation, choosing to devote his energies to the cultivation of the soil rather than to court the various disappointments and vexations incident to business life and to the learned professions. For a number of years before the war he was a colonel of militia, and for quite a while during the war he continued to hold this military rank. Enlisting in the active service of the Confederacy he became a lieutenant in the Second Georgia regiment, and served with conspicuous gallantry throughout the war. Col. Dorsey was a man of superior force of mind and strength of character. He exerted a marked influence over his fellow-men and was held in the highest esteem and respect by all classes in the community. The boyhood, youth and early manhood of Judge Dorsey were passed in Fayette county. He received his primary instruction from the schools at Fayetteville, and subsequently attended a select school at Campbellton, taught by Prof. W. H. Andrews. The discipline of this school and the various branches of learning taught by its able instructor made the enjoyment of its curriculum equivalent to an average course of study in college. The subject of this sketch was too young to enter the army or to share any of the bitter experiences of a soldier during the late war, being only thirteen years old at the time hostilities commenced. He completed his schooling in 1868 and then, having certain predilections for the practice of the law, he began to apply himself with diligence to his legal preparations. He entered a law office in Fayetteville, Ga., and for several months devoted himself to the acquisition and mastery of all the fundamental principles of the profession. He made a careful study of all the legal text books that were recommended to him, and having acquired a large and accurate fund of information, he formally applied for admission to the bar. He encountered no difficulty in being admitted and after passing a splendid examination he located for the practice of his profession in Fayetteville, believing that he could do as well in the home of his boyhood as anywhere else at that time. He found it rather up-hill work at the start, but his spirit never flagged and he continued to persevere in hope and study until prosperous days began to dawn on his professional horizon. In 1870 he formed a partnership with Col. Hughey of Fayetteville, which continued until that gentleman moved to Texas two years afterward. The young advocate then continued to practice on his own account in the courts of that circuit until 1880. He then came to Atlanta and opened an office, believing that a broader field of usefulness and higher professional honors awaited him in the capital city. In 1889 he formed a partnership with Mr. Albert Howell, Jr., the youngest son of Capt. Evan P. Howell of Atlanta, and two years later Col. P. H. Brewster was admitted, making the firm of Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, one of the strongest legal combinations in the city. Going back a few years: the subject of this sketch in 1873 was elected to a seat in the Georgia legislature as representative from Fayette county. He enjoyed the gratifying distinction of being the first democratic representative from that county since the war. Republican influence dominated that portion of the state for several years after the war and controlled the ballot-box. As an evidence of the high prestige attained by Judge Dorsey as a member of the legislature it is sufficient to observe that he was appointed on the general judiciary committee and also on the committee on appropriations. He took an active and eloquent part in all the important debates on the floor of the house and made a useful and patriotic member of that body. Shortly after coming to Atlanta the subject of this sketch, in 1883, was appointed judge of the city court of Atlanta. He filled the position for only one year, but discharged the duties of this high office with such ability as to win the encomiums of the bar, as well as expressions of high praise from the public generally. His resignation was received with regret by the bar and citizens of Atlanta. Judge Dorsey was married in 1870 to Miss Sarah M. Bennett, daughter of Mr. C. E. Bennett of Fayetteville, Ga. They have six children, four boys and two girls, and together they form a bright and attractive household. Judge Dorsey is a member of the Methodist church, and for several years has been a leading steward of Trinity church. He is loyal to his denomination and takes a deep and frequently a very active interest in all religious work. His chief aim in life is not to accumulate money, but to accomplish good and in the furtherance of this endeavor he has made his life a blessing to the church and to the community. Judge Dorsey's grandfather, John Dorsey, came to Georgia from Maryland, and died in this state in 1872 at a ripe old age. He followed the time-honored profession of the plow, and by diligence and economy accumulated considerable wealth. The family is of English descent, and the sturdy characteristics of that blood have been exemplified in all of its generations. Judge Dorsey's brother, John M. Dorsey, served throughout the entire war as a private in the Tenth Georgia regiment. He was several times wounded, receiving his severest ones at Gettysburg and Cold Harbor. The success of Judge Dorsey at the bar has not only been due to his fine legal equipment, but to the high sense of honor that has always characterized his professional conduct, and to his uncompromising integrity.

DR. JOHN WESLEY DUNCAN was born on a plantation in Union county, Ga., Sept. 29, 1842, and resided there until he reached his majority, attending the schools of the county and the academy in Clay county, N. C., where he was pursuing his studies when the war began. In 1865 Dr. Duncan, having finished his academic course, came to Forsyth county, Ga., and commenced the study of medicine with Dr. E. M. Bacon. He attended the Atlanta Medical college two years, graduating in 1868. After practicing for a time in western North Carolina he went to Philadelphia, east Tennessee, where he quickly established an enviable professional reputation and resided for thirteen years. In 1883 he located in Atlanta and has since then practiced there. He is a member of the State Medical association and ex-president of the Atlanta Society of Medicine. He is well known in the journalistic world, having contributed many able and comprehensive articles to the magazines devoted to the medical profession. Two of the papers he has delivered have been highly complimented, one on the subject "Of Dysentery," which he read before the State Medical association, convened at Athens in 1883, and the other on "Typho-Malarial Fever," which was also read before that body at its meeting in Columbus nine years later. Dr. Duncan is a member of Gate City lodge N. 3, F. & A. M., and when a resident of Philadelphia, east Tennessee, served as W. M. of Philadelphia lodge No. 426. He is also enrolled as a Knight of Pythias in Adolph Brant lodge of Atlanta, and has been medical examiner to that fraternity since 1888. He is also associate medical examiner to the Knights of Honor. He is a member and steward of Grace Methodist Episcopal church in Atlanta. Dr. Duncan was first married in western North Carolina, Oct. 1, 1868, to Mary M., daughter of Watson Curtis, and they had six children. He was married again Sept. 16, 1885, to Minnie E., daughter of Dr. A. Ellis, Milton county, Ga., and to his last marriage have been born six children—three boys and three girls. Dr. Duncan's father was David Newton Duncan, a native of Burke county, N. C., who was born in 1806 and came to Georgia thirty years later, locating in Union county, where he engaged in farming until his death in 1879. He married Nancy Gillespie and they had five children, of whom four grew up and three now survive: William Rufus of Union county, Ga.; Dr. John Wesley; Dr. Moses C., Madisonville, Tenn., who graduated at the Atlanta Medical college in 1873, was afterward at Bellevue Hospital Medical college, and now enjoys a large and lucrative practice. Dr. Duncan's grandfather, Charles Duncan, was a Virginian by birth, who migrated to North Carolina in his early manhood and there married. In later years he came to Union county, Ga., where he lived until his death, which occurred during the war, in his ninety-first year. The emigrant ancestor was a Scotchman, the sturdy integrity and fixity of purpose of that race being still notable traits of the family character. Dr. John Wesley Duncan is a great favorite socially and professionally.

DR. JOHN G. EARNEST, one of Atlanta's leading practitioners, is a native of Tennessee, who was born in Greene county in that state on May 16, 1842. His father was a merchant in the little village of Rheatown. Here he spent his early boyhood, remaining on the plantation until he was eleven years old. Leaving the parental homestead he entered the military school at Newport, Tenn., taught by Maj. W. F. Bouldin. He remained at this school, however, for only ten months, leaving it for Clear Spring academy. After one year's tuition at the academy he entered Rotherwood seminary at Kingsport, Tenn. In the fall of 1857 he entered Emory and Henry college, in Washington county, Va. At this institution he made rapid progress and acquired a broad and liberal culture in the arts and sciences. During his senior year and just a few months prior to the time of graduation the war broke out. Leaving college he returned to his home in Tennessee and shortly afterward enlisted in the Confederate service. He became a private in Company K, Sixtieth Tennessee regiment, and served in the ranks until Jan. 1, 1863. By reason of his courage on the field, and his skill in military tactics, he was made second lieutenant of his company and afterward first lieutenant. He held this rank until the close of the war. Lieut. Earnest was characterized throughout his career as a soldier by a true military bearing, and a courage that never faltered. Among the engagements in which he participated were the following: Coffeeville, Grenada, Baker's creek and Vicksburg. At the latter siege he was captured July 4, 1863, and sent home on parole for almost a year. In June, 1864, he rejoined the army and served in east Tennessee and southwest Virginia until the close of hostilities, taking part in the battles of Morristown, Russellville and numerous smaller skirmishes. He was fortunate enough to survive the war without being wounded; but two horses were shot from under him. He never missed a battle in which his regiment was engaged. After the war the young lieutenant came to Georgia, residing for a short while with an intimate friend in Baker county. In July, 1865, he returned to his native state and entered vigorously upon the study of medicine at Madisonville, Tenn. Having selected the practice of medicine as the means of earning a livelihood, he determined to give himself up exclusively to the labors of that profession. He first conceived the idea of being a physician during the war, and managed, in a rather broken and disconnected way, to carry on his studies in camp. In the fall of 1865 he entered Jefferson Medical college of Philadelphia, one of the leading institutions of the country, graduating in the following year. For six months he served as interne in the Lying-in hospital of Philadelphia, after which he returned to Tennessee, locating at Morristown. Six months later he moved to Mossy Creek, in the same state, remaining there until the spring of 1874. From the beginning of his professional career Dr. Earnest enjoyed a good practice. Possessed of a genial disposition and a strong personal magnetism, he found little difficulty in winning the confidence of his patrons. After leaving Mossy Creek he came to Georgia, locating at Newnan, in Coweta county. Here he remained for seven years in the enjoyment of a large practice as the leading physician of that section. Coming to Atlanta in 1881, Dr. Earnest has since been a resident of that city. He is recognized as a skillful practitioner and stands among the leading members of his profession, in a city that enjoys the reputation of being one of the chief medical centers of the south. Dr. Earnest is a member of the State Medical association, and also of the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association. He belongs to the Atlanta Society of Medicine, and holds the position of gynecologist to the Grady hospital. He is the physician for the Jennie D. Inman orphanage, the Hebrew Orphans' home, and is medical examiner for the Union Central Life Insurance company of Cincinnati. He has been a frequent contributor to current medical literature and the discussions of the medical societies. Dr. Earnest belongs to several fraternal organizations, and is a Knight Templar. He is an elder in the First Presbyterian church, and is a man of conspicuous and exalted piety. Dr. Earnest was married in 1868 to Miss Martha A. Hoffett, the daughter of Mr. W. H. Hoffett, of Tennessee, and several children have been the result of this union. Nicholas W. Earnest, the father of Dr. Earnest, was born in Tennessee. His wife's maiden name was Martha Cannon. They had three children, one son and two daughters. Peter Earnest, the grandfather of Dr. Earnest, was a man of strong character and commanding influence in his day and generation.

CAPT. W. D. ELLIS, lawyer, Atlanta, Fulton Co., Ga., has attained his distinction at the bar by reason of the high character and commanding qualifications which he has brought to the practice of his chosen profession. He is not a native of this state, but was born in the neighboring commonwealth of South Carolina, in Beaufort district, on Aug. 17, 1844. Until his thirteenth year he lived on the plantation owned by his father, Dr. William D. Ellis, near Allendale, S. C., and enjoyed the sunny, invigorating life of the open fields. His education on the farm was conducted by private tutors, and his acquisition of knowledge was both tenacious and rapid. Leaving the plantation he entered the military school at Aiken, S. C., remaining there for three years. The commencement of the war between the states found him a beardless boy in years, but possessing all the qualifications of the soldier in military discipline and patriotic impulse. In 1861 he joined the Pickens rangers, organized in Aiken, S. C., and with his comrades was shortly afterward assigned to Col. William E. Martin's cavalry regiment. In this regiment the subject of our sketch served as a private until February, 1862, when the regiment disbanded. He then joined the Eleventh South Carolina regiment of infantry, commanded by his uncle, Col. D. H. Ellis. He was assigned to a position on his uncle's staff as a non-commissioned officer, but was soon elected second lieutenant of Company B of that regiment and served in this capacity for about a year. The regiment was subsequently attached to Gen. Johnson Haygood's brigade, and took part in the defense of Charleston, Fort Sumter, and the general defenses of the city. The next experience of the young soldier was in Virginia, and here for quite awhile he was in full command of the company. Among the battles in which he participated were: Pocotaligo, S. C., a number of skirmishes on James island, the siege of Charleston, Olustee,

Fla., Cedar Run, Swift creek, Va., Drewry's bluff, second Cold Harbor, Fort Harrison, siege of Petersburg, battle of Weldon railroad, and Fort Fisher. Capt. Ellis was made a prisoner of war at the last-named place and was sent to the old capitol prison, in Washington city. He was subsequently removed to Fort Delaware, and was released in June, 1865. A slight wound received at Petersburg disabled him for a few days but failed to impair his courage. On his release from prison he returned to Aiken, S. C., and began to teach school. At the same time he devoted himself assiduously to the study of law and was admitted to the practice by the supreme court of South Carolina in 1868. He continued to teach, however, until 1870, doing such little professional work as chanced to fall his way. He came to Atlanta after giving up his school and, in order to acquire a start, he gave up his profession for a while and entered the journalistic field as a means for raising money. For two years he divided his time between the "Intelligencer," the "Constitution" and the "Herald," after which he returned to the practice of his profession. In a short time he formed a legal partnership with Judge William T. Newman, which continued for three years and was then dissolved. In 1873 he entered into a partnership with Col. John Milledge, but this, in a like manner, was dissolved in 1880, Capt. Ellis receiving the appointment as solicitor of the city court of Atlanta. He filled the position with marked ability, but declined a reappointment in order to resume the general practice. In 1886 he renewed his partnership with Judge Newman, but the appointment of the latter in 1887 as judge of the Federal court for the northern district of Georgia necessitated a dissolution of the firm. In 1888 the present partnership was formed, Mr. James R. Gray, a distinguished member of the bar, being the legal associate of Capt. Ellis. W. D. Ellis, Jr., was admitted into the firm in 1894. In 1884-85 Capt. Ellis represented Fulton county in the state legislature. He was a member of various committees, among them the general judiciary, corporations, military, manufactures and education. He was chairman of the committee on internal improvements, and vice-chairman of the committee on corporations. Capt. Ellis was the author of the bill creating the Stone Mountain circuit, and was very active in devising plans by which to erect the new capitol building. Capt. Ellis was a member of the city council in 1878, and was placed at the head of the legal department. Judge Newman, his law partner, at the same time occupied the position of city attorney, and together they formulated much of the legislation that has brought about the prosperous condition of the city to-day. Capt. Ellis is a loyal member of the order of Knights of Pythias, and is past chancellor of Capital City lodge, No. 33. He is also a consistent member of the Baptist church of Atlanta. In 1868 Capt. Ellis was united in marriage to Miss Prioleau, daughter of Samuel Prioleau, and great-great-granddaughter of Elias Prioleau, the leader of the Huguenot colony in South Carolina. Six children have blessed this happy union, four sons and two daughters. The names of the children are as follows: William D., Jr., Phoebe, Prioleau, Harry H., Frampton E., and Hallie. The home life of Capt. Ellis is an ideal one. He is fond of his family, and is in turn beloved by his fond household. The maternal great-grandfather of Capt. Ellis was Col. A. Hawks Hay, a native of New York state, and a soldier in the revolution. His paternal great-grandfather was also a revolutionary soldier, and was born in the state of Virginia. The father of Capt. Ellis died in 1855, at the early age of thirty-four years, in the midst of a successful professional career. The law firm of which Capt. Ellis is a member does a large business, and probably represents as many corporations and as much capital as any other firm in the state. A high sense of honor has always inspired the conduct of Capt. Ellis at the bar, and his professional career has always been above reproach.

CAPT. JAS. W. ENGLISH stands among the conspicuous figures of the incomparable pluck and courage of Atlanta citizenship. He was one of the originators of the Cotton States and International exposition; he is chairman of the executive committee, a member of the board of police commissioners, president of the American Trust and Banking company, one of the largest financial institutions of the city; president of the Chattahoochee Brick company, one of the largest industrial enterprises of the south; a member of the board of education of Atlanta's public school system, and is largely interested in many other industrial institutions which play no small part in the general development of Atlanta and its section. Capt. English was born October 28, 1837, in the parish of Orleans, state of Louisiana, and was left a penniless orphan at the age of thirteen; he came to Georgia in 1852, and located at Griffin, where he remained until the breaking out of the civil war in 1861, when he enlisted as a private in the Confederate service. His company was ordered to Virginia on the 18th of April, 1861, where it was consolidated with one from Columbus and two from Macon, Ga., forming what was known throughout the war as the Second Georgia battalion. Capt. English remained with the army of northern Virginia, serving with the Second Georgia battalion, Gen. A. R. Wright's brigade. It is said of him by his old comrades that he was only absent thirty days from active service in the field during the entire war. Gen. Lee surrendered him at Appomattox, on the 9th of April, 1865, with the rest of those faithful followers who had borne the brunt of the entire struggle from beginning to end, and on that ever-memorable day, when he began his weary march toward home, the same conditions environed him as confronted every other Confederate soldier that was present at the surrender—poverty in abundance, and poor prospects. It was then he came to Atlanta, making it his home May 14, 1865. He was united in marriage with Miss Emily Alexander, of Griffin, Ga., on July 26, 1866. Their family consists of five children: James W., Jr.; Harry L., Edward, Emily and Jennie. Theirs, indeed, is a happy home. Capt. English entered the service of the city as a member of the general council in 1887, and for the two succeeding years was the chairman of the finance committee of that body, his work in that capacity for the good of the city being marvelous. He found the city's finances in woeful shape, weighted down with a ruinous financial system, with a floating debt of over $500,000, bearing interest at from 12 to 24 per cent. per annum. He went to work to remedy the situation, and by a bold and honest effort placed the debt upon a basis of payment that was easy, satisfactory and safe, and reduced the rate of interest on said debt to 7 per cent. His work along that line is still remembered to-day in graceful acknowledgment by the older citizens. It was also while a member of that body that the present state constitution was adopted. Among other questions submitted to the people of the state, was the permanent location of the state capital, Milledgeville and Atlanta being competitors for that honor. The preponderance of sentiment and the press of the state seemed to be very largely in favor of Milledgeville. When this fact was fully realized by the mayor and council of Atlanta, they requested Capt. English to take charge of Atlanta's interests, which he reluctantly consented to do, realizing that it was leading a forlorn hope, and the great responsibility that would rest upon such a committee. He called together a number of Atlanta's public-spirited citizens; they organized a committee and elected him their chairman; they soon perfected a thorough organization of their friends throughout the entire state, and without a single penny of the city's money appropriated for the purpose of the work, they succeeded in carrying the election favoring Atlanta for the permanent capital by a majority of over 46,000 votes. The only campaign fund, for postage and various incidental expenses of such a campaign, was raised by his appeals to the people of Atlanta for individual subscriptions. This was perhaps the most important work he has ever done for Atlanta, the result being the permanent location and erection of the present magnificent state capitol building in that city. Capt. English retired from public service in 1879, for two years, when he was again called to renew his services to the city as mayor, in 1881-82. This was at a time when Atlanta was about to take her first long step to greatness, it being the year when the first cotton exposition was held, an era that stands pre-eminently replete with renewed energy, life and industry in the history of the town that Sherman burned. While mayor he inaugurated the splendid system of street and sewer improvements that has been carried on to the present degree of excellency. He established the present fire department, changing from the old volunteer service to the paid service; he purchased for the city the real estate and fire apparatus of the volunteer department, consisting of the three department houses, two on Broad and one on Washington street, which proved to be a splendid investment for the city; he established the present fire, signal and telegraph system. It was during his administration that the Georgia Pacific railroad was built, and to his personal efforts is due much of the credit for the successful culmination of the scheme to open up the great coal fields of Alabama advantageously to Atlanta. The city had subscribed and lost $300,000 in their efforts to secure the building of that road. It had been graded only a few miles from the city when the movement failed, and the roadbed and charter were sold to pay debts, and purchased by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad company, no doubt for the purpose of destroying competition, and without any intention of building the road. Capt. English and Mr. Anthony Murphey went to New York, by appointment, to confer with the board of directors of that company, and after twenty days of hard and persistent work succeeded in getting an option from them on that property, and placing it in the hands of others who were able, willing and did build it from Atlanta to Birmingham, Ala., and eventually to Greenville, Miss., passing through the great Alabama coal fields. The completion of that road has added very largely to the wealth and population of Atlanta, in one item alone, viz., the reduction on the price of coal, which was formerly from $4 to $6 per ton for steam purposes, whereas now it can be purchased in any quantity at from $1.65 to $2.00 per ton. It was also during his administration that the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railroad was built, leading southwardly to Macon and northwardly to Rome. These two railroad properties have added many millions of dollars to Atlanta, and thousands of good citizens to her present population. The Cotton exposition of 1881 was a great boom to the city, infusing new life and prosperity to all the arteries of trade and commerce. As mayor of the city, he contributed his full share to the success of that enterprise and the entertainment of the many visitors, and when the exposition ended, with the help of a few friends, he converted the old exposition buildings and grounds into an immense cotton manufactory, which is now one of the strongest manufacturing enterprises in that region of the south. He has always been enthusiastic in encouraging manufactories of every kind, believing it was the surest and safest foundation on which to build a city, thus furnishing abundant and remunerative employment for all the city's population that are willing to work. His work for the promotion of morality was striking and most noteworthy, and he is perhaps better known to-day for his achievements in breaking up gambling, which was rampant in Atlanta, than for any other specific work while mayor. With his usual determination, he gave orders to the police department to invade every gambling house in the city, seize their implements, by force, if need be, take it to the public square and burn it. He prosecuted the lawless ones. They carried their cases to the supreme court, without avail, Mayor English's warfare on them being thoroughly approved of by all the tribunals. Speaking of his career as mayor, the Atlanta "Constitution," at the close of his term, Jan. 1, 1883, editorially remarked: "It is seldom that any officer retires from a trust so universally honored and esteemed as does Mayor English, this morning. The two years of his rule have been the most prosperous the city ever knew—much of which is due to the fact that he has been the best mayor within her memory. In every sense his regime has been successful. He has put under control, at last, a lawless element that has heretofore defied city officials. He has restricted gambling to a few secret corners, if he has not driven it out altogether. In a financial sense, the result has been quite as happy. The English administration closes its year without having one dollar of debt or a single bill payable. It leaves a sinking fund of $95,000, where it found only $40,000 two years ago. It has reduced the bonded debt $9,000. It has spent $101,200 on permanent investments, such as $53,000 on pumps, $28,000 on fire department, and $10,000 for a new school house. It has spent $70,000 on streets, besides a levy of $60,000 on citizens, against $40,000 a year ago. It has maintained every department well. It may be claimed that Mayor English has had the two best years to work. We grant that, and claim for him that the man and the occasion met. He leaves office without a blot on his name or a stain on his record, and will have the confidence and affection of his people." In March, 1893, Capt. English was once more called to the public service by being elected a member of the board of police commissioners, without his solicitation or knowledge. Here he continued his good work, building up the morality of the city, and has continued to serve on that board up to the present time. The benefits of his work for the police department have been marked and considerable. He secured the present telegraph system, and was largely instrumental in securing the appropriation and building the present station house and police barracks. In October, 1893, he offered to resign from that board, but the mayor and general council petitioned him to remain in the work he had so long and faithfully pursued, and he consented. The good people of Atlanta will always appreciate his efforts to keep the police force out of local politics. If there is one thing that characterizes Capt. English as a useful citizen more than any other, it is his public-spiritedness. He has been identified with all charitable work that is started or maintained for the good of Atlanta. He was one of the promoters of the Young Men's Christian association, which was established as the result of the first meeting held at his residence; an original promoter and subscriber to the Georgia School of Technology; a promoter of the Grady hospital, of which he was a trustee until his son succeeded him, upon his resignation; a pioneer promoter of the Confederate soldiers' home, and an early advocate and supporter of the Young Men's library. Capt. English is an untiring worker for the upbuilding of Atlanta's best interests and the protection of her people from the vices of the day. But few men in few cities can be rightfully credited with having accomplished more good results than he has for Atlanta, and the people, rich and poor alike, hold him in high esteem.

JOHN ERSKINE was born on Sept. 13, 1813, in Strabane, County Tyrone, Ireland. In the spring of 1820, before he was seven years of age, his family migrated to British America, locating at St. John's, where the husband and father shortly afterward died. The survivors then came to the United States and resided for a time in the city of New York. John returned to Ireland in 1827 and remained there with his relatives, attending school until 1830 or later. He had a strong predilection for a seafaring life and for seeing many countries. He spent some years in gratifying this disposition, and while so doing acquired a practical knowledge of sailing and handling ships, which he afterward found of considerable use to him as a judge in the trial of cases in admiralty. In 1838, being strongly threatened with disease of the lungs, he took up his abode in the state of Florida. There and in the lower part of Georgia he taught school for four years. Then, studying law, he became a member of the Florida bar in 1846, at the age of thirty-three. In 1851 he was married to Miss Rebecca Smith, a daughter of Gen. Gabriel Smith, of Alabama. It may interest romantic young lawyers to learn that Judge Erskine entered matrimony by "stealing his wife," in which he was assisted by a sympathetic accomplice, who afterward became governor of Florida. After practicing law successfully in Florida for about nine years, Judge Erskine removed to Georgia in 1855, settling first in Newnan, but finally removing to Atlanta, where he resided for the most part during the rest of his life. He practiced his profession actively up to the civil war, and occasionally in select cases during the war. Among these cases were some in the courts of the Confederate states in which he antagonized that government in proceedings to confiscate debts owing to citizens of the United States. By temper, conviction and conscience he was highly conservative in politics and government. During the progress of the war he frequently quoted to his intimate friends a passage by old Judge Jenkins in the preface to Eight Centuries of Reports, which runs thus: "Amidst the sound of drums and trumpets, surrounded by an odious multitude of barbarians, broken with old age and confinement in prisons, where my fellow-subjects, grown wild with rage, detained me for fifteen years together, I bestowed many watchful hours upon this performance." He quoted the passage for its pathetic and devoted spirit of loyalty and not for its vituperative epithets or censorious implications; for he was as little disposed as any man to denounce or harshly criticize his fellow-citizens of the Confederate states. He differed with the great mass of them in political sentiment, but being one of their number, he conducted himself throughout the war, as he did before and after, with moderation, discretion and kindness. Being a pronounced Union man did not make him the less a personal friend, a good neighbor, or a good citizen for all purposes except active warfare. He felt no hostility to the Federal government, and perhaps nothing could have induced him to take up arms against it. He was spared any extreme trial in this respect, for by holding under his warm friend, Gov. Joseph E. Brown, an honorary appointment with light or mere nominal duties attached to it, he was protected against conscription. He remained quietly in Atlanta until after the city was captured by the Federal army, then he went with his family temporarily to New York and did not return to Georgia until after his appointment and qualification as judge. President Johnson appointed him judge of the United States courts for both districts of Georgia in July, 1865, and the appointment was confirmed by the senate in January, 1866. He presided both in Savannah and Atlanta until after the appointment of Judge McCay in 1882, under the act of congress which provided for a judge in each of the two Georgia districts; then, selecting for himself the southern district, he continued to serve in that district down to the date of his retirement. In 1869-1870 he was strongly recommended to President Grant for appointment to a seat on the bench of the supreme court of the United States. It is known that for awhile the recommendation was favorably considered by the president, but one of the vacant places ultimately fell to Mr. Justice Strong and the other to Mr. Justice Bradley, both nominations being made on the same day. Availing himself of the privilege allowed him by law of retiring for life without loss of salary, he relinquished the bench in December, 1883, and from thenceforth lived as a private citizen. After his retirement the bar of both districts testified their regard for him and their appreciation of his judicial services by causing to be painted by an eminent artist two portraits of him, one of which was placed in the United States court room in Savannah and the other in the room of the United States district court in Atlanta. These portraits were severally presented with becoming ceremony, and on each occasion a report was submitted and adopted, addresses were delivered by members of the bar, and a response was made from the bench. By his daughter's affectionate diligence these proceedings have been preserved in the form of a printed collection prepared at her instance for private circulation. The evening of his life was tranquil and happy, save in so far as it was disturbed or shaded by physical infirmity. His mind remained vigorous and clear until within a few hours before his death. His interest in the world and his relish for reading and conversation underwent no abatement by reason of age. He was a most beautiful specimen of the well-read, cultivated, amiable, genial and cheerful old gentleman. After a brief illness he died early in the morning of Sunday, Jan. 27, 1895, and on the following Tuesday was buried in Oakland cemetery, Atlanta, by the side of his beloved wife, whose death occurred in September, 1879. Their daughter, an only child, Mrs. Ruby (Erskine) Ward, wife of Willard P. Ward, Esq., of New York city, is the sole survivor of this happy family. By instinct and by allegiance to principle he was an honest man. Honesty was incorporated in his constitution as well as in his creed. In thought, feeling and conduct his adherence to it was rigid, continuous, invariable. Without this great virtue, of course, there can be no worthy life or genuine character, consequently its mere possession confers no distinction, but in some it is better attested and more pronounced than in others, and in him it was manifest in all its purity and beauty. His sterling manhood was the outgrowth of inflexible integrity. Internally and externally, in mind and person, in fact, and appearance, he was a gentleman. The tastes, habits, impulses and principles, the presence and bearing of a gentleman, distinctly marked and characterized him. He was cultivated, gracious, refined, accomplished. He "understood the dignity of manners and the language of deportment." He was discriminating and delicate in the observance of all social amenities. His sense of propriety was exact, and though he never neglected form, he rarely appeared formal or ceremonious. In the practice of well-bred self-denial he was pre-eminent, for in matters of comfort or convenience he yielded precedence to others on all occasions. This he did with such urbanity and polite authority as almost to compel acceptance of the proffered courtesy. His politeness was not the disguise or concealment of selfishness, but its elimination. His uniform consistency was such as to preclude any possible doubt of his sincerity. He had a sunny humor and a shrewd and polished wit, but so gentle and genial was his temper and so kind was his heart, that while he delighted to amuse, he was careful never to wound. He was more willing to receive pain than to give it; on the other hand, the communication of pleasure ranked with him as one of the duties of life. He was absolutely without animosity or malevolence. He had few enemies, but if their number had been legion he would have forgiven them all. His attachment to friends was sincere, ardent and constant. It may be truly said of him that "he never forsook a friend or forgot a favor." He had a solemn realization and a most vivid appreciation of the blessings with which his lot in life was attended, and his gratitude for them was profound. Heaven he considered their primary source, and their chief secondary source, friendship. Accordingly his gratitude was first to God and next to friends; not only to those who aided in his advancement, but to those also who encouraged and sustained him by their good wishes and favorable opinion. So modest was his estimate of himself that he often, in the freedom of private intercourse, expressed astonishment at his own success. But beneath his humility, and lying too deep perhaps for self-consciousness, was a wholesome vanity which prevented undue depression or any lapse of effort or energy. His education was not classical; it was not collegiate. He made no pretension to scholarship beyond a familiar acquaintance with the common elementary studies. His mind, however, was fairly well disciplined, and his critical faculty was highly developed and constantly exercised. He liked definite thought and accurate expression, and strove diligently for the attainment of both. Though his style was direct, unadorned and unambitious, composition was a great labor to him, and after much toil in writing, correcting and amending, he usually failed to satisfy himself with the result. He had a clear conception of an excellence which he was rarely able to reach. As a student of literature his taste was fine and his sympathy broad and comprehensive. He extracted their choice flavors from a multitude of books. He read for character more than for incident, valuing the latter chiefly for its instrumentality in reflecting or illustrating the former. Character of every rank, from royalty down to the tramp, interested him, and he had a keen perception of types and variations. Memoirs and other forms of biography had a strong attraction for him. His fund of anecdote touching historic personages was large, but he had certain favorite stories which he was fond of repeating, and which he frequently told more than once to the same auditor. His reproductions were always faithful to the original, thus affording evidence both of his conscientiousness and the accuracy of his memory. He had a fancy for heraldry, a wide knowledge of the great families of England and Ireland, and a remarkable aptitude not only for retaining such knowledge, but for using it agreeably on proper occasions. He knew Ireland and the Irish very thoroughly, and though he retained to the last his affection for his native land, he felt no ill-will against England or the English. On the contrary, an Englishman, Oliver Cromwell, was the historic hero whom he most admired. Next to him he reckoned Henry the Great, of France. The form of literature which was most congenial to him was the dramatic. He liked to read plays, to study them closely, and to see them performed on the stage. He was a studious reader of Shakespeare and was so familiar with the text of that great master that he could quote with facility very many, perhaps most of the best passages. Falstaff was a perpetual delight to him, and he knew the whole composition of the character as thoroughly as if the fat knight had been one of his intimate personal acquaintances. He was a member of the Players' club of New York, and had pleasant social relations with several eminent actors, among them Booth and Mansfield. His knowledge of the stage and of great performers was quite extensive. He cared, however, in later life for no acting but the best. The severity of his taste made him hard to please. By long study and much observation he knew what good acting really is. While he preferred the dramatic, other forms of poetry received a fair share of his attention. He could wade through an epic, even a translation of the Lusiad or the Jerusalem Delivered, and the finest lyrics gave him great pleasure and lingered in his memory. It is known that he himself made a few attempts at brief compositions in verse, and in more than one instance was successful in producing lines pleasing both for their grace and fancy. Of these, the best-known are the following, said to have allusion to his own and his daughter's friend, Mrs. Cleveland, wife of the president:

"Hadst thou appeared with those entrancing eyes
On Ida's mount, beside the sacred three Whose charms contended for the golden prize, Paris had Venus passed and fled to thee,
To crown thee queen of beauty, love and purity."

For the society of ladies he had great fondness, and his bearing and demeanor toward them, while cordial, was courtly, deferential, delicate and dignified, suggesting a reminiscence of the days of chivalry and of knightly reverence. Many of his most attached friends were ladies, and in his later life he was an acknowledged favorite with young ladies even more than with those who approximated his own age. In practical life and the conduct of affairs he was thoughtful, considerate, cautious. Through a happy combination of shrewdness and prudence he generally hit upon the right thing for the service of his own or any other interest for which he was responsible. He was more sensitive to the hazard of loss than to the hope of gain, but, judged by its results, his timidity was a sort of ingenious courage. His tact, whether in business or in social intercourse, was of the highest order. Even in old age he never made long visits. He was a man of sound discretion to the last, and in nothing was he more discreet than in being silent when there was no occasion for him to speak. To measure him accurately as a lawyer, that is, to gauge the extent of his legal learning with precision, is something not quite easy. He made the impression on some members of the profession of being more profound than he was, and on others of being less so. The truth probably is, that having a genuine relish for the old law, he occupied himself over much, not with its principles, for that could hardly be, but with its details, their application and consequences. He loved to linger near the sources of the law, and found it so pleasant to do so that he often disliked to move down the stream, except for the exigencies of actual business. It was hard for him to realize that the substance of the law as he first learned it was not the true law for all time. Of course he was aware that changes did in fact take place, but if they seemed to conflict with established principles, unless they were embodied in statutes or attested by the supreme court of the United States, or by the house of lords, or at the very least, by Baron Parke, he was much disposed to regard them as mere novelties of opinion. When they appeared to him to accord with principle or to improve upon the past, he was ready and quite willing to accept them. In real work he was up with the times, and he cited modern authorities freely. He was more fond of reports than of text books. The reports of Plowden, Dyer, Hobart, Coke, Jenkins and others down to and including Meeson and Welsby, afforded him congenial entertainment. He had a sort of passion for knowing things overlooked or not much regarded by the ordinary professional reader. This led to a taste for rare and curious cases, and for unique morsels of early law. Not that he took odd or curious matters seriously, but they amused him. He truly venerated the law, but could smile at its freaks with open enjoyment, or with that bubbling zest that makes merry in solitude. He was not dependent for his merriment on company; least of all in his legal recreations. There is no telling how many good but rather useless things, found in the old books, were stored away in his mind. Much of his law reading in general (as distinguished from study for actual business or particular cases) was influenced more by what afforded pleasure than by what promised profit; yet it is certain that both at the bar and on the bench, very often, as the result of such reading, he recalled instantly not only the true law applicable to the pending controversy, but the legal work or volume in which it was laid down. He frequently did this, while others concerned in the question were groping in thick darkness. To cite or produce the needful learning when it was unexpected was a sort of by-play which he much enjoyed, but always in a quiet way and without the least ostentation. He liked to surprise by turning on light which others were not ready to furnish. He was well-versed in the law of special pleading, and had a keen relish for it, both its theory and its practice. His expertness as a special pleader was an accomplishment of which he was somewhat proud. While a practitioner at the bar it gave him real pleasure to ensnare an adversary by the adroit use of a replication or a rejoinder, to say nothing of the rebutter. He knew the subtle mystery of "giving color," and in handling the traverse "de injuria" he was supposed to be especially able and effective. He was fond also of a special demurrer, and of all the nice and refined distinctions which that searching instrument of pleading flushes for discussion where special pleading prevails. The whole system of special pleading having been abolished in this state at the close of the last century, only in the Federal courts did he have, after he removed to Georgia, any outlet for his skill in this kind of forensic combat, and he lived to see the system disappear from these courts also. He deplored its destruction. He deplored its destruction, both as a partial disarming of the legal profession and as a calamity to public justice, for with Lord Coke he devoutly believed "the law speaketh by good pleading." He was aware, however, of the abuses of which special pleading in its full vigor and extreme application was susceptible, and was not averse to the improvements which it underwent in England by the new rules. Indeed, he considered it still further improvable. What he really desired to stand and remain permanent was the essence of the system, in its substantial elements. In the moral attributes of a judge he was truly great—none could be greater. He loved justice and administered it in mercy. By diligent and conscientious labor he endeavored to ascertain the very right of every case and to give every litigant his due. His judgments were rendered without favor, except favor to justice, and without fear, except the fear that they might be erroneous. It was incumbent upon him as matter of official duty to prepare written opinions; nevertheless, he did prepare quite a number. Several of these may be seen in the thirty-fifth volume of the Georgia Reports, and some of the same cases, together with others, appear in Abbott's United States Reports. On certain questions of grave importance, as, for instance, taking the test oath by attorneys at law, he made the pioneer decisions, and was afterward followed (though perhaps without acknowledgment) by the supreme court of the United States. The great debt of Georgia and her people to Judge Erskine is not so much for the details of his judicial administration as for its spirit; its spirit of gentle justice; its spirit of law civil as distinguished from law military; the spirit of law in its benignity as distinguished from law in its fury or the fury of its minister. This spirit manifested itself and became conspicuous at the very outset of his judicial career, though it was not fully appreciated by the public at large until many years afterward. He was a true civil magistrate, a true ambassador of peace at a time when war, though it had relinquished arms, was still raging in the emotions of many, and in the greedy craving of some who, eager for the spoils of conquest, hoped that much of what sword and fire had left might be taken by a sort of judicial pillage through summary sentences of condemnation under the confiscation laws. This hope was doomed to utter disappointment and defeat, in so far as it rested upon the Federal courts in Georgia. Judge Erskine, refusing to adopt the short and sharp practice which was said to prevail in one or more of the neighboring states, maintained that there could not, should not, be any summary condemnation in his courts, but that every case had to await investigation and determination by a jury. This gave cooling time, and enabled many persons to avail themselves of the more extended amnesty which was subsequently granted. The consequence was that none of the people subject to his jurisdiction underwent the misery and distress of losing by peace the little they had not lost by war. There was no confiscation of property in Georgia. Honor to the wise, moderate, upright and incorruptible judge. Honor to his name and memory, now and for all time!

GEN. CLEMENT A. EVANS, who is author of the chapter in this work on the military history of Georgia, cites with some pride his nativity as a Georgian and the occurrence of his infancy amidst the terrors of the Creek Indian war in southwestern Georgia, in 1836. Coming from an ancestry that participated in the revolutionary struggle and in the various wars of the Union, he entered life in Stewart county, at a time and place, where his people were in battle with the Indians and where no family was entirely safe from savage hostility. His father was a farmer and his first years were spent upon the farm. Early, however, a move was made to Lumpkin, the county town, for the purpose of educating the children of the household, and in that delightful place, whose inhabitants were noted for refinement, hospitality and wealth, he received his early education. After his graduation from the law school of Judge William Tracy Gould, in Augusta, which was at that time the resort of young students, ambitious to obtain education for the bar, he was admitted to the practice of law just before he had attained the age of nineteen years. Returning to his native county, he opened his office among those who had known him from his boyhood, and with very little delay obtained an excellent business. The bar at that time in southwestern Georgia, was composed, as it is now, of some of the finest lawyers in the state. Many of them were, in fact, noted jurists. Among the nestors of the profession were Seaborn Jones, Alfred Iverson, Hines Holt, and Judge Wellborn; and, somewhat younger, although not less noted, were Benning, Blanford, Worrill, Tucker, Perkins, Wimberly and many others. Among the yet younger were Sloan, Clarke, Douglas, Harrell and the like. After entering this field, when the conflict was sharp, and meeting cordial treatment and achieving success, Mr. Evans was invited to a co-partnership with his former preceptor, Col. Worrill, which he accepted. After that his life as a lawyer was spent in the firm of Worrill & Evans until, obtaining the ready and generous consent of his partner to conduct the business alone, he entered the Confederate army in the first year of the war, having been engaged in active practice eight years. The confidence shown in his general ability by his county people is shown by his election soon after he was twenty-one years of age to the office of judge of their county court, which was a court of extensive jurisdiction in civil suits, and involved the care of the county business in general. The service of his county being well rendered in this position, he was again soon honored by election, at the age of twenty-six, to the senate of Georgia, at the gravely important period when the questions which resulted in the Confederate war, agitated the whole country. In those questions he took what was called the "southern rights" side, and was placed upon the electoral Breckinridge ticket as an alternate during the warm political canvass of 1860. Although young, he had been trained in political debate, and went ardently into the canvass espousing the fortunes of the Breckinridge democratic party, although he had deplored the division of his party at Charleston, and its breach into the two factions of Breckinridge and Douglas. After the election of President Lincoln, he first favored what was termed the co-operative movement, which was designed to effect a union of all the southern states in a concerted separation from the United States, and introduced in the legislature resolutions to that end. But becoming quickly satisfied that this movement could not be made practicable, he advocated separate state action. Immediately after it became evident that war would ensue, Evans offered his services as a soldier. His tastes were military, and had been gratified in peace by active connection with the volunteer companies of his town, and through these he had acquired knowledge of military tactics and discipline, which prepared him, as well as inspired him to enter upon the duties of a Confederate soldier. In all that was required of such a soldier he devoted himself from the beginning to the close of the long bloody struggle. His first promotion was to the rank of major, and next to colonel of the Thirty-first Georgia regiment. Then he was commissioned brigadier-general, succeeding Gen. Gordon to the command of his brigade, and after Gordon was assigned to the command of a corps, he was assigned to the command of the division composed of the Virginia brigade of Gen. Terry, containing the old Stonewall brigade, and the brigades from Louisiana of Stafford and Hayes, commanded by Col. Waggoman; and, also, his own Georgia brigade. In these several positions he served in the commands of Stonewall Jackson until his death, and then with Ewell, Early and Gordon, all in the army of Lee, sharing with his men the dangers of the great battles, the many skirmishes and the increasing privations of the famous war, receiving several severe wounds, and surrendering under Lee at Appomattox, with guns still hot from firing at the latest hour. Fully recognizing that the issue made had been settled, Gen. Evans returned home and advocated the restoration of his state at once to all its former position in the Union, and urged such progressive measures as would make the Union valuable to the state. His addresses were all in advocacy of honorable assent to the arbitrament of the sword without any servile concessions; of cordial invitation to capital and immigration; of general improvement in all material development and of full confidence in the recuperation of the south. Gen. Evans has been a member of the Methodist church from his youth, and accustomed to take public part in the work of religious bodies, but after the close of the war he joined the Georgia conference, in which as a minister, he was placed in charge of several important positions, and has now the management of two valuable financial interests of his conference. In his business life, before and since the war, he has had the management of several large enterprises, which have been successfully conducted, and has uniformly taken a conspicuous part in all public affairs. He organized, and as president, guided to success the Augusta Real Estate and Improvement company, and also the Augusta and Summerville Land company, and was an active director in the Augusta Exposition company, and the Cotton States and International Exposition company of 1895. His political life consisted of an open and active espousal of the democratic party and advocacy of its candidates, without seeking office himself, until, in 1894, he was then, for a time, a candidate for nomination by the democratic convention for the office of governor, and discussed throughout the state the leading issues of the day, but perceiving that his party was threatened with disruption into factions, he withdrew by a notable public letter, and afterward canvassed the state in behalf of party principles and harmony, contributing very greatly to the success which followed. Gen. Evans has been widely known for his patriotic acceptance of the true results of the late war. His address as early as 1875, at the laying of the corner-stone of the splendid Confederate monument in Augusta, Ga., was copied extensively by the press of the United States. He is also thoroughly devoted to the comradeship and cause of the Confederate states. He was the first president of the Confederate Survivors' Association of Augusta, and afterward president of the Confederate camp in Atlanta. He is now major-general, commanding Georgia division, United Confederate Veterans, and actively interested in collecting Confederate history and assisting soldiers and soldiers' widows in need. As he was one of the youngest generals in the war, he has still before him many years which he will employ usefully for his state.

CAPT. W. S. EVERETT is the senior partner of the large dry goods firm of Everett, Ridley, Reagan & Co., of Atlanta, Ga. He is a true scion of sturdy Puritan stock, and came of a family connected with the Everetts, Claflins and Spragues of New England. His father was a Baptist minister who served several churches in various places in obedience to the calls made for him, and he himself was born in Alleghany county, N. Y., Jan. 21, 1839. Capt. Everett received his early education in the schools of his native state, and completed two terms in the academy at Ithaca. During these school years he employed his vacations industriously by work on the farm, and afterward learned to become a merchant by clerking in stores. In 1857, when about eighteen years of age, he came with his parents to Georgia, but they after a short time moved to the west. He then began business as a traveling salesman of books and music, and after a few months secured a position with J. L. Cutting & Co., a dry goods firm in Atlanta, with whom and their successors he continued until Jan. 1, 1862. At that time this northern-born boy, who had cast in his lot with the state of his adoption, enlisted in Company A, Ninth battalion Georgia artillery, in which he was appointed second sergeant. The company was rapidly recruited to such numbers as to require a division into the two commands, Company A and Company E, in which latter company Mr. Everett was elected junior first lieutenant, a position which he filled until promoted to the rank of captain in 1864. This gallant company, known in orders as Battery E and also as Everett's battery, did arduous and splendid service, having the distinction of never losing a gun during the war. During a great part of this service it was used on detach duty, and in all its battles except one, Everett as first lieutenant and afterward as its captain was in command. Capt. Everett was a skillful as well as a brave artillery officer, and gained merited distinction especially at the bloody battle of Chickamauga, where his battery played a most conspicuous part in the victories of the Confederates. Previous to that battle his command was in east Tennessee, but was detached from the battalion at La Fayette and reported to Gen. Bushrod Johnson at Dalton, and from that point first met the enemy at Ringgold. Fighting with Forrest in the advance, the battery crossed the Chickamauga creek on Friday night, and was in the engagement Saturday. But on Sunday it was in the scenes of brilliant charges made by the Confederates, being advanced as the battle progressed from ridge to ridge. Late in the afternoon it occupied a hill from which it poured steady shot upon the retreating foe, succeeding in blocking the road of retreat with guns and caissons disabled by its well-aimed fire, and pressing from this point to another position of advantage joined in some of the hardest fighting of the war. It was at this time that the battery, getting out of ammunition, served its guns directly from captured Federal boxes. After this great battle he went through the campaign of east Tennessee with Gen. Longstreet, after which he returned to Virginia and was detached and sent with McCauslan's cavalry to meet Hunter, who was advancing upon Lynchburg, and hold him in check until Lynchburg could be reinforced. He was next employed actively with Gen. Early in the valley campaign. The last service of the gallant company was in the defense of Richmond and in the retreat of Lee's army to the final day at Appomattox. At Richmond, Capt. Everett was assigned to the command of Fort Gregg, which he held until the evacuation of that city. Thus terminated an honorable military career. Guns which had never been captured in equal battle were now surrendered to become the property of patriotism, and Capt. Everett and his paroled command returned to their homes to resume the occupation of peaceful citizens. It was a feature of the civil war that brothers fought on opposite sides. Two of Capt. Everett's brothers were brave soldiers on the Federal side and he equally gallant on the side of the south. Their valor and patriotism belong to mutual American history. After laying aside his sword with the strife it symbolized, Capt. Everett rode his horse to Atlanta, and bringing his family from LaGrange, commenced business life anew without capital, but with the will and ability to succeed. It shows the state of things at the time that he secured three hospital tents and pitched them on a lot belonging to his mother-in-law in Atlanta for the purpose of a dwelling, where he lived several months. Beginning business he traveled for a few months for the firm of Claghorn & Herring, of Philadelphia, and then returned to selling dry goods. In the fall of 1868 he became an employe in the house of M. C. & J. F. Kiser, and in 1872 was admitted into partnership under the firm name of M. C. Kiser & J. F. Kiser & Co., where he remained until the dissolution of that firm, when the Everett, Ridley, Reagan company was organized, of which he is the senior member and president. Capt. Everett was married in 1860 to Frances G. Haynes, daughter of Mrs. Judith A. Haynes, widow of Reuben Haynes, and has four children, two sons and two daughters: Fannie O., wife of W. O. Jones; Clarence, captain on staff of the Fifth regiment; Edward Q., and Myrtle M., graduate of Notre Dame, Md., with first honors. Capt. Everett is a self-made man. The wealth he now enjoys is the fruit of skillful management and constant attention to business. He is a substantial representative of the commercial world.

JOHN NEWTON FAIN, school commissioner, Fulton county, Ga., was born in Dandridge, Jefferson Co., Tenn., July 17, 1830. He was reared in the town and educated in Man academy located there. After leaving school he entered the store of his father, who was a merchant, and whose business was amongst the heaviest of any in that section. He remained with his father until his death, in 1854, and afterward with his brother, who succeeded his father, until 1856. That year he with his two brothers bought a cotton factory at Mossy Creek, Jefferson Co., Tenn., which they operated until 1858, when they went to Osceola, Ark., where they engaged in cotton planting until 1865. From there they moved to Memphis, Tenn., and engaged in the cotton business; but the cholera coming there in 1866 they came to Atlanta and embarked in the wholesale grocery and commission business. They continued this business until 1869, when Mr. Fain withdrew and became a contractor, in which he was unfortunate, and at the end of a year abandoned it. After this he engaged in various businesses for some considerable time. His next venture was a partnership with A. P. Stewart, under the firm name of Stewart & Fain, in the stove and tinware business; he continued it for several years, and then sold out. After this Mr. Fain took life easily and leisurely until 1884, when he was appointed county school commissioner, an office whose important duties he has discharged with scrupulous fidelity. Able, attentive and conscientious, and devoted to his work, he has made a model officer. Mr. Fain has been married three times. His first wife was Miss Maria L. E. Moore, whom he married in 1860, who bore him one child, Maria E., and died in Arkansas. His second wife was Mattie C. Moore, a sister of his first wife, by whom he had five children, one only of whom, Mattie F., is living, the wife of Dr. Max M. Z. Crist, Atlanta. His last wife was Mrs. Virginia A. Watts, who has had no children. Mr. Fain is a Knight Templar Mason, an elder in the Central Presbyterian church, Atlanta, and clerk of the session.

THOMAS B. FELDER, JR., the well known attorney of Atlanta, Ga., was born Oct. 6, 1863, in Burke county, Ga., and in this and Emanuel county passed his boyhood days. He received his early education at the Waynesboro high school, from which institution he was graduated in June, 1879, taking the highest available honors, and receiving the first prize for declamation. From here he went to the North Georgia Agricultural and Military academy, Dahlonega, Ga., remaining a member of the same for a year, deriving much benefit from both the classic and military branches of the school. Leaving after the expiration of the first term, he entered the law department of the university of Georgia, received his diploma in 1883, and after locating in Dublin, Ga., was admitted to the bar during the same year. Six months later, having given great attention to his practice and gained a broad popularity in his section, he was made solicitor of the county court of Laurens county, Ga., and served as such for six years. He resigned in 1889 to accept the higher office of mayor of Dublin, holding this place creditably for one year, and was re-elected for a second term, but declined in order to serve as presidential elector on the Cleveland ticket. Mr. Felder moved to Atlanta early in 1890, and continued in this city the practice of his profession. Mr. Felder is a business man of much ability and it did not require long for his associates and acquaintances to recognize this fact. In June of 1892 he was elected president of the Atlanta Traction company, and filled this position until May, 1893, when he resigned. Mr. Felder was married on Aug. 12, 1886, to Charlotte, daughter of Grafton Jolinson. They have no children. He is a Royal Arch Mason and chairman of the committee of laws and appeals of the Elks, and is also a member of the Improved Order of Red Men, the Knights of Pythias and the Methodist church. Besides these secret societies and religious organization he is a director in the State Savings bank, president of the Union Loan and Trust company, and a director of the Southern Exchange bank. He has manifested a versatility that is seldom surpassed; and his efforts in the many different enterprises in which he has been engaged have never met with disappointment or failure. His father is Thomas B. Felder, a native of Sumter, S. C., who served as colonel in the late war and conducted himself chivalrously in a great number of campaigns. When the war was over he returned to his home in the palmetto state and followed the profession of law until a few years ago, when he retired permanently from active work. He now resides at Dublin, Ga. Mr. Felder is the worthy scion of an old, illustrious southern family, and by dint of perseverance is advancing rapidly to the front.

JOHN A. FITTEN, hardware merchant, Atlanta, was born in Augusta, Ga., in 1846. He lived and attended the schools there until he was fifteen years of age, when his father moved to Bartow county, Ga. In 1863 he entered the Georgia Military institute, Marietta, Ga., and in the spring of 1864 went with the cadets into the Confederate service as assistant quartermaster of battalion, and continued as such until the surrender. After the war he returned to his home in Bartow county and engaged in farming, until 1867, when he came to Atlanta and entered the employ of the hardware firm of T. M. & R. C. Clarke. About three years afterward he was admitted to membership in the firm, whose name was changed to T. M. Clarke & Co. In 1892 he retired from the firm, and subsequently spent about nine months in Europe. In April, 1894, he formed a partnership with A. P. Thompson and re-engaged in business under the firm name of the Fitten-Thompson Hardware company. Maj. Fitten has superior business capacity and sagacity, and has been successful in all his undertakings. Ample capital, combined with these pre-requisites, has made his last venture a success from the start. Cultured, traveled and affable, Maj. Fitten occupies an enviable position in society, as well as in the commercial world. Maj. Fitten was married, in 1871, to Miss Marianna, daughter of the late James A. Turner, a native of North Carolina, and to them there have been born two sons and two daughters. He is an active and prominent member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

WILLIAM J. GARRETT, capitalist, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Laurens district, S. C., in 1823. He was about six years old when his father came to Georgia and settled in Campbell county. He was reared on the farm, and received such education as the county schools of the time afforded. When he reached maturity, with $300 capital, he opened a small "cross-roads" general merchandise store, did a good business, and by strict attention to it, with economy, he made money. Three years later he moved to Campbellton, the county seat, where, with Gen. Alfred Anstett (afterward founder of the Atlanta National bank), he engaged in a general merchandise store, building up a large trade and accumulating capital. In 1857, after the completion of the Atlanta & West Point railway, he moved to Palmetto, a growing town on the line of the road. There he conducted a business on his personal account until 1865, when himself and a younger brother—Young—established a grocery and produce house in Atlanta, under the firm name of Garrett & Bro., which was continued until 1883, when he retired from active business. During his partnership Capt. Garrett established stores at several points on the line of the A. & W. P. railway, in one of which—at Grantville, Ga.—he still retains an interest. During the war, when Gov. Brown called out the reserves, he was commissioned captain of a company, served six months in camp, and afterward about eighteen months in the commissary department, with the rank of major. He was stationed at Augusta, Ga., when hostilities ceased, and surrendered a large amount of stores. When the Atlanta National bank was organized he was made a member of the board of directors, and continued to be one for years. He served one term—voluntarily retiring—on the board of county commissioners of Fulton county; also one term—1885-86—on the general council of the city; is a director of the West View Cemetery company, of which he was president for some years; and is a director of the Exposition cotton mills, in which he is the largest stockholder. Capt. Garrett was married, in 1855, when in business in Campbellton, to Miss Ellen, daughter of the late Col. Thomas A. Latham. She died in 1874, leaving no children. For his second wife he married Mrs. Mary A. (nee Wallace) Buttrell, daughter of William Wallace, of Dougherty county, Ga. Of the children born to them, three are living: Emma L., Mattie E. and Viola A. Capt. Garrett is a master Mason, and, although not a member, worships at the Baptist church.

DR. J. M'FADDEN GASTON, of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Chester district, S. C., Dec. 27, 1824. His early education was that of a country boy, and he attributes a great deal of his strength of body and endurance of fatigue to the hunting and fishing that he did in Chester district. The South Carolina college at that time was in a very flourishing condition, and no less a man than Rev. James Harper Thornwell, D. D., presided over this institution. Dr. Gaston's high moral character and ability as a writer are doubtless to be attributed largely to the years he spent at the South Carolina college, where he was graduated in 1843, at the age of nineteen. He entered immediately upon the study of medicine under the preceptorship of his father, Dr. John Brown Gaston, then practicing and farming in Chester district. After a year of diligent study and experience in compounding medicines, he entered the university of Pennsylvania, medical department, and attended there his first course of medical lectures, from 1844 to 1845. His second course of lectures was taken in Charleston, where he was graduated in 1846, from the medical college of South Carolina, at the age of twenty-one. If we count the three years of his medical education, we may say he has been studying and practicing medicine over fifty years. He has been a student and practitioner all his life, never entering politics or business to any extent, so as to divert his attention. The first six years of his practice were spent in partnership with his father. He then moved to Columbia, S. C., where he practiced alone and in partnership with Dr. A. N. Talley for about eight years. He had married Miss Sue G. Brumby, daughter of Prof. R. A. Brumby, Nov. 4, 1852. Their marriage has been blessed by a family of seven daughters and three sons. Five daughters and one son are still living, and are as follows: Mrs. A. W. Gresham, Greensborough, Ga.; Mrs. J. B. Kolb, Bahia, Brazil; Mrs. Nannie G. Blackford, Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. E. N. Shaw, Cameron, Texas, and Mrs. T. B. Gay, Atlanta, and Dr. James McF. Gaston, Jr., Atlanta. Dr. Gaston has been permitted to see nearly a score of grandchildren, before he has reached the age of three score years and ten. When the civil war broke out he was doing probably the largest practice in Columbia, was living in his own house, and with his carriages and horses was considered to be on the high road to prosperity. Neither family nor home caused him any hesitation, however, as to the course he should pursue. He enlisted in a company of volunteers called the Columbia Greys, which he had organized himself, and would have served during the war as a private had he not been made chief surgeon of the Carolina forces under Gen. M. L. Bonham, and made medical director on his staff. His service during the war was a long and varied one, being in all the important battles from Manassas to Gettysburg, under such leaders as Beauregard, D. R. Jones, R. H. Anderson, as medical director at Manassas under Beauregard, and chief surgeon of Anderson's division. He did a great deal of surgery during the course of these battles, and afterward in hospital service at Marietta and Fort Valley and Fort Gaines. Many of the Confederate veterans now testify to his kindness and his timely surgical skill in cases of wounds of all kinds. After the war he was penniless and disappointed—but never discouraged. So he moved to Brazil, South America, having to borrow money for the purpose. He first went to Brazil alone, and then returned and published Hunting a Home in Brazil. He then removed with his family and many friends. He had an audience before Dom Pedro II., of Brazil, and that noble monarch received him kindly and offered him a place as consulting surgeon in the Brazilian army, with the rank and pay of the highest medical officer. He had just been so actively engaged in a war in which his heart centered that he declined to take part in the war with Paraguay in this capacity. His idea was to investigate the advantages of the country and report on the same in the form of a diary for the benefit of his friends whose homes were devastated, and who wished to avoid the inconveniences of reconstruction—at least for a few years. Speaking of this stage of Dr. Gaston's life, so able a writer as James Wood Davidson, in his standard work, Living Writers of the South, says: "James McFadden Gaston, M. D., is a native of South Carolina, a graduate of the state college at Columbia, and of the medical college at Charleston. He practiced medicine before the war for several years in Columbia, and stood in the front rank of his profession. He contributed occasionally to the medical and scientific journals of the day, and paid some attention to belles lettres, writing verse sometimes. During the war he was a division surgeon in the army of northern Virginia. At the close of the war he went to Brazil in quest of a future home for himself and family. The only volume that Dr. Gaston has thus far published is an account of that tropical region. It was published for the author, in 1867, and is entitled Hunting a Home in Brazil, and gives a lively but practical account of that country, with special reference to its being the home of the southern emigrant. It lays no claim to merely literary excellence, though it is written in a very healthy and earnest style, that reflects credit upon the learned author. Dr. Gaston is now in Brazil, with his family, and the probability is that he will make it his permanent home." The Brazilian government offered a large sum for 500 copies of the work on Brazil. His life in Brazil was one of trial and often of privation, until he had surmounted all obstacles, passed satisfactorily the examination for license to practice, before the faculty of the National Medical college at Rio Janeiro, and removed to Campinas, where he finally did the largest practice in the city; also having a surgical infirmary, where patients from all the surrounding country were treated. In 1880 Dr. Gaston paid a visit to the United States, after a residence in Brazil of thirteen years. He and Mrs. Gaston came over, leaving the other members of the family in Brazil. In New York he was paid some special attention by the medical profession, and attended the meeting of the American Medical association there. Among his friends were Drs. T. R. Agnew, J. Marion Sims, Ramsey, Nathan Bozeman, T. Addis Emmett and T. Gaillard Thomas. He attended the clinics of the colleges and the operations at the hospitals. His experience in the army was now reinforced by years of private practice in these lines—surgery and gynecology—and he profited by the ample opportunity for seeing the operations of so many distinguished surgeons. He returned to Brazil by way of Europe, so that he might have the opportunity of seeing the skillful surgical work of such men as Spencer Wells, William Meredith and others. He went to London, Antwerp, Brussels and other points. He heard the famous preacher, Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, in London. His impressions of him are very vivid, and his admiration for the man is so great that he reads everything he has written, when he sees it in print. The Crystal palace, in London, and the museum, were also of special interest. In this way he became acquainted with the most prominent men in the profession, and has kept up a correspondence with them. He settled up his affairs in Brazil as soon as possible after his return. Moving to Atlanta in December, 1883, he opened an office and began to write upon surgical topics. To say in a few words what Dr. Gaston has accomplished in Atlanta would be impossible. Coming to the city a complete stranger, at an age when most men are unable to compete actively in a large city with the rush of the day and times, he has made a success of life. At the time he was made editor of the "Southern Medical Record," this medical journal made the following editorial remarks about him, in January, 1892: "To the profession, Dr. Gaston needs no introduction. As professor of the principles and practice of surgery in the Southern Medical college, as a contributor to Wood's Reference Hand Book, as one of the editorial staff of the 'Annual Universal Medical Science,' and as a contributor to the 'International Clinic,' he has made for himself a national fame. He comes to us bringing with him a rich store of knowledge, which he has acquired through long years of the practice of his branch, both in this and other countries. He is also chairman of the section of surgery of the American Medical association, and president of the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association." He is a member of the Medical association of Georgia, of the American Medical association, of the American Surgical association, the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association, and of the American Academy of Medicine. He is also a member of the Confederate Veterans' association, of the Scotch-Irish association of Georgia, and other local organizations. He is a Free Mason, having joined the order in Brazil. He is a Presbyterian, having been elder of the Presbyterian church in Columbia, S. C., being elected to succeed his father-in-law,

Prof. Richard T. Brumby, professor of chemistry and geology in the university of South Carolina, as it is now called. He has always shown himself to be a consistent Christian gentleman. Dr. Gaston is recognized as a writer and a teacher of medicine, and it is interesting to describe his methods. He says: "I have never prepared any medical paper until the necessity for it was urgent, and then no time is lost until the work is done. I am a creature of circumstances, and cannot work unless under the pressure of the occasion." He does not write in his office in the day, but sits up at night and prepares the compact, lucid and learned papers that are so widely read and so thoroughly appreciated by the general practitioner and the student. His brother, Dr. J. B. Gaston, of Montgomery, has told him that he is not careful enough, and that he should take longer to write his articles; but if he should do this he would write as rarely as his brother does. The strong mark in most great men's minds seems to have been observation. They have seen things where others have seen nothing. They have put some of their individuality into things that had none of their own. So it has happened that Dr. Gaston has impressed the students that from year to year hear him lecture at the Southern Medical college. In dealing with practical subjects he draws upon the field of observation that he has had, and in a few pointed words pins the main facts in the memory of the most listless student. Never leaving out a detail where it is necessary, but at the same time never wearying with useless harangues, he points the young doctor to the great landmarks of surgery, and illustrates them by his own cases. A list of Dr. Gaston's contributions and reports of cases shows that he has performed all the important operations and is entitled to the rank that Dr. Richard Douglas, professor of gynecology in Vanderbilt university, medical department, accorded to him when, addressing the Medical association of Georgia, he said: "I feel a hesitancy in presenting my views when we have present the Nestor of surgery in the south, a man whose surgical skill is recognized all over the country. I refer, gentlemen, to Dr. Gaston. (Applause). But it is as a man, battling with the cares and vexations of life, never baffled, but always cheerful, that he wins the hearts of men, who do anything in the world for him." To illustrate this point, we need only quote a few casual remarks, never intended for publication, coming from men who have known him best. The late Dr. W. D. Bizzell once said: "He is a grand old man. He is like a piece of bronze, any way you strike it it gives out a good sound—like a perfectly ripe apple, mellow to the core." Old Mr. Heinz, who lived in Columbia for forty years and then moved to Atlanta, and in this way, knowing the difficulties of getting a foothold here, and at the same time appreciating Dr. Gaston, as he knew him in Columbia before the war, said: "The way he has struggled through the many vicissitudes he has seen, and still retains the gentlemanly bearing and control of his temper throughout, is something heroic—is something heroic."

WILLIAM T. GENTRY, manager of the Atlanta Telephone exchange—a branch of the Southern Bell Telephone and Telegraph company, and assistant superintendent of the second division, including all exchange in Georgia, Florida, South Carolina and Alabama, was born at Gordonsville, Va., April 14, 1854. When his father, John R. Gentry, an illustrious and beloved Virginia gentleman, who held the office of mayor in the city of Gordonsville for twenty-five years, left home to enter the Confederate army, William went to the residence of his maternal grandfather, Thomas M. Mansfield, residing in Franklin county, Va., where he remained until the war closed, attending school. While here a most unfortunate accident befell him. One day he was playing in a sorghum mill, and, unconsciously going too near the machinery, received so severe a cut on the arm that it was necessary to amputate it. In 1865 he returned to his old home and entered the Neoptrophian academy at Gordonsville, preparatory to taking a college course. His scholastic career was not without its honors. He was so fortunate as to win a warmly-contested medal and to be selected the valedictorian of his class. Having become, in the meantime, interested in electricity and its application, Mr. Gentry decided to devote his life to this science, and incidentally aided as operator at Gordonsville, learning the intricate points very rapidly. At the age of twenty years he was in charge of the Southern and Atlantic Telegraph company, embracing all the wires running from Charlotte, N. C., to Norfolk, Va., and Washington, D. C. He filled this important office for three years. When this company was absorbed and purchased by the Western Union, Mr. Gentry again resumed the key—this time at Lynchburg, Va., remaining a few months, and being then transferred to Wilmington, N. C. In three months afterward he was appointed chief operator and assistant to the general manager, which position he held for three years, and then began the erection of telephone exchanges for the Western Union system. He built the one in Wilmington, N. C., the first in the state. A year later the Western Union sold out its interests to the Bell company, and Mr. Gentry became an employe of the succeeding company, and superintended the building of an exchange at Alexandria, Va., remaining there three years. He was then, in 1884, selected as manager of the Atlanta exchange, and has held this position ever since. Mr. Gentry was married at Gordonsville, Va., to Nina, the daughter of William H. Mann, of the same city. They have six children: Mary Belle, Willie M., James H., Thomas R., Nina, and Allene. He is a member of the Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, and Red Men, besides being a devout worshiper of the Methodist church of Atlanta. To show the great, magnanimous heart that throbs in his breast, Mr. Gentry has always taken a marked interest in young men, in promoting their desires and encouraging their initial efforts. There are many young men, occupying to-day high and lucrative positions, who owe their success in life to the kindly interest and help extended by him. Several of those who have attained prosperity were newsboys and bootblacks when Mr. Gentry first extended a sympathizing hand. Some of them are now receiving handsome salaries of $5,000 a year. Such generosity is not common, and commends him, who wields it, to the hearts of all people. Mr. Gentry doubtless receives his reward in the gratification that he has given substantial support to the plodding labors of worthy, appreciative fellow-men.

DR. CHARLES GLENVILLE GIDDINGS, Atlanta, was born on a farm in Loudoun county, Va., June 8, 1861. His father, Charles G. Giddings, was born in Frederick county, Md., in 1834, and came across the Potomac to his present residence, about twenty miles away, when twenty years old. He married Dorcas A. Hempstone, a daughter of Cephas Hempstone, a well-known citizen of Loudoun county, Va. Charles G. Giddings was a lieutenant in the Confederate service and was a prisoner in Federal prisons for eighteen months. He was the father of eight children, of whom five were sons. The grandfather of Dr. Giddings was James Giddings, who was born in Devonshire, England, and came with his wife to America, locating in Frederick county, Md., where he died in 1872, aged sixty-six years. He was a civil engineer by profession and was one of the engineers of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad and Chesapeake & Ohio canal. His wife was Louisa Johnson and they had four sons and three daughters, of whom two sons are deceased. One of the latter, Luther Giddings, was a soldier in the Mexican war, of which he afterward wrote a history. Eugene Giddings, another uncle of Dr. Giddings, was in the Confederate service in the army of northern Virginia. Dr.

Charles Giddings was reared on the farm, a homestead which has been in possession of the family for a century. His early educational training was received at the hands of a private tutor. He later attended Glenwood institute near Baltimore, Md., and then St. John's academy at Alexandria, Va., where he was graduated in 1881. He then entered the medical department of the university of Virginia and graduated therefrom in 1884. After a year in New York city he entered Mt. Sinai hospital as an interne, where he remained two years, locating in Atlanta in 1882, where he has since followed his profession. Dr. Giddings is a member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, and is now professor of principles and practice of medicine of the Atlanta Polytechnic and attending physician at the Henry W. Grady hospital. Dr. Giddings ranks among the leaders of his profession in the state, and his frequent contributions to the medical journals are read with much interest in the north as well as the south. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Episcopal church. Dr. Giddings was married in 1890 to Miss Maud, daughter of the late John P. Crichton of Atlanta.

WILLIAM C. GLENN, senior member of the firm of Glenn & Rountree, was born in Chattooga county, Ga., Dec. 31, 1856. His father, Col. Jesse A. Glenn, was born in Gwinnett county, Ga. He entered the Confederate army as a captain, was made colonel of the Thirty-sixth Georgia regiment, and served throughout the war with distinction. He was nominated brigadier-general by President Davis, and his confirmation was pending when the surrender took place. Prior to the war Col. Glenn had practiced law with success, and at the age of nineteen was elected justice of the inferior court of Chattooga county. Shortly before the breaking out of the war he moved to Dalton. He served in the first legislature after the war. Mr. Glenn passed his youth in Dalton, and there laid the foundations of his education. Early in life he devoted himself sedulously to the acquisition of knowledge, and the studious habits thus formed have been strengthened as the years passed. His acquirements were sure and rapid, and he became proficient in the classics, a competent knowledge of German, French and Italian. He evinced a fondness for philosophic studies, and absorbed the works of Bacon, Kant, Hegel, Herbert Spencer, Tyndall and others. Fascinated by German literature, he studied its classic works, and is recognized as an accomplished scholar of Faust. Whilst pursuing these studies Mr. Glenn was grounding himself in the principles of the law, reading under his father's guidance. In addition to the usual studies he devoted large attention to the Roman and civil law. Soon after passing his seventeenth year he was admitted to practice. He began, perhaps, at an earlier age than any lawyer in the south. His practice was varied and extensive through all the courts of the northern part of the state, and in the supreme court of the state. While never a candidate for office until his election to the legislature, he had an interest in politics, and before his majority, took an active part in the political contests of the state. He participated in many notable campaigns, such as the contest between Gov. Colquitt and Hon. Thomas M. Norwood in 1880, and between Gen. Gordon and Maj. Bacon in 1886. In these campaigns he met in discussion on the hustings such redoubtable campaigners as Mr. Norwood, Dr. Felton, Maj. J. F. Hanson and numbers of others. In response to the popular demand Mr. Glenn was elected to the house of representatives in 1886 from Whitfield county by a very large majority. Two years later he was re-elected by a still larger vote. During his service in the legislature Mr. Glenn devoted himself mainly to the legal side of the questions pending before that body. He was a member of the judiciary committee, committee on corporations, Western & Atlantic railroad, and others of like importance. In 1886 he was chairman of the special committee to report on the legal status of the acts chartering railroads, and on behalf of that committee he prepared an exhaustive report, which has since been regarded as closing the question. He warmly advocated the extension and development of the educational interests of the state, both along the line of common schools and the higher branches. The most notable work of Mr. Glenn is the act conceived, drawn and introduced by himself, which has since been known as the "Glenn tax act." Anterior to the enactment of this law railroad property, with an aggregate valuation of $60,000,000, was exempt from taxation. Several efforts had been made to frame such a bill as would remedy this condition, and, at the same time, prove practicable and constitutional. The measure conceived by Mr. Glenn fully met all of the requirements. After its passage through the house of representatives it went to the senate, and a protracted hearing took place before the senate finance committee during the summer of 1889. Numbers of the most distinguished lawyers in the state appeared on behalf of the railroads and fought the measure—Mr. Glenn alone appearing in support of it. The committee, however, reported it favorably, and it was returned to the senate with only one amendment, known as the fourth section. This amendment, while not favored by Mr. Glenn, was not fought by him, because a contest upon it might have defeated the measure. From the legislature the contest was transferred to the courts. In the arguments before the supreme court of the state, Mr. Glenn attacked this fourth section, and his objections to it prevailed, and the measure, as first introduced by him, was sustained. The litigation did not, however, end until the railways carried it to the supreme court of the United States, by which tribunal it was upheld without hearing from the representatives of the state. This act has been since applied to the municipal taxation of railroad property. The act adds about $400,000 to the revenues of the counties and cities of the state. Mr. Glenn removed from Dalton to Atlanta and began the practice of law in January, 1890, in that city. Since coming to Atlanta, he has eschewed politics and devoted himself entirely to his profession. Since that time he has been entrusted with cases of every character and of the highest importance. He has appeared with distinction in the state and Federal courts. Several times he has made arguments before the supreme court of the United States; some of them in cases of national importance. Mr. Glenn appears in many cases before the supreme court of the state, representing that class of business from every section of it. He has given much study to the Roman and civil law, deeming an acquaintance with them a necessity to the study and practice of our American law. Notwithstanding the fact that he is one of the most industrious of lawyers, and that the demands of an exacting practice require the greatest attention, he still finds time to devote to literature. By common consent, he is the best-read lawyer in Atlanta, if not in Georgia. His versatility has excited the surprise and admiration of his friends. In matters of art his taste is irreproachable, and he is esteemed as a keen musical critic. Not infrequently he is invited to lecture before learned bodies. In December, 1889, Mr. Glenn and Miss Miriam Armstrong were married. She is the only daughter of the lamented Dr. J. G. Armstrong, formerly rector, Monumental church, Richmond, Va., and St. Philip's church, Atlanta. She had been a great social favorite since her debut a few years before. Her beauty, talents and notable qualities made her beloved by all. She is an accomplished woman, and is one of the musical leaders of the city of Atlanta. They have one child—a little girl—Alma Glenn.

JOHN T. GLENN. The subject of this sketch, who is a member of one of the oldest and most illustrious families of Georgia, is a lawyer by inheritance as well as by virtue of special training and preparation for the bar. His father, Hon. Luther

J. Glenn, was for many years a distinguished member of the Atlanta bar and a lawyer of profound legal ability. His mother, whose maiden name was Mildred Cobb, is a sister of Gen. Thos. R. R. Cobb, one of the leading lawyers of Georgia, who was killed at the battle of Fredericksburg, in Virginia, and of Gen. Howell Cobb, who filled the high office of governor of this state and also that of speaker of the national house of representatives. Possessing a bright legal mind and reared in an atmosphere that was fragrant, so to speak, with legal traditions and surroundings, it is no marvel that the subject of this sketch, Hon. John T. Glenn, should have risen to such a high and commanding prestige in the practice of his profession. Mr. Glenn was born near the town of Monroe, Ga., in Walton county, about forty-six years ago. His early boyhood, however, was spent at McDonough, Ga., where his father enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. At the age of twelve he came to Atlanta, and has since resided in this city. After completing his primary studies the subject of this sketch entered the state university at Athens, Ga. Here he made the best of his opportunities and gave promise of the talents that have since distinguished him in the practice of his profession. Graduating from the university in the summer of 1863 the young student immediately entered the Confederate army and remained in the active service until Gen. Lee's surrender. Returning to Atlanta after the war, Mr. Glenn entered his father's law office in that city, and after diligent application to his law books, gaining a thorough mastery of the fundamental principles of the law, he was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1866. His talents brought him at once into prominence as a practitioner and accordingly, in the following year, he was made the city attorney of Atlanta. This position he held for two years, performing valuable service to the city and still further extending his reputation. In 1872 he was appointed solicitor-general of the Atlanta circuit, and held that office five years. He then resigned for the purpose of forming a legal partnership with Judge John L. Hopkins, under the firm name of Hopkins & Glenn. He was subsequently elected a member of the board of education and has since continued to serve that body with marked devotion to the interests of the public schools of this city. In 1888 the name of Mr. Glenn was suggested in connection with the high office of mayor of Atlanta. It touched a popular chord and he was subsequently nominated at a citizens' mass meeting. He was elected to that office by a handsome vote and served the city during the years 1888 and 1889. His administration was characterized by a patriotic and progressive policy, and the welfare of Atlanta was substantially promoted during the period of his incumbency, and the credit of the city so firmly established that her four per cent bonds sold at par, which had never been done in a southern city. During Mr. Glenn's term as mayor other public improvements were made as follows: Over twelve and a half miles of sewers were built; ten and a fourth miles of Belgian (granite) block pavement was laid, and twenty-two and one-half miles of sidewalk put down. The large sums paid for these improvements and for other necessary expenses, great as they were, did not consume the city's income, a large amount being left available to pay interest on the public debt, and the increase in the value of real and personal property during the last year of Mr. Glenn's incumbency was over five and a half million dollars. In his inaugural address Mayor Glenn suggested the building of the new water works, and this suggestion, after mature consideration by the city council, was adopted during his official term. It was also at the suggestion of Mayor Glenn that the charter of the city of Atlanta was so amended as to prohibit the mayor from presiding over the deliberations of the council, but giving him the power to approve or veto all the acts of that body. The office of city comptroller-general was established during Mayor Glenn's term of office, at his suggestion, and the wisdom of the mayor has since been demonstrated by the success of this provision. It provides for a thorough system of bookkeeping, and served as a check against the promiscuous handling of the city's money. Mr. Glenn is now the senior member of the firm of Glenn, Slaton & Phillips, one of the strongest legal combinations in the city. As a lawyer Mr. Glenn is profoundly read in the principles of the profession and is diligent and painstaking in the service of his clients. He has been identified, as leading counsel on one side or the other, with many of the most important legal proceedings in the courts of north Georgia. He is equally at home in his efforts before the court and jury, and is employed in nearly all the important criminal business as well as in much of the civil litigation of the Atlanta circuit. Mr. Glenn has always been a loyal and patriotic citizen of Atlanta and is devoted to all her public enterprises. As one of the promoters of the Cotton States and International exposition he has aided materially in the advancement of that great industrial undertaking. Mr. Glenn was married in 1873 to Miss Helen Garrard, of Columbus, Ga., a sister of Col. L. F. Garrard, of Columbus, Ga., and of Hon. William Garrard, of Savannah, Ga. Four children, all of whom are living, have sprung from this union, two boys and two girls: Iza, Garrard, Helen, and William Louis. Mr. Glenn is still in his prime, and his future at the bar is one of continued usefulness and honor.

DR. NEWTON N. GOBER is a native of Tennessee. He was born in Shelby county Dec. 1, 1836, on a large plantation, and there resided until twenty years of age, gaining his primary education from the private schools of the vicinity and having as a tutor the noted Prof. Beman. During childhood his father died, and in 1855 he moved with his mother to Georgia, locating on Peachtree creek, Fulton county, five miles north of Atlanta. The next four years were passed here. In 1859, his mother having married Edward Mayse, they went over into Cobb county, Ga. Mr. Gober attended the high schools in Decatur and Smyrna, Ga., acquiring in these institutions the principal training of his intellect. Deciding upon the medical profession he began the study of this science under Dr. N. H. Campbell in Marietta, Ga., and in 1858 entered the medical college of Macon, Ga., graduating in March, 1860. He returned to Marietta and undertook active practice. His early professional labors were interrupted by the outbreak of the civil war. In the latter part of 1861 he enlisted as first lieutenant in Phillips' legion, served in this rank almost twelve months, and was then appointed captain of Company F, Third battalion, Wofford's brigade, Longstreet's corps and McClain's division. His appointment was made directly by President Jefferson Davis himself. In this office he remained until the surrender. He fought with memorable courage at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Zoah's church, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Knoxville, Cedar creek, Bean Station, Tenn., Wilderness, siege of Richmond, and commanded the last skirmish line when the city was being evacuated and on fire. Three days before Lee's sword was tendered as a symbol of defeat, Dr. Gober was captured, sent to Johnson's island and detained in that prison three months. On being released he came back to Marietta, purchased a small farm and followed this agricultural pursuit in connection with his practice for eight years. In February, 1894, his residence was changed to Atlanta, Ga. His practice has been lucrative and increasing daily since making Atlanta his home. Dr. Gober was married first in 1868, to Sarah P., daughter of Robert White, of Campbell county, Ga. Two girls survive their mother, Eva and May. He was again married on Dec. 21, 1893, to Mrs. Eva M. Ripley, nee Metcalf, of New Orleans, widow of Peter Ripley, of Boston, Mass. His home life has been blessed with the charms of happiness and love. Dr. Gober is a member of Kennesaw lodge, No. 33, F. & A. M., of the Royal Arch chapter, of the Encampment (I. O. O. F.), and the Cherokee lodge, No. 8 (I. O. O. F.). During 1868-69-70 he served the state as representative of Cobb county in the legislature, and was chairman of the auditing committee. He is a Presbyterian by faith and held the place of deacon for several years while living in Marietta, Ga. Dr. Gober's father was John A. Gober, born in De Kalb county, Ga., in 1817, and died of yellow fever at the age of forty. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Benjamin Plaster, Fenton county, Ga. This tie was hallowed by five children: Arminda, wife of J. M. Lidell, of Fulton county, Ga.; Sarah, wife of James Brockman, also of Fulton county; Julius J., a lieutenant in "Stonewall" Jackson's corps, who breathed his last at Staunton, Va.; Edwin F., first lieutenant in Howell Cobb's regiment, the Sixteenth Georgia, who died at Yorktown, Va., in 1861, and Dr. N. N., the subject of this sketch. Dr. Gober's mother died at the ripe old age of seventy-four, her death occurring in 1891. His grandfather was Daniel Gober, a native Georgian. He died during the late war at an advanced age after living the peaceful, pure and contented life of a farmer in Tennessee. Dr. Gober's ancestors were from Scotland.

SAMUEL WATKINS GOODE was born in Stewart county, Ga., June 3, 1847. In early childhood he was first sent to a meager school in the locality of his home. His father aided and encouraged him in his studies, and his death at the beginning of the war was a severe blow to the young son. He was under the tutorship of Mr. Ira Foster twelve months later in Waverly hall, and attended the Georgia Military institute for a half term. He removed to Lumpkin, Stewart Co., in January, 1866, and taught the classes in Latin, Greek and higher mathematics in a large school in Brunbridge, Ala. While here he completed his own education in the classics and besides amassed about $10,000, with which he contributed to the support of his younger brothers and sisters. From the school-room he went to New York, entering the Albany law school, and was graduated in May, 1871, with a B. L. degree. Being admitted to the bar he practiced in the state courts of New York, and the United States courts. During January, 1872, he moved to Savannah, Ga., and later in the same year to Eufaula, Ala. Mr. Goode was associated with Sterling B. Toney, who later located in Louisville, Ky. After his removal Mr. Goode practiced alone until September, 1881, and then sought Atlanta, with the intention of prosecuting real estate law entirely. He formed a partnership with Samuel T. Barnett to purchase the business of Joel Hurt. Soon his professional labors were interrupted by the demands made upon him by his private property; although he has presented many cases admirably before the supreme court of the state, with a spirit that never tires, a tact for successful advertising, and a memory that defies forgetfulness, he has prospered bountifully. In October, 1882, he was united in marriage to Miss Jennie W. Kendall, who died in July, 1875, leaving two children: Vadie and Mattie. He was married again in 1882, to Miss L. E. Stone, of Lexington, Ky., by whom he has two daughters: Ellen and Julia. Mr. Goode has held the presidency of the Atlanta Real Estate board and the vice-presidency of the National Real Estate association. He belongs to the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, the Georgia Bar association, the Young Men's Library association, the Capital City club and the First Methodist church. He is also president of the Southern Exchange bank. Mr. Goode was made president of the Guarantee Loan and Investment company when organized in 1881. He is also director in the Pasco Phosphate company and the Pasco Land company. They control 86,000 acres of Florida land and were capitalized as follows: Phosphate company, $2,000,000;

Land company, $1,000,000, with headquarters in Chicago. Mr. Goode is the scion of a noble house. His father was S. W. Goode, of Washington, Ga., possessing every trait that characterized the old southern gentleman. His mother was Martha E. Kirkpatrick. He is descended from the royalists of England, and his ancestors are traced back to the fourteenth century. We know not what motto was engraved on their "arms." It might have been honor and integrity. Mr. Goode is an extensive traveler, a lawyer of decided talent, a cultured, genial gentleman, and is considered, from his long residence and retentive memory, one of Georgia's historians.

HON. JOHN B. GOODWIN, the subject of this sketch, occupies a bright position in the esteem and respect of his fellow-citizens, who have twice honored him with the high and responsible office of mayor of the city of Atlanta. In every position of trust occupied by this useful Georgian since his entrance into politics, he has fully met the public expectation and discharged his duties with signal patriotism and ability. Mr. Goodwin was born in Cobb county, Ga., on Sept. 22, 1850. His early days were spent on his father's farm in Cobb county, and by virtue of the rigid discipline of the furrows he developed into a strong, athletic youth. He received his primary education from the neighboring schools and as soon as he was far enough advanced he entered the Powder Springs academy. Leaving this excellent institution he clerked in a store at Powder Springs for two years and by strictly adhering to his business he acquired the principles of a good commercial schooling. Thus equipped for the active duties of life and ready for the wider arena of public service that awaited him in the metropolis of the state, he came to Atlanta in 1870. He began at once the study of his chosen profession, the law, and by vigorous strides he succeeded in acquiring a sufficient understanding of its elementary principles to be admitted to the bar in September, 1871. Having attained his legal majority and his commission to practice law in the same month, he entered upon the practice of his profession with the ardor of a prophetic zeal. Clients, however, in those days were scarce, by reason of the hardships entailed upon this section by the devastations of the civil war. Very few people had any ready cash to pay an attorney, and the young practitioner could not subsist on the mere hope of reward. For this reason in the following year he applied for a temporary position on the staff of the Atlanta "Herald," then under the management of the late lamented Henry W. Grady, associated with R. A. Alston and St. Clair Abrams. He remained on the staff of the "Herald," serving as reporter, for two years, and then resumed the practice of law in the early part of 1874. During this year, and also for two years immediately succeeding, Mr. Goodwin was elected to a seat in the city council, having scarcely attained the age of twenty-four at the time of his emergence into politics. He was elected as a councilman from the first ward. In 1879-80-81 he served the city as an alderman. Such was the splendid record made by Mr. Goodwin during his term of service in the legislative councils that two years after his voluntary retirement he was called upon to discharge the duties of mayor of the city. In this office he strengthened his hold upon the confidence and esteem of the community by sacrificing his personal interests in order to promote the public weal. From July, 1885, to January, 1893, Mr. Goodwin served as city attorney and by his safe judgment and discriminating sense of the legal effect of all legislative measures proposed by the city council he was enabled not only to save the city large sums of money, but the unforeseen embarrassment that might arise from future litigation. In 1891, during his term of office as city attorney, Mayor Goodwin was elected to a seat in the state legislature as one of the representatives from Fulton county. As a member of that body he frequently made speeches on the floor of the house, besides serving on the following committees: General judiciary, corporations, public buildings and grounds, and railroads. He also served on the special committee appointed to adjust the differences between the state of Georgia and the Western & Atlantic railroad, and the special committee on congressional re-appointment. In 1893 Mayor Goodwin was recalled to the executive chair of the city and served in this high office for an additional two years. Mayor Goodwin is deeply imbued with the spirit of fraternity and belongs to quite a large number of mystic brotherhoods. He is a member of Georgia lodge, F. & A. M., a member of the Capital City lodge of Knights of Pythias, and belongs to the Independent Order of Red Men, and to the Capital lodge, No. 60, of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In this latter organization he has held all the posts of honor and has been grand master of the grand lodge of Georgia. For fifteen years he has been a representative from the grand lodge of Georgia to the sovereign grand lodge of the world. He is now the chairman of the committee on appeals of the sovereign grand lodge. But the list of honors is not yet exhausted. Mayor Goodwin is the past chief patriarch of Empire encampment of No. 12, I. O. O. F., a member of the Knights of Honor and of the Royal Arcanum. Mayor Goodwin was married in 1877 to Miss Emma A. McAfee, of this state. Several children have blessed this happy union and the home life of the household is happy and inviting. The father of Mayor Goodwin, whose name was Williamson H. Goodwin, was a native of Cobb county and throughout his life followed the occupation of a planter. He was also a commissioner and for several years held the office of justice of the peace in Cobb county. He was a gallant survivor of the Mexican war and a private in the First Confederate Georgia regiment, serving throughout the entire war. His death occurred in December, 1884, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. Mr. Goodwin has been faithful to every trust imposed upon him by his fellow-citizens, and being still in the prime of life, it is safe to predict that his career of usefulness has only commenced.

JOHN BROWN GORDON was born in Upson county, Ga., July 6, 1832. He came from good old Scotch stock, his grandfather being one of seven brothers who emigrated from Scotland to the colonies, and all of whom were brave soldiers in the revolutionary war. His grandfather was an influential citizen of Wilkes county, N. C., and his father was the Rev. Zachariah H. Gordon. Like many other of Georgia's great men, he secured his education in the state university, graduating at the head of his class in 1852. He was admitted to practice law a few months afterward, and entered the office of his brother-in-law, L. E. Bleckley. He resigned his profession to help his father in the mining business, but when the war began he left everything and enlisted at once, serving to the close of the conflict. His part in the war was that of a brave and heroic man, and his record for hard fighting is unsurpassed in the history of the rebellion. He won international distinction by his illustrious service, and was second to the great Lee in the Confederate army. From captain he rose in the service to command one wing of the army. He was five times seriously wounded, and when pierced by bullets at Sharpsburg, his life was only saved by the nursing of his faithful wife, who accompanied him in the service. At Appomattox he led the last charge, taking the Federal breastworks in the final scene of the war. When hostilities had ended, he called his ragged and broken-down men around him and made an eloquent and feeling speech to them, advising them to bear the trial, go home in peace, obey the laws, rebuild the country and work for the future of their country. After the war he settled in Atlanta, and was a member of the national union convention at Philadelphia, in 1866, and delegate to the national democratic convention in 1868. He was defeated for governor, in 1868, by R. B. Bullock, and declined the use of his name for United States senator in 1871, when Mr. Norwood was elected. He opposed the nomination of Greeley in the Baltimore democratic convention of 1872, and in 1873 was elected United States senator, and re-elected in 1879. He resigned in 1880 and organized the Georgia Pacific railroad. In 1886 and 1888 he was elected governor, and in 1890 was returned to the United States senate. Gen. Gordon's presence in the senate in the seventies was of inestimable value to the southern states. In the Louisiana trouble he was chosen by the democratic congressmen to draft an address to the people of the south, urging patience. He aided Lamar in rescuing Mississippi from political misrule, and was empowered by Gov. Hampton to look after South Carolina's interest, and after the adjournment of congress secured the removal of troops from Carolina.

HENRY WOODFIN GRADY was born in Athens, Ga., in 1851. He received in his youth excellent educational advantages, but his studies were disturbed by the civil war. The close of the war found him fatherless, Col. Grady having fallen on the battlefield. Young Grady graduated at the state university, and then took a post-graduate course in the university of Virginia. History, belles lettres, Anglo-Saxon and Greek attracted him, and he stood very high in these branches. From an early age his command of language was remarkable. His magnetic and ringing style of speaking won for him the title of the "silver-tongued orator," and in the literary societies of the two universities he carried off the highest honors as a speaker. While a student he wrote a letter to the Atlanta "Constitution," which was the beginning of his journalistic career. A year or two later he became the editor and part owner of the Rome "Daily Commercial." The field was too limited for him, and in 1872 he went to Atlanta and purchased an interest in the Atlanta "Herald." This paper was one of the most brilliant newspapers ever printed in the south. Later he became the southern correspondent of the New York "Herald," and on this great journal did some of the best work of his life. In 1880 he purchased a fourth interest in the Atlanta "Constitution," and became managing editor. As the guest of the New England society, at its annual banquet in New York, in 1886, he delivered a speech which attracted widespread attention. As a newspaper man, Mr. Grady's capacity for rapid work was amazing, and his fertility in conceiving newspaper enterprises audacious and prolific. His best gift was his eloquence, and one who has heard every famous orator since 1850, including Everett, Choate, Webster, Clay and Prentiss, says Henry Grady was unsurpassed. Of his brilliant orations, the following stand forth as the most striking illustrations of the great eloquence of Mr. Grady: Speech on prohibition, in Atlanta in 1887; at Dallas, Tex., 1888, opening of the state fair; to the societies of the Virginia universities, at Charlottesville, 1889, and his last public address, after the banquet of the Merchants' association in Boston, in December, 1889. On this occasion Mr. Grady contracted a cold which resulted in his death, Dec. 23, 1889. At his death Mr. Grady was the largest young national figure of this great government. Putting the war behind him, in his position as editor and orator, he directed thought to the united future, and thus did the mission of a national peacemaker. Mr. Grady married Julia King, in October, 1872. His sudden demise was a shock to the whole country, and his funeral was attended by a large concourse of people from all sections of the country. A monument in Atlanta was erected to his memory, by a popular public subscription, in which the thousands of friends of the great man among the poorer people contributed.

DR. LUTHER BELL GRANDY was born in Oxford, N. C., April 3, 1865; was there reared and received his rudimentary education. In 1882 he entered the university of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill, and graduated therefrom in 1886. Then he went to Charlottesville, Va., spending one year in the medical department of the university of Virginia. From this institution he removed to the College of Physicians and Surgeons, of New York city, graduating there in 1890. In the autumn of the same year he came to Atlanta and began the practice for which his subsequent success has proved him so well qualified, and which he has enjoyed ever since. When he first came to the Gate city he associated himself with Dr. W. P. Nicolson, which "partnership" continued for two and a half years. Dr. Grandy is at this time demonstrator of anatomy in the Southern Medical college, and owner of a half interest in the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal," of which he is also managing editor. He is secretary of the anatomical board of Georgia, and member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the Georgia State Medical association, and the Tri-State (Georgia, Alabama and Tennessee) Medical society. He married, Dec. 14, 1893, Hattie, daughter of A. G. and Hattie T. Smart. Dr. Grandy's father was Titus T. Grandy, who was born in Camden county, and married in the historic city of Camden, N. C., to Elizabeth Bell. They removed to Oxford, N. C., in 1850, and there Titus Grandy engaged in mercantile business up to the year 1883, when he retired and died some five years later. He was in the quartermaster's department in the late war. His wife died in 1893. They had eleven children, of whom but three are now living: Leonora, wife of Thomas D. Crawford, Ocala, Fla.; Albert S., lawyer, Nashville, Tenn.; Dr. L. B., Atlanta. The last named has contributed many noted articles to the medical journals of the country, amongst which are the following: "The Present Demand for Better Medical Education in the South," read at the meeting of the Tri-State Medical society, Chattanooga, Tenn., October, 1892, and published in the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal" in November of that year; "A State Board of Medical Examiners—the State's Medical Duty," read at the meeting of the Georgia Medical association, April, 1893, and published in the journal above named, May, 1893; "A Contribution to the History of the Discovery of Surgical Anesthesia, with Some New Data Relative to the Work of Dr. Crawford W. Long," published in the "Virginia Medical Monthly," October, 1893; "The History of Medicine and Surgery in Georgia" (four articles in the Atlanta "Medical and Surgical Journal," 1894-1895); "The Discovery of Anesthesia and the Alleged Relations Between Dr. Crawford W. Long and Dr. P. A. Wilhite," published in the New York "Medical Journal," July 20, 1895.

LEMUEL P. GRANT, who was born in Frankfort, Maine, Aug. 11, 1817, died in Atlanta, Ga., on the morning of Jan. 11, 1893, aged seventy-five years and five months. Col. Grant's boyhood and youth were spent on his father's farm, the labors on which served to strengthen and toughen a naturally good constitution. Educational facilities were so limited that he enjoyed school advantages for only short terms at irregular intervals. When about nineteen years of age, in 1836, he obtained a position as rodman on the engineering corps of the Philadelphia & Reading railway. Here his industry and fidelity, the quickness and capacity of his mind, and his aptitude for mathematics received ready recognition, followed by rapid promotion. On the completion of the Philadelphia & Reading railway he accepted an offer from J. Edgar Thomson, engineer-in-chief of the Georgia railway, and came to Georgia in January, 1840, serving on the extension from Madison, to the proposed terminus—the present site of Atlanta. Financial embarrassment having necessitated temporary suspension of work on this line, he engaged as assistant engineer on the Central railway; but, in 1843, he was recalled to the Georgia railway, with which he remained until it was finished. It is worthy of remark here, and of record, that, although Col. Grant subsequently acquired extensive landed propertyship in and near Atlanta, his first purchase was not made for mere ownership, or on speculation; but he was moved to make it from higher and holier motives—which serve as a key to his inner thought, his broad mindedness and public spirit. The circumstances were these: To reach the point designated as the terminus, the right-of-way was needed through land, lot No. 52, between one and two miles east. This the owner positively and persistently refused to give. Col. Grant bought the lot, gave the needed right-of-way, and this assured an easy and free passway to the center of the now prospective metropolis of the south. As the years glided by, Col. Grant sagaciously invested largely his earnings in real estate, in and near the rapidly growing embryo city; the increased value of which contributed much to the value of the handsome estate which he left. Col. Grant's conspicuous ability as a railway engineer, together with the sterling attributes of his character attracted, as well might be expected, the attention of railway builders, and caused his services to be desired, and sought. Consequently, he was offered and accepted the superintendency of the Montgomery & West Point railway in 1845, of which he remained in charge until April, 1848, when he resigned to accept the position of president engineer of the Georgia railway. He held the position until 1853, when he resigned and was appointed engineer-in-chief of the Atlanta & West Point railway. In addition to this, Col. Grant was, during all the years intervening between the time and his death, more or less engaged in several important railway enterprises, notably, the Georgia Air-line, and the Georgia Western (now Georgia Pacific), and an influential adviser in many others. During the war between the states Col. Grant rendered valuable services to the Confederate government, in his capacity of engineer, particularly in his superintendency of the defenses round Atlanta. In October, 1866, he was appointed superintendent of the Atlanta & West Point railway, continuing until July, 1881, when he was elected president of the company. In 1843 Col. Grant married Miss Laura A. Williams, daughter of Mr. Ami Williams, of Decatur, Ga. This lady died in 1875, leaving two sons and two daughters, viz.: John A. Grant; Myra B., wife of Dr. W. A. Armstrong; Lemuel Pratt Grant, Jr., and Letitia H., wife of George W. Logan. In 1881 Col. Grant married Mrs. Jane L. Crew, widow of Mr. James R. Crew, one of Atlanta's first and oldest and most esteemed citizens, who was assassinated in the latter part of 1865, and robbed while on his way home from the office of the Georgia railway, of which he was ticket agent. In 1860, Col. Grant united with the Central Presbyterian church, of which he remained a consistent, and devout, and liberal member until his death—his generous church contributions, and his unnumbered free-will and other benefactions demonstrating that he recognized himself only a steward of the Most High. In 1883 Col. Grant donated to the city a tract of 100 acres of land, partly within and partly without the southeastern limits of the city, to be maintained in perpetuity as a public park. To this the city afterward added forty-five acres by purchase, the entire tract being known as the L. P. Grant park. Col. Grant was always one of the warmest and most steadfast friends and advocates of the public school system of Atlanta; and was an ardent supporter, and one of the early directors of the Young Men's Christian association. Unostentatious, unassuming, and politically unambitious, yet always ready to advance all laudable public enterprises, with mind, means, and service, Col. Grant was a model citizen; discharging fully, faithfully, and promptly, every Christian duty, and contributing liberally to every movement for the advancement of home and foreign Christian work, he was a model Christian gentleman; while in his domestic relations his open-handed hospitality, and firm and conscientious discharge of every marital and parental obligation presents him as a shining exemplar, worthy of all honor, and of the emulation of all.

JOHN T. GRANT, Georgia's pioneer railroad builder, was born in the vicinity of Grantville, Greene Co., Ga., Dec. 13, 1813. He was of Scotch descent, and the blood that ran in his veins was like that which inspired Wallace to heroism. His ancestors were devout, intelligent and patriotic sons of the land of "banks and braes," severe in truth and honesty. His great-grandfather was Daniel Grant, of Virginia, a man of culture and refinement, who removed to Wilkes county, Ga., after the revolutionary war had closed, and erected the Grant meeting-house, the first Methodist church in the state, and the initial school-house of the county. Believing that slavery was a relic of barbarism he personally emancipated his slaves and granted them the freedom of his own existence. Col. Grant's father was the husband of Lucy Crutchfield, daughter of a prominent Methodist. This couple, with their young son, moved first to Greene county, and later to Athens, Clarke Co., Ga. John T. entered the state university and was graduated in 1833. With the spirit of enterprise and genius he determined to open commercial intercourse with the north, and also between the southern states, and consequently became a railroad constructor and established lines in Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas. The calamity of war destroyed his prospects and confiscated his land. When the bomb of secession had spent its force he reorganized his aids, and by stupendous contracts rapidly replenished his depleted finances. On Dec. 13, 1834, he married Martha Cobb Jackson, daughter of William H. and Mildred Cobb Jackson, at the home of her uncle, John A. Cobb, the father of Howell Cobb, governor and secretary of the United States treasury. This charming lady, a child of southern chivalry, was a gentle helpmeet to his worthy efforts and ambitions. They had one son, Capt. W. D. Grant, of Atlanta, Ga. Col. Grant was state senator from Walton county in 1856; was appointed colonel, as an aide on the staff of Gen. Howell Cobb, and has built an elegant home, placing it in a beautiful grove of oaks. Col. Grant was a bosom friend and companion of his brother-in-law, Chief Justice James Jackson, of Georgia's supreme bench. Their attitude toward one another was that of David and Jonathan. Col. Grant enjoyed a day passed in the field with dog and gun. Being an unerring shot and a devotee of athletic sports, he could find no happier diversion than hunting. He loved literature, and in his books found a pleasure that only intellects of power can appreciate. He was a connoisseur of art and music, and possessed great talent in each accomplishment. He was a man of mighty undertakings, with indomitable will power and force of character that can be expressed only by the adjective grand. Practical, religious and persevering, he gained the love and devotion of his people. Such was his life; his death came as softly as the morning, a fit close for years of usefulness and toil. He died Jan. 18, 1887. The immortal Grady, with the pathos of a sublime nature, wrote of his death: "He lived a long life, in which good deeds were sown with unstinting hand and far-reaching arm. He died as the tired and weary man falls asleep. The end came to him in no storm or convulsion, but gently as a leaf parted from the bough in an autumnal breeze floats adown the waiting silences of the forest, his life, parting from the world, passed into the vast unknown which men call death. Earth is better for his having been—heaven will be brighter because of his coming."

COL. W. D. GRANT, one of the wealthiest of Atlanta's citizens, is the only surviving child of John Thomas Grant and Martha Cobb Jackson. He was born in Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., on Aug. 16, 1837, in the house of his paternal grandfather, Daniel Grant. When in his seventh year his father removed with his family to the neighborhood of Monroe, Ga., on the road to Social Circle. Mr. Grant attended school at Monroe until fifteen years of age and in the fall of 1853 entered the freshman class of the university of the state at Athens. After leaving college he undertook the study of law under his uncle, the late Chief Justice James Jackson, and was admitted to the bar, but decided not to practice this profession. Before arriving at his twentieth birthday he assumed entire charge of his father's plantation in Walton county, which he managed with marked success for four years. He was a theoretical as well as practical farmer and was the first person to use commercial fertilizers in Walton county and raise a bale of cotton to the acre on fields of very thin soil. When the war between the states summoned southern defenders to assert their conceived rights and loyalty, Mr. Grant was unanimously elected captain of the first cavalry company sent from that section of the state, and served in the Confederate army until discharged by reason of ill health. Later during the war he was superintendent of the construction of the fortifications around Atlanta, under the direction of Col. L. P. Grant of the engineer corps. Soon after the war closed Mr. Grant settled in Atlanta, in the place where he now lives, and became associated with his father in building railroads and other public works, and was actively engaged in that business until 1885. By the construction of railroads and introducing means of transportation and traffic, Mr. Grant aided materially in the substantial growth and rapid development of Georgia and the south. The enterprise and love of civilization here displayed has redounded largely to his latter years, by bringing as a fitting recompense wealth, luxury and happiness. At the same time he was thus engaged he was a large and successful planter, raising his own needed supplies, and an average of 1,500 bales of cotton per annum. He has dealt extensively in real estate since making Atlanta his home, and is at this time the largest taxpayer in the city. Mr. Grant was married June 13, 1866, to Miss Sallie Fannie Reid, the daughter of William Reid, and Martha Wingfield, of Troup county, Ga. They have two surviving children: Sallie Fannie Jackson, the widow of the late Tom Cobb Jackson, and John W. Grant, a dealer in real estate. Col. Grant retired from active business years ago, and since then has devoted his time exclusively to the improvement and management of his valuable property and the pleasures of his family. Col. Grant occupies much of his time in his library, which is large and contains the choicest literature. He is familiar with the best authors and revels in their company. He is fortunate in possessing not only affluence but the appreciation of genius.

JAMES R. GRAY. Among the younger members of the legal profession in Georgia no advocate enjoys a higher degree of prominence or a more successful practice than Mr. James R. Gray. Devotion to the interests of his clients, associated with exceptional talents for serving them, and a stainless integrity that no one has ever dared to assail, has made this brilliant young attorney one of the most reliable in the brotherhood of the Atlanta bar. James Richard Gray is a native Georgian and was born at Adairsville, in the upper part of the state, on Sept. 30, 1859. He received his primary instruction from the schools of that vicinity, graduating from the North Georgia Agricultural college at Dahlonega, a branch of the state university, in 1878. The legal predilections of the young student began to assert themselves at a very early age, and long before he received his diploma he conceived the idea of becoming a lawyer and of reaching, in the course of time, the highest rounds of the profession. Equipped by nature and education for the legal combats of the forum, the young student, immediately after graduation, began his preparations for the bar. He studied with zealous application in the law office of Col. Abda Johnson, at Cartersville, Ga., and after reading law for several months under that able counselor, he passed a rigid examination, and, with the compliments of the court pronounced upon his exceptional qualifications for the practice, he was admitted to the bar in 1879. The small town of Cartersville was too restricted in the field of opportunities presented to the outlook of a bright, ambitious young lawyer, and accordingly, in the summer of the same year, Mr. Gray located in Atlanta. He at once entered upon a good practice and never for a moment has regretted the impulse that prompted him to come to Atlanta. He continued in the practice alone until 1883, building up a splendid clientage and earning a high reputation among his associates and brother members of the bar. He then formed a legal partnership with Col. B. F. Abbott, one of the ablest civil lawyers of the state, and a man of varied and successful experiences in the profession. At the expiration of the first year this partnership was dissolved and Mr. Gray continued to practice by himself until 1887, when he formed a partnership with Col. W. D. Ellis. This combination continued for several years until the admission of Capt. W. D. Ellis, Jr., into the firm, and with that addition to its legal talent the firm has remained unchanged. Mr. Gray has been associated in the management of quite a large number of civil proceedings and his skill and research as a lawyer are manifested with renewed emphasis at each successive appearance in court. He is not only a shrewd and successful practitioner at the bar, but his financial and business qualifications place him in the front rank of those who, in recent years, have promoted the growth and material upbuilding of the city. Mr. Gray is the vice-president of the American Trust and Banking company, and is also a member of the board of directors of that institution. He is also a director of the Atlanta Savings bank, and of the Southern Glass company. His business tact and versatility are demonstrated by his active participation in the management of all these business enterprises. Mr. Gray was married in 1881 to Miss May Inman, daughter of Mr. Walker P. Inman, of Atlanta. Five children have resulted from this happy union, two sons and three daughters. The domestic life of Mr. Gray reveals the true tenderness and refinement of his character. He is always happy in the companionship of his wife and children, and believes in making his home attractive by bringing into it all that tends to make it beautiful. A consistent member of the First Presbyterian church, Mr. Gray is regular in his attendance upon the exercises of divine worship, and is always in his pew, when not prevented by sufficient or providential reasons. He has never sought political preferment, though he takes a lively interest in all public questions, and is able to converse thoughtfully on all the current topics of the day. Col. John W. Gray, the father of the subject of this sketch, commanded the Forty-second Georgia battalion during the late war, and served with distinguished valor throughout that bloody conflict. He is a native of Georgia, and was born and reared near Augusta, Ga. As a member of the state legislature he has been instrumental in securing wise laws for the government of the state, and has been a faithful, upright and conscientious citizen, devoted to the welfare of the commonwealth. Col. Gray is still living at Adairsville, Ga. The maiden name of Mr. Gray's mother was Miss Sarah Venable, a lady of gentle blood and rare mental gifts. Under the refining influence of her life and discipline five children were reared, the youngest of them being the subject of this sketch. Mr. Gray is still in the prime and vigor of his young manhood and if the achievements heretofore recorded, during his brief career at the bar form any indication of his future honors, he will no doubt mount to a much higher pinnacle of success and usefulness.

JOHN M. GREEN. No citizen of Atlanta is more universally admired for his business talents and for his character as a Christian gentleman than Mr. John M. Green. For a number of years Mr. Green has occupied an influential place among the promoters of Atlanta's growth and no public enterprises that have sought to advance the material welfare of that city have appealed to him in vain. Since coming to Atlanta in 1875 Mr. Green has been connected with the fertilizing industry and, under his wise and successful management, the business has grown into mammoth proportions. The subject of this sketch was born in Macon, Ga., in Bibb county, on Jan. 5, 1847. His father, Franklin Green, was a native of this state and a man of brilliant promise, who died on the threshold of his business career. Though only twenty-six years old at the time of his death, he had succeeded by dint of pluck, energy and perseverance, in establishing a splendid credit and would no doubt have become a wealthy merchant had he lived. Mr. Green's mother, whose maiden name was Mary Ansley, was the daughter of Rev. M. Ansley, a Baptist clergyman of Knoxville, Crawford Co., Ga. A woman of deep piety, she reared her children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord and the influence of her life and Christian example had much to do with the growth and development of their characters. Two children sprang from her union with Franklin Green. These were John M. Green, the subject of this sketch, and Mary F., the wife of J. H. McKenzie, of Americus, Ga. Shortly after the birth of the subject of this sketch his parents moved from Macon to Griffin, Ga. Here his father carried on for a short while a general merchandise business, dying in 1850. At this time his son was only three years old, and his mother a helpless widow with two little children. Leaving Griffin with her children, Mrs. Green went to her father's home in Crawford county. Here the subject of this sketch developed into a strong lad and gave promise of the useful manhood to which the principles by which he was actuated, even as a boy, all pointed. As soon as he was old enough to go to school he was given the benefit of the best instruction to be obtained in that county, and being a boy of studious disposition he made the best of his opportunities and advanced rapidly in his books. At the age of fifteen he entered the Georgia Military institute at Marietta, Ga., and in 1864, with the other cadets, he entered the Confederate service, remaining in the service actively until the close of the war. He and his schoolmates were in quite a number of battles, among them being the engagement at Turner's Ferry on the Chattahoochee river, and the battles fought in the neighborhood of Atlanta. After the war, having nothing else to do, as the business of this section was completely paralyzed and no avenue of success appeared to open a way for him, he decided to follow the plow as a safe and honest means of earning a livelihood. Accordingly, he farmed for two years in Macon county and afterward for seven years in Cobb county. In 1875 he came to Atlanta and entered the fertilizing business, engaging in the manufacture of fertilizers on a small scale. His experience on the farm opened to him this line of business, which proved to him a doorway to success. From a small beginning he has steadily risen by slow degrees and is now at the head of one of the largest fertilizing industries of the south. He is the president of the Atlanta Guano company, located in Atlanta, Ga.; the Americus Guano company, at Americus, Ga., and the Walton Guano company, at Social Circle, Ga. He was also one of the organizers of the Trust company of Georgia. Mr. Green has no taste for political life and has never allowed himself to be influenced by the greed for office. Though qualified, by reason of his talents, for the discharge of public duties, he has always preferred to serve the community in the role of a humble citizen, giving his cordial support to all enterprises that have tended to promote the welfare of the city. As one of the deacons of the First Baptist church of Atlanta, Mr. Green devotes much of his time to religious work and is one of the most enthusiastic and loyal members of his denomination. Mr. Green has been identified with the church ever since his removal to Atlanta. He has always contributed with a liberal hand to the support of its enterprises, both at home and abroad, and has been a delegate to nearly all the Baptist conventions that have met in the state since his connection with the church. He is chairman of the finance committee, and also of the board of deacons, and is the treasurer of the church. He has also been frequently a delegate to the Southern Baptist convention. Mr. Green has always been an ardent worker in the cause of young people, and for several years was president of the Fulton County Sunday-school association. He has also been at the head of the state organization. Mr. Green was one of the organizers of the Travelers' Protective association and as the head and front of that movement has made it one of the most flourishing organizations of the state. As a member of the committee of arrangements to prepare for the coming of the Georgia manufacturers to Atlanta, Mr. Green is entitled to much of the credit bestowed upon that committee for the success of the convention. He devoted himself with tireless zeal to the special work assigned to him and won the gratitude and praise of all who labored with him in the cause. His election to the high office of treasurer of the association was an honor worthily bestowed. Mr. Green was married in 1869 to Miss Eunice Clifton, of Marietta, Ga. They have three children, two sons and one daughter. Devoted to his family, Mr. Green has made an ideal husband and father, and his home life, no less than his success in the business world, furnishes a splendid example for encouragement and emulation.

G. V. GRESS. At the head of the largest lumber business of the south, and the owner of thousands of acres of the finest timber lands in the wire grass section of Georgia, G. V. Gress, of Atlanta, can well be termed the lumber king. And he is a very young king, too, for it was about 1870, when a boy just entering his twenties, he came from his native state of New York and entered the employ of D. R. Wadley, the leading lumber manufacturer of this part of the state at the time. Young Gress has managed saw-mills and cut timber up in the Empire state and his industrious habits, experience and thrift soon attracted the eye of Mr. Wadley and he was given charge of important trusts in connection with the business. In a few years Mr. Wadley died and Mr. Steele was his successor, from whom Mr. Gress purchased a one-third interest. He worked no harder for himself than he did for his employers, but his rare judgment exercised in the business brought big profits to the company and his interest continued to increase until he owned the entire interest, amounting to something like $100,000. More money was then put in the concern and its business quadrupled, and so successful has it been in this line of prosperity and enterprise, that now the Gress Lumber company handles a big part of the lumber traffic of the south. The chief mills of the company are located in Wilcox county, but they have others in surrounding counties, all of which do a thriving business. The company has fifteen or twenty miles of steel railway track, standard gauge, well equipped with locomotives and cars, and is provided with every facility for supplying the lumber products, in any form, at the market prices. Mr. Gress, in adopting Atlanta as his home, wisely appreciated its advantage as a business center and a desirable residence place, and has for years made large investments in real estate, and still has big holdings. He also owns one tract of land in southern Georgia, of over forty thousand acres of timber, which is estimated to be worth nearly $300,000. Mr. Gress was one of the organizers of the Georgia Loan and Savings bank, which was established in 1891, and he has been ever since president of the company. In 1893 the Hart Lumber company was organized in Finn, Ga., and Mr. Gress is president of this concern. Mr. Gress, like most self-made men, is of a liberal mind and generous nature. He has started many a young man on a high road to competence, and several have amassed fortunes through help extended them by him. Messrs. J. A. Hart and D. N. Hughes, wealthy bankers of Chattanooga, owe their success in life through the efforts of Mr. Gress. He also has distinguished himself as a public benefactor, by purchasing the menagerie of the Hall & Binley circus, which he gave to the city, providing a nucleus for a zoological garden, located in Grant park. In recognition of this kind act Mr. Gress was unanimously elected president of the park commission, a board which is doing grand work in the care and improvement of the public grounds of Atlanta. Mr. Gress is a gentleman of whom any city might feel proud, as is evidenced by this tribute paid him by the "Atlanta Constitution": "It is a pleasure to see a man who can handle his business with as much ease as Mr. Gress does. There is not as much friction in his large business, in all its details, as there is on many two-horse farms in this state. The men who work for him like him, and respect him; he pays good wages, requiring hard work and the men get their pay without fail on pay day. He is not pompous or puffed up, but is a fair, square man in all his dealings, and has that reputation among all the men who have dealt with him. Mark our prediction: the wire grass region of Georgia will some day be the most populous part of the state, and George V. Gress, if he lives, will be one of the richest men of the south. He is now one of our most liberal and progressive citizens, and men of his makeup are always lucky and happy. If they are not they ought to be." Mr. Gress was married to Abbie J. Morgan of Chattanooga, Tenn., Dec. 23, 1873. She was a devoted wife and noble Christian lady of the Methodist Episcopal (South) faith. Mr. Gress attributes much of his success in life to the wise counsel of this helpmate. To them were born Morgan V., Jan. 7, 1875, and John Hast Gress, September, 1877, both members of the church of which their mother belonged. Mrs. Gress died from heart disease in April, 1881. In May, 1883, Mr. Gress married Ida May Nelson of Indianapolis, Ind., whose father was also a Tennessean. To them was born in November, 1885, Marie Gress.

DR. HUGH HAGAN is one of Atlanta's prominent physicians, who is held in high esteem by his colleagues. He was born in Richmond, Va., June 22, 1863, and there passed his early youth and learned the rudimentary branches of study. When eighteen years of age he became a dealer in tobacco in that city, but finding his tastes did not favor the pursuit of merchandising, he abandoned that business a year later, and with the intention of completing his education and taking an academic course, went to Europe. He chose the university of Berlin as his "alma mater," and attended there for twelve months, returning to America when the term was concluded. In 1885 he entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York city, applied himself diligently for three years, and graduated with distinction in 1888. Shortly after Dr. Hagan became imbued with the desire to become a physician, so he again crossed the Atlantic ocean with this object in view, and studied medicine for one and a half years in the cities of London, Vienna and Paris. He gained valuable experience in the hospitals of the old world, and having the most learned practitioners of the day as his tutors, advanced rapidly in the acquisition of the science. On returning to his native country, Dr. Hagan located in Atlanta, where he has since pursued his profession. His reputation has extended far beyond the limits of his practice, and besides being a member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, he is also identified with the State Medical society, and holds the chair of diseases of the mind and nervous system in the Atlanta Polyclinic. He also occupies the responsible position of medical examiner for the Fidelity Mutual Life Insurance company, of Philadelphia. These various offices testify strongly to the confidence placed in his ability. Dr. Hagan was married, Oct. 26, 1887, to Miss Sarah Cobb Johnson, daughter of the late Dr. John Milton Johnson, whose biography appears elsewhere in this work. Dr. Hagan's father was Hugh Hagan, who was a native of South Carolina, but removed to Virginia between the years 1830 and 1840, and there resided for half a century, dying in Richmond, Va., in 1881. When the civil war called volunteers to the front, Mr. Hagan was too feeble to enter the active service, and became a member of the Virginia reserves. His loyalty and fidelity were not dimmed by age. His wife, Sarah Copeland McMinn, was of Scotch-Dutch descent, and born in the state of Pennsylvania. To this marriage were given two sons and two daughters, of whom the survivors are Stella, wife of Charles E. Smith, of Richmond, Va., and Dr. Hugh Hagan, of Atlanta. The paternal grandfather was Alexander Hagan, a jeweler and lapidary, whose native place was northern Ireland. This ancestor emigrated to America and settled in South Carolina soon after the war of 1812. Dr. Hagan is not so entirely engrossed in professional duties but that, after office hours, he can devote much of his time to the pleasures of society. Being a popular club man, he heartily believes in the promotion of friendship and good feeling among his fellow men. As a member of the school of medicine and a gentleman of individuality, with the magnetism that attracts companionship, Dr. Hagan is a strong factor in the state.

JOHN I. HALL was born Feb. 20, 1841, in Jackson, Butts Co., Ga. He was partly educated at Erskine college, South Carolina, but only went through the sophomore class at that institution, his education having been interrupted by the coming on of the war between the states. He enlisted as a volunteer in the Fourteenth Georgia regiment, in July, 1861, and served as a lieutenant in that regiment until December of that year, when he resigned his commission, on account of ill-health, and returned home. In February, 1862, he returned to the Confederate army as first lieutenant of a company in the Forty-fifth Georgia regiment, and was in the battles around Richmond in June of that year, and on the 30th day of that month he received severe gunshot wounds, from which he has never fully recovered. He was promoted to the rank of captain, and in the winter of 1862-63 was detailed to post duty in Georgia, where he remained until the fall of 1863, when he was elected to the legislature of Georgia, as a member from his native county of Butts. On his election to the legislature he resigned his commission in the army. Judge Hall was admitted to practice law by the superior court of Henry county, in the spring of 1861, after having taken a course of reading under Judge James S. Boynton, then a practicing lawyer in Butts county, and practiced law in the counties of Butts, Upson and Spalding. He was married, in 1864, to Miss McMichael, of Butts county, and has now living four children: Mrs. R. A. Drake, of Griffin, Ga.; Robert M., M. P., and J. E. Judge Hall served the term in the legislature to which he was elected, and resided in Butts county until 1869, when he removed to Upson county, and was sent from there to the legislature in 1870, serving one term. Soon after the expiration of his legislative term he was appointed judge of the superior courts of the Flint circuit, and served six years on the bench. This office gave him an opportunity for the display of those high and broad powers of his mind in the administration of justice, and that perfect fairness and impartiality which soon marked him as one of the ablest lawyers and jurists of the state. He manifested, while on the bench, profound knowledge of legal principles, unusual energy, and that rare combination of great breadth and subtle acumen which gave him what appeared to be an intuitive power of applying the law to the particular case before him, and almost unerring accuracy in reaching legal conclusions. In 1875, while on the bench, Judge Hall removed to Griffin, Ga., and was again elected to the legislature from the county of Spalding, in 1878, and in November of that year resigned the office of judge, to take his seat in the general assembly, where he served a term. After this he resumed the practice of the law at Griffin, in connection with John D. Stewart, who was afterward judge of the superior court and member of congress. This partnership lasted for two years, until Judge Stewart went upon the bench. In 1884 he practiced law with Hon. John J. Hunt, of Griffin, who afterward became judge of the superior court. In November, 1885, Judge Hall entered into a law partnership with Hon. W. R. Hammond of Atlanta, Ga., who had just resigned from the superior court bench of that circuit. This partnership has existed since it was formed and still continues, under the firm name of Hall & Hammond. At the bar Judge Hall has displayed his greatest powers, and won his most enduring fame. As an advocate, both before courts and juries, he has no superior, and his equal is rarely found. Of large stature and commanding appearance, his very presence inspires respect and confidence. Add to this his thorough knowledge of his case, as evidenced in every phase of the trial, and his complete mastery of law as applied to all parts of it, and his great success at the bar is easily accounted for. Ever and thoroughly vigilant and watchful, he is a tower of strength to his clients in the court house and a terror to his adversaries. Judge Hall's great activity and energy, which qualities have always been conspicuous in him, and the unusual interest he has always taken in current events, have not allowed him to keep entirely aloof from politics, though the law has always been his first love, and he has never permitted himself to yield to any desire for personal promotion which would divorce him from that. Thus he has been elected to the legislature of his state five separate times, having besides those already mentioned, been returned to the state senate in 1888, and again to the general assembly in 1892, and he was a presidential elector on the Hancock ticket in 1880. In April, 1893, the high office of assistant attorney-general of the United States was tendered to Judge Hall by President Cleveland. The office was entirely unsought by him, and was accepted with hesitation. But it was in the line of his profession, and he entered upon the discharge of its responsible duties with his accustomed energy and ability, and has secured for himself an enviable fame, which is not bounded by state lines, but is national in its character. Judge Hall's character can best be summed up by saying that he is one of the great lawyers of his time. As said in the outset, he is equaled by few and surpassed by none.

C. R. HANLEITER. Among the earliest of the devout Salzburg immigrants who founded the famous colony of Ebenezer, in what is now Effingham county, Ga., was John Jacob Handleiter. An only son who bore the same name changed the spelling of the surname to Hanleiter. A descendant still bearing the name of John Jacob was married in 1812 to Miss Elizabeth McFarland, daughter of William McFarland, of distinguished Scottish lineage of Cowpens, S. C. They had four children, of whom Cornelius R. Hanleiter, born in Savannah, Ga., June 14, 1815, was the youngest. He was left an orphan quite young, his father dying the year after he was born, and his mother when he was about eight years old, but he was given a home with a maternal aunt. When eleven years of age he was bound to William Robertson, editor and proprietor of the Savannah Georgian, to learn the printers' trade, served more than his full term of years, and is possibly not only the oldest printer in the state, but the only one who served a regular seven years' apprenticeship. In 1834, soon after the expiration of his time, he went to Augusta, Ga., and assisted P. C. Guieu in getting out the first number of the "Constitution," which, after thirty years of lusty life, was merged into the "Augusta Chronicle." After going thence to Alabama and assisting in making a railway survey, he accepted the position of foreman of the "Montgomery Advertiser," James E. Belden, editor and proprietor. While visiting relatives in Macon, he assisted in running an experimental railway line from Macon to Dublin, under L. O. Reynolds. Proposing to make a permanent home in Macon, he accepted a position on the "Macon Messenger," of which Simri Rose and Isaac G. Seymour were editors and proprietors. He employed his leisure hours in publishing the "News Courier," a small weekly, which evolved first into the more pretentious "Southern Post," and then into the "Southern Lady's Book," monthly, published in the interests of the Georgia (now Wesleyan) female college, edited by Rev. George F. Pierce, afterward the distinguished Methodist bishop. In 1840 he went to Forsyth, Ga., and published the "Southern Botanical Medical Journal," and the next year he published "Worthy's Botanic Practice," a volume of 500 pages. In 1842 he purchased the office and moved it to Madison, Ga., and established the "Southern Miscellany," of which he was sole editor and proprietor, and in which first appeared "Maj. Jones' Courtship," contributed by W. T. Thompson, afterward editor of the "Savannah Mining News." In 1847 he moved his office and business to Atlanta, "to grow up with the city." In 1852 he published the "Reveille," a whig campaign weekly, and the same year sold his office to a party of gentlemen who established the "Atlanta Intelligencer," which after a life of a quarter of a century was merged into the "Atlanta Constitution." Early in 1857 he established the "National American," tri-weekly, which was conducted with conspicuous ability on lines of progressiveness and development—advocating with spirit and vigor cotton and other manufacturing industries, the construction of the Georgia air-line, now R. & D., and Georgia Western, now Georgia Pacific, railways, and direct foreign trade, and when disunion began to be talked his opposition was fierce and strong. The "National American" was not only powerful and popular politically, but it was a model family paper—not a line was given space that would cause the slightest flush to mantle the cheek of any around the family circle. It was subsequently merged into the "Southern Confederacy" newspaper. In 1860 Col. Hanleiter organized a strong company and established the Franklin Publishing company, which was disposed of while he was doing duty in the Confederate service on the Georgia coast, and for which he never received a cent. The present great Franklin Publishing company is the outcome of this organization. Early in the seventies, in connection with Col. B. C. Yancey, he published the "Plantation," which is his last important connection with the printing business. He helped to organize the Gate City Guards in 1855, was elected a lieutenant, and his eldest daughter, Josephine, presented the company with a costly silk flag. In 1856 he was a member of the city council (when it served for nothing); was a justice of the inferior court, and was principally instrumental in establishing a house of refuge for the poor. After the war, about 1870, he was superintendent of the celebrated Orphans' home at Bethesda, near Savannah; and while holding the position raised $8,000, mostly from distinguished citizens of the north, and thereby saved from forced sale and being sacrificed, property worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. When in Macon, in 1837-40, he was foreman of fire company No. 1, and ex-officio chief of the fire department, and vice-president of the Macon Benevolent association, composed of the leading citizens of Macon. In 1844, in Madison, he was marshal of the day when the great Clay mass meeting was held. Col. Hanleiter is spending his closing years with his children at Atlanta, prepared for and calmly awaiting the time when he shall be summoned to a re-union of those of his family who have preceded him to the great unknown. Col. Hanleiter was twice married; first to Miss Mary Ann Ford, born in New Haven, Conn., Feb. 22, 1837, and who died in 1848, leaving five children; and second he was married to Miss Ann Elizabeth Shaw, Atlanta, September, 1850, who died in December, 1893, bearing eight children. Ten of his children attained to maturity: Josephine, deceased wife of Henry Gullatt; William R., merchant, Griffin, Ga.; Ida, unmarried; Katharine Anna, wife of J. S. Peterson; Bertha E., unmarried; Victorine, Mrs. Stowers; Cora, Mrs. Catchings; George S., Methodist preacher; James McP., in business, Savannah; Elizabeth, clerk superintendent of public schools, Atlanta.

WILLIAM CORY HALE, banker, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Columbus, Miss., in 1858. He received his education in the schools of his native city. At the age of seventeen he entered his father's office. In 1880 he accepted a position as general bookkeeper for a cotton commission house, and remained with them until he removed to Atlanta, Ga., in 1887. His first work in Atlanta was in the insurance business, but realizing the importance and future of the city as a financial center, he soon organized the Southern Mutual Building and Loan association and the State Savings bank, both of which companies he is president of. He is also president of the Hale Investment company, and a director in several other organizations. Enterprising, yet cautious, prompt in all business obligations and engagements, and thoroughly systematic in his business methods, he has established a fine reputation and been eminently successful in his undertakings.

JUDGE WILLIAM R. HAMMOND. Few men have reached a higher distinction at the bar or enjoyed, in fuller measure, the respect and confidence of their fellow-citizens than Judge William Robinson Hammond. Though just in the prime of life, at an age when the greatest legal successes are usually attained, Judge Hammond has been recognized, for a number of years, as one of the foremost members of his profession. A native of this state, Judge Hammond was born in Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., on Oct. 25, 1848. His father, Judge Dennis F. Hammond, was a man of distinguished ability and of great usefulness. His attainments at the bar and in private life were such as to merit incidental mention in this connection. He was born at Newberry, S. C., in 1819, but came to Georgia in his youth, settling first in Lincoln county. He was subsequently united in marriage to Miss Adeline Robinson, of Carroll county, and nine children sprang from this union, four of whom survive: Octavia, wife of A. D. Adair, of Atlanta; William R., the subject of this sketch; Dr. John D., president of Central college, Missouri, and Edward M., a practicing lawyer of Orlando, Fla., and formerly a member of the state senate. Judge Hammond, the elder, was admitted to the bar in 1840. He moved to Newnan, Ga., in 1850, and five years later was elected to the superior court bench as judge of the Tallapoosa circuit. Leaving the bench in 1862, after an able and fearless administration of the law, Judge Hammond came to Atlanta and entered upon the active practice of his profession. In 1870, during a period of great disturbance and of frequent violations of the law, Judge Hammond was elected mayor of Atlanta. His administration was one of the most conservative the city has ever enjoyed and its influence was felt in the superior moral tone imparted to the city's daily life. Judge Hammond remained in the practice of law with his son until 1881. Leaving Atlanta, he then removed to Orlando, Fla., to engage in the orange industry, and devoted himself to that pursuit, though not giving up his professional practice entirely, until his death in 1891. The passing away of this great and good man was sincerely mourned. Among the tributes of sympathy received by the afflicted family were letters from Senators Alfred H. Colquitt, John B. Gordon and one from Judge B. H. Bigham. The press of the state teemed with eulogies upon his noble and useful life and the memory of his stainless record is still fresh in the minds of his fellow citizens. Returning to Judge William R. Hammond, the son of the foregoing: he lived only two years in Heard county, removing with his parents to Newnan, Ga., where he received his primary education. In 1862 the family came to Atlanta and William attended the private schools of that city for three years. He then entered the state university at Athens, Ga., in 1867, graduating from that institution in 1869, with the highest honors of his class. Dr. A. A. Lipscomb was the chancellor of the university at that time, and the class was one of the brightest and largest that ever graduated, several of its members having since attained both state and national distinction. After graduating the young student entered the law office of his father, Judge Dennis F. Hammond, and after preparing himself for the practice was admitted to the bar in 1870. Forming a partnership with his father they continued to practice, as a law firm, until 1881. In the following year William R. was elevated to the bench of the Atlanta circuit, having been elected by the general assembly to fill the unexpired term of Judge Hillyer, who resigned. He was subsequently re-elected for a term of four years but after serving for only a few months he resigned in November 1885, to resume the active practice. As a judge his decisions were sound and logical and he enjoyed the confidence of both the bar and the public. During the period of his practice from 1870 to his election as Judge in 1882 Mr. Hammond had charge of, and successfully conducted, some of the most important and difficult litigation in the state. One of these was the case of the state against the Scofield Rolling Mill company, brought under a special act of the legislature, in which Mr. Hammond was for the defense. He obtained a new trial in the supreme court, after a heavy verdict for the state, and got a verdict for the defendant, on the second trial. Another case was the state vs. Cox, charged with the murder of Alston. He was convicted, and Mr. Hammond was selected, by five or six prominent lawyers who represented Cox, to argue his case in the supreme court. He obtained a strong dissenting opinion from Chief Justice Warner, on which Cox was pardoned. Mr. Hammond was highly complimented by the supreme court in both these cases, Judge Warner having said that his argument in the Cox case was the finest he had ever heard. These cases attracted a great deal of attention, and his management of them made him a great reputation and character as a lawyer throughout the state. After leaving the bench he formed a partnership with Judge John I. Hall, the present assistant attorney-general of the United States. Judge Hammond was elected a member of the board of education of the city of Atlanta in 1887, for a term of six years, and was subsequently re-elected in 1893, serving with pay. His work on the board has demonstrated his abiding love for the public school system of Atlanta, and his desire to elevate the masses by giving to all the wholesome advantages of a good education. Judge Hammond is a man of deep religious convictions, and has always been active in the affairs of his church. He is chairman of the board of trustees of Trinity church, and is also chairman of the board of stewards. In addition to these religious offices Judge Hammond is a life trustee of Wesleyan Female college, the oldest institution of its kind in the world. He is also president of the board of trustees of the Atlanta Dental college, and a member of the board of trustees of the colored branch of the state university, located in Savannah, Ga. Judge Hammond has always taken a profound interest in this work, and has made it a matter of careful study. He has also been engaged, as a prominent factor, in some of the leading enterprises of the city. In the early period of his professional life Judge Hammond was united in marriage to Miss Laura Rawson, the daughter of Hon. E. E. Rawson, one of the most prominent and enterprising citizens of Atlanta. In his private, as well as in his professional life the career of Judge Hammond has been above reproach, and his integrity has never been assailed. The firm of Hall & Hammond is one of the ablest in the state, and controls an extensive general practice, not only in Atlanta but throughout the state. His success as a practitioner, with his natural business capacity, has brought Judge Hammond a handsome competence, and in the financial world he enjoys a high rating. He exercises the same prudence, consideration and sagacity in his business interests that he brings to bear in his profession, and with a corresponding result. Judge Hammond is held in the highest esteem by all classes and his career of public service has not only been one of honor to himself but of usefulness to the community.

DR. VIRGIL O. HARDON, the son of Betsy (Packard) and Charles W. Hardon, both of Massachusetts, was born in Mansfield, Mass., March 13, 1851, and removed, when four years of age, to Providence, R. I., where he attended the public schools and received his early training. From here he went to Brown university, taking a two years' course in the academical department, and after its completion, taught school for two years in East Providence. Here he conceived the idea of becoming a physician, and having excellent opportunities when not engaged in school duties, applied himself constantly to the study of medicine; but finding that self-instruction made slow progress, he became a student in the Harvard medical school, spent one and a half years as interne in the Rhode Island hospital at Providence, and finally went to New York, where he attended the Bellevue Hospital Medical college and graduated in 1874. Selecting Providence as his field of labor he practiced his profession there until 1881, and then came south, settling in Savannah. There he did not continue practice, but entered the mercantile firm of Solomon & Co. After remaining here for some months, he decided that Atlanta afforded more encouragement to young men and removed to that city, accepting a position with Messrs. Pemberton, Iverson & Co. Shortly after he became chief bookkeeper for John B. Daniel, the wholesale druggist. Finding this constant confinement injurious to his health, Dr. Hardon became traveling salesman for Messrs. Hail & Ruckel, of New York. Since resigning that position he has been in the active practice of medicine in the city of Atlanta. Dr. Hardon is widely known throughout the state among the members of his profession, and takes great interest in all organizations controlled by them. He is a member of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the State Medical association, the Southern Surgical and Gynecological, and the American Gynecological societies, and for five consecutive years has acted as censor in the former association. For two years he filled the presidency of the Atlanta Society of Medicine. Dr. Hardon does not confine his enthusiasm and knowledge of medicine to practical experience alone, but in the broader scope of its literature has displayed a keen interest and contributed numerous articles to the various medical journals of the country, chief among them the "American Journal of Obstetrics" and the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal." In addition to the honors bestowed upon him in recognition of professional skill and learning, he is a zealous Christian worker and a vestryman of St. Philip's Episcopal church. Dr. Hardon now holds the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in the Atlanta Medical college. His career has been successful from its beginning, and is the result of untiring energy, close, assiduous study and a persevering devotion to duty. One of the best methods of ascertaining a professional man's true worth is to learn the opinion held of him by his colleagues. One of Atlanta's most prominent physicians is quoted as saying: "Dr. Hardon has made an enviable reputation in his especial line of work, obstetrics and gynecology, and is widely known throughout the state and beyond its boundaries. He is a bold and successful surgeon, a very accurate diagnostician and a conscientious man; one who shrinks not from the many unpleasant obligations of the profession. He is a quiet, reserved and generous gentleman, making and holding friends. He is a fluent talker, and in the medical societies of which he is a member, is one of the best impromptu speakers who discuss the essays presented for consideration. His argument is clear and concise, and his thoughts arranged as promptly as though carefully prepared in advance." Dr. Hardon was married Jan. 1, 1885, to Miss Julia A. Robinson, who died in 1891. He was married again Dec. 27, 1892, to Miss Bertha Wardell, of Bainbridge, Ga. They have no children.

NATHAN OVERTON HARRIS, M. D., was born in Culpeper county, Va., Dec. 4, 1851. During the late war he removed with his parents to Atlanta, Ga., where he was raised and educated. In 1868, he went to Covington, Ky., where he attended school one year and then returned to Atlanta, where during the following year he pursued a course of study at the Houston street high school. He next entered the office of his father, who at that time was sheriff of Fulton county, where he remained four years. After clerking a year in Atlanta he commenced the study of medicine under Dr. T. S. Powell, and was graduated from the Southern Medical college, in Atlanta, in 1881. After graduating he practiced medicine in Atlanta eighteen months, and during three months of that time had charge of the small pox hospital in that city, where he treated two hundred small pox patients. His duties at the hospital were so exacting that he found it necessary to deny himself the ordinary physical comforts of life; and for two months he was compelled to seek such brief moments of rest as nature demanded, without removing his clothing. In 1882 he went to New York, where one year later he was graduated from the Bellevue Hospital Medical college, and returned to Atlanta, where he has since been engaged in the practice of medicine. In 1888, he was assistant professor to the chair of obstetrics and diseases of women and children in the Atlanta Medical college. Dr. Harris is a member of the Georgia Medical association and of the National Association of Railway Surgeons and of the American Medical association. He is medical examiner for the Aetna Life Insurance company of Hartford, Conn.; the Equitable of New York; the Union Mutual of Portland, Me.; American Union Life Insurance company; Michigan Mutual Life Insurance company; the Providence Savings of New York; the Phoenix Mutual of Hartford, Conn., and for the endowment rank, section 611, Knights of Pythias. He is also chief surgeon for the Georgia, Carolina & Northern division of the Seaboard Air Line (260 miles). He is police surgeon, and is city physician for the sixth ward of Atlanta, and surgeon Fourth battalion, Georgia volunteers. In 1886, Dr. Harris was chosen president of the Atlanta Society of Medicine for one year; and since that time he has been corresponding secretary of that society. He belongs to the Knights of Pythias and has held the chairs in Atlanta lodge No. 20, K. P. He was a delegate to the grand lodge, which met at Brunswick, Ga., in 1891. He is also a member of St. Phillip's church (Episcopal). The father of Dr. Harris was James O. Harris, who was born in Albemarle county, Va., in 1820, and married in Culpeper county, in that state, to Miss Elizabeth A., daughter of Daniel and Lucy (Powell) Brown. He moved to Culpeper county, where he was elected sheriff in 1856; the first man elected to that office who was not a native of the county. In 1863, James O. Harris moved to Atlanta and engaged in mercantile pursuits until 1866, when he was appointed deputy internal revenue collector, which office he held until 1868, when, while absent from home, he was elected sheriff of Fulton county. He served as sheriff for two terms, and one year. In 1874 he was elected city marshal of Atlanta, and at the expiration of his term he served one year as deputy city marshal. He was next elected state and county tax receiver, which office he held continuously until his death in 1891. James O. Harris had four children: Dr. Nathan O., Atlanta; Lucy Powell, who died unmarried in 1881, aged twenty-seven years; Clement Rush, who, in 1884, married Miss Sallie, daughter of Jackson Dick of Tennessee, real estate broker, Atlanta, and Daniel Brown Harris, who married Miss Bessie Sargeant, daughter of Hon. N. J. Hammond, Atlanta, adjuster and special agent for the North America Fire Insurance company of Philadelphia, Pa. The father of Dr. Harris served in the Thirteenth Virginia regiment during the first six months of the late war between the states. His grandfather was Nathan Harris, who was born in Albemarle county, Va., in 1772; he was a man of large wealth and a gentleman farmer during his life, and owned many slaves. He never held office. He married Ann Allen Anderson, and six children were born of this marriage: Dr. Clement Rush Harris, deceased in 1869; Elizabeth, wife of a Mr. Hutchins; Fanny, deceased wife of William Davis, of Rockbridge county, Va.; James O. Harris, deceased 1891; Judge John T. Harris, who has served seven terms in congress, and now living in Harrisonburg, Va., and Rev. Dr. William A. Harris, now president of Virginia college at Roanoke, Va., and for twenty-six years president of the Western Female college at Staunton, Va. Nathan Harris died in 1853, aged eighty-one. Dr. Nathan O. Harris was married April 8, 1885, to Lula S., daughter of Maj. Rufus S. Tucker, of Raleigh, N. C.; this lady died without issue April 23, 1886.

JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, the author of Uncle Remus and numerous other stories of southern life and character, is a native of Putnam county, Ga. He was born in the town of Eatonton in 1848, and spent most of his boyhood there. Circumstances forced him to leave school at an early age, and while still a mere child he learned the printer's trade in the office of "The Countryman," a popular weekly which was then published on a plantation several miles from any town. The proprietor of the paper had a fine library, and the boy was given free access to it. From these books he picked up the elements of an education which has carried him through a successful literary and journalistic career.

After leaving "The Countryman," while still in his teens, young Harris worked in a country newspaper office at Forsyth, Ga., and then accepted an editorial position on a monthly in New Orleans for a short time. In 1868 he accepted a position on the editorial staff of the "Savannah Morning News," and remained there until the yellow fever epidemic of 1876, which caused him to remove to Atlanta. He joined the editorial staff of the "Atlanta Constitution," and for the past nineteen years has been the leading editorial writer on that paper. Before moving to Atlanta he married Miss Essie La Rose of Canada. Mr. Harris resides at West End in a picturesque cottage, brightened by the presence of his wife and five children, one of whom, Julian Harris, is the book reviewer of the "Constitution," and the author of many charming short stories.

Mr. Harris was so successful with his first book, Uncle Remus, that the public demanded something more from his pen, and his leisure hours are now devoted to literary work for various publishers. His books have had a large sale in England as well as in this country, and he is one of the most popular of American story writers. He rarely ever travels, and is noted for his love of home and family and his loyalty to his friends. He takes an active interest in politics and the leading issues of the day, and his writings upon these topics would fill many volumes. The ease with which he turns from his routine editorial work to literature is a mystery to his contemporaries. In the main his life has been peaceful and uneventful. He has succeeded in his modest ambitions, and is now in his prime, with the promise of many more years of useful and brilliant work.

MR. Z. D. HARRISON, attorney-at-law and clerk of the supreme court, Atlanta, Fulton Co. The plantation has been the foster-mother of hundreds of Georgia's most successful and enterprising citizens. Amid the honors which have come to them, in reward of the tireless energy and fervent zeal put forth by them in quest of life's ambitious enterprises, they never forget the arcadian days of their boyhood and happy times they enjoyed down on the old farm.

It was on a farm in Randolph county, Ga., that Zadoc D. Harrison, the clerk of the supreme court of Georgia, first saw the light of day on November 26, 1842. His father, Hon. George W. Harrison, was one of the leading men of the state, and filled the high office of secretary of state for two terms prior to his death. He came to Georgia from North Carolina, having been reared among the pine trees of the tar-heel commonwealth. He died in this state in 1854. The mother of Col. Harrison is a woman of superior mind and character. Her maiden namé was Frances West, and she was born and reared in this state. She is still alive at the age of eighty-seven years in full possession of all her faculties.

Mr. Harrison remained on the plantation until 1850, when his father moved to Milledgeville, after his election as secretary of state. Milledgeville was then the capital of the state, and the duties of secretary of state called Mr. Harrison's father to that city. Here the subject of this sketch received his primary education under the direction of Prof. A. L. Carrington, a noted instructor of that time. In 1859 he matriculated as a student in Oglethorpe university, and remained a student in this institution until its suspension at the breaking out of the war. Mr. Harrison volunteered as a soldier in the Confederate army, but his elder brother having substituted in his stead, he entered the office of his father's successor as secretary of state at Milledgeville, and remained in that employment for one year. He taught school at Clinton, Ga., for several years, after which he came to Atlanta, a busy, enterprising city that was rapidly advancing to the front. Soon after coming to Atlanta, in 1868, he was appointed deputy clerk of the supreme court, and after holding this position two years he was elected clerk, which office he still continues to hold.

Mr. Harrison began the study of law in the office of the late William McKinley at Milledgeville. He was admitted to the bar in 1866, and two years later formed a legal partnership with Judge William T. Newman, now on the bench of the United States district court. This partnership continued until Judge Newman's appointment as city attorney. Mr. Harrison then practiced alone for several years, after which the present firm of Harrison & Peeples was organized, the junior member of the firm being Mr. Henry C. Peeples, a talented young lawyer and the son of the late Judge Cincinnatus Peeples.

Mr. Harrison is a director and also the secretary and treasurer of the Southern Marble company. For twenty years he has been a director and vice-president or president of the Franklin Printing and Publishing company, one of the leading publishing houses of the south. In 1872 he was united in marriage to Miss Laura Hendree, the beautiful daughter of Dr. George Hendree of Tuskegee, Ala. Seven children have been the result of this happy union, two boys and five girls. Mr. Harrison is a consistent and loyal churchman; being a member of St. Luke's Episcopal church. He has been the senior warden of St. Luke's cathedral, Atlanta, since 1883; a delegate to every annual diocesan convention since 1873; also a deputy to every general convention since 1881; secretary of the standing committee of the diocese since 1888; and is now the chancellor of the diocese. No man enjoys more fully the esteem of his fellow-citizens than Mr. Harrison, and he has always deported himself in such manner as to merit the respect and confidence of the people of his native state.

COL. GEORGE W. HARRISON is a member of a distinguished Georgia family whose individual members have been prominent in political and social fields, and is himself an example of what energy, self-reliance and broad-minded business policy will accomplish. Few men have been enabled to accomplish in a few years what Col. George W. Harrison has done by business acumen and financial ability. Starting with a printing and publishing business in its infancy, he has steered it through financial depressions affecting the entire country, until it is now one of the largest and best equipped publishing houses in the south. While his duties as general manager are manifold and exacting, demanding a clear head, decision of character and versatility of talent, every detail passes under his supervision, and the character of the work turned out reflects the inspiration of his genius, the excellence of his taste, and the thoroughness of his grasp on business. Included in his duties as general manager of the Franklin Printing and Publishing company is that of state printer, an office of honor and great responsibility, which he has held for several successive terms, and manager of the "Southern Cultivator," the "Southern Architect," and the "Southern Educational Journal," each one involving labor, tact and skill. The wise, prudent and successful administration of the affairs of the company has elicited from its members, who embrace some of the strongest and most influential business men in the city in their ranks, the highest encomiums. While Col. Harrison is emphatically a business man, he is at the same time one of Atlanta's most progressive and public-spirited citizens. For a number of years he has been chairman of the statistical committee of the chamber of commerce, chairman of the postal committee of the Commercial club, and by recent appointment is a member of the state commission on irrigation. He has contributed largely to the success of meetings in the interest of agriculture, direct trade, good roads, irrigation and benevolence. While pre-eminently a man of peace, for years he has been one of Gov. Northen's staff officers, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel of cavalry. He has also been complimented by a similar appointment from Gov. W. Y. Atkinson, the compliment being the more marked by the fact that it is unusual for a governor to confer such an honor on the appointee of his predecessor. Col. Harrison is a prominent member of the First Presbyterian church and chairman of its board of deacons. He is considered one of the first citizens of Atlanta, held in high regard by all classes, and loved by his employes, who recognize in him a friend and counselor at all times. He married Miss Lucy Hayden of Atlanta, a member of a family whose connections ramify every section of the Union, embracing the wealthiest and most influential persons in their respective states—a woman whose amiability and excellence illumine and ennoble all around her. There never was a more congenial union, and

"None know them but to love, None name them but to praise."

COL. G. W. HARRISON.

HON. WILLIAM A. HEMPHILL, a capitalist and one of Atlanta's energetic, progressive citizens, whose life has been crowned with the rewards that intellectual power and devotion to duty command, is a native of Georgia's "Classic City." He was born in Athens, May 5, 1842, and reared in the limits of that town, being tutored by excellent teachers and prepared for entrance into the state university, located at his home. Having arrived at the proper age, he entered this institution and graduated in the spring of 1861. He was then a boy, only nineteen years of age, but with the inherent qualities of patriotism and loyalty to section, enlisted as a volunteer in a Confederate regiment, and immediately marched to combine with Lee's army in Virginia. His war record is well and favorably known. In the battle of Gettysburg he was dangerously wounded in the head, but after weeks of suffering and intense pain, finally recovered his former good health. Being a quiet man, of few sentences, he rarely mentions his thrilling experiences, but his friends and comrades appreciate his sacrifice for the Confederate cause. Mr. Hemphill came to Atlanta in 1867, and shortly after established the "Daily Constitution," of which he was business manager. The position was responsible, and required quickness of perception, far-seeing enterprise, and shrewd financial ability to forward the interests of this great daily. Mr. Hemphill has been engaged in enterprises of vast scope and magnitude. His financial sagacity and rigid discipline have been recognized and employed. He was president of the Capital City bank and the Y. M. C. A., a member of the board of aldermen, superintendent of Trinity Sunday-school, promoter of various mercantile interests and charitable societies, and president of the board of education. He generously encouraged Atlanta's school system, and added materially to its excellence. Mr. Hemphill married Mrs. Emma Luckie in 1871, and has a happy, interesting family, with whom he delights in passing much of his valuable time. In the social as in the commercial world he is known and admired. His unstinted aid to benevolent causes and worthy charity has signally enlarged the circle of his friends and supporters. He is not a seeker after office, though his vote and work are heartily given for democracy. Mr. Hemphill loves out-of-door life, and as a Nimrod spends many days in the field with dog and gun to gain recreation and sport. His aim is unerring and his dogs of the best breed. He prides himself on his Jersey cows and the best stock of all species. Mr. Hemphill is an invaluable citizen, with a generous heart, and a strong advocate of education and culture.

JOHN CHAPPELL HENDRIX, real estate, Atlanta, Ga., son of Luke Hendrix, was born in Lumpkin county, Ga., in December, 1834. The family is of Scotch origin; the progenitors of the American branch having emigrated from Scotland to this country, and settled in Maryland in 1665. Capt. Hendrix's grandfather, Hillary Hendrix, was a native of North Carolina, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the Revolutionary war. Capt. Hendrix was raised in Lumpkin county, where he received such education as the schools of the time and locality afforded. In 1859 he came to Atlanta, and after clerking a year went into a general merchandising business. In May, 1861, he entered the quartermaster's department, where he remained three months. He then organized an artillery company—of which he was elected a lieutenant—which was assigned to Wright's Legion. After serving eighteen months with this command he raised a battalion of cavalry—of which he was made ranking captain—practically commanded the battalion as major, though not commissioned. He resigned in May, 1864, on account of impaired health, and was placed on Gov. Brown's staff with the rank of colonel, and served as such until the war closed, surrendering at Macon, where he had been stationed for some time. From September, 1864, to the time of the surrender he owned and ran a newspaper called the "Southern Confederacy." When with his first command he was present at the capture of Fort Pulaski; and with his cavalry command he actively raided on the flanks of the Federal army in North Carolina, East Tennessee and Georgia. He also participated in the battles of Lookout Mountain, Dalton, Resaca, Kingston, Altoona, Kennesaw Mountain, and the opening engagements around Atlanta. He was then transferred to Gov. Brown's staff, on which he remained until the surrender. Capt. Hendrix, though always in active and frequently in perilous service, escaped capture and wounds, but had several horses shot. After the war he returned to Atlanta and commenced the manufacture of machinery, and in 1868, was elected secretary of the senate, which office he held in 1868-69-70. After that he went into the flour milling business, which he followed five years, then engaged in miscellaneous trading. In 1880 he embarked in the real estate business, in which he has since prosperously continued. In 1882 he organized the Mutual Building and Loan association, of which he was elected secretary and treasurer, and served until 1889, when he wound it up. He was a member of the city general council 1889-90; was chairman of the committee on sewers, and during his time had built two main sewers at a cost of $180,000. He was also chairman of the committee on ordinances, and a member of the committees on finance, streets, electric lights, etc. In 1891 Capt. Hendrix was elected a member of the city board of education for six years, and is chairman of the building committee. He is also a director of the Capital City bank. Capt. Hendrix is a man of deep and strong convictions, and though unobtrusive is none the less fearless and inflexible in maintaining them. He is an industrious worker in whatever he undertakes, and persistent in his efforts; and whenever and wherever called on to aid in matters promotive of improvement or development, renders valuable service. Capt. Hendrix was married in Forsyth county, Ga., in 1854, to Miss Mary, daughter of Judge Robert Mooney. Of the children born to them six are living: Samantha, wife of W. H. Smith; Austin L.; Nettie, wife of J. W. Davidson; Georgia, wife of Saxon Douglas; Mamie, wife of A. L. Anderson; Johnnie—a daughter. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and a Royal Arch Mason. He is also an active, exemplary member of the Methodist church, prominent and untiring in all church work, and a generous contributor. He was superintendent of Payne's Chapel Sunday school fourteen years, and has been superintendent of the Sunday school at Grace church twelve years, a position he still holds with unflagging religious zeal and no sign of physical fatigue.

THOMAS J. HIGHTOWER. As a progressive business man and a thoroughly conscientious and upright citizen, this gentleman has always enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the community.

Thomas Jefferson Hightower was born in Parrottsville, East Tennessee, on Oct. 29, 1829. His grandfather, Thomas Hightower, was a native of South Carolina, and a gallant soldier in the American Revolution. His father, Allan Hightower, was also a native of South Carolina and a very successful planter and stock-raiser of that state. The maiden name of Mr. Hightower's mother was Louisa Jefferson. She was a native of Virginia and a member of that distinguished family to which the illustrious Thomas Jefferson belonged.

The boyhood and early youth of Mr. Hightower were spent in his native village in Tennessee, and from the institutions of that neighborhood he derived a common school education. At the age of eighteen he began to shift for himself and settled in Dahlonega for the purpose of digging gold. He failed, however, to gratify his ambition in this direction and decided to abandon the enterprise, since ill-luck had deprived it of all its former fascination. He clerked for a year in a grocery store at Dahlonga, and then located in Forsyth county, a few miles distant, where he found employment as a clerk, retaining his position for four years. After this he clerked in a grocery store in Rome, Ga., for two years. He was then overtaken for the second time by the gold fever, and set out for the mountains of California, going by the way of the Isthmus of Panama and taking a two month's trip. After a rugged experience of two years in the west, dividing his time between the gold fields and a general merchandise business, he returned to Georgia, in 1854, locating in Forsyth county. He was then and there united in marriage to Miss Eliza E. Henderson, a lovable and gentle lady, who died in 1886, leaving seven children, as follows: Milton H., Allan R., Harry H., Thomas J., Jr., John B., Albert S., Ida R., wife of William J. Montgomery, and Mark.

In 1854, the year of his marriage, Mr. Hightower opened a general store in Cherokee county, which he operated until the spring of 1862. He then sold out his business for the purpose of accepting an appointment under the Confederate government in the quartermaster's department, with headquarters located in Atlanta. Here he remained until the close of the war.

After the war he engaged in the grocery business in Atlanta, the firm being that of Ford, Hightower & Co. Their place of business was on Mitchell street. Two years after this Mr. Ford sold out his interest and the business was conducted under the firm name of Hightower & Co. From 1872 to 1876 Mr. Hightower carried on the business alone, forming a partnership with Mr. J. C. Hallman after the expiration of that time. Honest methods and a steadfast devotion to the principles of fair dealings have made the firm of Hightower & Hallman one of the leading wholesale grocery establishments of the south.

Mr. Hightower served as a member of the state senate during the sessions of 1859 and 1860. He has always manifested a deep interest in public affairs but has never allowed his political aspirations to interfere with his business engagements. He prefers the uneventful life of a busy merchant to the more conspicuous role of a public servant. Mr. Hightower is a blue lodge Mason and a consistent member of the First Baptist church. He was married for the second time in December, 1887, to Miss Georgia A. Nichols, a cultured and accomplished young lady of Griffin, Ga., and his home life has been a very happy one. Still vigorous and strong in the enjoyment of a robust constitution, Mr. Hightower has the promise of many additional years in which to illustrate the qualifications of a successful business man.

MR. CHARLES D. HILL. Judged by his official record, as well as by the opinion of the bar and general public, the ablest prosecuting officer in the state is Mr. Charles D. Hill, the brilliant solicitor-general of the Atlanta circuit. Felicitous of speech, quick at repartee, ready at all times with bright and sparkling quotations from his favorite authors, and rich in all the varied resources and accomplishments of the orator, the subject of this sketch stands without a peer among the able and distinguished prosecuting officers of Georgia. Mr. Hill possesses a peculiar mind. It is not only quick in its perceptions, but remarkably firm in its retentiveness. He never makes a note in the trial of any case, however important it may be, and never mistakes the evidence in the argument of his cause to the jury. His preparations are purely mental and in none of his great speeches has he employed the use of a pencil. Perhaps no lawyer at the bar possesses a more prodigious memory. Judge Richard H. Clarke, who has presided over nearly all the criminal proceedings in which Mr. Hill has been engaged during his official tenure, and whose opinion of his talents is based upon the severe and oft recurring tests of the court-room, says of Solicitor Hill: "He is very much like his distinguished father. I consider him one of the brightest men I have ever known. Judges frequently complain of the tedium of the court-room and the tiresome monotony of worn-out jokes and flights of eloquence on the part of their prosecuting officers, but I have never had reason to make this complaint against Mr. Hill." The varied experience of Judge Clarke, extending over a period of more than fifty years at the bar and on the bench, increases the value of this compliment and makes it one of which Mr. Hill has every reason to be proud. Mr. Charles D. Hill, the subject of this sketch, was born near La Grange, in Troup Co., Ga., on Nov. 3, 1852. His father, the late lamented senator, Benjamin H. Hill, one of the most gifted and patriotic men that Georgia ever produced, had just entered public life as a member of the Georgia legislature and was beginning to electrify the country with that surpassing eloquence that was destined a few years later to hurl its bitter denunciations in the teeth of the plumed military of the government, and to plead for a restored union in the spirit of that often quoted sentiment: "We are in the house of our fathers and we are here to stay, thank God." After spending his boyhood days in Troup county, Charles D., in 1867, moved to Athens, Ga., with his father's family, and shortly afterward entered the law school of the state university. He graduated from this institution in 1871. Among his classmates were Washington Dessau and Walter B. Hill, of Macon; his brother, Benjamin H. Hill; Charles W. Seidell, of Atlanta; W. A. Broughton, of Madison, and Robert Whitfield, of Milledgeville, a group of brainy and successful young Georgians. Mr. Hill was admitted to the bar in Twiggs county, and after practicing for two years, with discouraging results, he decided to abandon the profession. Having a penchant for farming, he decided to devote himself to agricultural pursuits, and accordingly purchased a farm and continued to follow the plow until the death of his father in 1882. This afflictive dispensation called him to Atlanta and, after his father's death, he decided to resume the profession which had now become to him a solemn legacy. He assisted his brother in the prosecution of quite a large number of criminal cases, making a brilliant reputation by his eloquence and adroit legal manipulations. In 1885 he was called to the solicitorship of the Atlanta circuit, and has since been several times successively elected to the high and responsible position. Since entering upon the discharge of his duty as the state's prosecuting attorney, Mr. Hill has been a terror to evil doers and while he claims that he has never convicted an innocent man it is equally true that a guilty one has rarely ever escaped. Mr. Hill has been identified with a number of celebrated murder trials and his speeches delivered on those occasions have been masterpieces of forensic eloquence. The court-room is always crowded to overflowing as soon as the report spreads that Solicitor Hill is about to make his closing speech to the jury. No man is more truly the idol of his friends or more conspicuously the life and center of every group in which he happens to be found than Mr. Hill. His humor is always captivating, and his wit lively, good-natured and sparkling. He has very little artificial reserve and speaks with frankness and candor, never hesitating to give his opinion freely on any subject. Generous, open-hearted, indulgent and kind, he is one of the best of husbands as well as one of the cleverest and truest of men. Mr. Hill has frequently been urged to allow the use of his name in connection with the race for congress in the fifth district, but he has steadily declined to yield to the earnest solicitations of his friends. He is now in partnership with his brother, under the firm name of Messrs. B. H. & C. D. Hill, and prefers to devote his time and talents exclusively to the practice of his profession.

GEORGE HILLYER.

WILLIAM PINCKNEY HILL, of the law firm of Hill & Mayson, Atlanta, was born on a farm in Troup county, Ga., May 14, 1862, remaining there until the age of fourteen years, receiving his primary education in the near-by schools and at West Point, in his native county. In 1877 he entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., but his attendance was for only a short time. His elder brother died two months after his matriculation, and his father having died in 1875, and William P., the subject of this sketch, being the oldest male representative of the family, he returned home to assume the management of the plantation. It was not until 1879 that he could return to Emory college, when entering the freshman class he continued for four years, graduating in 1883 with the degree of A. B. Soon after he accepted the chair of Latin and English literature in Milan college, Tennessee, which was tendered him in acknowledgment of his distinction in these departments. Here he remained one year, when he resigned to accept a better position, as the principal of the Fredonia academy at Fredonia, Ala., which he retained for a year and a half. He had begun the study of law after graduating, and on leaving Fredonia he came to Atlanta and was admitted to the bar in June, 1885. For eighteen months he practiced alone; but on Jan. 1, 1887, he formed a partnership with James Mayson, which still continues. Mr. Hill is a democrat in his political convictions, and in 1890 was elected president of the Young Men's Democratic league, serving one year. In 1892, without his knowledge or consent, he was elected a member of the city council of Atlanta, and perceiving the honor was sincere, accepted the commission and served two years. Mr. Hill was married during September, 1891, to Miss Grace D., daughter of Judge William R. Cocke, of Albemarle county, Va. He is a Mystic Shriner and a Knight Templar Mason. In both he has displayed a conspicuous concern. Mr. Hill's father was Dr. John Stith Hill, born in Jasper county, Ga., in 1822. He was the next oldest brother of the late eminent Benjamin H. Hill, one of the south's greatest sons, whose sketch appears elsewhere in these Memoirs. He came to Troup county in his infancy with his parents, who located where the son was born. He was a physician of ability, having graduated in medicine from schools both in New Orleans and in New York. He practiced in Troup county until forty-five years old, when he retired to farming, which he followed to the time of his death in 1875. He was a brave, fearless soldier in the last war and held many positions of responsibility as surgeon, in the hospitals and elsewhere. He also took an active part in state politics; was a member of the state senate before the war, and of the lower house after peace was restored. Mr. Hill's mother, Sarah Battle Cameron, was a child of Thomas Cameron, a native of North Carolina, of Scotch descent, belonging to the clan Cameron. She gave birth to four children: Edward C.; Julia, widow of Dr. Charles Hill of La Grange, Ga.; Minnie, wife of Todd Reed of Troup county and William P., the subject of this sketch. The mother died in 1890. Mr. Hill's grandfather was John Hill, born in North Carolina and married there to Sarah Parham. Some time thereafter they removed to Jasper county, Ga. Mr. Hill's great-grandfather was a Welshman. The firm of Hill & Mayson is well and favorably known to the people of Atlanta. They pay particular attention to commercial law and litigated estates, especially to the former.

JUDGE GEORGE HILLYER, one of the south's most prominent lawyers, is a native of Athens, Ga., where he lived until he was twelve years old. He attended the primary schools of that city, amongst them one presided over by Dr. William H. Felton, so long a member of congress from the Seventh district of Georgia. At the age of thirteen young Hillyer was taken by his father to Walton county, where they lived on a farm near the county seat, Monroe, and the boy was prepared for college at the grammar school taught by Hon. W. W. Thomas, who for many years represented Coweta county in the state legislature. In 1850 Judge Hillyer entered Mercer university, then located at Penfield, Ga., but afterward moved to Macon; and graduated in July, 1854, ranking high in all his classes, especially in mathematics. Having brought his course of education to this successful issue he began the study of law with his father, Hon. Junius Hillyer, at Monroe, and in 1855 was admitted to the bar before Hon. James Jackson, then presiding over the Walton county superior court. Locating then in Monroe, Judge Hillyer practiced until the beginning of the war, for the first two years with his father, and afterward in partnership with Hon. Hope Hull. Answering the call he left his practice and organized the first company raised in Walton county, and was made its captain. His company was assigned to the Ninth Georgia regiment, and was known as Company C, or the Hillyer rifles. Capt. Hillyer served as captain of his company until October, 1863, and between that date and the surrender he served the state as auditor of the old Western & Atlantic railroad, and as major commanding a battalion of state troops. He participated in the battles of Dam No. 1, in Virginia in 1862; Garnett's farm; Suffolk, Va.; Fredericksburg, Va., and at Gettysburg, where he lost killed, wounded or captured every man of his company but ten. He was also in the siege at Charleston, S. C. At the close of the war Judge Hillyer settled at Atlanta and resumed the practice of law, operating alone until 1867, when he associated with him his brother Henry, which partnership existed till 1892, when it was dissolved by agreement, and Mr. Hillyer allied himself with Blewett Lee, a son of general Stephen D. Lee. They practiced together for eighteen months, their contract being then abrogated by reason of Mr. Lee's being tendered a professorship in the Northwestern university of Chicago. Judge Hillyer then formed a partnership with Messrs. Hooper Alexander and W. W. Lambdin, the firm style now being Hillyer, Alexander & Lambdin. Born in 1835 Judge Hillyer entered the political arena at an early age, being in 1857 elected to the legislature from Walton county, and at that session served on the committees on general judiciary, finance and lunatic asylums. Receiving still further political preferment, he was in 1859 and 1860 chief clerk of the house of representatives, and, as related, in 1864-5 served his state as auditor of the Western & Atlantic railroad. Four years later he was one of three commissioners chosen by the legislature on a non-partisan basis—Judge Hillyer being the democratic member—to audit all claims against this railway company. This commission found that it had over 1,200 suits and claims to audit—the aggregate amount involved being nearly $2,000,000. The commissioners, however, managed to settle them all for about one-fifth of the sums claimed, and after the work was finished their conduct was indorsed in a special message to the legislature by Gov. James M. Smith, and later approved by that body. From 1870 to 1874 Judge Hillyer was a member of the state senate from the Thirty-fifth district, which embraced Fulton, Clayton and Cobb counties. It was during the sessions held at this time that the state was rehabilitated from the errors and oppression of reconstruction, and no man took a more active or more vigilant part than Senator Hillyer in the legislative good work of restoring the state to democratic supremacy and good government, and to the recovering of that which had been lost by error and bad management of the state's finances, railways and other public works. In 1877 he was appointed judge of the superior court of Fulton county by Gov. A. H. Colquitt and was thereafter twice re-elected by the legislature to the same judicial position, on each occasion every vote being cast on his behalf. At the beginning of his third term as judge of the superior court he resigned, having determined to resume his practice, and two years later—in 1885—he was elected mayor of Atlanta by an overwhelming majority, the term of office extending over two years. In this connection it will be well to explain Judge Hillyer's former connection with the city's business and the prominent part he had formerly played in its municipal management. When the new charter of Atlanta was formulated by the citizens' committee of forty-nine, in 1874, during the administration of C. C. Hammond, then mayor, Judge Hillyer was one of the sub-committee on finance which originated and drafted the section of the new charter relating to the municipality's financial system, public credit and annual budget and exacting personal liability of the members of the city council. Under the old charter the council of Atlanta had been spending money for various purposes as the occasion arose, with little regard to the municipal income. The result was a yearly deficiency which went over from year to year and accumulated until it threatened the city with bankruptcy. Under the new charter, in the securing of which Judge Hillyer took such an active, prominent part the members of the council are compelled to make up an annual budget, estimating the necessary outlay for all purposes for the coming year and then arrange to meet the expense. The new charter further provided that members of the city council should be personally liable for all moneys expended by them over and above the amount provided for in their annual budget. The effect of this clause in the charter was at once to renew and revive the sinking credit of the city and to increase the value of her bonds. This explains fully the significance of the words "personal liability" used above. Being a member of the state senate at the time of the new charter's formulation, Judge Hillyer was intrusted with the duty of introducing into that body a bill to secure its adoption. He had charge of this measure and through his efforts its passage by both houses was accomplished. The financial clauses of this bill are in Judge Hillyer's own handwriting; and the charters of many other places have been modeled after it. Since leaving the mayor's office in 1887 Judge Hillyer has been a member of the water commission of Atlanta and most of the time its president. He was at its head during almost the entire period in which Atlanta's magnificent system of waterworks was being built. In this great work he takes unbounded pride, having devoted much time and attention to securing the full fruition of all the plans for supplying the city with water which were indorsed by the people. He has never undertaken the accomplishment of any project in which he did not succeed, and the universal verdict is that Atlanta got in her waterworks, costing $850,000, a plant which in other cities has usually cost twice as much or more. Judge Hillyer's life has been an unusually busy one. In addition to his successful transaction of the work noted, it is conceded that no public servant ever performed his duty with more fidelity and public appreciation than he did while a member of the commission which righted the Western & Atlantic railway. He was appointed in 1873 by Gov. Smith centennial commissioner from Georgia, and fulfilled the duties of that office for three years. For two decades he was a director of the Georgia railroad and banking company, retiring from the directorate and selling his stock in 1891. Going back to 1884 we find him serving in the national democratic convention, which nominated Grover Cleveland, as a delegate from the Fifth congressional district of Georgia. In that historic meeting he introduced the first and only "simon-pure" tariff-for-revenue-only resolution that was offered in open convention. He was again a delegate from the same district to the national convention of 1892. Looking back still farther he represented the old Sixth district of his state at the convention which met in Charleston in 1860. There he earnestly advocated the nomination of Howell Cobb for president. In social life he is very highly esteemed. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the Second Baptist church, with which he has been associated for the past forty years. Judge Hillyer was married June, 1867, to Miss Ellen, daughter of Hollis Cooley, Rome, Ga., and they have five children: Elizabeth, wife of Francis M. Coker, Jr., Atlanta; Minnie, wife of H. A. Cassin, cashier of the Georgia loan, savings and banking company; Marian, wife of Dr. Bernard Wolff of Atlanta; George, a graduate of the university of Georgia, Athens, at this writing a student of electrical engineering at Cornell; Ellen, unmarried. Judge George Hillyer's father was Junius Hillyer, a native of Wilkes county, Ga., who in turn was the son of Shaler Hillyer. The latter came to Georgia from Connecticut in 1796. Shaler Hillyer's father was Asa Hillyer, a surgeon in the continental army, who served through the whole war of the revolution. The emigrant ancestor was John Hillyer, who came to New England about ten years after the landing of the Mayflower and settled at Granby, Conn., where he lived until his death, which occurred some twenty years later. Judge Hillyer's mother was Jane Watkins, daughter of Thomas Watkins. She was a lineal descendant of the early colonist of that name who came with Capt. John Smith and landed near Jamestown, Va., in 1620. One of George Hillyer's maternal uncles, after whom he is named, was George Walton, a signer of the Declaration of Independence; and another maternal uncle, of the generation younger, was Peter Early, who was governor of Georgia during the war period of 1812-1814. Junius Hillyer died in 1886 at the age of seventy-nine, and left three sons besides the subject of this sketch, Dr. E. Hillyer of Rome, Mr. Henry Hillyer named above, and Mr. Carlton Hillyer, auditor of the Georgia railroad at Augusta. Rev. John F. Hillyer, brother of Junius Hillyer, was a Baptist minister, active and faithful for nearly seventy years, who died in Texas when eighty-nine years old. Another brother of Rev. Dr. Shaler G. Hillyer, now residing in Atlanta. He also chose the ministry as his profession and has served therein steadily for sixty-four years. Judge George Hillyer, subject of this sketch, the second son of Junius Hillyer, is one of the best known lawyers of the south. The points noted above indicate that he has enjoyed a remarkable career, of which the full fruition has been achieved through an indomitable will and the sturdiest of determinations to succeed.

JUDGE JAMES KOLLOCK HINES, of the law firm of Hines & Hale, was born on a farm in Burke county, Ga., Nov. 18, 1852. He remained here the first nine years of his life and spent his youth in Washington county, Ga. He attended the country schools located there, and by manual labor in connection with his studies acquired the robust constitution that adds vigor to manhood. He entered Emory college, at Oxford, Ga., during August, 1869, and after a record of close application graduated in 1872, with first honors and the degree of Arts Bachelor. From there he went to the law department of Harvard university in 1873, and when the course was completed returned to Georgia, locating in Savannah. In the "Forest City" he first undertook the study of law, continuing for four months of 1873, and then put out his "shingle" and prosecuted his profession until August, 1875, removing at that date to Sandersville, Ga. In this town he resided sixteen years and came thereafter to Atlanta. On January 23, 1877, Judge Hines was appointed solicitor-general of the middle judicial circuit of Georgia by Gov. Alfred H. Colquitt, retaining this office four years. In October, 1884, he was elected to the legislature from Washington county, and served one term. By the general assembly he was chosen judge of the middle judicial circuit in November, 1886, and presided on that bench for four years. Judge Hines is a steward in the First Methodist church of Atlanta, and a tireless worker for religious causes. He was married, first in January, 1879, to Belle, daughter of the late Col. Thomas Evans of South Carolina. She died in 1884, leaving two daughters. He was again married Dec. 28, 1885, to Cora L., daughter of the late Dr. William G.

McBride of Washington county, Ga. By this last wife he has been blessed also with two daughters. Judge Hines had not taken a great interest in politics until the spring of 1894, when he was nominated by the populists to oppose the democratic nominee for Georgia's gubernatorial chair. Although defeated, he ran an excellent race, that was lauded for the high plan on which his campaign was conducted. He did not appeal to the prejudices of the people, but considered only public questions and national issues. His speeches resulted in making a large number of new and staunch friends. He is a gifted orator, and on the "stump" is invincible. The arguments as presented by him are comprehensible and plain and convincing. His father was Joseph H. Hines, a native of Georgia. He was a farmer, a lumberman, a brave soldier in the latter half of the civil war and at one time occupied a seat in the legislature as representative from Burke county. He died in October, 1871. His grandfather was Howell Hines, a native of North Carolina, and an extensive planter, who was, for a number of years, justice of the peace in Effingham county, Ga. His great-grandfather was David Hines, a Virginia gentleman who figured prominently in the revolutionary war. The Hines family is of Scotch-Presbyterian origin. The descendants emigrated to America from the north of Ireland. Judge Hines controls a large, extended practice. As a successful lawyer and courteous gentleman he is highly esteemed.

HON. JOSEPH HIRSCH is one of the most distinguished exponents of Georgia's Hebrew citizenship. Mr. Hirsch has accomplished more in behalf of true charity than any man in the state. He has not only given with a liberal hand to the enterprises of his own people, but in the illustration of the broadest public spirit, he has labored for the welfare of the whole community, including both Jew and Gentile. His magnificent contribution to the Grady hospital and his unremitting efforts in behalf of that institution have made it a lasting monument to his memory, and his services will be gratefully remembered as long as the Grady hospital continues to perform its mission of charity. Though Mr. Hirsch has been identified with this country to such a marked extent as to suggest an American nativity, he is nevertheless of foreign birth. He was born in the German empire in 1845, and the entire period of his boyhood was spent under the flag of that country. His father was a very successful merchant, and the influence of parental example, as well as the instinct of heredity, had much to do with the character of Mr. Hirsch and with his subsequent career as a business man. Even at school his ideas were suggestive of the business aptitude that was destined to distinguish him in later life, and it was only by exercising the greatest amount of effort that he succeeded in fixing his mind upon his text books. Germany, at this time, though one of the foremost countries of Europe, was not by any means as attractive to the ambitious young man as the republic beyond the waters, and, after reaching the age of mature decision, Mr. Hirsch resolved to cast his lot in the new world. He believed that fortunes could be achieved with greater ease in America than in Germany, and accordingly in 1860, being still a mere lad, he purchased a ticket and embarked for the shores of this country. In due course of time he arrived in New York, only to find the country agitated and disturbed by the imminence of civil war. It was out of the question for him to return home, and he had no alternative but to face the perils of the situation. He remained in the north for only a short while. Coming directly to Georgia, he settled in the little town of Marietta, Ga., a cultured and enterprising center of business activity, and remained there for a while in the capacity of a clerk. Leaving Marietta he went to Acworth, a few miles to the north, where one of his older brothers was engaged in business. Here he remained for several months, but realizing that his business education was deficient, in respect to the peculiar methods of this country, he set out for Philadelphia, Penn., in order to perfect himself in bookkeeping. He entered one of the principal business colleges of that city, and after several months of diligent application, he left the college an accomplished bookkeeper. He first stopped at Wheeling, W. Va., but he was not satisfied with that place and he came on to Atlanta. He arrived in that city in 1867. It was then suffering from the ravages of Gen. Sherman and was lying prostrate in the dust and ashes. He recognized the fact, however, that Atlanta was destined to become the business center of the south, and for that reason he decided to cast his fortunes in that city. Under the firm name of M. & J. Hirsch he and his brother organized a clothing establishment, and continued to operate in that line of business until the firm was recognized as the leading wholesale and retail clothing establishment in the city. In 1878 the retail feature of the business was dropped and they entered the wholesale trade exclusively. The success of these sterling business men was achieved by the adoption and rigid enforcement of simple rules of faithful attention to business, and square, honest and open-handed methods in dealing with the large trade that came to them in the course of years. Mr. Hirsch first came into public notice as a friend of charity, at the beginning of the movement to erect a Hebrew orphans' home. In addition to a handsome sum of money, he gave to that enterprise the unstinted labor of a whole year. The success of this movement was no sooner assured than a similar enterprise was inaugurated for the erection of the Grady hospital. Mr. Hirsch had been a warm, personal friend of Mr. Grady, and no man in Atlanta was more anxious to perpetuate the fame and memory of that lamented Georgian than Mr. Hirsch. The proposition to erect a city hospital pleased Mr. Hirsch, and he decided to do all in his power to insure the success of this movement. Notwithstanding his contribution to the Hebrew Orphans' home he donated a magnificent sum to the Grady hospital and gave the movement a splendid start. But his interest in the hospital did not cease with this monetary assistance. He became the life and center of the movement; he engineered the work, and devoted himself night and day to the success of this great enterprise. He was frequently dismayed by the outlook, but in spite of discouraging circumstances, the building was finally completed and dedicated to the cause of charity. The hospital has grown into one of the leading institutions of the south, and the fame of Mr. Hirsch has spread throughout the length and breadth of the country. A large crayon portrait of Mr. Hirsch is one of the ornaments of the public reception room of the Grady hospital. Among the distinguished men who have sounded the praises of Mr. Hirsch is Thomas Nelson Page, the brilliant author. In every part of the land the name of this good and useful citizen and friend of charity is mentioned with honor. Mr. Hirsch has always evinced a deep interest in the public schools of Atlanta, and for years has been an influential and active member of the board of education. He frequently visits the schools and is a great favorite with the teachers and children. Two or three years ago Mr. Hirsch was elected to a seat in the city council. He made a watchful servant of the people and espoused every movement that sought to promote the welfare of the city. He served on various important committees, and such was the excellent record made by him in that body that recently, as a compliment to his ability, he was elected to a seat on the aldermanic board. In this capacity Mr. Hirsch has continued to serve the city with marked zeal and fidelity. He is chairman of the committee on sewers, and is also a member of the committees on printing and schools. He is now interested in the erection of the Alabama street bridge, and proposes to agitate and urge the matter until the bridge is eventually erected. Mr. Hirsch is fond of his home fireside and has an interesting family, composed of a wife and three children, as follows: Lala, wife of A. L. Weil, of Savannah; Jacob H., and Milton. Surrounded by these he forgets the cares and vexations of the business world, and is conscious only of the happiness that belongs to an ideal and loving household.

DR. ARTHUR G. HOBBS, a leading oculist and aurist of Atlanta, was born in the Blue Grass state of Kentucky, about forty years ago. His father, an ardent student of medicine, and a long experienced practitioner, desired that his son should assume the responsibilities of the same profession. From his earliest years he manifested an inclination for this science and that he should select it as his life mission seemed only natural. After completing his academic studies he entered Center college, and then went to the medical department of the Louisville university and after a three years' course, graduated with honors. His ambition was to finally confine himself to eye, ear and throat work when he had gained sufficient experience as a general practitioner, so he moved to Petersburg, Ind., about fifty miles from his old home, where he prosecuted a general practice for three or four years, when he went to New York to perfect his knowledge of the eye, throat and ear. While there he had valuable experience in the hospitals of the city, for being a close observer his information rapidly increased. He studied under the eminent physicians, Drs. Noyes, Agnew, Bosworth, Heitzman and Mittendorf. Dr. Hobbs came to Atlanta in 1881, a total stranger, unacquainted with any citizen of the state. His genial disposition and warm-hearted courtesy soon attracted friends, and a character that association appreciates retained them. He built up, in an incredibly short time, a large, lucrative practice, and ranks to-day with the leading physicians of the city. He was elected to the chair of the "eye, ear and throat" in the Southern Medical college of Atlanta. For ten years he served in this capacity and resigned only because his practice occupied his full time. He was respected and esteemed by the faculty and students. Dr. Hobbs was elected president of the American Rhinological association that met in Chicago during 1891, being the youngest of its presidents, and the only one from the south. He is a member of many organizations and societies composed of the ablest physicians of the country, and all will testify to his thorough capability and superior skill. Dr. Hobbs possesses literary talent in connection with his many mental inclinations. He frequently contributes articles to the foremost scientific publications of the day, and reads assiduously both current and classic literature. Leisure hours invariably find him in his spacious library.

In 1882 he was married to Lillie Hendricks, niece of Hon. Thomas A. Hendricks of Indianapolis, a sweet and charming lady who guides his home affairs with queenly grace and devotion. Dr. Hobbs rarely leaves his office to visit patients except in cases of consultation or to perform operations. Scores crowd his reception room daily and an idle moment during his office hours is a rare thing. He has amassed a competency from his energetic endeavors. Dr. Hobbs is one of the shining lights of the medical fraternity. His record in the past twelve years has hardly a duplicate.

JOSES BILLINGTON SANDERS HOLMES. At irregular intervals of time there appears in one or more of the fields of human thought and endeavor, individuals of conspicuously distinguishing characteristics—natural gifts of a high order; and, like most precious and highly prized gems, they come from localities and surroundings whence they were least looked for or expected. A moment's thought on the part of the intelligent reader will bring to mind scores of such instances. Joses B. S. Holmes, Atlanta, one of the most eminent physicians in Georgia, if not in the Union, is the son of Dr. J. B. S. and E. J. Holmes, of Early county,

Ga., where he was born May 1, 1852. His father was a physician of skill and success, and was held in the highest esteem in his profession and as a citizen. Dr. Holmes received his elementary education during his boyhood days at the Blakely academy, and when about fifteen years of age engaged as a clerk in a dry goods store. A year or so later—early in 1868—he went to Morgan county, Ga., and remained there eighteen months as the private pupil of Col. Thomas A. Moody, paying for his tuition by superintending his instructor's farm. In 1869 he went to Rome, Ga., where he began the study of medicine under the direction of his uncle, Dr. G. W. Holmes, and Dr. J. B. Underwood, who were practicing together. In 1870-71 he attended lectures at the Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, but although he attained to extraordinary proficiency he was refused a diploma on account of his extreme youth (nineteen years), his age being under Jefferson's graduation limit. Nothing daunted he proceeded to Atlanta and entered the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated that same year at the head of his class—receiving the first honor. If his age was suspected it was not hinted, as the faculty were only too glad to graduate one so brilliant, and who then gave promise of that pre-eminence in the profession which he has already achieved, with the further promise of yet grander achievements in the future. Returning to Rome $2,500 in debt, he was accepted by his uncle as a partner, and they practiced together until 1873, when the distinguished Dr. Robert Battey was received into the firm, the style of which was Holmes, Battey & Holmes. This was unquestionably one of the strongest medical firms in the state, if not in the country; whose fame spread far and wide, but was dissolved by the temporary removal of Dr. Battey to Atlanta. Since then these three distinguished physicians have practiced alone. Not satisfied with what he had accomplished, and ambitious of attaining the highest excellence in knowledge, and in the practice of his profession, and also craving a diploma from Jefferson Medical college, he attended another course of lectures at that great institution in the session of 1876-77, and secured the diploma denied him six years before. After eight years of continuously successful practice in Rome, still hungry for more knowledge of the theory and practice of his profession, he went to New York, where, during the winter of 1884-85 he attended the New York Polyclinic, leaving there with the added distinction of an honorable diploma from that far-famed institution. He was now as completely equipped as he could possibly be with the profoundest theories and experienced practical application of them, and settled down, as he thought and purposed, permanently in Rome. His patients and his marvelous successes multiplied, his fame spread, and prosperity crowned his intense devotion to his profession and assiduous attention to his patients. His success marks the triumph of superior intellectuality centered upon one object or pursuit, and well-directed persistent energy. His whole heart and soul were in his work. His one-time partner, Dr. Battey, himself one of the greatest of physicians, said of Dr. Holmes: "He would be a physician if there had never been a text book on medicine. Nature made him a doctor." Recognizing the endowment and the consequent responsibility, he has used his utmost exertions to perfect himself in his profession. The increase of his patients, scattered far and near, demanding a more central position with greater facilities of intercommunication by mail, determined him to locate in Atlanta, which he did about two years ago, where he has established an infirmary, whose unprecedented success has demonstrated his sound business judgment, no less than his extraordinary skill.

His recent connection (1895) with the very critical case of Gov. W. Y. Atkinson of Georgia, in which he was a welcome co-laborer with some of the most distinguished physicians and surgeons in the south, corroborated the high estimate placed upon his scientific knowledge and practical ability. In Rome Dr. Holmes was not only highly esteemed as a physician, but as a sagacious, far-seeing, public-spirited citizen. He was prominently connected with the various enterprises calculated to build up the city—the land improvement and street railway companies—and especially the Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus railway, to which President Williamson said he furnished the original inspiration. In the prime of mature manhood, possessed of robust health and the affection of the thousands he has restored to health, always learning, and ambitious to an extreme, he has before him a future of usefulness and the attainment of honorable fame seldom equalled. Dr. Holmes was married June 26, 1873, to Miss Addie M., daughter of Judge A. P. and Mary A. Allgood, of Trion, Chattooga Co., Ga., a union which has been blessed with one child, who bears the name of Andrew Allgood.

HON. JAMES S. HOOK has had a distinguished career in law, literature and public life. Endowed with natural vigor of both body and mind and possessing a genial spirit, it was only necessary for him to cultivate these gifts and to have suitable opportunities in order to attain distinction. With considerable industry, he exercised himself through life in securing a large fund of knowledge, and has filled with ability all positions to which he has been called. His family on the paternal side, so far as can be traced into early English times, were called Hoces, then Hocks, then Hooke, the final letter of the last name being left off in the modern spelling. On the maternal side, the Schley family, which has been conspicuous in Georgia history, came originally from a German house of distinction. Judge Hook's father was Dr. Daniel Hook, an eminent physician, minister, and one of the former mayors of the city of Augusta; and his mother was Catherine Schley, sister of Gov. William Schley. His birthplace was Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., and his early education was obtained in Richmond academy, at Augusta, Ga., a school of high grade, which still preserves its reputation. He then read law with George Schley, and after graduation from the law school of William Tracy Gould, was examined before Judge John Schley, presiding in the superior court of Richmond county; but as he was not yet eighteen years of age, his admission to the bar was secured by a special act of the legislature. Thus almost before the close of his boyhood he began to practice his profession in Sandersville, Ga. There were great men at the bar in those days. Crawford, Holt, Schley, Gould, Henry Cumming, Longstreet, and immediately after them Starnes, Johnson, Stephens, Toombs, Andrew Miller and the like. These great men were the immediate predecessors of that distinguished bar which moved in column with Hook. The young attorney's first case was a suit in chancery, in which he drew a bill to force a settlement of an estate. This bill was filed in the Richmond supreme court before his removal to Sandersville. The case was somewhat noted by the complimentary remark of Judge Gould, his preceptor, that it was the shortest bill on record, and also for the protracted litigation for many years after it was gained. The State vs. Clark was another famous case in which the judge displayed in a marked degree his ability to move court, jury and court house audience. Clark was an Irish lad far away from home, friendless and poor, now charged in the indictment with larceny of $600. The evidence, his own confession, showed the money in the boy's possession, but he said he found the pocketbook in the road, and in defense it was urged that it was not stolen, but found and appropriated. The prosecutor was a man of wealth, the lad was friendless, the indications were that he would be convicted, but Hook believed the young Irishman to be innocent, and espoused his cause in a speech of such argument and appeal as to carry with him court, jury and crowd. The jury retired just long enough to write the verdict "Not guilty," and when it was read the crowd applauded the decision. In the political divisions of 1860 Judge Hook followed the fortunes of Douglas, and was chosen one of the electors on the Douglas democratic ticket, canvassing a considerable part of the state for his favorite. Upon the secession of Georgia he was elected to the first legislature of 1861, under the new government, and served at the time when great wisdom was required in preparing the state for the existing war. One of the measures which he introduced and warmly advocated, and which passed the house, but was lost in the senate, was the bill providing for the purchase of all cotton by the state by an issue of state currency for that purpose. While a member of this legislature in the fall of 1862, he was unexpectedly nominated by Gov. Brown to the judgeship of the Middle Georgia circuit, and the senate confirmed the nomination, which office he filled with ability for something over four years, part of the time in the Confederacy and part in the United States. From the bench in 1867 he returned to the bar and resumed the practice of his profession. One other very noted case of this period in which he more than sustained his reputation for forensic oratory was the State vs. Pounds; murder; Hook for the State and Alex. Stephens for the defendant. The case was tried in Hancock superior court, and is well remembered on account of the public interest in it, the court room being crowded with people, many distinguished persons being present, and also a large number of ladies. The speech of Mr. Stephens was as usual characterized by the unequalled abilities of that eminent juris-consult. He was followed by Judge Hook in a concluding argument of three hours for the prosecution, which Linton Stephens, Bishop Pierce and other good judges pronounced to be one of the ablest and most effective speeches they had ever heard delivered before a jury. Col. Richard M. Johnston in a speech said of Judge Hook: "As a lawyer he early exhibited the genius he inherited from a distinguished family. A laborious student and practitioner, a judicious counselor, an eloquent orator, the people elevated him to the bench when still in youth, and the career he made while there may be compared with that of the best of this or any former period of the judiciary of his native state. In the midst of purely professional work, he was ever fond of literary studies. In the interstices of a large practice he studied the literature of his own and foreign countries, and though one of the most distinguished lawyers of the state, he was never content with only the name of lawyer." The literary work referred to was chiefly in contributions on current questions for the public press, addresses and orations, with occasionally a poem. Among these may be mentioned his "Law and order letters," in which he took issue with Mr. Stephens on the policy of the democratic party as to the support of Greeley for president. Other important letters were a series on the financial situation, in which he showed why the agricultural classes were becoming poorer, notwithstanding their industry. In these writings he vigorously opposed the national banking system, and as a democrat advised the issuance of currency commonly called greenbacks, but more properly redeemable treasury notes. About the date of these letters he was offered the "Greenback" nomination for congress, but declined on the ground that he purposed to discuss existing issues inside the democratic party. Two of his orations attracted special attention; one on "Woman and Truth," at the Wesleyan Female college; the other on the "Bible and Republicanism," at Oglethorpe university. A few years ago Judge Hook was appointed state school commissioner, and filled the office for a term, during which his speeches increased the public interest of the people in public school education. Without retiring from the bar Judge Hook has given valuable attention lately to business entrusted to him by the general government. His home and office are now in Atlanta.

JUDGE JOHN L. HOPKINS. One of the most distinguished members of the Georgia bar, noted alike for his extensive legal acquirements and for the purity of his exalted character, is Judge John L. Hopkins, of Atlanta. A profound and accurate knowledge of the law, derived from years of patient study and application, have given to Judge Hopkins a commanding influence and prestige at the bar that few members of the profession have ever attained. Endowed by nature with a mind peculiar in its fitness both for the meditations of the law and for the maintenance, in controversial issues, of its great underlying principles, the success of Judge Hopkins at the bar was distinctly foreshadowed in the beginning of his practice, and his career of public and professional service has only fulfilled the prophecy of his talents. For several years Judge Hopkins occupied the bench of the Atlanta circuit, and the peace and good order prevailing in that community to-day is largely the result of his fearless and rigorous administration of the law. He had no sooner donned the judicial ermine and entered upon the discharge of his duties as the guardian of the rights and liberties of his fellow citizens, than he gave the violators of law to understand that all vice and immorality must cease—at least in their external and flagrant manifestations—and that he would not leave a stone unturned until every criminal was brought to justice and punished. The courage, decision of character and tireless energy that marked the judicial conduct of Judge Hopkins during this critical period of Atlanta's history, have made him one of the greatest factors in the promotion of her peace and tranquillity. The memory of his service on the bench will be gratefully perpetuated by all the succeeding generations of that city. Judge Hopkins was born in the little village of Madisonville, in the state of Tennessee, on Sept. 24, 1828. His boyhood days were spent in that immediate neighborhood and his education was obtained in the common schools of that vicinity, including a term of three years at the Hiwassee college, located in Monroe county. After completing his literary studies he decided, in the gratification of a long-cherished desire, to enter the practice of law. Accordingly he began to read under the careful advice and direction of his uncle, H. H. Stephens, who superintended his preparations for the bar. Having access to a good library and to the sound legal information of his uncle, who was a learned and able practitioner, he soon acquired the elementary principles of the profession, and was admitted to the bar in 1847, at the early age of nineteen. Forming a partnership with Hon. D. M. Key, who was subsequently appointed postmaster-general of the United States, under the administration of President Hayes, he entered upon the active, and, from the start, successful practice of his profession. In 1857 this partnership was dissolved; young Hopkins removing to Chattanooga, Tenn., and locating, for the practice of law, in that city. He remained in Chattanooga, practicing alone, until 1863. The vicissitudes of the civil war interfered for a while with the prosecution of his practice, but after its ravages had ceased and good order was again restored the young practitioner located in Atlanta in 1865. The poverty of the people at that time made clients scarce and remuneration uncertain, but patiently adhering to his profession he steadily forced his way to the front and soon controlled the largest general practice in the city. In 1870, on the resignation of Judge John D. Pope, he was elevated to the bench of the Atlanta circuit. At this time the city was disturbed and harassed by quite a number of lawless characters who made no secret of their evil doings, but openly defied the courts and sneered at the entreaties of law-abiding citizens. It required a courage of no ordinary man to brave the perils of the situation, but the iron firmness of Judge Hopkins was equal to the responsibility of his position. He met the ordeal with unflinching nerve and in cool defiance of the mob who threatened to visit him with personal violence and possibly assassination, he administered the law without regard for persons. By his fearless conduct he earned the gratitude of all classes in the community and during his official tenure, the voice of criticism was never raised against him and no one could charge him with a single motive that dimmed the splendor of his reputation. Judge Hopkins remained on the bench for six years in spite of the meager salary that was paid him for his judicial services. He then resumed the active practice of his profession. In giving up his large clientage to serve the public on the bench Judge Hopkins made a great sacrifice of his personal and private interests, but no selfish motive ever swayed him when the welfare of the public needed his assistance and a sense of duty urged him to obey. If there is one characteristic that is more conspicuous than another in the public career of Judge Hopkins, as emphasized by his long and faithful service, it is a cheerful willingness at all times to subordinate his own selfish interests to the higher good and happiness of the community. In this respect his career should be an example and an inspiration. In 1893, as a compliment to his ability and learning, Judge Hopkins was appointed by Gov. Northen, under the advice and approval of the supreme court, chairman of the commission to codify the laws of Georgia. His associates in this important undertaking were Hon. Clifford Anderson, of Macon, Ga., ex-attorney-general of the state, and Mr. Joseph R. Lamar, of Augusta, Ga., one of the brightest of the younger members of the profession. The importance of the work assigned to this brilliant trio of lawyers is self-apparent. It required extensive information and the qualifications of the best legal talent in the state in addition to great physical strength and perseverance to meet the requirements of this important legal duty. In spite of his rare qualifications for public service Judge Hopkins has never entered the political arena nor sought preferment of any kind. He has been content to serve in the ranks and to perform the duty of a private citizen without display or ostentation. During the war, as a volunteer in the Confederate service, Judge Hopkins served under Col. R. J. Morgan for several months but his career as a soldier was not extensive. Judge Hopkins belongs to the membership of the Methodist Episcopal church, and is also a Mason. In 1853 Judge Hopkins married Miss Mary E. Cooke, the daughter of Dr. Robert F. Cooke, a native of Tennessee. They have four children living, two of them, Charles T. and Linton C. Hopkins, being in partnership with their father, under the firm name of John L. Hopkins & Sons. This firm is employed in much of the important litigation in Atlanta. The father of Judge Hopkins, for whom he was named, was a man of liberal education and of great wealth. He was a native Georgian and a man of commanding influence in his day and generation.

CAPT. EVAN P. HOWELL, who has for so long been identified with the "Atlanta Constitution," is a native of Forsyth (now Milton) county, Ga. At the age of twelve years he moved with his father's family to Atlanta, and learned telegraphy under the direction of D. U. Sloan, and was the first student of this science in Atlanta. He entered and passed with distinction through the common schools of Warsaw and Atlanta, entering the Georgia Military institute at Marietta in 1855. After completing a two-years' course he went to Sandersville, Ga., read law until the end of 1858, and was then enrolled among the Lumpkin law school matriculates at Athens, Ga. A year later his active practice was commenced, but continued only a few weeks before the bomb of disunion exploded. He enlisted in the First Georgia regiment as orderly-sergeant, and was appointed a lieutenant before the expiration of a month. Later he accepted the rank of first lieutenant, and before a second year had remodeled the company and was honored by election to its captaincy. From service under Jackson in Virginia he was transferred to the western army in time to engage in the struggle of Chickamauga. In the retreat from Laurel hill Mr. Howell and his men realized that they were lost. Their sufferings and anxieties were intense; hunger, thirst, and privations of every kind menaced them. It was only the voice and courage and energy of Capt. Howell that led them at last back to civilization and home. He served mainly in Claiborne's division of the western army until the war closed. When the conflict finally ceased he began farming and pursued this vocation two years. In 1868 he became city editor of the "Atlanta Intelligencer," remained a year and resumed with renewed ambition the practice of his profession. He was selected chairman of the democratic committee of Fulton county and gave vigorous efforts for the reorganization of the party and the maintenance of principles. For two years he supported the municipal government as a member of the city council. During two years Capt. Howell acted as solicitor-general in the Atlanta circuit, and with the aid of the eminent and noble Judge John L. Hopkins succeeded in suppressing much of the lawlessness—murder, theft, and every form of guilt that could threaten and permeate a young and growing city. Capt. Howell was elected to the state senate in 1873, and re-elected for a second term. He was a delegate at large to the St. Louis, Cincinnati and Chicago national democratic conventions, and in each served on the committee on resolutions. President Cleveland in recognition of his invaluable services tendered him the consulship to Manchester, England, which he declined. By Gov. McDaniel, in 1888, he was appointed capitol commissioner, serving on the commission which built Georgia's new capitol, completing the building and turning back into the state treasury a part of the appropriation of $1,000,000. Capt. Howell's indomitable spirit in demanding that the state capitol be located in Atlanta and his tireless efforts to effect this end will never be forgotten by the people. His editorials were able, his arguments clear and convincing, and his good humor irresistible. In 1876 Capt. Howell, after purchasing a controlling share, became editor-in-chief of the "Atlanta Constitution." How this paper has prospered, and bears to-day the current topics of the world throughout the south, materially develops Atlanta and incidentally all these states and cities beyond our borders, is known to every child. He was elected to the legislature in 1894 while absent from home and not a candidate for office, and is also director of the Cotton States and International exposition. Capt. Howell is not only a journalist of rare ability, but an orator whose eloquence is often heard encouraging the youth of Georgia, and a patriot whose heart is filled with the love and devotion of his countrymen.

HON. CLARK HOWELL, editor-in-chief of the "Atlanta Constitution," was born in Barnwell district, S. C., Sept. 21, 1863. During 1820 his great-grandfather came to Georgia and located in Milton county. His father is Capt. E. P. Howell, one of the most prominent figures in Georgia politics, and one of Atlanta's pioneer citizens, who has been identified with her development and the growth of her many enterprises. His mother's maiden name was Julia Erwin, a woman possessing the attributes that form an ideal character. Young Howell came to Atlanta while a boy and entered the public schools, passing with credit through the successive grades. After completing his course here he became a student at the state university at Athens, Ga., applied himself diligently to the tasks assigned in the learning of literature and science, and graduated with distinction in the spring of 1883. Manifesting a decided talent for journalism, and wielding a pen of force and power even at that immature age, he went to New York and accepted the position of reporter on the "Times," and later served another newspaper apprenticeship on the "Philadelphia Press." A year or two later he returned south to his home in Atlanta and became in 1884 night editor of the "Constitution" under Henry W. Grady, whose assistant as managing editor he became in 1887, at a time when Mr. Grady was so occupied as an orator as to be away from home much of the time. When this patriot and peerless gentleman passed away Mr. Howell was made managing editor, and has held the position as a worthy successor of "the foremost Atlantian." Before reaching his majority Mr. Howell was nominated to the state legislature and elected a few days later. He was re-elected in 1888 and 1890, and chosen speaker of the house for the term of 1890-91, being the youngest legislative presiding officer in the United States. In 1892 he was elected as Georgia's member of the national democratic executive committee for four years, and in 1894, at the annual convention of the International League of Press clubs, he was unanimously elected as the president of that representative press organization, succeeding Col. John A. Cockerell, of New York. Having achieved these remarkable successes at so early an age is highly indicative of his intellectual stamina and indomitable energy. As a parliamentarian he is ready, concise and skillful, as a speaker, fluent and eloquent, and as a writer, brilliant and convincing. Mr. Howell was married in 1887 to Hattie Barrett, a charming young lady of Augusta, Ga. This union has been blessed with two daughters and one son. The Howells came over from Wales in 1650, settled in North Carolina and their descendants fought gallantly in the revolutionary war.

COL. W. H. HULSEY. One of the most distinguished citizens of Atlanta and a lawyer of marked professional attainments is Col. William H. Hulsey. Col. Hulsey was born on a farm in De Kalb county on Oct. 1, 1839. His grandfather, Jennings Hulsey, was a native of Virginia, but immigrated with his parents to South Carolina when still a mere child. He afterward came to Georgia and married Miss Rebecca Pate. He died in De Kalb county in 1852. The pioneers of the Hulsey family in America came from England. Eli J. Hulsey, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Jasper county, Ga., in 1812. He spent the greater portion of his life in agricultural pursuits, though, for several years before the war, he was engaged in the mercantile business in Atlanta. He married Miss Charlotte Collier, the daughter of Merrill Collier, of North Carolina, and ten children resulted from this union: Mary J., widow of Marcus A. Bell; William H., the subject of this sketch; Rebecca, wife of William C. Sanders; Laura, wife of Thomas J. Flake; Charlotte E., wife of Henry H. Loftin; Augustus J.; Alice, wife of Eugene Flake; Lulu, wife of Thomas J. Hooks; John, and Hayden. Augustus J. Hulsey died in 1884. He was a gallant soldier during the late war, leaving the Georgia military institute at Marietta, Ga., in 1861 to enter the Confederate army. He served under Gen. Johnston until the war closed, participating in all the engagements of that command. The mother of Col. Hulsey died in 1886. This sore bereavement was closely followed by his father's death in 1888. After spending his early boyhood days in De Kalb county, obtaining his primary education at the old-field schools of that district, the subject of this sketch came to Atlanta with his parents in 1850. The remainder of his education was derived from the schools of that city. He was preparing to enter college when financial disasters overtook his father in business and prevented him from realizing his cherished ambition. At the age of fifteen he began to clerk in a shoe store in Atlanta, occupied the position for about a year and then gave it up for a place in a clothing store. Leaving this position he clerked in a dry goods store for about a year, after which he commenced the study of law in the office of Ezzard & Collier, two of the most distinguished members of the legal profession, both of whom are now dead. The subject of this sketch was admitted to the bar in 1859, and moved directly to

Mitchell county to engage in the practice of his profession. He was allowed to practice for only a few months, however, as the declaration of war between the states put a stop to business of every kind. In April, 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company F of the Sixth Georgia infantry, commanded by Col. Alfred H. Colquitt, subsequently United States senator. Soon after enlistment the young soldier was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant, and served in that capacity for about a year. In the spring of 1862, while at home on a furlough, he was elected major of the Forty-second Georgia infantry, and a year later he was still further promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. A short time before the close of the war Col. R. J. Henderson, who commanded the regiment, was made a brigadier-general, and Col. Hulsey was placed in command of the Forty-second Georgia, one of the bravest regiments in the field. The war ended, however, before he received his formal commission. At Perryville, Ky., Col. Hulsey commanded the rear guard, in the retreat through that state, and mounted his command by capturing a regiment of Pennsylvania cavalry. He was in the battles fought at Big Bethel, Va.; Tazewell, Tenn.; Big Hill, Ky.; Chickasaw Bayou, Miss.; Baker's Creek; Siege of Vicksburg; Lookout Mountain; Resaca, in which engagement he was severely wounded; and the battle of July 22, near Atlanta. The capture of the famous De Grest Battery has caused the Forty-second regiment to be represented in the cyclorama of the battle of Atlanta, on exhibition at Grant park, near the site of the old battle grounds. At the battle of Jonesboro, on July 28, 1864, Col. Hulsey commanded a brigade on the left of Atlanta during the battle. In the following December he commanded the advance guard of Gen. Hood's infantry, driving the Federal pickets at Nashville to the shelter of the guns at Fort Negley. Col. Hulsey also participated in the bloody engagements at Franklin and Nashville. He was severely wounded in the latter fight, but notwithstanding his disability he commanded the rear guard on Hood's retreat for a day and a night until relieved. He was also in the fight at Binniker's bridge, S. C., a few weeks before the surrender. Though only a beardless youth during all these bloody encounters, the comrades of Col. Hulsey describe him as a man who was absolutely without fear. While on the retreat from Baker's creek, Col. Hulsey and several of his command rode in the twilight into a party of Federals at Black's station. They called upon the little band to stop; but Col. Hulsey, fully realizing that refusal to obey meant almost certain death, defiantly refused, and riding off, under the fire of the enemy, escaped. While riding away from the Federal force at full speed, Col. Hulsey came suddenly upon his own command, which had been augmented by about 400 stragglers—making altogether about 1,000 men, who, seeing him riding down upon them, thinking that he was a Federal officer leading a cavalry charge, opened fire on him, and he ran the gauntlet of hundreds of bullets, not one of which touched him. His horse having by this time become perfectly frantic, had the bit in his teeth, and as he went careering down the road a Confederate soldier, belonging to an Arkansas regiment, seeing him and thinking he was a Federal, fired at him from a distance of not more than thirty feet, cutting a lock of hair from his head. Just then Col. Hulsey's identity was discovered, and a cheer went up from his men that testified their joy at his escape. Many narrow escapes, similar to the foregoing, might be recorded. After the war Col. Hulsey was united in marriage to Miss Marion Bateman, daughter of Claiborn Bateman of Georgia. For several months he resided in Houston county, but subsequently returning to Atlanta he formed a law partnership with his old preceptor, Hon. William Ezzard. He was soon after elected solicitor-general of the Coweta circuit, and filled that office for eighteen months. He was then removed by the republican governor, Rufus B. Bullock, for partisan reasons, after which he resumed the active practice of his profession with his law partner. In 1869 Col. Hulsey was elected mayor of Atlanta and held that office for one term, declining re-election. He was the youngest mayor and one of the best that ever presided over the affairs of that city. In 1878 Col. Hulsey was elected to a seat in the lower branch of the general assembly. During his term of service he was a member of the general judiciary committee, and the committee on railroads, which framed the famous Georgia railroad commission bill; Col. Hulsey being chairman of the sub-committee that reported it. In 1883 the subject of this sketch was again honored by his fellow-citizens by a seat in the legislature. During this session he was chairman of the special judiciary committee of the house. In November, 1893, Col. Hulsey was prevailed upon to enter the race for congress in the Fifth district. Though in the race for only ten days prior to the nomination he made a brilliant fight and was defeated by Col. L. F. Livingston by only 116 votes in the county which would determine the contest. Col. Hulsey is a member of the board of education and one of the most active, influential workers in that body. He is the president of the National Railway Building and Loan association, and is interested in various other enterprises. He belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, is a master Mason, and a consistent member of the Methodist church. During his term of office as mayor of the city the present public school system was established, the first established in Georgia, if not in the south. Col. Hulsey has six children living as follows: Eli B., William E., Marion, Fred, Eula, and Luther. He lost his eldest daughter, Hallie, the wife of Clyde L. Brooks, only a short while ago. In public and private life Col. Hulsey has always been a model citizen, and he has ever been ready, both in peace and war, to discharge the full measure of his patriotic duty.

CALVIN W. HUNNICUTT, hardware and stoves, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., in 1827. When he was six years old his father moved to Montgomery county, N. C., and two years afterward migrated to Georgia and settled in Cobb county. Here he received a limited education—such as was obtainable at country schools at that period. At the age of twenty-one he came to Atlanta and engaged with the dry goods and clothing house of Haas & Levi as a clerk and continued with them five years. He then, with his fellow-clerk, John Silvey, formed the partnership of Hunnicutt & Silvey, with $500 capital embarked in the same line of business. They purchased as much as $15,000 worth of goods at a time on credit, and at once established a successful and profitable trade. At the end of six years the firm was dissolved, and Mr. Hunnicutt went into the drug trade with James A. Taylor, under the firm name of Hunnicutt & Taylor, and continued in the business five years. Retiring from this firm, he was detailed by the Confederate government to duty in the ordnance and medical departments at Cuthbert and Atlanta. In 1862, the firm which then consisted of Mr. Hunnicutt, Leonard, Bellingrath and James A. Taylor, commenced the manufacture of alcohol for their trade, and soon after the Confederate government took charge of their manufactory, or rather permitted them to operate it, but the alcohol they manufactured was taken by the government. In 1863, Mr. Hunnicutt and Mr. Bellingrath bought out Mr. Taylor's interest and continued the business until 1865. Returning to Atlanta early in 1866 he engaged in brick making. Shortly afterward he formed a partnership with Leonard Bellingrath, an elder brother of his present partner, Albert Bellingrath, and went into the plumbing and gas-fitting business. Their combined capital was $350; and with this sum as a basis, one of the largest businesses in its line in the south has been established—to accommodate which a spacious, three-story store-house, besides basement, has been built, and a stock averaging $70,000 carried. The firm does a very large business, is wealthy, and financially impregnable. Mr. Hunnicutt is president of the Georgia stove works, established, and now in operation in Atlanta; and vice-president of the Atlanta Banking company. He has been elected a member of the general council of the city twice; and in 1881 was elected one of the county commissioners, and has been continued thirteen years, for eight of which he has been chairman of the board. In these positions his sound judgment and public spirit have been recognized, and practically manifested in his advocacy of measures adapted to promote the material and moral upbuilding of the city.

Mr. Hunnicutt was married Dec. 3, 1857, to Miss Letitia A., daughter of Edwin Payne, who was a native of Virginia. Six children blessed this union: Luther L.; Mary, wife of A. H. Green, Atlanta; Joseph Edgar; Eddie P., wife of Dr. C. O. Tyner, Atlanta; Letitia A., wife of W. W. Drake, Atlanta; Sallie F., unmarried. Mrs. Hunnicutt died Sept. 24, 1886. Mr. Hunnicutt is a member of the Pioneer Citizen's society of Atlanta, a Royal Arch Mason, and a member of the First Methodist church, of which he is a steward.

DR. MILLER B. HUTCHINS, joint-owner, business manager and associate editor of the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" was born in Greensboro, Ga., March 18, 1864, and very soon afterward was taken by his mother to Columbus, where she went to join his father, who was a Confederate officer. He spent the first six years of his life in Gwinnett and Forsyth counties, Ga., and then moved with his parents to Iuka, Miss., his parents both dying there within two years of that time. Young Hutchins was subsequently taken by his guardian, Col. N. L. Hutchins to Lawrenceville, Ga., and lived with him until 1879, when he went to the military school at Dahlonge, Ga., remaining there two years. He was then at Emory college at Oxford for a year, but on account of ill-health was obliged to leave before graduating. In 1883 he entered the Atlanta Medical college and graduated therefrom in March, 1886, with first honors, being also elected valedictorian of his class. From this time until the fall of 1887 he practiced his profession in his old home, Lawrenceville, Ga., coming at that time from that point to Atlanta and being appointed a demonstrator of anatomy pro tem in the Atlanta Medical college. Feb. 23, 1888, Dr. Hutchins was married to Miss Addie Davis, daughter of L. B. Davis, Savannah, Ga. Immediately after his marriage he went to New York and studied dermatology for three months in the schools of that city. He then served one year as assistant house physician in the New York Skin and Cancer hospital and as house physician for the following six months. Dec. 1, 1889, he returned to Atlanta and engaged in the practice of dermatology; and assisted in the business management of the "Atlanta Medical and Surgical Journal" for two years. He then became active business manager. In 1889 he was appointed lecturer on dermatology in the Atlanta Medical college and three years later he was appointed demonstrator of anatomy and histology in the same institution, which position he still holds, together with the lectureship on dermatology and syphilis. Dr. Hutchins is a member of the State Medical association of Georgia, the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the Tri-State (Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama) Medical society and also of the Presbyterian church. His father was Andrew Jackson Hutchins, a lawyer and Confederate officer, who was born in Gwinnett county, Ga., and died in 1872, aged thirty-three years. He was married to Jennie, who died September, 1870, daughter of James Word, a native of Georgia, and a soldier in the war of 1812, who died in 1890, at the phenomenal age of ninety-four. Andrew Jackson Hutchins had four children, of whom three survive: Dr. M. B. Hutchins, J. Nathan Hutchins, Hartford, Conn., architect, and Amelia Hutchins Alexander, Atlanta. Dr. Hutchins' grandfather was Nathan L. Hutchins, who was born in South Carolina and moved to Georgia in 1820, at the age of twenty-one years. He died in 1870, having served in the Georgia legislature; and as judge of the western circuit of Georgia for eleven years, which latter office is now filled by his son, Nathan L. Hutchins.

DR. CHARLES DAVIS HURT, one of the most successful physicians in Atlanta, is the son of Joel Hurt and was born in Russell county, Ala., July 26, 1843. His father was born in Putnam county, Ga., in 1813. He was a planter and owned large milling interests in Russell county, where he located in 1825. He served as sheriff of that county in 1830, was in the Seminole war in 1836. In 1838 married Miss Lucy Long, daughter of Nimrod Washington Long, a native Georgian. They had eleven children, of whom six grew up and three now survive: Dr. C. D. Hurt, Elisha F. Hurt of New York city, Joel Hurt, president of the Atlanta Street Railroad company, president of the East Atlanta Land company, secretary of the Atlanta Home Insurance company, which he organized, and engaged in many other business enterprises. Henry N. Hurt, one of the brothers, served in the Forty-fifth Alabama regiment, and died at Tupelo, Miss., in 1862. E. F. Hurt was also in the Forty-fifth Alabama regiment, serving until July 22, 1864, when he was severely wounded at Atlanta. Dr. Hurt's grandfather was Henry Hurt, who resided in Putnam county, Ga. Dr. Charles Davis Hurt resided in Russell county from the time of his birth until 1861, receiving his education in the schools of that district. In the latter year he entered the Confederate service, enlisting in an artillery company, principally composed of Russell county men, commanded by Robert A. Hardaway, who was afterward promoted to the rank of colonel in the artillery. Young Hurt served as a corporal for nine months, when he was discharged on account of illness. In April, 1862, he re-enlisted in the Forty-fifth Alabama regiment, Company B. After serving as a private for a few months he was transferred to a cavalry regiment commanded by Col. Hannon, with whom he served until the close of the war. During most of his service with the cavalry he was quartermaster-sergeant, and took part in the battle of Manassas and many minor engagements. At the close of the war Dr. Hurt came to Macon county, Ala., and there engaged in farming until 1869, when he began the study of medicine with Dr. B. F. Johnson at Notasulga, Macon Co., Ala. A year later he went to the Atlanta Medical college, and in 1871 to the Medical College of Georgia, Augusta, graduating there the same year. He located at Notasulga for one year, and then practiced at Hurtsboro until 1884, when he removed to Columbus, Ga., and lived there eight years. During his residence there he served as president of the board of health, for seven years was a member of the school board, and for the same number of years was chairman of the board of stewards of St. Luke's Methodist church. In October, 1892, Dr. Hurt came to Atlanta and is now vice-president of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, having been elected to that position for the term of one year, at the annual meeting of 1894. He is also a member of the Medical Society of Georgia, of which he is now a censor, chairman of the committee on programs, and very prominent in all its councils. He affiliated long ago with the F. & A. M., and was worthy master of Hurtsboro lodge, Hurtsboro, for several years during his residence at that point. He was also mayor of that city for one term. Dr. Hurt was married in July, 1863, to Mary Louisa Grant, daughter of John F. and Frances (Pollard) Cone. They have had eight children, of whom six are now living—three sons and three daughters: Charles D., cashier of Plant's bank, Macon, Ga., and partner in the insurance broking firm of Plant & Hurt, who married Anna

Roe Gray, daughter of James M. Gray, Fort Valley, Ga.; George Nimrod, now residing in Macon, Ga.; Lulu, Lucy, John W., and Mamie Maud. Dr. Hurt was a member of the ninth international congress which met in Washington, D. C., in 1887, and is very prominent in professional as well as social circles, in which he is a universal favorite.

DR. THOMAS HENRY HUZZA was born in St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 12, 1863, and came to Atlanta with his parents, at the age of nine years. He was educated at the public schools of Atlanta, and was graduated from the high school with the first honor. In 1879 he entered Emory college at Oxford, Ga., from which he was graduated in 1883, having achieved the record of 100 in the standing of his class—the highest record for proficiency in study ever made in that institution. After finishing his course there he taught school for one year in Tennessee, and then came to Rome, Ga., where he commenced the study of medicine under Dr. Robert Battey. In 1885 he entered the Jefferson Medical college in Philadelphia, and was graduated in 1887. He returned to Rome, where he practiced one year, and assisted on the staff of Dr. Battey's private hospital. In the fall of 1888 he returned to Atlanta and entered upon the practice of his profession and has continued to the present time. Dr. Huzza is a member of the State Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine and the American Medical association. In 1889 he served as "quiz master" in the Atlanta Medical college. In 1890 he was chosen secretary of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, and in 1890-1 he was lecturer on abdominal surgery in the Southern Medical college. In 1890 he commenced the publication of, and edited, a medical journal in Atlanta, known as "The Dixie Doctor," which he conducted for three years. Dr. Huzza is a member of the F. & A. M., and is a noble of Mystic Shrine (Yaavab Temple). He is past chancellor of Empire lodge, No. 47, Knights of Pythias, of Atlanta, and he is ex-treasurer of the Uniform Rank of Knights of Pythias, Gate City division, No. 5. He is a member of Capital lodge, No. 60, I. O. O. F., and of Empire Encampment, I. O. O. F., and he is a communicant of Trinity M. E. church (south). Dr. Huzza's father is Robert H. Huzza, who was born in Baltimore, Md. He came to Atlanta in 1872, where he established the first trunk factory in the south. He retired from business in 1891. At the commencement of the late war he entered the Confederate service, enlisting at St. Louis in Col. Kelly's regiment. He served during two years and left the army in 1863. Joseph Huzza, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch (whose father came from Wales), was born in Baltimore, Md., and was a soldier in the Seminole war.

MR. SAMUEL M. INMAN, perhaps the best known and most highly esteemed citizen of Atlanta, was born at Dandridge, Jefferson Co., Tenn., Feb. 19, 1843, the son of S. W. and Jane Martin Inman. His parents were members of a strong, earnest Presbyterian family, and after attending the primary schools located in and near his home he entered Princeton university and graduated with distinction after a commendable course of study. Just after emerging from this academical institution the clouds of civil war gathered over the country and he immediately enlisted in Company K of the First Tennessee cavalry, a part of Gen. Johnston's army. He served as a lieutenant of his company until the latter half of the war and was then detailed to special duty on the division staff. His conduct throughout these numerous campaigns was resolute, fearless and daring—that which finds the warmest co-operation in noble hearts. He gained the affection of his comrades and left behind a memory fragrant with deeds of gallantry and unselfish friendship. With an honorable parole he went to Augusta, Ga., engaged in business for a year and in the spring of 1867 moved to Atlanta and has since resided there. In the same year he formed a partnership with his father under the firm name of S. W. Inman & Son, but during 1869 the firm was changed to S. M. Inman & Co., which still exists. This is one of the largest cotton houses in the world, controlling the majority of the southern states and the entire commonwealth of Texas, in which a branch office is located. Mr. Inman, with a rare discernment, has filled every department of his enormous business with capable, competent men, and with a satisfaction of their integrity and faithful devotion to the interests of the enterprise, he finds much spare time for outside occupations. He has been connected with numerous important enterprises, and his encouragement is solicited in almost every new venture of importance. He is a large stockholder in the Constitution Publishing company, owns a great amount of real estate, and has nearly a half million dollars invested in other interests of the city. He is a prominent promoter of public projects, and to each of Atlanta's expositions has given valuable support, both by wise counsel and broad liberality. He is a director in the Inman system of railroads, stretching from Richmond to Montgomery, and Bristol to Savannah. He was largely instrumental in securing the appropriation by which the Technological school was erected and equipped; gave $5,000 from his own private resources, and secured from Atlanta $75,000 and an annuity of $2,500. He was appointed a member of the board of commissioners, and by his sagacious management the school has improved rapidly and acquired a powerful influence in this section of the Union. In an unassuming manner he gave $5,000 for the support of the Y. M. C. A., offered $10,000 to a hospital for both white and colored, and accepts every opportunity for doing good and spreading the spirit of charity among the people. Mr. Inman belongs to a family of financiers, embracing the qualities and virtues of greatness. His brothers, John H. Inman, of the firm of Inman, Swann & Co., New York, and Hugh T. Inman, capitalist, Atlanta, are millionaires, admired and beloved by all who know them. Mr. Inman was married, in 1868, to Miss Jennie Dick, of Rome, Ga. She died in 1890, leaving two sons and a daughter. He was married again, in 1893, to Miss McPheters, a lovable lady of Raleigh, N. C. Mr. Inman is not an office-seeker, but any honor is in his power. The people would unanimously place him in any public position. His record as a pillar of Atlanta's prosperity and a gentleman of stainless honor is without reproach. High-toned, magnanimous, and with a heart that appreciates the trials and sufferings of the poorer classes, he is loved by every station of society. He is an elder in the First Presbyterian church, and devotes much energy to religious labors. Mr. Inman is a wealthy man, but not sordid nor penurious, and occupies the handsomest residence in the city. A noble, Christian nature has guided and controlled his life.

HUGH THEODORE INMAN, of the firm of Inman, Smith & Co., wholesale shoes and notions, and capitalist, of Atlanta, was born in Jefferson county, Tenn., and there he resided until eighteen years of age, receiving his early education in the town academy. In 1867 he removed to New York city, entered the cotton exchange, and was associated with Messrs. Inman, Swann & Co., cotton dealers, for six or seven years. By cautious yet numerous speculations in the cotton traffic, he amassed a small fortune, and then came south again, locating in Savannah, Ga. He remained in the "Forest city" about three years, prosecuting the same business, gradually increasing his finances, and moved to Atlanta in 1876. Mr. Inman has been engaged in many enterprises. He built the Exposition cotton mills, and conducted their successful operation, and at the same time was engaged in the fertilizer and the cotton compress business. In 1892 he formed the partnership that is now recognized as one of the strongest in the state. For several years he was director in the Central railroad, of Georgia, the Atlanta National bank, and is now director in the Home Insurance company, the Constitution Publishing company, the Atlanta Trust and Banking company, president of the Franklin Publishing company, and controller of the Kimball House company, of Atlanta. He has never coveted public office, nor sought positions of notoriety. However, the people, knowing his ability as a financier and his power as a thinking man, insisted on his becoming a city councilman, and thereafter he was appointed chairman of the finance committee, and now wields the sceptre of economy and guarded policy over the municipal government. Mr. Inman is a deacon in the First Presbyterian church and superintendent of the Sunday school. He has always devoted much time to religious work, and has effected unlimited good by his generous endeavors. He was married, on May 23, 1871, to Miss Vandyke, of Athens, Tenn., daughter of Chancellor Vandyke. This union has been blessed with five children; those surviving are Josephine, Edward and Annie, wife of Mr. John W. Grant. Mr. Inman is generally considered the wealthiest citizen of Atlanta, owning immense tracts of real estate and maintaining vast interests in numerous industries and corporations. From a poor, humble country boy, he has, by thrift, tenacity and perseverance, combated the hindrances that confront the American youth, and acquired affluence and social prestige. His character, manly in every fibre, embraces the attributes that command respect and accumulate friends. Virtue, strength of mind and body, vigilance, piety and a will power that surmounts all difficulties, have made his fortune and his name.

DR. WILLIAM CALVIN JARNAGIN was born in Macon, Miss., Aug. 28, 1850, was there brought up and attended an "old-field" school taught by a noted Connecticut teacher named Hubbard, celebrated in that day and generation for his educational ability. Young Jarnagin left this school when he was seventeen years old and entered the university of Mississippi at Oxford, where he reached the senior year in 1870, going from there to the university of Virginia at Charlottesville, taking a medical course there and graduating in 1872. Then he took a summer and winter course at Bellevue Hospital Medical college, and returning to Macon, Miss., practiced his profession until 1875. Returning to New York he took a post-graduate course at Bellevue and the College of Physicians and Surgeons. Going back to Macon, Miss., he remained there till in the spring of 1882, when he removed to Atlanta, Ga., where he has since practiced. Dr. Jarnagin belongs to the State Medical association and to the Atlanta Medical society. He has contributed articles to medical journals—one on typho-malarial fever, which was widely copied. He is surgeon for the R. & D. railway (Atlanta & Charlotte division) and the E. T., V. & Ga. railway (Atlanta division). He is also medical examiner for the Mutual Life Insurance company of New York and medical referee for the state for the same great insurance company. He is examiner for the Washington Life Insurance company of New York, and holds the same position with the Maryland Life of Baltimore, the Connecticut Mutual, the Phoenix Mutual of Hartford, Conn., the Travelers' Insurance of Hartford, the Hartford Life and Annuity Insurance company of Hartford, and the Home Life Insurance company of Brooklyn, N. Y. Dr. Jarnagin is a member of the I. O. O. F. and encampment, the Knights of Pythias and of the Cherokee lodge, No. 1, A. O. R. M. He is also a member of the First Baptist church. Jarnagin, a native of east Tennessee, where he was brought up. When a young man he removed to Macon, Miss., where he practiced law for forty years and died in 1887. Hampton L. Jarnagin went to school in Greeneville, Tenn., and Andrew Johnson, afterward vice-president, made his clothes for him. He was for twenty years a member of the upper and lower houses of the Mississippi legislature, and his brother, Spencer Jarnagin, was United States senator from Tennessee. The Jarnagin family is of Huguenot ancestry.

JAMES CALDWELL JENKINS, a brainy Atlanta attorney, is a native of North Carolina, having been born in Gaston county, in that state, on May 22, 1853. Here he resided for eighteen years, and in the fall of 1871 left home to attend college. He first entered Wake Forest college, and remained in this institute for three years. When the course was completed he matriculated in Princeton university, and was graduated in the Centennial class of 1876 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, but by a continued application as post-graduate he received the Master of Arts degree after the lapse of three sessions. On leaving Princeton, where he went through three classes in one year, he traveled through Europe for six months, visiting the famous resorts and places of interest to Americans. Returning to his native country he took a course of study in the Columbian university of Washington, D. C., in the law department for two years, and there won the first prize for the best essay. Finishing here he went to the Columbia law school in New York, and received a diploma in 1881 with degree of LL. B. Soon after he came south, locating in Atlanta, Ga., where he was admitted to the bar in 1881, to the supreme court and United States district courts, and in 1889 to the United States supreme court. From March, 1883, to June, 1884, Mr. Jenkins acted as assistant United States attorney for the northern district of Georgia, appointed by Benjamin Brewster, and made an efficient officer. Indeed the marked ability he displayed gave him a high reputation. Mr. Jenkins was married May 24, 1882, to Miss Susie M. Scruggs of Atlanta. They have six children, a happy household, as follows: James C., Jr.; Welling Field, Eleanor Marjorie, Lydia Louise, Theodore Dwight, and a daughter not yet named. He is a tender, affectionate husband and father, and enjoys no evenings like those with his little ones about him. He is a devout member of the Second Baptist church of the city. Mr. Jenkins' father was David A. Jenkins, of North Carolina. He was state treasurer of his commonwealth between 1868 and 1876, serving two terms. He was also two terms in the legislature from Gaston county, N. C. The Jenkins family is of Welsh descent. Mr. Jenkins is a thorough, conscientious and painstaking lawyer, who is never discouraged by obstructions in his path. He has managed with success a number of large cases, and his practice is constantly growing.

HON. GEORGE E. JOHNSON, the chairman of the board of police commissioners, and one of Atlanta's most progressive and enterprising merchants, was born in the city of Richmond, Va., on Feb. 14, 1855. His father, Joseph A. Johnson, who is still living, is also a native Virginian, and was born in Richmond in 1827. He resided in that historic city until the breaking out of the late war, engaged in the sash and blind manufacturing business. Prior to the war he was the captain of the National Grays. In 1862 he entered the Confederate service, and after a year's experience in the field he was detailed to take charge of the arsenal at Tallassee, Ala., and remained there until the close of the war. He then came to Atlanta, Ga., where he has since resided. For the first eleven years of his life the subject of this sketch lived in Richmond and enjoyed for two or three years the best primary instruction of that city. Moving with his parents to Tallassee, Ala., where his father was stationed in charge of the arsenal, he remained there for two years and carried on his studies. In 1868, being still a mere boy, he came to Atlanta with his parents and went to school for three years. Leaving school he accepted a position with Mr. G. W. Jack, the candy manufacturer, at $10 a month, and later as head clerk at $85 a month; holding the latter position for two years. He then decided to go into the manufacturing business for the purpose of making himself familiar with its details. He accordingly threw up his $85 a month job and entered Jack's candy factory, working for nineteen months at the low rate of 40 cents a day. In 1874 Mr. Jack sold out to his brother, W. F. Jack, and the business was carried on for several years under the firm name of Jack & Holland. Mr. Johnson was at once made general superintendent with a salary of $175 a month. He held this position for five years, after which he bought out the firm and has since carried on the business by himself. Mr. Johnson is now at the head of one of the largest candy manufacturing enterprises in the south. He employs thirty people for nine months in the year and fifty for three months. The capacity of the establishment is 25,000 pounds of candy a week. Mr. Johnson has never had a man to voluntarily quit his employ on account of dissatisfaction. This speaks well for the kindness of heart as well as for the splendid administrative ability of Mr. Johnson. He has men in his employ who have been with him ever since he started up in business. For a number of years it has been the custom of Mr. Johnson, just before Christmas, to give a package of candy to every poor child in Atlanta, thus making the season one of thankfulness and joy. Last year he gave away, in this manner, 3,500 pounds of candy. His trade extends into North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Florida and Georgia. He has two men on the road and two in the city and runs four delivery wagons. In March, 1894, Mr. Johnson was elected a member of the board of police commissioners and just one year later on the five hundred and ninety-first ballot he was elected chairman of the board, defeating Capt. James W. English. Mr. Johnson belongs to the Order of Red Men, and also to the Odd Fellows. In 1885 he was united in marriage to Miss Eleanor Morgan, daughter of Mr. D. Morgan of Atlanta. They have three children, as follows: Mabel G., Lillian, and Edgar M. The household is a happy one and Mr. Johnson is fond of spending his leisure hours with his wife and children. Though not by any means a politician, Mr. Johnson has always been a wide-awake and public-spirited citizen, devoted to the welfare of the community. He has been the friend and, to a large extent, the patron of all enterprises that have promised to eventuate in good to the city. His career as a business man has not only been one of phenomenal success, but one of marked honor and usefulness.

JOSEPH H. JOHNSON, president of the Atlanta Loan and Investment company, Atlanta, Ga., son of Rev. Marcus D. C. and Harriet R. (Long) Johnson, was born in Culloden, Monroe Co., Ga., Feb. 20, 1840. His grandfather, Aaron Johnson, of the same stock as Hon. Reverdy Johnson, of national distinction, was a farmer, a native of Maryland, whence in early manhood he migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county, where he farmed until he died. Mr. Johnson's father was born in Elbert county in 1807, where he was raised on the farm. He was a Methodist minister, and died in Griffin, Ga., in 1849, aged forty-two years, after a ministerial service of more than twenty years. His mother was born in Savannah in 1810, and is still living (1894) at the advanced age of eighty-four years. Mr. Johnson's early boyhood was spent in Culloden; but when he was eight years old his father moved to Griffin, Spalding Co., Ga., where he was educated and grew to manhood. At his death in 1849, his father left nine children, the oldest of whom was only thirteen years old—our subject being the fourth child and only nine years old. When fourteen years of age Mr. Johnson entered the general merchandise store of Cherry & Bro., Griffin, as a clerk, and remained with them six years; commencing on a salary of $50 a year, and board, and, later, receiving $600, and privileges which brought him that much more. In August, 1860, he associated himself with E. P. Hill—their combined capital being about $5,000—to engage in the grocery business in Griffin. Purchasing a stock of groceries they run the business prosperously until May, 1861, when Mr. Johnson, who was a member of the Griffin light guards, entered the Confederate service. The guards became Company B, Fifth Georgia regiment, and he served in it as a private for six months, when he was discharged on account of bad health. Not long after this he was detailed to service in the quartermaster's department, in which he served at Pensacola and Mobile, Ala., and at Macon, Ga., until the close of the war, acting as chief clerk of the post. After the war Mr. Johnson, who (having made some fortunate investments) was about as well, if not better off, than when he entered the service, established himself in the banking and cotton business, which he conducted from 1866 to 1874. After farming two years he came to Atlanta—in 1877—and became connected with his brother, Mark W. Johnson, under the firm name of Mark W. Johnson & Co., in selling seeds and manufacturing and selling agricultural implements. In 1889 he sold his interest in this business and assisted in organizing the Atlanta National Building and Loan association, of which he was made general manager of agencies. He held this office two years and then resigned. He is also a director in the National Railway Building and Loan association which he assisted in organizing in 1891. In 1890 Mr. Johnson was made vice-president and general manager of the Interstate Abstract company, Atlanta. He is also prominently connected with the National Mutual Relief association, of which he is a trustee and its treasurer. Mr. Johnson was married in November, 1865, to Miss Sarah E., daughter of James A. Beeks, Griffin, Ga., by whom he had six children, of whom five survive; Ella H., wife of J. A. Droege, Savannah, Ga.; Mary B., wife of A. S. Hook, Atlanta; Joseph H., Jr., on the Atlanta "Journal" staff; Sarah E., and Fanny. Their mother was an exemplary member of the Methodist church, and died in 1884. Mr. Johnson is a member of the I. O. O. F., a royal arch Mason, and a prominent and zealous member of the Methodist church. Mr. Johnson had four brothers in the Confederate service during the war between the states: Marcus, now a seedsman merchant, Atlanta, quartermaster; Russell P., deceased, who was in the war but a short time, on account of ill health; Wilbur F., who at the age of seventeen was appointed a lieutenant on the United States coast survey, resigned when Georgia passed the ordinance of secession, and enlisted and went to Virginia with the Macon, Ga., volunteers. Soon after he was commissioned as a lieutenant in the Confederate navy, and assigned to duty at Pensacola, on the staff of Gen. Bragg, with the rank of captain of artillery. He was with Gen. Bragg at the battle of Corinth, accompanied him through the Kentucky campaign, and, returning, was wounded at Knoxville. He was next made assistant chief of ordnance under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and served with him until the latter part of 1864. At this time he was promoted to the rank of major and associated with Gen. Pillow (whose daughter he married) in Alabama in reorganizing stragglers, deserters, etc. After serving in this capacity several months he was assigned to the command of a battalion of troops in west Florida, where he was at the close of hostilities. He died in 1879. Michael A., who was a cadet in the Georgia military institute, went into the service with his young comrades in 1864, and remained until the surrender. He died in 1876.

DR. JOHN MILTON JOHNSON, now deceased, was a native of Kentucky, having been born in the "Blue Grass" state Jan. 15, 1812. His father was a courteous Virginia gentleman, who fought with the spirit and fire that enthused American patriots in the revolutionary war, practiced medicine for a number of years and afterward, until death, devoted his labors to the cause of religion as a beloved Presbyterian divine. His mother was Jane Leeper, niece of Mr. Polk, author of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. His brother, Gen. R. W. Johnson, belongs to the United States regular army. Dr. Johnson was taught by his father until prepared to enter college, then received a diploma from the Kentucky School of Medicine. He first located in Ramsey, Mecklenburg Co., during 1833 and there began active practice. In 1844 he removed to Fredonia, Ky. Remaining four years, he went to Marion, Ky., and in 1853 became a resident of southern Kentucky. From here, after three years' stay, he moved to Paducah, a small town in the same state, and came to Atlanta in 1862. His career as a practitioner and a learned student in the profession is far above the average and has been justly applauded. He was a member of the Georgia Medical association and the Atlanta Academy of Medicine, acting as president of the latter in 1875. From 1868 to 1872 he held the chair of physiology and pathological anatomy in the Atlanta Medical college. During the civil war he served three years in the Confederate army, having charge of the hospital at Nashville, Tenn., and filled the position of surgeon to Gen. A. S. Johnson. After the fall of Fort Donelson he was field surgeon with Gen. Buckner's division and accompanied Patrick Cleburne in the campaign of Murfreesboro, Tenn. Later as medical director of Hardee's command he achieved new honors and commendation. Dr. Johnson did not confine his labors to the medical profession alone, but gave valuable service to the state of Kentucky as a pure-minded, conscientious and capable legislator. He represented his county in both houses of the state's general assembly, filling a seat in the senate chamber for four years consecutively. Dr. Johnson was twice married, first in 1830, to Elizabeth Eaver of South Carolina, a lady of charming personality, who died in 1862. Subsequently, in 1864, he married Mrs. Mary Willis (nee Cobb) Erwin, sister of Howell Cobb, of Georgia, who possesses the same mental qualities as her honored brother. Dr. Johnson died in 1887. He was a pioneer in Atlanta's medical circles. His Christian character was much admired, and his history is preserved as a precious legacy for future generations.

COL. GEORGE HOYLE JONES, ex-principal keeper of the Georgia penitentiary, was born on a farm in Gwinnett county, Ga., Oct. 23, 1833, and remained there until twenty-one years of age, attending the "old field" schools. He adopted farming as a profession and is still engaged in that occupation, though the farm has not his personal supervision. In March, 1862, he enlisted in Company A, Forty-second Georgia regiment, but was soon transferred to the scouts, and in this capacity served under Gen. Braxton Bragg, Gen. Joe Johnston and Gen. Hood. Under Gen. Johnston he was made captain, and held that rank until the surrender. Capt. Jones figured conspicuously in the following battles: Walden's Ridge, Tenn.; Baton Rouge, La.; second battle of Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Bethel church, Kennesaw mountain, Atlanta, Frankfort and Nashville, Tenn., and Bentonville, N. C. He was captured on several occasions, but each time effected an escape. On July 19, 1864, he suffered a severe, painful accident that caused the loss of an eye. It was the result of the explosion of a bomb-shell and occurred near Atlanta. He returned to his farm in April, 1865, and there resided until 1870, when he was nominated and elected to the state legislature, serving two years. After the expiration of this term he again took up the labors of a planter, and was sent to the state senate during 1888, and while a member of the upper house served on several committees, among them the penitentiary and agricultural. In 1891 he was appointed principal keeper of the penitentiary. Col. Jones was married in 1857 to Anna E. Martin. By this wife he had four children: Willie Graham, R. H., F. T. and Clara, wife of Frank S. Howell, of Nebraska. Mrs. Jones died and for his second wife he married, in 1868, Miss Lollie L., sister of his first wife. To this marriage two children survive: G. L. and Mamie, wife of R. E. Skinner, of Milledgeville, Ga. Having the misfortune to lose his second wife he was married a third time, in 1877, to Miss Lula Trammell. Col. Jones is a member of the Norcross lodge of Gwinnett county, Ga., F. & A. M. and the I. O. O. F. He has always taken an active part in temperance work and organization, as did his father before him. Since 1869 he has been a steward in the Mt. Carmel Methodist church in Gwinnett county. Col. Jones' father was Thomas H. Jones, a native of Virginia, who came to Georgia during early manhood and died in 1876 at the advanced age of seventy-seven years. He had five sons in the late war: George H.; Thomas Allen, a private in the Forty-second Georgia regiment, who died from exposure in 1866; Benjamin F., major in the last war and a member of the Third Georgia battalion, who served as division quartermaster in Bragg's division and now resides in Kansas City, president of the water works company located there; R. M., also of the Third Georgia battalion and sergeant of artillery, and Peter F., a member of the old Gate City guards, in which company he enlisted for one year of the war. Col. Jones' grandfather was Wylie Jones, born in Wales, who emigrated to America with his father, Allen Jones, in 1790, and settled in Virginia.

CAPT. W. R. JOYNER, chief of the Atlanta fire department, was born in Cobb county, Ga., June 30, 1854, the son of R. W. and L. C. Joyner, his mother's maiden name being Robertson. At the age of seven years he came to Atlanta in company with his parents and has since resided in that city. During the succeeding five years he was a pupil in the public schools, but discontinued his studies in 1868 to take a position with W. F. Peck & Company, as retail clerk, and remained in their employ for eight years. Leaving this firm he traveled for W. H. Patterson & Company, a wholesale millinery establishment, for eighteen months, and on resigning this position entered the tailor shop of Jerry Lynch as salesman, and remained there two years. For a few months of 1878-79 he worked with C. W. Brunner & Company, a gents' furnishing goods house of Atlanta. In July, 1879, Capt. Joyner withdrew permanently from commercial life, and has held office in the city government continuously since. He was elected city marshal, and re-elected for two terms, serving in all six years. In 1885 he was chosen chief of the fire department by the municipal council, and holds that position to-day. Two years before he had been honored with this office, together with that of city marshal, but declined the former. In November, 1878, Capt. Joyner was married to Clio B., daughter of Dr. E. J. Setze, of Marietta, Ga. They have four children, as follows: Richard W., Walthall R., Jr., Harry S. and Ralph. Capt. Joyner is a member of the Mystic Shrine, a Knight Templar Mason and is past sachem of the Tallulah Tribe No. 29, I. O. R. M. He also belongs to the Commercial and Atlanta Driving clubs, and in both takes a zealous interest. Capt. Joyner has cordially co-operated with the military since physically able to carry a gun, and from 1875 to 1878 acted as sergeant of the Atlanta cadets. Capt. Joyner has made the Atlanta fire department what it is to-day; from a small volunteer company he has gradually added mechanical apparatus, increased the number of stations and multiplied the first nucleus of members until it now ranks first among the similar organizations of the south. It is handsomely equipped with all the latest modern improvements, attached to harness, horses and engines. Capt. Joyner is regarded second to none in his efficient management and superior tactics of subduing and contending with the flames. His bravery is almost daily demonstrated. He is the idol of every member of the department, for his deeds of kindness and liberality toward them warrant their devotion. Under his regime the number of large and destructive fires has diminished and the insurance companies, as well as the general public, feel a satisfaction and security that proclaim the truest attestation to his competency as a public official. With his little red wagon, drawn by a blooded steed, he is known to every man, woman and child of Atlanta.

CAPT. JOHN M'INTOSH KELL was born at Laurel Grove, McIntosh Co., Ga., on the banks of the Altamaha river, in 1823, almost within sound of the sea upon whose waves many years of his long, useful, and eventful life were to be passed. His great-great-grandfather, John Mohr McIntosh—or, as the Scotch write it, McIntosh Mohr, the word “Mohr” meaning chief of a clan—came over from Scotland to join Gen. Oglethorpe in 1735, bringing with him one hundred Highlanders and settling in that part of the coast country which still commemorates his name. These Highlanders served with great distinction in all the struggles with the Spaniards in those early days. At the attack of St. Augustine, John McIntosh was wounded, captured by the Spaniards, and carried in captivity to Spain, where he remained a number of years. Gen. Oglethorpe took his family under his immediate protection, appointed his eldest sons, William and Lachlan, cadets in the regiment under his own command. The blood of heroic sires could scarcely fail to produce men of military genius, and among the family names are to be found some that will adorn American history so long as we continue to honor brave deeds and hold patriotism as a sacred virtue. The father of Capt. John McIntosh Kell was a lawyer of distinction, and was the junior partner of Gen. Anthony Wayne. He died at the comparatively early age of forty, leaving a widow and five young children. Taught at his noble mother's knee that life is earnest and duty holy, the subject of this sketch soon took up his part in life, and became the stay and pride of his mother, thus foreshadowing the part he was to take in later years. Through the assistance of influential friends, he was appointed a midshipman in the navy. At the age of sixteen he left the home of his childhood, and, as years went on, took his share in all the important events that illustrated his country at home and abroad. He served with distinction in the Mexican war. He was an officer in Commodore Perry's famous expedition to Japan, which opened to modern civilization that unknown and wonderful country. He volunteered for duty in the threatened trouble with Paraguay, but the intervention of Urquiza, president of the Argentine republic, prevented war. Later, when in the zenith of his manhood, he served his own state and the Confederacy with all the devotion of his heart through the perils and disasters of the war between the states. In October, 1856, he married Miss Julia Blanche Munroe, of Macon, Ga. A brief service at Norfolk and eighteen months at the Pensacola navy yard constituted his only duties on shore. When the civil war began he was junior lieutenant at Pensacola. Upon the secession of Georgia from the union he tendered his services to his native state, and was placed in command of the steamer “Savannah,” for coast defense, where he remained till May 1, 1861, when, acting under confidential orders, he proceeded to New Orleans and reported for duty to Capt. Raphael Semmes. The Confederate government had purchased a passenger steamer that had run between New Orleans and Havana, and Capt. Semmes, having been tendered the command, had just begun the rather difficult task—at that time—of remodeling her and fitting her out as a war vessel. While the hull of the "Habana" was well built and she was quite fast, her upper works were too light, having been built for passenger accommodation only. After some weeks of work, however, she was put into shape for war purposes, and armed with one pivot 8-inch smooth-bore gun, and four thirty-two pounders (medium), in broadside. With this armament, and with a crew ready to brave any danger, the "Sumter," as she was re-christened in honor of the fort of that name, succeeded in running the blockade on June 30, 1861, in the face of the steam sloop-of-war, "Brooklyn," which chased her forty miles and nearly captured her. The winds and waves favored the daring little craft, however, and with skillful management she made her way to the high seas, where she began her career to "prey upon the commerce of the enemy." The second day out she captured her first prize, the "Golden Rocket." This was the beginning of her brilliant record, for which history has not given her full honor, as she has been overshadowed by the marvelous career of the "Alabama," her famous successor. Capt. Semmes' able and delightful book, Service Afloat, gives in detail the cruise of the "Alabama." Capt. Kell was executive officer of both vessels, for which position Admiral Semmes says he applied for him, because, having known him as a youth, he discovered that he "had in him the making of a man," and knew that he would discharge this trust with fidelity and ability. His daring career is recorded in the history of his country. After the loss of the "Alabama" he returned to the Confederacy, and was appointed to the command of the iron-clad, "Richmond." At the close of the war, worn with service and saddened by defeat, he quietly withdrew to a lonely country home, with no legacy but the consciousness of duty well performed, and with no light save the star of love shining at his fireside, to begin life anew amid the desolation of his native state. The coast, almost deserted by his kindred, had little charm for him; so amid the red clay hills of middle Georgia he found a refuge and a home, and reared manly sons and winsome daughters—"the world forgetting, by the world forgot"; until he was called by Gov. Gordon to be his chief of staff and adjutant-general of the state. He has since found congenial work, and a reward for past service and disappointments in the love and respect of his fellow-countrymen.

DR. WILLIAM S. KENDRICK, the subject of this sketch, has been for several years the proctor of the Atlanta Medical college. By reason of his conspicuous talents he is recognized as one of the leading exponents of the medical profession in the south. Dr. Kendrick was born on a plantation in Chattooga county, Ga., near the Alabama state line. He grew up among the furrows, so to speak, and his early life was that of the ordinary country youth, diversified only by such pastimes as fishing, hunting, and other innocent amusements of the plantation. He attended an old-field school, taught by Rev. F. C. Crawford, and later, by Prof. Dunlap Scott. In 1858, under the principalship of Prof. Scott, the school was transformed into a village academy, and became a local institution of rare merit. In 1862, young Kendrick enlisted as private in Company B, Ninth Georgia infantry. Although an immature stripling, he was full of the martial spirit and bent on shouldering his musket. He was at once made orderly of the regiment, and assisted in keeping the books and records. He did other valuable work and served in this capacity with marked devotion throughout the entire war. He was in the battles of Gettysburg, Spottsylvania, the Wilderness, Petersburg, and quite a number of minor engagements. He was stationed at Petersburg for nearly six months. Though never wounded, the young soldier had many narrow escapes. He was at home on a furlough at the time of Gen. Lee's surrender. For two years subsequent to the war young Kendrick managed his father's plantation and taught school. He became the principal of the institute he had previously attended, and for more than five years taught the young of that immediate section of the country. He commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Robert Battey, of Rome, Ga., and subsequently attended the Jefferson Medical college, at Philadelphia, for one year. Dr. Battey, having accepted a professorship in the Atlanta Medical college, the young student left the Philadelphia institution and came to Atlanta, graduating from the medical college, in which his patron was an honored preceptor, in 1874. Dr. Kendrick commenced the practice of his profession in Atlanta, and, after a successful experience of three years, he decided to prosecute his medical and scientific studies still further by attending the best institutions of London, Paris and Edinburg. He sailed for Europe accordingly, and entered upon the laborious study of his profession, under the leading scientists of the old world. On account of the diligence and fervor of his application he impaired his eyesight, and was forced to return to America. He remained for two or three years at his old home in Chattooga county, after which he spent three months in Bellevue hospital, New York city, thus further perfecting himself for the practice of his profession. In the fall of 1877 he came to Atlanta, and has since continued to practice medicine in that city. Dr. Kendrick is a member of the State Medical association, and is recognized as one of the ablest men in that body. He is also a member of the Atlanta Medical society, having served as the executive head of this organization. Dr. Kendrick has several times been a delegate from Georgia to the American Medical association, and has always taken a prominent part in the deliberations of the convention. As the proctor of the Atlanta Medical college, Dr. Kendrick has entire charge of the finances of that institution. He is a consistent member of the Central Presbyterian church, and is a man of deep religious convictions, believing that no life is complete or well rounded that is not modeled after the pattern of the Great Physician. Dr. Kendrick was united in marriage in 1877 to Miss Lula, daughter of Maj. W. L. Groves, who served as the gallant major of the Thirty-ninth Georgia regiment during the war. The father of Dr. Kendrick was a plain, but successful farmer, possessing a strong mind and character. He believed in the simple maxims of truth and honesty, and these he constantly held up before the minds of his children. He was a native of York district, in South Carolina, and died in 1876, at the age of sixty-nine years. The maiden name of Dr. Kendrick's mother was Martha Scott. She had nine children—four sons and five daughters. The only death in her family for nearly fifty years was that of her husband. Dr. Kendrick has been the proctor of the Atlanta Medical college since 1887. During his administration the record of attendance has steadily increased, and the institution has enjoyed great prosperity. No physician in Atlanta has a stronger personal following than Dr. Kendrick. His talents, his dignified bearing and his genial affability have made him not only a leading and successful practitioner, but one of the chief ornaments of his profession.

H. I. KIMBALL was a potent factor in Atlanta's prosperity. Much of his life was devoted to her upbuilding and welfare. He was the son of a poor carriage maker, and was reared to follow the same trade. He was born in Oxford county, Me., in 1832, and died April 28, 1895. Becoming dissatisfied with the narrow scope of opportunity in his native town, he left home at the age of nineteen years and went to New Haven, Conn., where a better position was offered in a large carriage manufactory. He labored unceasingly, and soon was made manager of one of the most extensive factories in New England. But, although performing his allotted tasks perfectly, nature had prepared him for higher things, and determined that he should rise to positions that would allow executive ability and open for the world's betterment the gates of his great, noble heart. He lived in Boston for a short while, and then was called to Chicago, in 1866, to accept a responsible position with George Pullman. Being assigned the duty of building street car lines in the southern cities, he made an extended tour through the south, visiting Atlanta among other places. He was fascinated with the thrift and enterprise here visible, and predicted a brilliant future for this section and city. He assumed the management of the southern branch of the Pullman Car company, located in Atlanta, and for the next twenty years we see evidences of his labor in behalf of progress. It was largely through his instrumentality that the state capitol was removed to Atlanta; that the opera house was erected, and the union depot became a reality. He decided the wholesale section of the city by having the railroad tracks laid in their present positions at the rear of Alabama street, and encouraged the building of many additional railroads. At one time he was president of nine distinct companies. His activity secured the state bonds that enabled the Brunswick & Macon railroad to be built. In the Chicago fire of 1871 he suffered severe loss that "threw a damper" over his spirit for almost two years. Adversity greatly affects an ambitious man. Mr. Kimball always believed that the south was the best locality for the manufacture of cotton, and strenuously urged the erection and operation of the Atlanta cotton mills. He also organized the Peters Park Investment company, and capitalized it at $200,000, and raised the Kimball house twice to completion. Mr. Kimball was a popular man, and having once formed a purpose, its consummation was inevitable. He was persevering, industrious, with personal judgment, coolness of decision and the courage of his convictions. He was a Methodist by faith, and a republican by political principle. He married the daughter of Mr. George Cook, of Boston, and left as his successors his wife and three children: Laura, the wife of Mr. Covall, of Boston; Mae, a charming young woman, and Hannibal I. Kimball, a rising young business man of Chicago.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL KING, one of the leading members of the Georgia bar, and one of the most successful practitioners in the state, is a native of Charleston, S. C., and was born in that aristocratic old southern city on Dec. 7, 1856. From Charleston the subject of this sketch moved with his parents to Greenville, S. C., in 1862. Here he remained for six years, attending the primary schools and gaining the rudiments of an education on which he has since built the superstructure of his life's work. In 1868 he left the palmetto state in company with his parents and sought a home in Georgia, settling at Savannah, a city that resembled in many of its characteristics the city of his birth. In 1872 he went to Marietta, and two years later he came to Atlanta. Here his migrations ended. Since coming to Atlanta Mr. King has identified himself to such an extent with her busy life that he is looked upon as a typical Atlanta citizen. Leaving school at the age of fifteen the subject of this sketch though possessed of an ardent thirst for learning, was denied the privilege of a college education. He made the best of his opportunities, however, and after beginning the skirmish of life he devoted himself to his books, at such intervals as he could spare, with remarkable zeal and assiduity. He was determined, if possible, to supply by self-culture the deficiencies of a collegiate education; and the success to which he has carried this resolution is emphasized by the fact that no member of the Atlanta bar is more widely read or possesses a broader range of general information. In February, 1874, Mr. King began the study of law with Col. George T. Fry (now of Chattanooga, Tenn.), one of the leading members of the Atlanta bar at that time. The young law student was admitted to the bar on April 9, 1875, entering at once into a legal partnership with Col. Fry. This, however, was dissolved in December, 1877, Mr. King continuing the practice alone until 1882, when he became a member of the firm of Van Epps, Calhoun & King. This partnership lasted until 1885, when the legal combination of King & Spalding was formed, the younger member of the firm being Mr. Jack J. Spalding. In January, 1887, the name of Patrick Calhoun was placed at the head of the firm, and for several years it was known as Calhoun, King & Spalding. The recent retirement of Mr. Calhoun from the firm gives it the original style of King & Spalding. Mr. King was chosen a delegate to the gubernatorial convention that nominated Gen. John B. Gordon for chief executive of the state in 1886. With this exception he has never occupied nor sought political position, and has merely discharged the duties of a quiet citizen, maintaining a deep interest in political affairs, but entirely without selfish or personal ambition. Though a loyal democrat and pronounced in his views on all party questions, he has never taken the stump, preferring to discuss issues quietly and to use his influence in behalf of his principles or his friends without parade or ostentation. From 1888 to 1892 the firm of Calhoun, King & Spalding represented the terminal combination of railroads in the southern territory, embracing, at that time, the entire Richmond and Danville and Central systems. At the same time they were employed as general counsel for the Atlanta & West Point railroad and the Queen & Crescent system in Georgia, besides doing a large general practice. The firm of King & Spalding is one of the best in Atlanta, and nearly all the important cases tried before the courts of that city are represented, on one side or the other, by these enterprising attorneys. Mr. King argued alone in the supreme court of Georgia the case of Angier vs. the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railroad, securing a reversal of the decision of the court below, and in the report of the case (Seventy-fourth Georgia, page 642) Justice Jackson, in concluding his opinion paid Mr. King the following high compliment: "I desire to express my obligations to Mr. King of counsel for the plaintiff in error, for the able and exhaustive argument and very complete brief he made in this cause." Mr. King was married on July 13, 1881, to Miss Alice M., a daughter of Mr. N. R. Fowler, of Atlanta. The success of Mr. King has not been restricted to his professional aspirations. He has demonstrated his ability in various directions. From 1881 to 1888 he served as a director of the Young Men's Library association, and took an active part in the promotion and upbuilding of that institution. For a number of years Mr. King was the chairman of the library committee, and in this office had charge of the library and its extension. He is one of the charter members of the Georgia Bar association, and was during the preceding year chairman of the executive committee. Before this body Mr. King has read a number of papers, among which may be mentioned: "A Sketch of the History of Land Titles in Georgia," read in Atlanta in August, 1885, and "Reform of Pleadings in Georgia," read in July, 1894, at Rome, Ga. Both of these essays, by distinctly pointing out the defects in the law, have resulted in various important modifications by the state legislature. No two papers ever read before the association produced a greater impression or resulted in such permanent good. Mr. King is a man of social inclinations, and is fond of the companionship and association of his friends. Though fond of reading and research, possessing a broad range of the best literature, as well as the current topics of the day, he takes a special delight in conversation, and is always ready for a social chat. He is one of the original members of the Capital City club and the Atlanta Driving club. As a lawyer, a man and a citizen, Mr. King has always commanded the respect and confidence of the community. Mr. King's father, Mr. J. Gadsden King, is still living. He is a native of South Carolina, but for a number of years has been a resident of Atlanta. Mr. King's grandfather, Mitchell King, was a native of Scotland, and emigrated to South Carolina in early manhood just after the war of 1812. He settled in Charleston, S. C., and immediately began the practice of law. It will be observed that the legal profession in its successful practice, as well as in a theoretical knowledge of the law, has come to the subject of this sketch by inheritance. Mr. King is still a comparatively young man. In the enjoyment of vigorous health, he has many years of activity before him, and will no doubt continue to illustrate for years to come both the genius and culture of the Georgia bar.

DR. JAMES JERROLD KNOTT was born in Henry county, Ga., June 16, 1839.

In 1844 he moved with his parents to Griffin, Ga., where he received his primary education, and resided until 1858. In 1851 he entered his father's drug store in Griffin, and later commenced the study of medicine under his father, Dr. Edward F. Knott. In 1858 he came to Atlanta and entered the Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in the spring of 1859. He then returned to Griffin and practiced his profession for one year, after which he went to Paris, France, where he remained until the fall of 1860, visiting the hospitals of that city. Returning to Griffin, he again resumed the practice of medicine. In the winter of 1860-61 he delivered a course of lectures on anatomy and clinical surgery at the Georgia Medical college, at Griffin. In the spring of 1861 he applied for a position in the medical department of the Confederate army. Having failed in this, he enlisted as a private in an independent company which had been organized at Atlanta, and was sent to Pensacola. At the latter place the company was assigned to the First Georgia and Mississippi regiment, in which he served until October, 1861. After his discharge from the Confederate service he reported for duty to Gov. Joseph E. Brown, near Savannah, Ga., who assigned him to the Fourth Georgia regiment (state troops), as assistant surgeon, in which rank he served six months, at the expiration of which he received a commission from the secretary of war, as assistant surgeon in the Confederate army. He was immediately assigned to the camp of instruction at Griffin, Ga., where he remained a month, and then went to Virginia, as assistant surgeon in the Fifty-third Georgia regiment, and served until the seven days' fight around Richmond, when he was made surgeon in charge, although still remaining assistant surgeon in rank. He was in the Sharpsburg campaign, and was left in charge of the wounded after that memorable battle, where he remained until November, 1862, and then rejoined his command at Culpeper Court House, Va. He continued with his command until just previous to the battle of Fredericksburg, when he was placed in charge of the smallpox hospital of Gen. Lee's army, at Fredericksburg. He remained there until the battle of Chancellorsville commenced, when he rejoined his command as assistant surgeon in charge, and remained with it until the battle of Petersburg, Va., when he was commissioned as surgeon, and continued with the regiment until January, 1865, at which time he returned to his home on sick leave. After a month's rest he started to return to his regiment, but was taken sick at Augusta and placed in a hospital. On his recovery, he went on duty there in charge of the officers' ward, and was there when Gen. Lee surrendered. He returned to Griffin and again entered upon the practice of his profession, pursuing it until the fall of 1866, when he settled in Atlanta, where he has continued to engage actively in the practice of medicine and surgery. During the yellow fever epidemic in Chattanooga, Tenn., he volunteered his services, did magnificent work, and contracted the disease himself. Dr. Knott was first married, in 1868, to Fannie E. Howe, by whom he had four children, living: Edward L., Mary Eudora, wife of H. C. McCool, Atlanta; Frances A. and James P. In 1883 Dr. Knott was married a second time, to Nellie J. McCool. They have one girl, Eugenia. In 1893 he made a trip of observation of two weeks' duration to Brunswick and Jesup, Ga., during the yellow fever epidemic at those places. Dr. Knott's father was Edward F. Knott, who was born in Caswell county, N. C., and came to Georgia in his early manhood. He attended a course of lectures at Lexington, Ky., and in 1859 he was graduated from the Augusta Medical college. He practiced medicine chiefly at Griffin, and died in 1878. At the age of eighteen he lost a leg, and was thereby incapacitated from active service in the army; but he was engaged in the hospital service during the war. Back in the 40's he was a candidate for the legislature from Henry county, Ga., and was beaten by one vote. He married Mary A. F. Crenshaw, and by her had nine children, of whom five survive and reside in this state: Dr. James Jerrold Knott, John S. Knott, of Spalding county, Ga.; Dr. David F. Knott, of Carrollton; Louisa, widow of H. Johnson, of Brooks Station, and Edmund F. Knott, of Pike county, Ga. The mother of Dr. James Jerrold Knott died in 1888. His grandfather was James W. Knott, who was born in England, and came to America in his early manhood, with his brother; located first in Granville county, N. C., and came to Salem, Clarke Co., Ga., about 1830, and later to McDonough, Henry Co., Ga., where he spent most of his life. He died within ten miles of that place, in 1865.

MR. CLARENCE KNOWLES. Perhaps no man in Georgia is more thoroughly identified with the insurance business in this state than Mr. Clarence Knowles. Mr. Knowles was born in Pensacola, Fla., in December, 1853. He resided in that state until the beginning of the late war, at which time he moved with his parents to Columbus, Ga., being then about eight years old. He received his early training from the schools of that city, but as soon as the war closed he returned to Pensacola, where his education was completed. In 1870, though still a mere youth, he decided to try his luck in New York, and accordingly embarked in the metropolitan life of that city. He secured a good position with one of the best insurance companies of New York, and soon developed in usefulness to such a marked extent that his employers could very easily foreshadow his success in the insurance field. Having acquired a thorough knowledge of the business, and made the acquaintance of all the leading insurance men of the country, Mr. Knowles decided that a wider field of success awaited him in the south, and, returning to this section, he located in Columbia, S. C. He shortly afterward came to Atlanta, acting at that time in the capacity of a general adjuster. His first impressions of Atlanta were so favorable that he decided to cast his lot in that city. He found it the home of industrious and enterprising business men, whose progressive spirit prophesied for it a commanding place among the cities of the south. His friendships rapidly increased, and he soon realized that he was building up a large and remunerative business in that city. At the present time Mr. Knowles is the southern agent for quite a number of fire insurance companies, and he has the reputation of conducting one of the largest and most successful agencies in Georgia. Mr. Knowles is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and is also a Knight Templar and a Shriner. Mr. Knowles was united in marriage, in 1882, to Miss Fannie Judah, daughter of Mr. William H. Judah, of Pensacola.

Fla., now deceased. They have only two children, Constance and Clarence, Jr. Devoted to his little household, Mr. Knowles spends much of his time in the enjoyment of his home fireside. He delights in entertaining his friends, and never appears to be so happy as when they avail themselves of his generous hospitality. Belonging to one of the best families of the south, the social and personal characteristics of Mr. Knowles are peculiar to this section. No man in Atlanta possesses a larger or more loyal retinue of friends, and no one is more willing to serve them than Mr. Knowles. Few readers of southern literature are more familiar with the best publications of southern authors, or include a greater number of them among their warm personal friends. He has frequently entertained at his home that gifted southern writer, Mr. Thomas Nelson Page, and is a very enthusiastic admirer of his books. Mr. Knowles has never courted political influence, and has always been careful to avoid the scramble for office. He is a close observer, however, and is always ready to discuss public questions in a conversational way. His views are maturely formed and always fearlessly expressed. Recently Mr. Knowles was drawn as a member of the United States grand jury. Judge Newman, recognizing his ability, designated him as the foreman of that body, and a careful review of the record will show that a more thorough or faithful officer never discharged the duties of that responsible position. In both his public and private life Mr. Knowles has always exemplified the qualities of a true man and a good citizen.

ANTON L. KONTZ, Atlanta, Ga., was born in the city just after the city itself was born, his parents having come here in 1848, a short time previous to his birth. They settled on Marietta street, nearly opposite where the United States custom house now stands, and the spot where he first saw the light of day ever since has been his home. His father owned a small farm near the city on which young Anton was an enthusiastic helper; the then "plow-boy" has since developed into one of the ablest financiers, and one of the most popular, influential and progressive of Atlanta's progressive citizens. His early education was obtained in Atlanta, which, even then, could claim to have as good schools as any in the state. After the war he made the acquaintance of Alexander H. Stephens, who at once became deeply interested in him, and in 1871 induced him to go to Baltimore and enter Richard Malcolm Johnston's school for boys. He attended that school three years, then returned to Atlanta and engaged as a clerk in a leading tobacco store. In less than a year afterward he secured a position as conductor with the Pullman Sleeping Car company. After serving as such four years he was made assistant agent in the Atlanta office, then agent, and in 1879 he was promoted to the superintendency of the Atlanta district, which comprised at that time almost the entire south, and was the highest position in their gift in this section. He held this position twelve years, and then, in 1891, resigned to accept the administratorship of several large estates and give closer attention to his own increasing capitalistic interests. He was regarded by Mr. Pullman as one of the very best of his able staff of officers; and had he not loved Atlanta so well, he might have gone higher, and held more responsible positions elsewhere. As evidence of his superior financial ability, as well as his conscientious fidelity to trusts confided, one instance may be cited: One estate he took charge of conservative business men valued at $65,000. In less than two years he wound it up and paid over to the three legatees $55,000 each, total $165,000, earning almost interest enough to pay the entire expense of administration. Although he had always been regarded as a man of sound business judgment and financial ability, his wonderful success in the management of this and other large estates, and of his own affairs, brought him into greater prominence, so that to-day Mr. Kontz is considered one of the soundest and safest of Atlanta's business men. Owing to his extreme modesty he has persistently refused public office, for which his peculiar abilities have often caused him to be suggested. When the Commercial Travelers' Savings bank was organized Mr. Kontz, believing that the city needed such an institution, accepted the cashiership and active management, which he held for eighteen months, until it had been firmly established. Mr. Kontz is and has for some years been a director of the Southern Banking and Trust company. At present he is the treasurer of the Cotton States and International exposition, which is at present being held in Atlanta. In 1888 he was elected a member of the city general council, defeating his opponent, himself a prominent and popular citizen, by 1,900 majority, which was the largest majority given any candidate for city office at that election. He was made chairman of the committee on parks, and took great interest in the improvement of Grant park; was a member of the finance committee; and was one of the board of water commissioners, and chairman of the water works committee, when the preparations were begun for the city's splendid new water supply. The same year he was elected a member of the council he was elected a member of the city board of education, and is still a member, and chairman of the committee on teachers and examinations. He takes great interest in the public schools; and of all the positions Mr. Kontz has held, he prizes that of being member of Atlanta's board of education most highly. Although not a politician he takes great interest in politics; and when Alexander H. Stephens was nominated for governor in 1881, he and a few other friends organized the Stephens club, and so enthusiastic and efficient was its campaign that Fulton county gave Mr. Stephens a larger majority than any other county in the state. This club is still in existence as the Young Men's Democratic league, and is the strongest political organization in the county. Mr. Stephens' admiration and friendship were such—for it increased from the time he first knew him as a boy—that when he was elected he wanted to give him a public office—an honor which Mr. Kontz declined. Poverty and distress arouse his profoundest sympathy. All organized charities find in him a cheerful and generous supporter and co-laborer. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and Encampment, has held all the chairs, and is now grand warden of the grand lodge of Georgia. He affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

ERNEST C. KONTZ, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., was raised in Atlanta and received his primary education in the public schools. He was afterward employed for two years in the large wholesale house of John Silvey & Co., where he received valuable business training. In 1880 he began a four years' course at Neel's Kirkwood Military academy, where under the strict discipline of a graduate of the United States Military academy he was prepared for college, entering the university of Georgia in the fall of 1884; here he was anniversarian of the Phi Kappa Literary society, by election of its membership, 1887; was president of his class 1887; and was public speaker in both his junior and senior years, as the reward of his scholarship. He graduated from the literary department 1887. In 1888 he took a course of law lectures under Prof. John B. Minor at the university of Virginia. In 1889 he graduated from the law department of the university of Georgia. Within a few months after his admission to the bar, which occurred in 1889, he was appointed sole counsel for Pullman's Palace Car company for Georgia and South Carolina. In 1890 he was, without more than the expression of a willingness to serve, elected over a strong opponent recorder of the city of Atlanta. As recorder he tried about 12,000 cases; of these only eleven were appealed; none was ever reversed, and in one particularly hard fought case involving large property rights, which was twice carried to the supreme court, he was both times sustained. He has a large law clientage, and takes an active interest in all movements for the moral and intellectual advancement of the community; is a member of the board of directors for the Young Men's Library association, one of the foremost libraries of the south; a director of the Young Men's Christian association, and is the superintendent of one of the largest and most flourishing mission Sunday schools about the city, as an adjunct to which is run a large free day school. His parents were both Germans and Judge Kontz highly honors the sturdy people of his ancestry, but himself born in this country and having a large acquaintance throughout the state and having traveled quite extensively throughout the various sections, has broad views of our country. In a literary address delivered by him on the subject "Georgia" he said: "Oh, proud Georgia! Mother of soldiers, scholars, statesmen, grand men and noble women, seated on your everlasting hills clothed in the rich drapery of forest and of plain; decked in your rich rude jewels, and with lap well filled with amaranth of immortality, sheaves and choicest gifts for your children; in one hand cities, the other outstretched in benevolent deeds and ever ready for the protection of your people; your feet resting at the sea, 'mid orange blossoms, emblems of your worth; your tresses bound with mountain laurel, fit emblem of your virtue and your glorious achievements; palms strew your pathway; with your sisters go on in your majesty while the nations wondering watch your sure and steady march to new victories and to greater glory." These sentiments illustrate his love both of state and of the indissoluble union. He is careful, thorough, scholarly, is himself his severest critic, and has the promise of a successful career.

ER LAWSHE, retired jeweler and optician, Atlanta, Ga., son of John and Mary Lawshe, was born in Union county, Pa., March 27, 1824. His grandfather, John Lawshe, was a citizen of New Jersey, and was a commissary in the army during the war of 1812. His father, also named John, was born in New Jersey, and died in Pennsylvania in 1845, aged 61 years. Mr. Lawshe was raised on the farm, and the only education he received was four terms of schooling of three months each. In 1828, when he was four years old, his parents moved to Louisburg, Union Co., Pa., where he lived until 1848, when he left home to build up his fortune in the south. He traveled by wagon from his home to Pittsburg, thence by boat down the river to New Orleans, coming from there to Bibb county, Ga., where his brother, William C. Lawshe, had been living some years. He remained there six months, and then came to Atlanta, where he located Aug. 16, 1848. Atlanta has been his home ever since. The first thing he did was to make some window sash, he having learned the cabinet-makers' trade in Pennsylvania. The following December he went to work for a jeweler, and made himself master of that trade. A year later, the latter part of 1850, himself and Riley Baker formed a partnership—Baker having $31.75 in stock, and himself $7.25 in cash. A year later Mr. Lawshe bought out his partner and continued in the business until 1884, being compelled to retire from active business life, on account of three years of sickness, from which he has fully recovered, and is now in the enjoyment of robust health, full of the vim and vigor which characterized his early manhood. With erect form, elastic step, and a bright eye twinkling with humor, he walks Atlanta's streets now as aforetime. During the early stages of the civil war he was in the state's service, and, later, in that of the Confederate States; on account of disability he was assigned to gathering supplies for the hospitals. He remained in Atlanta until the first shell was thrown into the city, when he was ordered to

JOHN R. LEWIS.

Augusta, Ga., to attend to the above duties. Mr. Lawshe organized the first lodge of Odd Fellows in Atlanta, in 1849; was noble grand four terms, and represented his lodge in the grand lodge three times, of which he has been grand senior warden. He is now an Ancient Odd Fellow. He is also a member of the Improved Order of Red Men. In 1851 Mr. Lawshe was made a Mason, and he has been exalted to the royal arch degree. In 1852 he united with the Methodist church, of which he has been a liberal, consistent and working member ever since. The church was then known as Wesley chapel, but is now known as the First M. E. church, south. He was chairman of the building committee which had in charge the erection of the present spacious and imposing edifice; is chairman of the board of trustees, and a member of the board of stewards. Mr. Lawshe was married Aug. 8, 1854, to Miss Sallie W., daughter of Willis Peck, who, with his wife, was a native of North Carolina. This union was blessed with five children: John Z., prominent physician, Atlanta, rapidly rising to professional distinction; William P., died in 1892; Anne E., wife of Eugene Hardeman, Atlanta; Margaret M., and Er, Jr. The estimable wife and mother—a lifetime consecrated and zealous member of the Methodist church, died Nov. 9, 1894.

THOMAS JAMES LEFTWICH, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., son of Rev. James Turner Leftwich, was born in Alexandria, Va., in 1861. His father was a native of Virginia, and is a retired Presbyterian clergyman. He was a chaplain in the Confederate service; and, in response to a call, came to Atlanta in 1868, assuming the pastorate of the Central Presbyterian church. Later, he accepted a call to the First Presbyterian church in Baltimore, and removed to that city. He is not now doing any stated work. Mr Leftwich was seven years old when his father came to Atlanta, where he received his boyhood schooling, including a course at Neal's Military school at Edgewood, a delightful suburb of the city. Later, he attended the Bingham academy, at Mebaneville, N. C., where he was prepared for college. He then entered Johns Hopkins university, Baltimore, where he took a special course, including law, graduating in 1880; immediately after which he was admitted to the bar, at Annapolis, Md. Locating in Minneapolis, Minn., he entered vigorously upon the practice of his profession, in which he was very successful, achieving many notable triumphs, established a fine reputation, and secured a good clientage. Believing that Atlanta would become the great city of the south, with a great future before her, he determined to remove to the city; so, in 1890, he came to Atlanta. He has been singularly successful from the start, both in management of his cases and securing an influential clientage. In May, 1893, he became associated with Capt. Harry Jackson in the practice, a partnership which still continues. Mr. Leftwich has an exalted conception of his profession, conforms to its time-honored customs, and is scrupulously exact in his transactions with his clients and the profession. Enthusiastically devoted to the law, and of unquestioned ability, he has a brilliant future before him. He possesses a delightful, magnetic personality, is a fluent and instructive conversationalist, a fine writer and impressive speaker—in all things a perfect gentleman. Mr. Leftwich was happily married in Bedford county, Va., in 1883, to Miss Camilla S. Price, a member of a distinguished old family of Virginia. He is a member of the Presbyterian church.

GEN. JOHN RANDOLPH LEWIS, secretary Cotton States and International exposition, was born in Erie county, Pa., Sept. 22, 1834, where he received his education and lived until he was sixteen years old. Leaving there in 1851, he went to Buffalo, N. Y., where he studied and practiced dentistry until 1856. That year he went to Philadelphia, Pa., and graduated at the Philadelphia College of Dental Surgery, and then went to Burlington, Vt., where he practiced his profession, entered the university of Vermont, located there, and in 1860, graduated from the medical department. He, however, did not engage in the practice. In April, 1861, he volunteered in the Union service, and May 2 was mustered in as sergeant of Company H, First Vermont regiment. After three months' service he was discharged, but immediately re-enlisted, and on Sept. 16, 1861, was mustered into the service as captain of Company I, Fifth Vermont regiment. On July 16, 1862, he was made major of the Fifth Vermont regiment, and on October 6, following, was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the regiment. On May 5, 1864, he lost his left arm in the battle of the Wilderness; June 5, following, was made colonel of the regiment, and mustered out as such Sept. 11, 1864. On Sept. 8, he was made colonel of the First regiment, Veteran Reserve Corps. On March 13, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant services in the battle of the Wilderness, and on March 31, 1867, was honorably mustered out of the volunteer ranks. He was made a major of the Forty-fourth United States infantry Jan. 22, 1867, and was retired April 28, 1870, with the rank of colonel. On March 2, 1867, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel and colonel in the regular army—the first for “gallant and meritorious conduct at the battle of White Oak Swamp, Va.,” and the second rank (colonel) “for gallant conduct at the Wilderness.” Gen. Lewis participated in the following battles: Golding's Farm, Savage Station, White Oak Swamp, Va. (where he was wounded in the leg), Second Bull Run (Manassas), Fredericksburg (first and second battles), Salem Church, Burkittsville, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, and Wilderness, where he lost his arm. After the war Gen. Lewis was placed in command of the post at Elmira, N. Y., where he paroled about 5,000 prisoners of war; and in the fall of 1866, he was ordered south and assigned to duty as inspector-general on the staff of Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, at Nashville, Tenn. Six months afterward Gen. Fisk was mustered out of service, and Gen. Lewis was assigned to his position as assistant commander “Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.” He served here until January, 1867, when he was ordered to Georgia, and assigned to duty as inspector-general on the staff of Gen. C. C. Sibley, at Savannah, Macon and Atlanta. In 1868 Gen. Sibley was retired, and Gen. Lewis was appointed to his position as assistant commander of same bureau, as at Nashville, in which he remained until April 28, 1870, when he was retired. The succeeding fall he was appointed by Gov. R. B. Bullock, and confirmed by the senate, as state school commissioner, and organized the present admirable school system of Georgia. After serving eighteen months, he resigned and went to Des Moines, Iowa, where he engaged in business with Gen. L. A. Grant, late assistant secretary of war. He remained in Des Moines until 1876, when he went to Buffalo, N. Y., and lived there until 1880, when he returned to Atlanta, and rendered valuable service in behalf of the International Cotton exposition in 1881. In 1883 he established a wholesale and retail rubber goods business in Atlanta, which soon assumed great proportions and became very profitable. Having been appointed postmaster of Atlanta by President Harrison, Aug. 1, 1889, he disposed of his interest in the rubber goods business, and devoted his time and superior abilities to the duties of the office. During his incumbency important and valuable improvements were made, calculated to facilitate the transaction of business inside and outside; and during his administration the aggregate business of the office increased from $136,000 to $207,000 per annum. Dec. 1, 1893, Gen. Lewis was succeeded by Dr. Amos Fox, democrat. In April, 1894, he was made secretary of the Cotton States and International exposition, to be held in Atlanta in the fall of 1895. Gen. Lewis is a member of the G. A. R., of which he has been junior vice grand commander-in-chief, and commander of the department of Georgia. He also belongs to the Loyal Legion—his membership being in the Ohio commandery. He is also president of the Summit Land company, Atlanta, which owns a very desirable tract of 600 acres of land about ten miles northeast of Atlanta, of sufficient elevation to command a view of the city. Gen. Lewis was married Aug. 17, 1856, to Miss Frances H., daughter of F. M. Mattice, of Buffalo, N. Y., and to them two children have been born: Fred W., now in the United States Military academy at West Point, and Harold B., at home. He is a member of the First Church of Christ, Scientists.

DANIEL HOWARD LIVERMORE, vice-president of the State Savings bank of Atlanta, Ga., and president of the Bank of Calhoun, Ga., was born in Sangerfield, N. Y., in 1868. In this little town he was reared, received a primary instruction and a liberal education, and graduated in Waterville, N. Y., in 1889. From here he went to the Rochester (N. Y.) Business university, and was graduated from this thorough institution in 1891, and soon after, with a desire to test his efforts away from home and assume a personal responsibility over his growing ambition, he migrated to Georgia, locating in Calhoun, a small town in the northern portion of the state. Here he organized the Bank of Calhoun and was at once elected president. While still holding a controlling interest and the highest title in the bank, he removed to Atlanta in October, 1894, and was chosen vice-president of the State Savings bank, in which he had bought a large block of shares. In 1891 Mr. Livermore was united in marriage to Helen, daughter of A. J. Hale, of Waterville, N. Y. They have one child, Howard Jerome Livermore, a bright, happy-hearted little fellow. Mr. Livermore is a member of the Presbyterian church, and aids religious endeavor with an unstinted liberality. His father was Daniel Livermore, born in the state of New York, and a veteran captain of the late war. His mother was Ella Brigham, also a native of New York. Mr. Livermore is a very provident and practical man, who believes in anticipating the future by prudent forethought. He has handsomely fortified the pecuniary condition of his family by carrying a $100,000 policy on his life in the Mutual Life Insurance company of New York. This is a substantial attestation of sincere devotion. Mr. Livermore, when first elected, was perhaps the youngest bank president in the United States. The phenomenal success that has attended his financial operations has fully justified the wisdom of his selection to positions of such importance and responsibility. He has large moneyed connections in the east which, coupled with his present affluence, indicate a flattering future.

DR. WILLIAM ABRAM LOVE, one of the oldest and best-known physicians in the state of Georgia, has lived in Atlanta nearly a quarter of a century. With the spirit and the blood of the old English cavaliers coursing through his veins, he has ever been a man of action and decided character, keeping the same even to his old age. Dr. Love, the only child of William and Sarah (Childers) Love, was born May 16, 1824, in that historic place, Camden, Kershaw district, S. C. His grandparents and his father were residents of that vicinity in colonial days and suffered much at the hands of the British and the Tories during the revolutionary war. Indeed, though a mere boy at that time Dr. Love's father, for the sake of freedom and his loyalty to the colonial cause for which his father fought, carried a withered arm all his after life. It was through the cruelty of the Tories that he suffered most. The facts are: He was captured one day while riding a very fine horse, when, after being deprived of his mount, he was bound hand and foot to the back of an old, worn-out army mule. The mule was then turned loose to graze in a desolate wood, and here after three days of intense pain, the exhausted, but patriotic boy was found by his friends. Little wonder that to this day Dr. Love despises and scorns the name and memory of tory. Notwithstanding the suffering thus endured by the elder William Love, he grew to a noble manhood and because of his affliction was most carefully educated, after which, for the greater part of a long life he held high positions of public trust in his native state. By the death of his father, Feb. 17, 1825, and the second marriage of his mother, William Abram Love became the special care of his grandmother Childers. This grandmother, previous to her marriage was Miss Sarah King, a daughter of that sturdy revolutionary soldier on whose property was fought and for whose honor was named that fateful and famous encounter known in history as the battle of King's mountain. The daughter of this soldier inherited the stern and sturdy characteristics of her revolutionary father, with all his vigilance and high sense of honor and justice. So the life of her young charge was closely guarded, but the thrilling accounts of his adventures in childhood, which he often relates to his children and grandchildren stamp him as a character of strong individuality, even in early youth. In his boyhood Dr. Love attended the schools of Camden and afterward Russell Place academy, but at a very early age he chose his life's work and when twelve years old, with a view to the study of medicine, he entered the drug store of Dr. George Reynolds, continuing his other studies under private tutors. Later, as a regular medical student, he was for four years under the preceptorship of Drs. E. H. Anderson, senior and junior, then of Camden, S. C., the latter now in Kirkwood, Miss. In 1844 Dr. Love entered the medical department of the university of Pennsylvania, and as a private pupil in the office of Dr. Samuel George Morton of Philadelphia. With a view to ultimate special work he entered at the same time the Obstetrical institute, under the supervision of Dr. Joseph Warrington. He served his full time also under the direction of the lady managers of lying-in and charity and nurse societies and was graduated by this institution in 1845. Through the summer of that year he remained in Philadelphia, devoting his time to ward and clinical services in Blockley and Pennsylvania hospitals and attending lectures at the Locust street schools. April 3, 1846, he received his degree of doctor of medicine from the university of Pennsylvania. July, 1846, he came to Georgia and located at Locust Grove, Taliaferro Co., and there began his lifelong friendship with Alexander H. Stephens. Jan. 11, 1849, he was married to Marion Louisa, daughter of Hon. Abner Darden, who then and for many years represented his people in the legislative halls of his state. During the following winter Dr. Love, with a colony of friends, passed through Atlanta, then a young city, and made a home in Cave Spring, Floyd Co., where in 1850, he was elected superintendent and physician of the Georgia asylum for the deaf and dumb. He accomplished much in the up-building of this institution; but preferring to give his entire time to his profession he remained with the school only a few years. In 1858, the winters of north Georgia having made a change of climate necessary for himself and his family, he removed to southwest Georgia and located at Albany. There he soon established himself as a physician, surgeon and gynecologist and was regarded as the leading practitioner of that section. From Albany Dr. Love went as a volunteer with the first troops enlisted for the defense of the Confederate states. Very early in the war he was discharged from the regular army on the score of ill health, but nothing deterred him from duty and he served till the latest hour of that eventful struggle on the medical staff of the Confederate states army on the field and in the hospitals. Doubtless many southern soldiers remember him most kindly, especially in connection with Ocmulgee hospital at Macon, Ga. The result of the civil war having changed very largely the environment of his antebellum field of practice, Dr. Love, in 1870, removed from Albany to Atlanta for the purpose of devoting himself more exclusively to the practice of gynecological medicine. In this he has been so eminently successful that he, by result of work, has established a reputation which extends his field of usefulness over Georgia and through all the adjoining states. In 1871 he was elected to the chair of physiology in the Atlanta Medical college and with scarcely a day's notice he entered upon his work in this school, which is one of the best in the south. He is now (1894) senior professor and president of the faculty. He has always taken much interest in his State Medical association; he devoted much time and labor to its revival and up-building immediately after the close of the war and has occupied the position of vice-president in that body. He is a member, too, of the American Medical association, and in the International Medical congress held at Washington, D. C., he was vice-president of the physiological section. In connection with his professional work he has made some valuable contributions to the medical literature of his age, and as a practitioner, writer, speaker and teacher he has ever been an earnest and strong advocate for principles in medicine and conservatism in practice. With all his labor for the benefit of humanity, Dr. Love has lived a quiet, retired life, devoted and indulgent to his family, caring little for wealth and avoiding at all times political preferment, desiring the rather to live for the good of mankind and bending his energies to the study and advancement of his profession. This he has done indeed, directly through his own efforts, and indirectly through the result of work by hundreds of his students. For his students his interest never wanes. Even at the age of three score and ten, with pencil and brush, he has illustrated his lectures on physiology, making for his classes almost hundreds of illuminated life-size and magnified microscopic drawings. In the order of Free Masonry Dr. Love has evinced a lifelong interest. From his earliest manhood he has been a past deputy grand master of his grand lodge and for more than a quarter of a century he has held in supervision the masonic jurisprudence of that body. In national and international masonic meetings he has been highly honored with official positions. In the world's masonic congress at Chicago, 1893, he was elected vice-president and there he carefully guarded "the old landmarks," casting Georgia's entire vote on all decisive questions. In fact, in his own state he has taken high rank in symbolic, capitular, cryptic and templar masonry and in the Scottish rite of the southern jurisdiction he has risen to the prince of the royal secret or thirty-second degree. By Georgia's sister jurisdictions he has been highly honored, being the grand representative in Georgia of the grand lodge of Alabama, the grand lodge of New York, the grand chapter of Alabama, the grand council of Ohio, the grand council of South Carolina and the grand council of Vermont. He has also contributed to the literature of the masonic order. Many of his masonic addresses have been published and as chairman of the committee on foreign correspondence for the grand chapter of Georgia he was most cordially and courteously welcomed by the reportorial corps of the grand chapters of the world.

CAPT. WILLIAM B. LOWE, manufacturer, Atlanta, Fulton Co., was born at Greenville, Ga., in Meriwether county, on the 10th of July, 1839. His father, a gallant soldier of the war of 1812, having entered the struggle a beardless boy, came to Georgia when quite a young man. He was a native of Edgefield district, S. C. His parents were of English descent, and illustrated all those sturdy qualities which belong to the English character. He died in Georgia in 1882, at the advanced age of eighty-six years. The first twelve years of Capt. Lowe's boyhood were passed in Meriwether county. Like other boys, he was fond of outdoor life, and delighted in all the sports and pastimes which make up such a large part of a boy's happiness. From Meriwether county he moved to Baker county and remained there for two or three years. He then went to Coweta county, where he clerked for about four years, after which he went to New York. He became a clerk in the great metropolis in 1856, securing a position in a large clothing store. At the expiration of three years he bought an interest in the firm and continued in business until the breaking out of the war. He then came to Atlanta, and in July, 1861, entered Cobb's legion as first lieutenant. He was subsequently promoted to the rank of captain in Company F, and received a severe wound at South mountain, Md., in 1862. Here he was captured and held as a prisoner for two or three months. On being paroled at Baltimore he rejoined the Confederate army at Fredericksburg, Md. His health began to fail at this juncture, and on the recommendation of medical advisers he was transferred to the Georgia state service. He was stationed in Atlanta, where he supervised the transportation department of the Atlanta & West Point railroad, and served in this capacity until the war closed. Capt. Lowe demonstrated the qualities of a superb soldier during his campaign in Virginia, and his military record is one of the best to be found on the muster rolls of the Confederacy. He was in several of the hardest-fought battles of the war, and acquitted himself in each engagement with soldierly courage and behavior. After the war Capt. Lowe settled in Atlanta, and entered the clothing and dry goods business. He continued in this line for about ten years, and then, in connection with Gen. John B. Gordon and others, became the lessees of the state convicts for a term of twenty years. He commenced a general contracting business and devoted himself exclusively to the building of railroads and bridges. Capt. Lowe has since been occupied in this line, and his marvelous energies have chiefly been expended in the material upbuilding of the state. He has been a strong and influential factor in the development of Georgia's railroads. Capt. Lowe is the vice-president of the Enterprise Lumber company, president of the Columbus Southern Railroad company, vice-president of the Parrott Lumber company, director in the Chattahoochee Brick company, and president of Penitentiary company No. 2. The political arena has never had any charms for Capt. Lowe, and his friends have never prevailed upon him to accept political office from their hands. He has always preferred the quiet life of a private citizen, believing it to be conducive to his best interests, as well as to his own happiness and that of his household. Capt. Lowe was married, in 1868, to Miss Douglass, daughter of the late John Douglass, of La Grange, Ga. They have two children, a son and a daughter: W. B., Jr., and Rebecca. Capt. Lowe has an elegant home on Peach-tree street, in Atlanta, and his domestic life is sweetened by all those social ties that make home bright and beautiful. While not a member of any church, he believes in the spiritual as well as the practical and business side of life. His reputation for integrity and honor has long been established among his friends and neighbors, and no one envies him the success in life which he has patiently achieved.

JUDGE J. H. LUMPKIN, a scion of one of the most illustrious families in the state, the subject of this sketch, has added new laurels to a name already richly blended with the associations of the bench and bar of Georgia. A grandson of the great and gifted Chief Justice Joseph Henry Lumpkin, and bearing the name of his lamented forefather, it is not improper to observe that in the brilliancy of his judicial talents, as well as in the probity of his unsullied private life, the subject of this sketch is worthy of the honored name he bears. Judge Lumpkin was born at Athens, Ga., the seat of the state university, and a center of learning and culture.

receiving both his primary and collegiate education in that city. Athens has always been distinguished as the home of honored and illustrious families, among the number being the Cobbs, the Lumpkins, the Hills, the Lipscombs, the Hulls and the Gradys. As a student at the state university, young Lumpkin acquired the distinction of being the finest Greek and Latin scholar in the institution. Graduating from the university with the highest honors of his class, he moved directly to Atlanta, in 1875, and applied himself with diligence to the study of the law, for which profession he was fitted by discipline, preference and heredity. After passing a rigid examination on all the fundamental principles of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1876, and immediately formed a partnership with Capt. Harry Jackson, a kinsman, and one of the leading practitioners at the Georgia bar. He was subsequently appointed assistant supreme court reporter, in 1877, and after filling this important position to the satisfaction of the bench and bar he was promoted to the office of supreme court reporter, in 1882. He held this office until 1888, when he tendered his resignation and returned to the active practice of his profession. Chief Justice Logan E. Bleckley, who then presided over that tribunal, in accepting the resignation of Mr. Lumpkin, said: "In directing that this resignation be accepted and recorded on the minutes, I will observe, for the court, that it is with great regret that we part with an officer whose services have been so faithful and efficient. Every public servant who discharges his duty is worthy of high commendation, and this Mr. Lumpkin has done with remarkable fidelity and with great skill and ability. In some respects his faculty for reporting is remarkable. He can, with more facility and expedition than almost any other man I have ever known, arrive at the true contents of a record or opinion, and present them in a condensed form, making a sort of miniature of any case, however large its proportions, and yet a miniature that reflects its features accurately. I repeat, that we part with him with very great regret, and—as numerous as the bar of Georgia is—with scarcely a hope that we will find a successor equal in all respects to himself for the functions of this important office." This is high praise, coming from a man of such pronounced conservatism and established probity as the then chief justice, Logan E. Bleckley. Returning to the practice of his chosen profession, Judge Lumpkin found a large clientage awaiting him, and he stepped into a lucrative and growing practice in both the state and federal courts. The familiarity with the judicial rulings of the supreme court made him a favorite oracle with the members of the bar throughout the state, and he was frequently called into consultation where important and far-reaching issues were involved. Among the noted cases in which he figured after returning to the general practice was that of the Southern Mutual Insurance company, involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, and bringing in question the determination of important legal issues affecting the rights of policy holders and the distribution of accrued profits. He was also employed as counsel in the Cotton States life insurance case, one of the most intricate issues ever tried in Georgia. In numbers of criminal proceedings he has represented the attorney-general of the state, and given aid to the solicitors in the prosecution of criminals. In one volume of the supreme court decisions alone twenty cases are reported in which he figured. On the resignation of Hon. Marshall J. Clarke, as judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit, Judge Lumpkin was appointed by Gov. Northen to succeed him. His term of office began on Sept. 16, 1893. He was subsequently elected to that office by the general assembly. In addition to his legal qualifications, Judge Lumpkin is a student of general literature, and is one of the best informed men in the state on all subjects pertaining to his favorite study. He has written several compositions of superior merit, and his talents, had he chosen literature as his profession, would no doubt have advanced him to the front rank in that field. Judge Lumpkin has traveled extensively, both in Europe and this country, and his powers of observation, brought to bear upon the opportunities for study afforded by his travels, have made his mind a treasury of information, all of which enrich his conversation and serve to increase his usefulness at the bar and on the bench.

JUDGE SAMUEL LUMPKIN, associate justice of the supreme court of Georgia, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Dec. 12, 1848. His boyhood was spent in this locality, training his intellect in the schools close by for the great mental labors that awaited his coming manhood. His mother was Sarah E. Johnson. His father died at the early age of twenty-six, and yet before that time had established an enviable reputation as a lawyer of remarkable powers. Judge Lumpkin attended both Mercer university and the university of Georgia, graduating from the latter institution in July, 1866, with the highest honors of his class. In the following fall he taught school in one of the middle counties of Georgia, and through 1867 conducted a small school in Mississippi. Soon after graduation he undertook the study of law in connection with his other duties, and after a splendid examination was admitted to the bar at Lexington, Ga., in 1868. He began his first practice in Elberton, Ga., with Col. Robert Hester, and later removed to Americus, Ga., resuming practice during 1870-71 with Col. C. T. Goode. After the expiration of that time he returned to his home in Lexington. In 1871 Mr. Lumpkin was appointed journalizing clerk of the house of representatives, and a year subsequently was appointed solicitor-general of the northern circuit of Georgia by Gov. Smith, being reappointed in 1873 for a term of four years. In 1877 he was made postmaster of Lexington and in the same year was elected state senator. As chairman of the committee on railroads he greatly aided in framing the excellent railroad commission law, which has been enforced since that day. In 1884 he was elected judge of the superior court of the northern circuit by the state legislature, and was unanimously re-elected for a second term. In 1890 he was chosen an associate judge on the supreme bench. In this tribunal he is distinguished as accurate, amiable and wise, and has given the highest satisfaction by his methods of honorable justice. It has been said of him: "Judge Lumpkin's manner on the bench will always afford that mitigation to counsel disappointed by a decision." Judge Lumpkin was honored in 1891 by having the degree of LL. D. conferred upon him by the South-western Baptist university at Jackson, Miss. He was married in 1888 to Kate, daughter of Walker Richardson, and granddaughter of Col. A. M. Stanford of Alabama. She is a lady of beauty and accomplishment, and has blessed his life and shared with him the true reward of greatness. Justice Lumpkin is of noble lineage. His ancestors without exception have been the pride and flower of the state. He is a grand nephew of Chief Justice Lumpkin of the Georgia supreme bench, and of Wilson Lumpkin, one of Georgia's brainiest governors. He is respected and loved by every practitioner in the state.

EDGAR P. M'BURNEY, banker, Atlanta, Ga., son of J. C. McBurney, was born in Tompkins county, N. Y., Jan. 31, 1862. His father is of Scotch-Irish lineage, whose home is in Jersey City, N. J., but who has large financial interests in the south. Mr. McBurney was raised in Jersey City, spending his winters in Macon, Ga., attending school in both cities. After graduating from the Jersey City high school in 1878 he came south, and engaged as bookkeeper at the cotton factory of Hollingsworth & McBurney (his father), at Hawkinsville, Ga.

A year later he went to Macon as clerk for W. A. Duty, dry goods merchant, with whom he remained a year. The year following, 1880, he came to Atlanta as bookkeeper for Hendrix & McBurney, real estate men, and was with them two years. He then went into the real estate business with his father under the firm name of McBurney & Co., and continued the business until 1887, when he commenced organizing a series of development and investment enterprises, all of which have proven to be phenomenally successful. In 1886 he organized the People's Mutual Loan and Building association, of which he is now secretary and treasurer. This is the most successful local building and loan association in the United States, having paid as high as 19 per cent. per annum. In 1887 he organized the West View Cemetery association, of which he was made secretary, and two years later general manager, a position he still retains. That same year he organized the Mechanics' Loan and Building association, of which he is secretary and treasurer. The next year, 1888, he organized the Mutual Loan and Banking company, of Atlanta, with a paid-up capital stock of $72,000, of which Mr. McBurney was made cashier. The bank is now operating on a capital of $200,000. In 1890 Mr. McBurney organized the West View Floral company, of which he is secretary and treasurer and general manager, and in which he owns a controlling interest. The company ships flowers to all parts of the southern states, from Richmond to Jacksonville, Mobile and New Orleans, and has built up a business of almost incredible extent and value. The organization of these various enterprises, and so successfully managing them, evidences remarkable versatility of business qualifications, untiring well-directed industry, and financial ability of a remarkably high order—especially in one so young, just on the threshold of life. Mr. McBurney was married in Atlanta Jan. 25, 1888, to Miss Maggie Berry, daughter of M. R. Berry, one of Atlanta's most highly esteemed, as well as one of her most solid, citizens—morally and financially. Mr. McBurney is a member of the Capital City club, of the masonic fraternity, and of the First Presbyterian church, Atlanta.

JOSEPH A. McCORD, cashier, Atlanta, Ga., son of Stewart McCord, was born in Newton county, Ga., Oct. 6, 1857. His father, who was of Scotch descent, the family having come to this country before the revolutionary war, was born in Abbeville district, S. C., in 1794, and died Aug. 31, 1868. He was a farmer, was a soldier in the war of 1812, was sheriff of Abbeville district, S. C., and came to Georgia in 1824. Mr. McCord was reared on the farm, and was educated in the country schools in Newton and Rockdale counties. When twelve years old he commenced clerking in a store at Conyers, Ga., and clerked a number of years. In 1874 he was appointed deputy clerk under T. J. Treadwell, clerk of the superior court of Rockdale county, retaining the position about four years. He then went to Carrollton, Ga., and engaged in a general merchandise business, conducting it with success and profit until 1890. In 1887 he was elected a member of the city council of Carrollton, was re-elected, and served three years. At the same time he was elected a school commissioner of Carrollton by the general assembly and served two years. In 1890 he came to Atlanta and entered the employ of the Western & Atlantic railway in the general freight office, having charge of the adjustment of all city claims for damages, etc. He remained in this office until November, 1892, when he was elected assistant cashier of the Atlanta Trust and Banking company, and on May 11, 1893, was elected cashier, a position he now holds, discharging its responsible duties with conspicuous ability. Mr. McCord was married in Carrollton April 24, 1889, to Miss Lillie, daughter of Capt. David Croft. His wife died, leaving no issue, June 21, 1890. He is a member of the Capital City club, of the I. O. O. F., and of the Methodist church, south. Mr. McCord has the entire confidence of the commercial element of Atlanta, ranks well in financial circles, and, being a young man, may be regarded as having a bright future before him.

FLOYD WILLCOX M'RAE, physician, Atlanta, was born on a farm in Telfair county, Ga., Dec. 6, 1861. He is of Scotch descent on his father's side, while his maternal grandfather was of English extraction. His grandfather was Alexander McRae, who was a native of Scotland and was there married to Abigail Bain. They came to America and settled in Telfair county, Ga. Dr. McRae's father was Murdoch H. McRae, a well known farmer of Telfair county, where he was born in 1826. He was married to Elizabeth Willcox in 1852. She was the daughter of Thomas S. Willcox, who was a native of Georgia, and well known in its political circles, having been a member of both upper and lower branches of the state legislature from Irwin county. Dr. McRae lived at home until eighteen years old, passing the usual life of a farmer boy, and receiving his early intellectual training at the hands of private tutors. He then attended Robert E. Lee institute at Thomaston, Ga. He was obliged to leave here on account of his health, just before he was to be graduated, and after he had gone through the course and occupying an advanced position in his classes. In 1881 he located in Jesup, Ga., and engaged in the drug business until the summer of 1884. He had in the meantime taken one course of lectures at the Atlanta Medical college, and after selling his business he returned to Atlanta, and pursuing his studies was graduated from this college with second honors in March, 1885. He began to practice his profession in Talbotton, Ga., at once, but three months later was elected to the chair of demonstrator of anatomy in the Atlanta Medical college, which position he held until the spring of 1892, when he resigned, and was elected in the fall professor of physiology and clinical medicine in the Southern Medical college of Atlanta, which chair he now holds. Dr. McRae belongs to the American Medical association, the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association, and the Atlanta Society of Medicine. He has been honored with the offices of president and secretary of the latter society, and is at present secretary of the surgical section of the American Medical association. Since he was called back to the city to take a place in the faculty of the Atlanta Medical college Dr. McRae has made this city his home and has practiced his profession in connection with his college work. He is a frequent contributor to medical journals and some of his papers have evoked wide discussion. Dr. McRae is a thirty-second degree Scottish rite Mason. He belongs to the Methodist church, south, and is a member of the board of stewards of Trinity Methodist church of Atlanta.

DR. MANNING WILLIS MANAHAN, who has his elegant offices in the "Grand," is one of the most popular and successful of Atlanta's splendid corps of physicians. He was born in Hartland, Ohio, from which place he removed to Norwalk, where he resided many years. He received a thorough education, graduating with honor; after which he was for several years, deputy clerk in the office of the probate judge of that district. Being strongly inclined to the study of medicine, he then entered the Homeopathic Hospital college, at Cleveland, Ohio, from which he graduated in due course with high honors; among them being the first clinical and obstetrical prizes. He married the daughter of George R. Walker, a prominent lawyer of Norwalk, and in 1882, located in Atlanta, forming a partnership with Dr. F. H. Orme, an experienced and prominent physician. This partnership continued until the close of 1887, when it expired by limitation, since which time he has conducted personally his large and increasing practice. Dr. Manahan comes of a distinguished lineage which has contributed in no small degree to the making of the history of this country. His father, George W. Manahan, was a successful business man of broad views and systematic habits, who amassed quite a competency with which he gave his children the best educational advantages, and on which he and his family lived comfortably during his declining years. His mother, Mrs. Lucy Sophia Manahan, was a daughter of Isaac Morse, of New Haven county, Conn., and a near relative of Jedediah Morse, the geographer; Prof. Samuel F. B. Morse, the inventor of the American telegraph; Sidney E. Morse, the author of Modern geography, and of Lieut.-Gen. Scott, while Mr. Isaac Morse was himself a man of fine talent and education, and much respected. She was a consistent member of the Presbyterian church, and a Christian woman in the best sense of that term, as evidenced by an even temper and an example of the virtues of charity, forbearance and love, and died in 1894. Dr. Manahan stands high in the medical world, is zealous in all things pertaining to the ethics and practice of his profession, and has held many offices of prominence and consideration. He was president of the board of United States pension examiners of Atlanta from 1891 to 1893, is a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy, a charter member of the Southern Homeopathic Medical association, a member of the Atlanta Medical club, and has served both as secretary and president of this organization. Dr. Manahan is a successful physician, a skillful surgeon, and a genial gentleman, possessing a large share of personal magnetism and commanding confidence in his professional ability, as is evidenced by a host of devoted friends, and a large practice in the very best families of the city.

EDMUND WELLBORN MARTIN, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., son of Col. John M. Martin, was born on the plantation of his maternal grandfather, Alfred Wellborn, near Warm Springs, Meriwether Co., Ga., July 23, 1854. His paternal great-grandfather, Gen. John Martin, was born Oct. 6, 1749, and was a general in the revolutionary army. His grandfather, Edmund Martin, was a native of Edgefield district, S. C., which he represented many years in the legislature of that state. Mr. Martin's father was born in St. Peter's parish, Beaufort district, S. C. He entered the Confederate service from Marion county, Fla., as captain of the Marion Light artillery. At the battle of Richmond, Ky., during the effort of Gens. Bragg and E. Kirby Smith to unite their forces, he was seriously wounded and taken to a hospital. When recovered he rejoined his command; but, in the meantime, the people of his congressional district, in consideration of his gallantry in the battle of Richmond, elected him to congress. Being in robust health, he felt it to be his duty to return to active service in the field, and declined a re-election. He was elected colonel of the Ninth Florida regiment, Finegan's brigade, and continued in active service until the surrender. After that event he returned to Florida, and is now a citizen of Ocala, in that state. Mr. Martin was born while his mother, whose home was in Marion county, Fla., was on a visit to her father; as soon as she was able, she returned to her home in Florida. In 1858 his mother died of yellow fever, and Mr. Martin was taken to the home of his uncle, Dr. E. H. Martin, Savannah, Ga., where he remained until 1865; and he then, when eleven years old, returned to Florida, where he lived until 1871. In February, of that year, he entered the preparatory department of Wofford college, Spartanburg, S. C., and in the summer of 1875 graduated from that institution with first honors and valedictorian of his class. Late in that year he was elected principal of Greenville Masonic institute, and held it during 1876-77. During this time he commenced reading law; and in the fall of 1877 he came to Atlanta, and continued his reading with McConnel & Heyward. In 1878 he was admitted to the bar in Fulton county superior court, Judge George Hillyer presiding. Since then he has done a successful and constantly growing general practice. On March 1, 1886, Mr. Martin was elected police commissioner, and served acceptably three years. In 1890, and, again in 1892, he was elected to represent Fulton county in the general assembly. During his two terms in that body he was one of the most active and laborious of its members; being chairman the first term of the committee on privileges and elections, and a member of the committees on education, finance, general judiciary and penitentiary. His first term was one of almost incessant, arduous labor—in the committee-room on details, and on the floor of the house in discussions, himself the leader in very many of the most important of them. His colleagues were Clarke Howell, Jr., editor of the "Constitution," and ex-Mayor John B. Goodwin. The first-named having been elected speaker, devolved unusual labor on Messrs. Goodwin and Martin. The latter, during his first term, introduced fifty-five bills of a general and local character, three-fourths of which passed. Among them was a bill to improve the capitol grounds; also, a bill making an original appropriation to the Technological school, and another making a supplementary appropriation, necessitated by a former deficiency. Both bills were vigorously, not to say viciously, attacked, and as vigorously and ably and successfully defended by Mr. Martin. The supplementary bill was introduced by him, and he had the leadership and bore the brunt of the assault; but after a hard-fought contest, he won, and both appropriations were made. They saved the school—but for them it would have been killed. He was also the author of the bills making uniform and clear the mode by which the superior courts of Georgia were authorized to grant charters to corporations according to the terms of the constitution of the state. These bills passed, and have proved of great benefit. He supported with all his earnestness, ability and energy the proposition to accept the Soldiers' home, but the proposition failed. Mr. Martin performed an immense amount of hard work on the various committees, and made many speeches, this first term. During his second term—1892-93—he served on the committees on corporations, finance, general judiciary and enrollment. The amount of work to be done this term by the Fulton county delegation was as large as that of the preceding term, and Mr. Martin was quite as conspicuous, doing his full share. He introduced a bill to establish a state reformatory for juveniles; and, also, a bill to allow counties and municipalities in Georgia to establish reformatories by a vote of the people of each locality interested. After a hot and exciting debate, lasting two days, the deep-seated prejudice and want of information, generally, on the part of members, caused the first bill to be defeated. It, however, received a majority of the votes cast, and lacked only nine votes of receiving the needed constitutional majority. This action was afterward reconsidered, but on account of the constitutional limit of the session, did not reach a vote. The other bill, to allow counties and municipalities to establish reformatories for juvenile criminals, passed both houses and is now a law—recognized everywhere as a wise and beneficent one. In the matter of the passage of this, as well as that of the other bill, Mr. Martin was the leader of the debate on the floor, and the head and front of the work in the committee. During the session the bill for the acceptance or non-acceptance of the Confederate Soldiers' home came up, and Mr. Martin again strongly favored the passage of the bill accepting the same. The bill passed the house, but was defeated in the senate. During the session of 1893, Mr. Martin introduced a measure amending the constitution, so as to allow counties to raise revenue for sanitary purposes, to protect the public health; but it was defeated. He ably championed a bill introduced at this session giving the election of the municipal officers of Atlanta (with certain exceptions), to the people, instead of their being elected by the council. This bill became a law. Of a large number of other important general and local bills, of some of which he was the author, he was the ardent, hard-working champion. Mr. Martin is a man of untiring industry, persistency of effort and unswerving integrity, and will unquestionably be again called into the public service. Mr. Martin was married in April, 1879, to Miss Sallie, daughter of Alexander F. Hill, of Meriwether county, and granddaughter of the late Chief Justice Hiram Warner, who was elected associate justice when the court was first organized. Mr. and Mrs. Martin have three children: Willie Wellborn (daughter), Hiram Warner, and Frank Hill. Mr. Martin is a member of the I. O. O. F., and a member of the Methodist church, and is on the board of stewards of Trinity church, South Atlanta.

EDWIN W. MARSH, of the firm of Moore & Marsh (now dissolved), is a native of Chatham county, N. C., having been born in the "tar-heel" state, Dec. 27, 1824. When eight years of age he came to Georgia with his father's family, and located in Covington, where he lived two or three years, and in 1836 moved to La Fayette, Walker Co., Ga., and there resided until 1853, studying the elementary branches and completing the course at the high school, in Chattooga county, taught by Rev. James Gamble. This was the extent of his education. When ten years old he entered his father's store, worked hard and conscientiously, and was admitted to the firm after the expiration of ten years. In 1853 Mr. Marsh went to Chattanooga, Tenn., formed a partnership with W. A. Moore (whose sketch appears on another page of these Memoirs), conducted a general business, and there remained until 1863, when Federal troops and the disasters of war forced them further south. Mr. Marsh came to Atlanta, where he purchased an interest in the "Southern Confederacy," a newspaper edited by the brilliant Henry Watterston, now of Kentucky, and J. F. Hanson. He maintained an interest in this publication until the close of the war. During 1864 the paper was transferred to Macon, Ga. A few months later he again entered a partnership with Mr. Moore. They established the first and largest wholesale dry goods house in Atlanta, and conducted this with unparalleled success until the death of Mr. Moore, in 1891. Mr. Marsh continued the business three years longer and then sold out. He was married, in 1853, to Louisa Adelaide, daughter of McAllen Betts, a native of Georgia. This tie was blessed with four children, one of whom, Edwin W., died in 1889. Those surviving are: Spencer S., Adelaide, wife of G. B. Adair, and McAllen B., who lately married the beautiful and accomplished Miss Louise Bigby. Mrs. Marsh having died, he was again married, in 1868, to Achsach, daughter of James Turner, of La Grange, Ga. They had one daughter, Mary, who was married to Charles Crankshaw, of Atlanta, and died in May, 1895. Mr. Marsh is a demitted Mason. His ancestors were Baptists, and he is inclined to this faith. He is president of the Trion Manufacturing company, a large cotton mill of Chattooga county, and owns immense iron properties in north Georgia, which are rapidly developing and yielding valuable products, and has a controlling interest in the Sweetwater Park hotel at Salt Springs, Ga. Mr. Marsh is one of Atlanta's wealthiest citizens, who has been closely identified with her growth since he made the city his home.

MILLEDGE. There is not among the many patriotic and historic families of Georgia any one more truly deserving of being held in grateful remembrance than the Milledge family. The first John Milledge, of Georgia was born in England, and came to America with Oglethorpe. He became a man of affairs in the new colony, and held several important trusts, civic and military. His commission as commander of a troop of rangers, dated March 29, 1742, was signed by James Oglethorpe. In 1768, while a member of the colonial assembly, he was one of a committee to correspond with Benjamin Franklin, agent "to arrange the affairs of Georgia with Great Britain." The captain and his family had a pew in Christ church, Savannah, "in consideration of six pounds and ten shillings," receipted July 5, 1763. His son, Gov. John Milledge, was born in Savannah in 1757. He commenced the study of law with the king's attorney. He was so engaged at the breaking out of the revolutionary war. When but sixteen years of age he was one of the six who broke open the magazine at Savannah and took away a large quantity of powder. Some of it was stored in Savannah, some sent to Beaufort and a part of it to Boston, where hostilities had commenced, and with it the battle of Bunker Hill was fought. The royal governor, Wright, offered a reward of £100 for the capture of each of the raiders; but they, instead of inviting arrest, waited a month and then captured the governor in his own house, wherein they confined him. In this he was a leading spirit. He was in Savannah when it was taken by the British, but escaped. In January, 1780, when only twenty-three years of age, he was appointed attorney-general—this was the beginning of his civil career. Subsequently he served in the general assembly, and then was elected a representative in congress, serving as such in 1792-93, from 1795 to 1799, and again in 1801-02. He resigned in 1802 to accept the governorship; was inaugurated Nov. 24 of that year, and held the office until Sept. 23, 1806. He was immediately elected to the United States senatorship, where he served three years—the last year as president pro tem. That year, 1809, although only fifty-two years old, he resigned his seat and retired to private life. Milledgeville, the former capital of Georgia, was named in honor of Gov. John Milledge. In April, 1802, he was one of three commissioners on the part of Georgia who negotiated with three appointed by the president, a treaty by which Georgia ceded the most of her western territory to the United States for $1,250,000, and other considerations. Although confronted by three statesmen of the highest national reputation, the Georgians made so satisfactory a settlement of a bitterly contested question that they received, by a unanimous vote, the thanks of the legislature. Gov. Milledge retired to his plantation on the Sand hills, near Augusta, where he died in 1818. While Mr. Jefferson's epitaph on his tomb is inscribed the "Father of the University of Virginia," Gov. Milledge was the "Benefactor of the University of Georgia." Gov. Milledge bought and conveyed to the university at Athens nearly 700 acres of land. Upon this land the college buildings and a great part of Athens now stand. Its first commencement was held in 1804. There hangs in the state library, Atlanta, a handsome painting of this eminent Georgian. It is the work of the late Miss Kate Elliott Milledge, the only granddaughter of Gov. Milledge. She was the daughter of the late Col. John Milledge, and a sister to the present state librarian, Capt. John Milledge, who was a Confederate soldier, serving as first lieutenant and captain in the First Georgia regiment, and afterward captain of artillery under Gen. Lee.

Col. John Milledge, the genial gentleman and present popular and efficient state librarian of Georgia, was born in Richmond county, and, as will be observed, is of distinguished historic lineage. In 1857 he graduated from the Georgia Military institute, with the rank of captain. He was commissioned first lieutenant, Feb. 1, 1861, in the First Georgia regulars. From 1862 until the close of the war he was captain and commanded a battery of artillery in Nelson's battalion. The battery was known as the Milledge artillery, and formed a part of the army of northern Virginia. At the second battle of Cold Harbor he was severely wounded.

Col. Milledge, by his courageous deeds and soldierly bearing, gained a strong hold in the hearts of his comrades and superior officers. In 1866 he came to Atlanta, just after the desolation of fire and plunder had laid waste all budding enterprises, and opened a law office. He took a high stand in his profession, and was city auditor and recorder from July, 1877, to July, 1881. He won the hearty favor of all in performing the duties of this office. For many years he served as president of the Benevolent home, and he was mainly instrumental in having the home property, over $20,000, transferred to the Grady hospital. He called together and presided over the first meeting of the Confederate Veterans' association. He was appointed commissioner from Georgia at the Yorktown centennial; commanded the Governor's Guards infantry, of Atlanta; organized the Governor's Horse Guards in 1883, and was its captain seven years; was lieutenant-colonel of the First Georgia battalion of cavalry, and retired in 1891 with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He was appointed state librarian in 1888, and has held that position with great credit to himself and to the universal satisfaction of the bench and bar of the state. The state library of Georgia is now one of the best in the country. Col. Milledge is chivalrous, kind and cultured, and brings into this younger generation the virtues of the ante-bellum southerner. Everybody loves John Milledge because of his bravery and magnetic charms. Soon after the war he married Miss Fanny C. Robinson, a charming, cultivated lady of Virginia. She was president of the Ladies' Memorial association of Fulton county, and it was during her administration, and due to her efforts, that the beautiful monument to the unknown dead was erected. The funeral of Mrs. Milledge was perhaps the most noted occasion in the record of the state to her many honored women. The governor, the judges of the supreme court and state house officers were honorary pall-bearers. The military of the city attended as a special escort.

DR. H. V. M. MILLER. It rarely happens that a man eminently distinguishes himself in more than one profession. An exception to this rule is furnished by the versatile and commanding genius of Dr. H. V. M. Miller. Dr. Miller is one of the most remarkable men that Georgia has ever produced. His memory is simply prodigious, and no impression once made upon his mind has ever been forgotten. He recalls with the greatest ease events that happened more than three-quarters of a century ago, and names, faces, public issues and personal reminiscences are still retained by him as vividly as when they were first stored away in his brain. Profoundly read in all departments of thought, especially that pertaining to the science of medicine, Dr. Miller has possibly no equal in Georgia, and perhaps no superior anywhere. Early in life he acquired the sobriquet of "the Demosthenes of the mountains," and this distinction has followed him through life. He is looked upon with esteem and reverence by all Georgians as one of the lingering landmarks of a past generation, a generation made illustrious by the statesmanship of Toombs, Howell, Cobb, Stephens, Hill and Walter T. Colquitt. Homer Virgil Milton Miller was born in Pendleton district, S. C., on April 29, 1814. Of Welsh extraction on his father's side of the house, and of Huguenot ancestry on his mother's side, he combined the qualities of noble blood, and, in the light of such lineage, his success in life is not surprising. His father, Maj.-Gen. Andrew Miller, moved to Rabun county, Ga., in 1825, at which time his son was only eleven years old. The maiden name of Dr. Miller's mother was Rebecca F. Cheri. She was a lady of rare culture and profound piety, and the influence of her parental discipline was a very potential factor in giving shape to her son's character. His early training was derived from private tutors, supplemented by his mother's instruction and his father's chivalrous example. Though living in the heart of the North Georgia mountains, remote from the refining influences of social life, the young student acquired a knowledge of the classics and a general culture that was strikingly at variance with the rugged character of his surroundings. One of his preceptors was a graduate of the university of Dublin. Beginning the study of medicine, for which department of science his predilections were quite decided, he graduated in 1835 from the Medical college of South Carolina, located in Charleston. Though the youngest member of his class, he received the silver goblet awarded for the best English dissertation. Two years were subsequently spent in the city of Paris, after which he located at Cassville, Ga., for the practice of his profession. In 1846 he was made professor of obstetrics in the Medical college of Memphis, Tenn. He returned to Georgia, however, in 1849, accepting the chair of physiology in the Medical college of Georgia, Augusta. His lectures at this institution became famous throughout the state, and steadily advanced its popularity. In 1861 Dr. Miller was assigned to duty at Harper's Ferry as surgeon of the Eighth Georgia infantry. He was afterward promoted to brigade surgeon and then to division surgeon. For quite a while he served under Gen. Beauregard's command at Charleston, S. C. He was appointed medical director for the state of Georgia, and was further designated as surgeon of posts and inspector of hospitals. After the war Dr. Miller located in Rome, Ga., but did not remain long in the hill city. In 1867 he was elected to a professorship in the Atlanta Medical college, one of the foremost institutions of the south, and during the year following he was elected to the senate of the United States. This high office had been vacant ever since the war. Dr. Miller at once entered upon the discharge of his senatorial duties, and acquired a national reputation for eloquence, patriotism and ability. During the war Dr. Miller was made a trustee of the state university, and since that time he has rarely failed to attend the annual meetings of the board. He has always been a loyal friend of that institution, believing that every Georgian ought to support and uphold the university of the state. In 1890 Dr. Miller was appointed by Gov. Gordon as principal physician, to succeed Dr. Willis F. Westmoreland. He has rendered valuable service to the state in this capacity. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon Dr. Miller by Emory college several years ago. Dr. Miller's first appearance in public life was during the heated contest of 1844. He met in joint debate with such men as Walter T. Colquitt, John H. Lumpkin and others, and proved himself a foeman worthy of their steel. His fame as an orator was not confined to Georgia, but spread to the frontiers of the nation. He took an active part in all the political campaigns preceding the war, and was recognized as one of the ablest of Georgia's public men. He refused the nomination of the American party for congressman in 1857. Dr. Miller was a member of the famous reconstruction convention of 1867, and was an influential delegate on the floor of the convention. In 1881 he traveled over Europe as the agent of the International Cotton exposition, and contributed greatly to the success of that enterprise. Dr. Miller was united in marriage to Miss Harriet Perry Clark in 1835, and, after a wedded life of nearly fifty years, that noble lady has recently been called to her reward. Since leaving the senate of the United States, Dr. Miller, until overtaken by the growing infirmities of old age, has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession. His interest in public matters has never left him, and his familiarity with the principles of the government and the rise and fall of political parties is still fresh and vivid. Dr. Miller is richly endowed with conversational resources, and is able to discuss any subject with ease and accuracy. No man, in his old age, has preserved his intellectual faculties so unimpaired, or better illustrated during his long life the state of his adoption, than the brilliant subject of this sketch.

JOHN T. MOODY. Ranking among the leading business men of Atlanta, and strictly a self-made man, is John T. Moody. Though three decades have not yet passed over his head, he has lived long enough to make a place for himself in the business world that even in this country, renowned for energy and enterprise, is one to excite the ambition of the rising generation. Mr. Moody was born in Etowah county, Ala., May 25, 1868. There he lived until sixteen years of age, attending the public schools of Gadsden and preparing himself for the line of work he has so successfully followed. At the age of sixteen, with a brave heart and firm determination, he left his native state and came to Rome, Ga., taking a position with Batty & Hamilton, wholesale grocers. He began at the bottom of the ladder, but soon found himself promoted to a responsible position, with a thorough knowledge of the business. In 1888, when twenty years old, he determined to come to Atlanta, where his keen business perception told him was a wider field for a young man. He associated himself with Maddox, Rucker & Co., and was employed in the fertilizer and cotton department. Having mastered the details of this branch of the trade, he entered into business for himself in 1890, forming a partnership with Mr. G. S. Brewster, in the manufacture of fertilizing products, and also in the private banking business, which business is now conducted under the firm name of the Moody Loan and Banking company. The career of this enterprise has been distinguished by success from the first, and holds a prominent part in the commercial interests of the city. Mr. Moody was married in Atlanta, Oct. 30, 1888, to Miss Mabel, daughter of Mr. G. H. Holliday, president of the Holliday Lumber company, of Atlanta. They have one child, Mary Helen Moody. Mr. Moody is a member of the I. O. O. F., and with his wife belongs to the First Methodist church. Mr. Moody has, by his care, industry and perseverance, succeeded in accumulating a comfortable supply of this world's goods. Candid and straightforward, systematic and punctual in his business, and upright and clean in his dealings, he has established a career honorable to himself and to the community in which he lives.

WILLIAM ADOLPHUS MOORE, who passed away on July 31, 1891, has won the enviable distinction of being the foremost wholesale merchant in the southern states. He was born at Kingston, Tenn., Nov. 19, 1819, the grandson of Samuel Moore, of Scotch origin, who was a native of Pennsylvania, residing in Lancaster as inn-keeper for some years, and then moved to Tennessee, married Ann White, of German descent, and taught a small school. His father and mother were John Moore and Susan Moore, respectively. Her father was a son of Scotland, who came to America and settled in South Carolina, going subsequently to Tennessee. Her mother was Barbara McCullough. While yet a boy Mr. Moore was left an orphan and he, with the aid of his brother, was compelled to support the younger children. This was the severe school in which he was taught frugality, patience and perseverance, and developed the noble traits of manhood that breathed a calm and gentle satisfaction in his latter days. When sixteen years of age he accepted a humble position that paid the meager salary of thirty-six dollars per annum and his board. In 1845 he went to La Fayette, Walker Co., Ga., but removed to Tennessee again shortly after, locating in Chattanooga. His employer opened a branch house in La Fayette, Ga., and placed him in charge of it, the firm being Moore & McLendon, but he soon sold his interest for a small cash consideration and the balance on time. In 1853 he entered into partnership with Edwin W. Marsh, the firm being Moore & Marsh, and was familiar to every southern merchant. In the same year they returned to Chattanooga and conducted a mixed dry goods and grocery business with success until the Union army put them to flight. Mr. Moore, with his family, refugee first to Cassville and then to Decatur, Ga., he being in such feeble health that his services were refused by the Confederate government. His sympathy was with the south from first to last, but his better judgment caused him to advise against secession. He remained at Decatur through the dark and destructive period, suffering the direst hardships and privations. Immediately after the war Messrs. Moore & Marsh located in Atlanta, established the first wholesale dry goods and notion house in the state and in time the largest below Mason and Dixon's line, shipping their goods into Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida and the Carolinas, and made Atlanta the recognized agent for all northern products. In 1867 they erected a large building, and in 1880 a magnificent structure to facilitate their growing industry. This firm, by its perfect integrity, energy and judgment, easily won decided supremacy. Mr. Moore was a model man, with the great and imitable attributes, exceptional business ability, simple, engaging manners and a heart that beat in unison with all that is true and noble and just. In the commercial sphere he is Georgia's pioneer and pattern. He made religion the staff for his support and comfort, and carried it into his everyday life. He was a Presbyterian deacon in Chattanooga and an elder in Atlanta. He gave generously to the Christian cause, and erected the Moore Memorial church of his own denomination and left bequests for various charities, among them a liberal donation to the Henry W. Grady hospital; the founding of a scholarship at the Agnes Scott institute, located at Decatur, Ga., and a fund for the assistance of weak churches of the Presbyterian church, south. He was a complete man, wise, honorable and just. In 1850 he married Miss Euphemia Barry, who survives him.

MURPHY. This name, though seemingly so inconsequential because so well known, has an origin and an ancestry quite as remote and royal as any in this country. Irish history and heraldry give it high rank and eminently noble and chivalric characteristics. According to the most reliable historical authorities the Murphy's are direct descendants of Cathaire (Cahire-More), king of Leinster, Ireland, in the second century, who finally became king of Ireland. Two out of a large family of sons—Rossa Failge and Fiacha Baikheada—became most distinguished. From the last-named descend the MacMorroghs—Murchada, or O'Murphy—anglicised as Murphy, and the Cavanaghs. From this distinguished ancestry are descended those so widely scattered who bear the name of Murphy. Through diverging lines the parents of the subject of this sketch were lineal descendants of Fiacha Baikheada, son of Cathaire, king of Ireland in the second century. But Mr. Murphy needs not this or other distinguished ancestry to commend him; his own estimable character and unostentatious life-work do that. The family coat of arms is ancient and denotes authority and royalty, and the motto: "Fortis et Hospitalis," the highest type of chivalry and hospitality. And the ancestral home of the family is in the valley, where meet the water of the Avon and Avoca, which inspired Moore's beautiful poem, "The Meeting of the Waters:

"There is not in the wide world a Valley so sweet
As that Valley in whose bosom the bright waters meet."

* * * * *

"Sweet Vale of Avoca! how calm could I rest

ANTHONY MURPHY.

Anthony Murphy, capitalist, Atlanta, Ga., son of Thomas and Elizabeth (Keyes) Murphy, was born in County Wicklow, Ireland, Nov. 6, 1829. His father was born in County Wexford, Ireland, in 1804, and his mother in County Wicklow, adjoining. They emigrated to the United States in 1838, and settled first in Schuylkill county, Pa. Subsequently he went with his family to Iowa, where he lived many years, came south in 1878, and died June 18, 1879. His widow is still living. Anthony was nine years of age when his parents emigrated to this country; he lived with them until he was eighteen years of age, and was educated at the public schools. At the age mentioned he went to Trenton, N. J., where he was apprenticed to the machinist's trade. After serving three years he went to Piermont, N. Y., worked there a year in the Erie railway shops, and then went to the Pittsburgh (Pa.) shops, where he worked at his trade another year. In 1854 he came to Atlanta, and after working four years as a machinist, he ran on the road as a locomotive engineer eighteen months. After this he was made foreman of motive power and machine shops of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, which position he held until 1861. That year he went into the employ of the Confederate states, but at the end of six months he went to Columbia, S. C., as master machinist of the Columbia & Charlotte railway. After a short stop in Columbia he returned to Atlanta, and soon afterward went to Montgomery, Ala., and took charge of the motive power of what is now the Louisville & Nashville railway, and remained there until driven out by Gen. Wilson's raiders. After the war he came back to Atlanta and engaged in the saw-milling and lumber business. In 1869 he built a saw-mill in Dodge county, Ga., with headquarters in Atlanta, which he continued until 1882. In this venture he was phenomenally prosperous, and at the date last named retired from active business and has since operated as a capitalist. It was during Mr. Murphy's connection with the Western & Atlantic railway (April 12, 1862) that the famous "engine chase" and capture of the locomotive "General" occurred. He was foreman of the machine and motive power, which was absolutely under his control. That morning he was called to examine an engine which supplied the power to cut wood and pump water for the locomotives at Alatoona. While at breakfast at Big Shanty (now Kennesaw) he heard a noise as of escaping steam, and at the same time noticed that the engine was moving, and remarked to the engineer and fireman, "Some one is moving your train." On reaching the door he saw the engine with three cars moving out of sight. Sending a man on horseback to Marietta to wire the superintendent, he started with the conductor and engineer on foot, knowing there was a squad of section hands with a hand, or pole-car, just ahead. Taking this the pursuit was continued until farther on they obtained an engine, with which, after overcoming all obstructions they overtook the engine just north of Ringgold, where the raiders had deserted and taken to the woods. But for his knowledge of the road and his control of the motive power which he utilized, the result might have been very different. Mr. William Pittinger, one of the Federal raiding party who escaped, in a book published by him, says: "The presence of Anthony Murphy that morning was purely accidental. As an officer of high authority on the road, commanding all engineers and firemen, knowing all the engines and everything about the road perfectly, his presence at that time was most unfortunate for us. He was a man of great coolness and good judgment. His first act was far-sighted. He sent a man on horseback to Marietta to notify the superintendent at Atlanta by wire." To Mr. Murphy, more than to any other man, is due the successful termination of that exciting "engine chase." In 1866 he was elected a member of the city council of Atlanta, and served by re-election nearly three years, and was again elected in 1870. This service was rendered

during the most trying period of Atlanta's history and rendered efficiently. He originated the water works movement in 1866, was president of the water works board for some years, floated the bonds issued for their construction—the work being completed in 1874. During this period he originated and superintended the construction of immense cisterns for saving water for fire extinguishment, was the principal mover in the matter adopting steam fire-engines and purchased the first steam fire-engine, and actively co-operated with Dr. O'Keefe in establishing the present magnificent public school system. Mr. Murphy's early training, together with his practical common sense and strictly business methods, made his services at this time of inestimable value to the city. Mr. Murphy was a jury commissioner a number of years, and served two terms on the county board of roads and revenues, of which he was chairman of the committee on buildings, and built the present model alms-house. He advocated the building of the Georgia Air Line (now R. & D.) and represented the city's stock, was an important factor in saving what is now the Georgia Pacific railway, was one of the promoters of the building of the Atlanta Cotton factory and as one of its board of directors was an earnest and watchful worker during its construction, was one of the committee of forty-nine who formulated the present city charter which saved the city from threatened bankruptcy, and was appointed by Gov. Gordon one of the commissioners to appraise for the state the value of the road, rolling stock and betterments of the Western & Atlantic railway. Quiet, reticent, undemonstrative, he is yet an almost invincible power when brought into action—it is only then that his true value is developed. A more evenly balanced mind is rarely found. While his head is cool, a warmer heart throbs not in the breast of man. Blessed with a sound judgment, of unbending integrity and governed by the most scrupulous exactitude in all business transactions, it excites no wonder that he has been deservedly financially successful and is held in the very highest esteem by all who know him. Mr. Murphy was married in 1858 to Miss Adelia McConnell, who, and her parents before her, are natives of Georgia. Her mother was a Bell on the paternal side and Hampton on the maternal side—connected with the distinguished South Carolina family of that name. This union has been blessed with eight children, seven of whom are living: Annie E., wife of G. H. Tanner, clerk of Fulton county superior court; Kate F., wife of Charles E. Sciples, of Sciple Sons, Atlanta, Ga.; Robert E., John K., Adelia, Anthony, Jr., and Charles C. Mr. Murphy is not a member of any church (though he was raised a Roman Catholic), but is Catholic "in spirit and in truth," liberally contributing to the dissemination of Christianity irrespective of the agency. He keeps fully abreast with the progressiveness of the age, is fully alive to the highest interests of Atlanta and is an earnest and energetic worker in promoting those interests.

COL. PRYOR L. MYNATT, a talented lawyer of the Atlanta bar, was born in Knox county, Tenn., in 1829. Here he was reared and received his early education, preparing himself for the seminary at Maryville, Tenn., in which institution he took a full course, graduating in 1849, before arriving at his twentieth birthday. He then returned to his home, worked on the farm for one year and went to Clinton, Addison county, to assume charge of the academy located there. In 1850 he removed to De Kalb county, Ala., still following the calling of a school-master; but after a year, on account of his father's declining health, he thought best to be near him, and returned to his home. With the late Horace Maynard, at one time minister to Turkey, he studied law for four years, and was admitted to the bar in 1855, after having also completed a law course in Cumberland university at Lebanon, Tenn. After being recognized as a practitioner he went to Jacksboro, Tenn., near the Kentucky line, and began active practice. Two years later, by reason of his father's death, he found himself in his old home, settling his father's affairs and winding up the estate. When this was satisfactorily done he went to Knoxville, Tenn., resumed the practice of law, and in 1858 entered into partnership with C. F. Trigg, who was afterward appointed a judge of the United States district court by President Lincoln. Mr. Trigg was an outspoken supporter of the Federal cause, and when about to be arrested, escaped, through a stratagem devised by Col. Mynatt. In 1861 Mr. Mynatt enlisted in Company I of the Third Tennessee cavalry as a private, and fought in the ranks for two years. During 1863 Col. Carter, an old friend and neighbor of the Mynatt family, offered him the post of commissary of his regiment with the rank of captain, and later was appointed commissary of the brigade. A splendid service in this position soon elevated him to division commissary, which he held until the surrender. Col. Mynatt was often and desperately exposed in the almost daily raids and forages, but escaped safely through them all. When the war closed he came to Atlanta, Ga., took up again his legal duties and has since resided and practiced there. He was married in 1860 to Alice L., daughter of the late honored and beloved Campbell Wallace, of Atlanta. Col. Mynatt was a member of the constitutional convention of 1877, appointed chairman on the homestead committee. To the next legislature he was elected and placed on the general judiciary committee and made chairman of the committee on corporations. His career as a citizen, a soldier, a lawyer and a legislator is exemplary and worthy of imitation.

JOSEPH VAN HOLT NASH, JR., is a native of Petersburg, Va., having been born in the year 1868. He resided in that city until eight years old, and from there moved to Baltimore, Md. On arriving at the age of matriculation he entered Randolph-Macon college, located at Ashland, Va., and after graduating came with his parents to Atlanta, Ga. In 1880 he went to Savannah to become a student at the Georgia Military academy, and after a course in that school, returned to Atlanta. To perfect himself in commercial transactions he studied a short time in a business college and later took a position with an insurance agency of Atlanta. In September, 1894, he was tendered the office of assistant general manager of the American Book company of New York, which he accepted and now occupies with much credit. He was married Nov. 9, 1894, to Josephine, daughter of the late Samuel Hoyle, of Atlanta. Mr. Nash is a member of the order of Knights of Pythias and affiliates with the Roman Catholic church. In 1886 he joined the Atlanta rifles, one of Atlanta's military companies, has experienced a celebrated past record as a private and has filled every rank by successive promotions until he was honored by the captaincy in July, 1893. Mr. Nash is an agile athlete and before the cares of business accumulated on his shoulders he took great interest in the Atlanta gymnasium, and is now a warm supporter of lusty sports and robust, healthful exercise. He is exceedingly popular among the young men of the city, being admired for his sterling qualities, for his cordial, cheering characteristics, and the manly attractions that fasten friends as magnetism induces bits of steel. He is achieving deserved success.

THOMAS B. NEAL. Perhaps no city in the south can boast of a stronger or more thorough banking system than Atlanta, and prominent among the bankers to whom this credit is due is Capt. Thomas B. Neal. Capt. Neal is a native of Pike county, Ga., and was born in that county on Oct. 21, 1838. His grandfather, David Neal, came from South Carolina, and was a gallant revolutionary officer in the struggle for independence. The father of Capt. Neal was born in what is now Pike county. He came to Atlanta after the war and became one of the leading financiers of that city. He died in Atlanta a few years ago at the advanced age of ninety years. The Scotch-Irish ancestry from which Capt. Neal sprang explains, in a measure, the secret of his commanding influence, as well as the sturdy characteristics of his family. Until his nineteenth year the subject of this sketch lived in the little town of Zebulon. He received only a common school education, but made the best of his advantages. Leaving Zebulon, he went to Minden, La., where he clerked for two years in a general store. In 1860 he went into business for himself, and was just beginning to realize his first profits when the war commenced. Although opposed to secession as a remedy for the existing evils, of which the south complained, he entered the Confederate service, enlisting as a private under Gen. N. B. Forrest. He served under this gallant officer throughout the entire war, surrendering at Gainesville, Ala., in 1865. While in the service the subject of this sketch participated in the following battles: Shiloh, Murfreesboro, Corinth, Holly Spring, the siege of Vicksburg, Jackson, Miss., the first and second battles of Franklin, Tenn. He was also in the heavy fighting between Dalton and Atlanta, and in front of Wilson on the retreat from Nashville, Tenn. His career of service ended at Gainesville, Ala. On the retreat from Corinth, Miss., the subject of this sketch was captured by the Federals and taken to Alton, Ill., where he was kept in prison for four months. After the war he returned to Minden, remaining there until 1885. The progress of his native state since the war had been so marked in commercial and industrial lines that he turned his face in this direction and came to Atlanta. In 1886 he organized the Neal Loan and Banking company, with a capital stock of $100,000, becoming the president of that institution. Under his able financial management the bank has steadily grown in popularity and strength, and is to-day recognized as one of the strongest banking institutions of the city. Since Capt. Neal has been a resident of Atlanta he has been a strong advocate of all enterprises that have sought to advance her true interests, and has been, since the inception of the movement, an ardent promoter of the Cotton States and International exposition, being at the present time a member of the board of directors. Capt. Neal was married in 1866 to Miss Mollie Cash, the daughter of Mr. P. B. Cash, of Louisiana. Though seven children have blessed the union thus happily formed, only one of them survives, Emma, the wife of Mr. Lee Douglas, a successful young dry-goods merchant of Atlanta, and a member of the firm of Douglas, Thomas & Davison. Capt. Neal is a member of several mystic brotherhoods, being a Knight of Pythias, a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and a master Mason. A consistent member of the Second Baptist church of Atlanta, Capt. Neal has not been careless of his spiritual interests, and he has faithfully performed all the duties enjoined upon him by his church. His life is that of a man whose purpose seems to be the attainment of a lofty ideal and whose business integrity has always been above reproach.

LEVI B. NELSON, one among the many able financiers in Georgia, was born in Chemung county, in the lower part of the state of New York, on May 4, 1838. At a very early age, however, he moved with his father into Tioga county, settling in one of the most delightful portions, the village of Newark Valley. This region of the state is famous for its picturesque scenery, and the quiet, subtle influence of this charming locality may have been a potential factor in shaping his life. At the age of thirteen he sustained the severe misfortune of losing his father, who was quite an eminent physician, and who, prior to his long illness, enjoyed a monopoly of the best practice in that immediate section of the state. The bereavement occasioned by his sad death was aggravated by the helpless condition in which he was forced to leave his family, consisting of a wife and two small children. This was due to the fact that, for nearly three years preceding his death, Dr. Nelson was a confirmed invalid, unable to carry on the practice of his profession. During his long illness the little money that had accumulated from his practice had been completely exhausted, and at the time of his death he had no patrimony to leave his children save the good example that he had always set before them, and a father's parting benediction. The educational advantages enjoyed by Mr. Nelson were extremely meager. He was forced to begin the skirmish of life at a time when most boys are in the schoolroom, and the knowledge of books which he subsequently acquired was gathered entirely from his own self-instruction. Soon after the death of his father he entered a store at Cortland, N. Y., and received his first lessons in the art of making money. In order to get a start in business he agreed to board himself and after the expiration of the first year to receive, as compensation for his services, the sum of $100. This was not a large sum of money, but to a young boy who was just starting out in life it looked like a great deal. The labor expended by the young clerk in earning his year's salary impressed upon him the need of saving every dollar that he could possibly keep back after paying his honest debts. This became the fixed maxim of his life and he made it his inflexible rule never to allow his expenses to exceed his income. In a large measure this simple maxim explains the success attained by Mr. Nelson in the financial world. After one year's service in Cortland a better position was offered him in Oswego, N. Y., which he accepted and retained until the spring of 1856, and then decided to adopt the advice of Mr. Greeley, and turned his face in the direction of the undeveloped west. Success awaited him at the destination of his journey. He selected the little village of Toledo, in Iowa, as his starting point, and became one of its citizens on the last of March, 1856. His financial affairs were not by any means in good shape, as his cash assets at the time amounted to only $2.50, and he was indebted to a generous friend in the sum of $75 for the expenses of his trip. In a short time, however, by reason of his push and energy, he obtained a position as deputy recorder and treasurer of the county. He retained this position until June, 1861, when he left the office to enlist as a private in the Union army. He entered the service as third sergeant in Company C of the Tenth Iowa regiment volunteer infantry, but was subsequently detailed as lieutenant and acting assistant adjutant-general, performing gallant service, until June, 1862, when, before the receipt of a promised commission as lieutenant, he was compelled to retire on account of injuries received. The operations of the regiment were confined to the west, and the scenes of the campaign in which the young officer figured were pitched in Mississippi, Arkansas and Missouri. After the war Mr. Nelson returned to Toledo and resumed his old position. He soon resigned it, however, to engage in the real estate business and subsequently in the business of general merchandise, in which vocations he remained until 1869, when he organized the Toledo Savings bank, with a capital stock of $50,000, and became the cashier of that institution. During the same year he was elected a member of the town council of Toledo, and was subsequently in 1873 elected to fill the office of mayor. From 1870 to 1874 Mr. Nelson was a member of the board of education. During the latter year and for five subsequent years he was elected school treasurer. Leaving his western home in 1881 Mr. Nelson decided to cast his lot in Atlanta. Accordingly he moved to that enterprising city in September of that year, engaging in the farm-loan business, with Mr. C. P. N. Barker, as a partner. Mr. Barker had been associated with him for several years in the west. This firm was the pioneer in this line of business in Georgia, and several million dollars were brought into the state by them for the benefit of the farming classes. Mr. Nelson had not been a citizen of Atlanta long before he was elected by the city council as street commissioner. His zeal in behalf of the city's interests made itself apparent to such a degree that in 1886 he was elected, by a handsome vote, to a seat in the city council, as a representative from the fourth ward. During his term of service he was appointed by Mayor Tyler Cooper as chairman of the relief, water works, and member of the finance, sanitary and sewer committees, positions of grave responsibility. His fellow members give him the credit of having carefully and faithfully performed every duty delegated to him and of being one among the best members of that body. He was largely helpful in the preparation of the report recommending the erection of a city hospital, presented to the council in 1888. The efforts of this relief committee in connection with those of a committee of physicians and citizens, Dr. Hunter P. Cooper, chairman, whose report was embodied in that of the relief committee, was greatly helpful in creating the sentiment that resulted in the erection of the Grady hospital. Mr. Nelson has always been a true friend to charity. He is at present a trustee for the Home for the Friendless, the institution of which Mrs. Nelson has been, since its organization, the president. He belongs to the masonic fraternity, is a member of the Central Congregational church of Atlanta, and was recently elected commander of the department of Georgia of the Grand Army of the Republic. Mr. Nelson was united in marriage on Oct. 20, 1866, to Miss Eliza M. Hendry. They have five children living, as follows: Levi D.; Frances, the wife of Charles G. Beck; Edith M., George and Adelaide, and their oldest and youngest sons, Herbert and Charles, are buried in Iowa. Mr. Nelson has one of the most elegant homes in Atlanta. It is situated on the boulevard and is surrounded by extensive grounds, delightfully shaded. The success achieved by the subject of this sketch has been earned by diligent and persevering work, and his influence in the community is that of a loyal, upright and conscientious citizen.

ROBERT TAYLOR NESBITT, present state commissioner of agriculture of Georgia, was born in Savannah, Ga., April 2, 1840. His father, Dr. H. O'K. Nesbitt, of Augusta, was a thoroughly educated physician, having spent several years abroad, principally in Paris, preparing for his life-work. Returning to this country in 1838 he met and afterward married Martha Deloney Berrien, which event changed the whole tenor of his life. Miss Berrien was the daughter of Dr. Richard M. Berrien of Savannah, youngest brother of John McPherson Berrien. Dr. Berrien, already distinguished in his profession, died at the early age of twenty-five, a victim to the yellow fever scourge of 1820. He remained at his post in Savannah and after ministering to many sufferers of that fearful epidemic, himself fell, a sacrifice to duty. At the time of Miss Berrien's marriage to Dr. Nesbitt the bulk of her property was in lands and negroes and, as was so often the case, the responsibility of their charge caused an entire change in Dr. Nesbitt's plans. He gave up his cherished project of becoming a distinguished physician and devoted himself to the care and development of his own and his wife's estate. It will thus be seen that R. T. Nesbitt, the subject of the present sketch, was from his earliest infancy associated with agricultural pursuits, and the tastes which he developed for a planter's life were thus fostered by both education and environment. The earlier years of his education were conducted in Athens, Ga. Afterward his parents moved to Marietta, where his studies were prosecuted under the most competent teachers. His father died while he was still a youth, leaving him the protector of his widowed mother and his two sisters. Under the care of a tutor he was prepared for college. Entering college at Davidson, N. C., then under the presidency of Dr. Morrison and during the professorship of Maj. (afterward Gen.) D. H. Hill, he spent two years. He then took charge of the planting interests of his mother, his sisters and himself, in Early county, Ga. At the beginning of the war between the states he had just attained his majority. Leaving his business in the hands of agents, he enlisted in the army, and in July, 1861, went as a private with Cobb's legion to Virginia. The terrible experiences of the campaigns during the four years of bloodshed and suffering almost shattered his health, which had been gradually undermined by hardship and exposure, and he has always suffered from its effects. On May 4, 1865, he was married to Rebecca Lanier Saffold, daughter of William O. and Mary L. Saffold, and granddaughter of Judge A. G. Saffold and Gen. Jephtha V. Harris. From the time of his marriage until 1882 he planted in Early county, Ga., and a part of that time also in Henry county, Ala. In 1882 he moved with his family to Cobb county, Ga., where he has farmed ever since. He was elected in 1868 to and served a term in the state senate from the ninth district. In 1890 he was elected to the office of state commissioner of agriculture, which he now holds and to which he has been twice re-elected, having performed its responsible and intricate duties with credit to himself and satisfaction to the people.

JUDGE WILLIAM T. NEWMAN. The grave responsibilities of high judicial office impose a burden upon the wearers of the ermine that few can measure or appreciate; but these responsibilities only increase the dignity and honor of the bench when associated with a fearless administration of the law and a rigid personal integrity. It is not invidious to say that an abler, purer, or more conscientious judicial officer never adorned the Federal bench in Georgia than Judge William T. Newman. Judge William Truslow Newman was born in Knoxville, Tenn., on June 23, 1843. His early youth was spent in the neighborhood of this cultured and progressive center, and from the private schools of that city he chiefly derived his education. He was still a mere youth at the time hostilities were declared between the north and the south, but being an ardent young southerner he enlisted in the Confederate service before he attained his eighteenth year. He joined the Lookout Rangers, a cavalry company, organized at Chattanooga, Tenn., under the command of Capt. W. F. Ragsdale. This company was subsequently assigned to duty, and known as Company H, in the Second Tennessee regiment of cavalry. Though mustered in as a private, the martial spirit of the young soldier was not long in making itself apparent, and he was soon promoted to the rank of lieutenant. His career of active military service ended in July, 1864. It was not the wish of the young soldier to abandon the service of his country, but a serious wound received at Jonesborough, Ga., causing the loss of his right arm, forced him to retire involuntarily from the field. As soon as he was able to mount his horse he started for the front, regardless of his disabilities, and was on his way to rejoin his command, when Gen. Lee surrendered. Lieut. Newman, during the period of his active service, made a gallant record as a fighter, and participated in quite a number of engagements. Among these may be named the battle of Fishing Creek, in Kentucky, where Gen. Zollicoffer was killed; the engagements attendant upon the occupation of Cumberland gap by the Federal troops under Gen. Morgan, of Ohio; and the fighting at Perryville, and the other engagements, resulting from Gen. Bragg's invasion of Kentucky. After his campaign in the blue grass state the young lieutenant served in the army of Tennessee, taking part in the battle of Murfreesboro. He then served for several months in Tennessee and Kentucky, in the cavalry brigade, commanded by Gen. John Pegram. This brigade figured in quite a number of lively skirmishes during the course of its raid, and Lieut. Newman, who kept at the front of the column, received a severe wound in the leg and was captured at Somerset, Ky. He was first sent to Lexington, Ky., and afterward to Camp Chase, at Columbus, Ohio. His prison experiences terminated on Johnson's Island, in Lake Erie. Here he remained a prisoner of war until August, 1863, when he was exchanged at City Point, arriving in Richmond, Va., a short while afterward. From Richmond he returned to Knoxville to rejoin his command. It was just retreating from Knoxville with the troops evacuating that city at the approach of Gen. Burnside. He participated with his regiment in all the engagements leading up to the battle of Chickamauga, one of the bloodiest encounters of the war. Lieut. Newman's command opened the engagement, and during the subsequent encounter with the enemy suffered the severest loss, both of officers and men. Lieut. Newman then accompanied Gen. Wheeler on his famous raid through Tennessee, fighting with him almost daily. Soon after this he went into winter quarters at Dalton, Ga., though his command was often engaged in active service in that immediate vicinity. Gen. Johnston's celebrated retreat from Dalton began in the spring of 1864, and daily engagements followed each other in quick and fatal succession. Lieut. Newman was in the fights at Dalton, Resaca, Adairsville, New Hope Church, and the battles around Atlanta. On July 29 Lieut. Newman was sent with Gen. W. H. Jackson's brigade to intercept the raid of Gens. Stoneman and McCook. It was on the following day, in the execution of this order, that he lost his right arm. His command came upon the Federal cavalry between Jonesboro and Lovejoy's Station, and found them engaged in tearing up the track of the Macon & Western, now the Central, railroad. It was in this engagement that Lieut. Newman received the wound that disabled him and caused the loss of his arm. At the close of the war, having recovered from his wounds, he was on his way to rejoin his command when he heard of Gen. Lee's surrender. He remained with relatives in Virginia until the surrender of Gen. Johnston's command at Greensborough, N. C. In June, 1865, having received his parole at Liberty, Va., he started for his home in Knoxville, Tenn., walking the greater part of the way. He remained in Knoxville for two or three months, and during this time he carefully considered the future, and reasoned with himself as to the best means of earning a livelihood. He had lost his right arm, and this only increased the embarrassment of the situation, and made the outlook more uncertain. Atlanta, at that time, was just beginning to emerge from the smoke and ashes to which she had been reduced by the invading army of Gen. Sherman, and he decided to cast his lot in that city. Soon after his arrival in Atlanta he began the study of law in the office of Judge John L. Hopkins, a native Tennessean who had preceded him to that city by only a few months. In November, 1867, the young law student was admitted to the bar in La Grange, Ga. He began the practice in Atlanta, and has since enjoyed the emoluments of his profession in that city, advancing rapidly until his final promotion to the Federal bench. In 1871 he was elected by the city council attorney for the city of Atlanta, and filled that position with distinguished ability until 1883, a period of twelve years. In 1886, on the death of Judge McCay, he was appointed by President Cleveland as judge of the United States court for the northern district of Georgia. Judge Newman has since continued to occupy this position in the display of talents that have demonstrated his fitness for the bench, and in the spirit of a blind impartiality that no one has ever been able to impeach. Judge Newman is connected with the First Presbyterian church, of Atlanta. In September, 1871, he was united in marriage to Miss Fanny Percy Alexander, daughter of Hon.

Ebenezer Alexander, for many years the judge of the Knoxville circuit court, of Tennessee, and one of the most honored and distinguished citizens of that state. Judge Newman has six children—two sons and four daughters—and his home life is one of ideal charm and felicity. Judge Newman's father, Henry B. Newman, was a native of Tennessee. At the time of his death, which occurred in 1849, he was the register of deeds for Knox county. He was a gallant captain in the Mexican war, and was a man of unswerving fidelity and patriotism. Judge Newman was only a small boy at the time of his father's death.

DR. WILLIAM PERRIN NICOLSON was born in Middlesex county, Va., Feb. 4, 1857, there received his early education and lived until he was seventeen years old. Being the son of a physician, young Nicolson naturally desired to devote himself to that profession, and in 1875 entered the medical department of the university of Virginia, graduating there a year later. He then attended the Medical college of Virginia, at Richmond, from which he received a diploma in 1877, and was subsequently interne at the hospital at Richmond for two years. In 1879 the Southern Medical college, of Atlanta, was organized and Dr. Nicolson elected to the chair of anatomy, to which clinical surgery was added in 1882. In the latter year he was elected dean of the faculty, and still holds both offices. Dr. Nicolson is a member of the Georgia State Medical association, the Atlanta Medical society, the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association, the American Medical society, and the Medical society of Virginia. He is chief medical examiner for Georgia for the Equitable Life Assurance society of the United States, and chief medical examiner for the same company in Atlanta. He is also medical examiner for the Connecticut Mutual and the Travelers' Insurance companies, of Hartford; the United States Life, the Manhattan Life, the Germania Life, the Home and the Washington Life Insurance companies, of New York, and the Union Central, of Portland, Me. He takes an active part in the orders of I. O. O. F. and the Knights of Pythias. Dr. Nicolson is a prominent member of St. Philip's Episcopal church. He was married twice, first to Kate, daughter of Col. H. D. Whitcomb, and had no children by this marriage. In 1891 he was married to Miss Caroline, daughter of Maj. Benj. E. Crane, who served as a major in the Confederate army and was later a prominent merchant in Atlanta and president of the chamber of commerce when he died, in 1887. Dr. Nicolson's father, Dr. George L. Nicolson, a direct descendant of the Wormleys, of Rose Gale, Va., was born in Middlesex county, Va., and received his medical education at Jefferson Medical college, in Philadelphia, of which he was a graduate, and in Paris, where he studied three years. Dr. George L. Nicolson practiced all his life in his native county in Virginia, dying there in 1883, at the age of sixty-four years. He was for many years a member of the state legislature from his county. He married Betty, daughter of Charles C. and Mary (Stiff) Wellford. They had eight children, of whom seven are living. Dr. Nicolson's grandfather, George Nicolson, was a native of Scotland. From his excellent ancestry, Dr. Nicolson inherits many commendable traits, and has won for himself an enviable position in professional and social circles.

DR. G. H. NOBLE. Atlanta is second to no city in the United States of its size in the rank of its physicians. The number of its doctors and surgeons who enjoy a national reputation through professional skill and contributions to the journals of science are many. Among this brilliant array is Dr. George H. Noble, who was born in the city of Atlanta Feb. 25, 1860. He is the son of James Noble, a native of England, who was for years a well-known resident of Atlanta, a leader in business and social circles. He is now a large iron manufacturer at Anniston, Ala., and was one of the founders of that thrifty city. Dr. Noble attended the public schools of Rome, Ga., in his youth and finished his education in Atlanta. He commenced the study of medicine in 1879, under the late Dr. V. H. Taliaferro, whose fame as a physician extended throughout the entire country. In 1881 Dr. Noble was graduated from the Atlanta Medical college. He began the practice of his profession at once, being associated with Dr. Taliaferro, but in a few months left Atlanta to take a special course at Bellevue Hospital Medical college, and at the Women's hospital, in the state of New York. He then received clinical instructions at Mt. Sinai college and at Manhattan Eye and Ear hospital, and personal instructions by many of the leading men in the city of New York, such as Sims, Emmet, Fordyce, Barker and others. Thoroughly equipped for resuming his place in the Atlanta field, Dr. Noble returned and has continued to practice here. A close student and indefatigable worker, possessing a calm and placid temperament and fine mental attainments, he has achieved a great success. He makes a specialty of diseases of women. He is a member of the Medical Association of Georgia, the Southern Gynecological association, Atlanta Medical society, Atlanta Obstetrical society and the Tri-State Medical association. Notwithstanding his busy life Dr. Noble finds time to write some interesting papers, which have been read before the associations to which he belongs and published in leading medical journals of the country. These articles, showing a remarkable research and advancing important ideas, have attracted the attention of leading members of the profession in various states. Among these papers were: "Abortive Treatment of Mammary Abscess by a New and Effectual Compress." This paper received very high compliments from the leading members of the profession, both in this country and in Europe, and from the late Dr. J. Marion Sims especially. The "New England Medical Monthly," and the "Birmingham Medical Journal" of Birmingham, England, gave it very high endorsements. "Suspension or Inanition of Blood to the Brain in Asphyxia Pelidum of the New-born" was favorably commented on, one of the French medical journals saying that the doctor was an "original thinker." Then followed other papers, all of which attracted much favorable attention, viz.: "A More Rational Method of Treating Flexions of the Uterus," "The Use of the Tampon in Pregnancy," and much aid and contribution to a paper by the late Dr. Taliaferro on the "Uterine Tampon," which was the means of much improvement in the treatment of diseases of the womb. The doctor presented to the Southern Surgical and Gynecological convention a paper on "A New Operation for the Relief of Prolapsus and Procidentia of the Womb," which was pronounced by the leading members as a very ingenious operation and the best they had seen for the purpose intended. He then gave to the Medical Association of Georgia a paper entitled, "The Removal of Septic or Infectious Materials with a View of Relieving Phlegmasia Alba Dolens," and later a report of the first and only successful case of removal of cancerous womb in confinement, the title being, "A Case of Carcimonia of the Parturient Uterus Removed Three Days After Confinement—Recovering." This new departure was received with praise by many of the leading members of the association. The doctor was also the first man to deliberately remove with success the pregnant uterus for cancer. Other papers and reports of heroic operations with success attained, have been presented from time to time, all possessing some degree of originality. The marriage of Dr. Noble to Mary L., daughter of Dr. Taliaferro, Jan. 25, 1884, was an important event in Atlanta society. It was the union of two old families of that city, well known throughout the state. Dr. Noble belongs to the St. Phillip's Episcopal church, and is a vestryman of that organization.

JONATHAN NORCROSS, known as Atlanta's most historic citizen, has been identified with her interests and gradual development since the city was but the humble terminus of a railroad. He was not only one of the earliest residents, but mayor when the settlement was assuming the proportions of a large town. He has been a potent factor in almost every enterprise. He came to Atlanta in 1844, when no streets had been built, only four roads converged, known as Peach-tree, Decatur, Marietta and McDonough, and opened a general store, but soon after started a saw-mill and had his time wholly occupied in sawing cross-ties and "string-timbers" for the state road. In a few months he built a home on the site of the present air-line depot. In the latter part of 1850 he was nominated by the citizens for mayor. His opponent was L. C. Simpson, a lawyer. These factions were known respectively as the "moral" and "rowdy" parties. The campaign was heated. Mr. Norcross gathered votes by the distribution of fruit and candy, while his opponent offered whiskey and like stimulants. The "moral" clan bore off the prize. Mr. Norcross was not only mayor, but chief of police and superintendent of the streets as well, and considering that the population was but a conglomeration of railroad hands out of employment, and gambling and murder of daily occurrence, had his hands full enforcing order and maintaining peace. In the same year he established a general merchandise store. Groceries and dry goods formed the bulk of his stock, but a sign over the front door announced that "shingles and feathers" were his specialty. His labors in this undertaking were productive of merited success. While in the saw-mill business Mr. Norcross invented a vertical saw, consisting of a circular wheel forty feet in diameter, and adjusted in an almost horizontal position, with which he was able to saw about 1,000 feet of lumber per day. The timber thus prepared was utilized in building the Georgia railroad, the first locomotive of which came into the city Sept. 15, 1845. The Norcross building on Marietta street was destroyed recently because of an insecure foundation. This is now supplanted by a magnificent structure that is a fitting monument to its owner's enterprise.

Mr. Norcross has not been so deeply engrossed in his daily labors but that he could spare much time for literary pursuits, and spends many hours in his library. He has displayed remarkable authorship in The History of Democracy, The Conflict of Labor and Capital, Common Sense Views of State Sovereignty vs. United States Supremacy, and Democracy Examined. He is one of the pioneer citizens of Atlanta, possessing a vigorous intellect, a true, untarnished patriotism, and the spirit that knows not defeat. Mr. Norcross was married in April, 1845, to Mrs. Montgomery (nee Harriet N. Bogle), of Blount county, Tenn., who died in August, 1876. One son blessed this union—Rev. Virgil C., an eminent Baptist minister of Atlanta. Mr. Norcross contracted a second marriage Sept. 4, 1877, with Miss Mary Ann Hill.

WILLIAM J. NORTHEN, the thirty-sixth governor of Georgia, was born in Jones county of this state, on July 9, 1835. The sturdiness of character and the high sense of honor that have distinguished him in private and in public life are largely due, perhaps, to his Scotch ancestry. His grandfather, William Northen, settled in North Carolina. From this first American home, his father, Peter Northen, moved into Georgia, then a frontier state. He settled at Powelton, about the year 1800, and the family lived in that part of Georgia up to 1890, when his son, William J. Northen, was elected governor of his native state and removed to Atlanta. Peter Northen married Louisa M. Davis. The result of this marriage was several children besides the subject of this sketch. With true Scotch appreciation of the value of a thorough education, Peter Northen kept his son at school or college from his early childhood until he graduated from Mercer university in 1853, in his eighteenth year. His health had been somewhat injured by his long and continuous application to study, but he had become so fond of his books that the scholar almost immediately became the teacher. In 1854 he began teaching, and in 1856 he was assistant to the famous instructor, Dr. Carlisle P. Beman, in the Mt. Zion high school. In this capacity he served from 1856 to 1858, when, upon the retirement of Dr. Beman, he assumed the management of this noted school, and raised it to still higher efficiency and reputation. When war was declared between the northern and southern states Peter Northen, then nearly seventy years' old, took command of a company, and William J. Northen enlisted under him as a private. At the close of the war he returned to Hancock county and reassumed control of the Mt. Zion school. Here he labored faithfully and with the greatest success. The school, under his management, became famous as an institution for the preparation of boys for colleges and universities. Young men were sent to him from every part of the state and from other states. His thorough method and the fine results of his teaching made his school as famous in Georgia and neighboring states as Eton and Rugby are in England. One interesting result of his long and successful career as a teacher was brought out in his candidacy for the governorship in 1890, and may be most appropriately mentioned here. As soon as his name was authoritatively published as a candidate for nomination, the boys who had gone to school to him immediately flocked to his standard, and it was found that in every part of the state he had strong supporters in the former scholars of Mt. Zion. These boys had now become voters and men of intelligence and influence in their respective communities. Their weight was irresistible, and the people of Georgia witnessed the rare spectacle of a teacher so honored and beloved by his pupils that they were ready to give to him their time and their labor to elevate him to the highest office in the state. It was remarked during the campaign that every man in Georgia had either gone to school to Mr. Northen or with him. In 1874 his health, which had not been strong since his school days, gave way under the severe strain to which he subjected himself as a teacher. To rebuild his constitution, he began farming, turning his attention largely to improving the methods of butter making and to the raising of a fine breed of cattle. His thoroughness in this pursuit, as in all others, made him successful. He became one of the most prosperous and advanced farmers in the south. He made a study of all the conditions of farming, the nature of the soil and the best methods of agriculture, and he was soon recognized as the very highest authority in the state on all branches of his vocation. He has always taken the highest interest in the condition of the agricultural class, and has always been ready to serve for its improvement and progress. From the origin of the Hancock County Farmers' club he was its president and most efficient member. He was chosen as vice-president of the State Agricultural society, and shortly afterward became its president, serving in this office in 1886, 1887 and 1888. His labors in these positions have had a wide and beneficial effect upon agricultural methods throughout the state. He also served as president of the Young Farmers' Club of the Southern States, thus broadening the field of his work and influence. The first part taken in politics by the future governor was in 1867, when he was elected a member of the state democratic convention, which was the first political body to organize in Georgia after the war. He was again called upon to serve his county and state, and elected as a member of the legislature of 1877-78. In 1880, during the gubernatorial convention, he was chosen as a member of the committee to investigate the bonds of the Northeastern railroad. He was elected to the house of representatives the second time for 1880-81. In 1884-85 he was senator in the legislature of the state, and was appointed chairman of the educational committee. Throughout his legislative career he devoted himself with great ardor and thoroughness to the cause of education. Indeed, this may be called his life work, and he has given to it his best labor and his best thought. As scholar, teacher, legislator, governor, and as private citizen, he has been enthusiastic in his devotion to this cause. He has striven to make the public school system of the state more efficient, and has perhaps accomplished more than any other public man toward forming a strong sentiment on the part of the people in favor of longer terms in the free schools and a higher degree of ability in the teachers. He has been the most ardent advocate of normal schools, and as governor did not cease in his efforts with the legislature and before the people until partial success crowned his labors in the securing of an appropriation for the establishment of a state normal school. He has served his alma mater, Mercer, as trustee for twenty years. In 1892 this university recognized his great services to the cause of education, as well as his mature scholarship, by conferring upon him the degree of LL. D. This degree was also conferred upon him in 1894 by Richmond college, of Virginia. Up to 1890 Mr. Northen had found his farm and home near Sparta, in Hancock county, a happy retreat after public life and cares. He had gone from his farm to the halls of legislation and had returned, after the full and fervent discharge of his duty, to his peaceful life and the quietude of his country home. He was happy to serve his state, and he was happy to find rest awaiting him in his fields and amid his stock and in his library. In 1890, however, he was summoned by his people to his longest period of public service. There was a general call for him to enter the race for the governorship, but he would not consent to have his name presented to the people as a candidate until he felt assured that the people, and not the politicians only, wished him to take this position. As soon as this was clear to him he announced himself as ready to go before the voters for their decision. It was plain to every observer, from the very commencement of the campaign, that the people were overwhelmingly in favor of Mr. Northen. County after county instructed for him, and all opposition soon ceased. He received the nomination, and was elected governor in October, 1890. On Nov. 8 he was installed in office. The most striking characteristic shown by the new governor was plainly brought before the knowledge of all in his straightforward inaugural address. This was his open sincerity of purpose. At no time and under no pressure of circumstances was it ever doubtful as to where the governor stood upon all questions that involved the welfare of his people. There was no equivocation, no evasion, no temporizing. Anyone whose mind was clear enough to see the proper and just course could tell exactly what would be his conduct in any emergency. His first address was warmly praised by the people and by the press for its plain and practical utterances, directly to the point, and touching the needs of the state with the sure hand of the careful student of public affairs. He warned the people against the miserable economy which, to save a few dollars, had enrolled Georgia among the illiterate states, and had deprived thousands of her children of the benefits and great moral influence of education. He called attention to the great excess of legislation, and the filling of volumes with unnecessary laws. He took occasion, also, to direct the attention of the legislature to the heavy burdens already borne by the people, and urged wise laws that would relieve and not add to their distress. The practical wisdom of the governor was shown in the following sentiment: "Whatever encourages general industry in the state marks the state's progress in power and wealth. Whatever makes fertile its fields, prosperous its manufacturers, thrifty its business and secure its capital, advances the enlightenment of its people and makes the stability of their institutions." Among the many important questions that came before Gov. Northen during his two terms as chief executive, only a few can be mentioned in this brief notice. The famous "betterment claim" of the lessees of the state railroad known as the Western & Atlantic railroad, came up for settlement through the action of a commission to be appointed by the governor. The high character of the men he selected for this important work placed the result of their deliberations and findings beyond censure. The claim was for $711,890, and was adjusted for $99,644. His firm stand in the dispute with the secretary of the interior, Mr. Noble, over the proper division of funds appropriated by congress to purposes of education of the two races in Georgia had the good effect of securing a just distribution of the funds. The secretary demanded that it be equally divided; the governor insisted that justice could be done both races only by a division according to the relative number of each race. He carried his point, and the fund was divided between the two races according to their numbers. The geological survey of the state, as promising to aid very greatly in bringing to the knowledge of the world the wonderful natural wealth of Georgia, always received his ardent support. Had it not been for his strong advocacy and constant work, the survey would long since have been abandoned. The attempt had been made several times to push a survey to completion, but disagreements, lack of appropriations and some sectional jealousies had invariably wrecked all work of this kind. The gratifying success of recent work by the survey testifies to the wisdom of his efforts to carry out the original purpose of establishing the geological bureau. His earnest appeals to successive legislatures for the establishment of a state board of health, for the making of good roads, for the establishment of a reform school, and for the better care and protection of convicts of the counties, were of no avail, so far as legislation is concerned, although it is believed that they have served to bring to the consideration of these important matters the best and most public-spirited citizens of the state. In reference to a reformatory, he took the high stand in his message to the legislature that "It is far more in harmony with good government to prevent crime than to punish the criminal." A number of reforms in the management of the penitentiary were enforced by Gov. Northen. The sexes were separated, the women being placed in a special camp, which materially improved the discipline and morality of the penitentiary. He also secured for the convicts more nourishing food and more humane treatment. Escapes from the camps had been frequent, and the law imposing a fine upon the lessees had not been carried out. Gov. Northen enforced the law and made the diligence of the lessees much more wakeful. A sum of nearly $10,000 was collected in fines, which were imposed, according to law, at the rate of $200 for each escape, where due diligence had not been exercised. In connection with these reforms in the care of the state's criminals may be mentioned the unceasing efforts of the governor to suppress mob violence. He urged upon the legislature the passing of suitable laws, and part of his suggestions were acted upon and a statute passed looking to the better protection of accused persons. Whenever there was danger of mob violence he at once summoned the civil and military power to protect the prisoner, so that he could have a fair trial by due process of law. His words and his conduct tended very greatly to strengthen the best sentiment of the people against this relic of savagery. The encouragement of the volunteer militia of the state and their efficient organization was one of the governor's special cares. Through his influence an officer was detailed by the United States war department to drill and organize the state troops. The forces have been well equipped and drilled, and are a fine body of citizen soldiery. Perhaps the work in which he took most interest, because it has been his life work, was in the cause of education. He strove successfully to extend the scope and power of the common schools. To secure better teachers, he urged the establishment of normal schools, and during his administration had the happiness of seeing two such institutions opened in the state—the Georgia Normal and Industrial college, at Milledgeville, which had been decided upon prior to his term of office, and the Normal school, at Athens, which is largely the result of his untiring and zealous work. He saw, while governor, and mainly because he was governor, the school year almost doubled, the establishment of the two institutions already mentioned, the opening of an industrial college at Savannah for negro students. The teachers have been better and more promptly paid, and have been more efficient, and a school has been opened nearer to almost every home in the state. He was elected governor for the second time in 1892, when his splendid services in the cause of education and in the protection of persons accused of crime received recognition, on the part of the negroes, by 40,000 of them casting their ballots for him, regardless of their usual political faith. Among prominent offices conferred upon Mr. Northen should be mentioned the presidency of the trustees of Washington institute, which he held for six years; he was moderator of the Washington Baptist association for eight years; he was elected vice-president of the Southern Baptist convention in 1894, and president of the American Educational society. His two terms as governor embraced the period between Nov. 8, 1890 and Oct. 27, 1894. Immediately upon his retiring from office, he organized an immigration and investment bureau. In this work he has utilized the vast knowledge of the conditions, resources and advantages of this state and has already, 1895, succeeded in bringing to Georgia thousands of thrifty people to aid in the upbuilding of the commonwealth. It is quite possible that his labors as a private citizen will excel in real value to the state his services while governor. He has proved himself a wise and efficient leader, and has achieved success equally as legislator, educator, farmer and governor. His sterling qualities have shone conspicuously in public and in private life and he has steadily advanced in the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Perhaps he showed himself greatest when he deliberately sacrificed his personal interests in the appointment of a successor to Senator Colquitt, who died in the last year of his second term as governor. Mr. Northen was regarded as the only probable successor at the expiration of Senator Colquitt's term and a less honorable man and even a "practical" politician, would have appointed a nonentity to hold the seat until the regular election of a senator by the legislature. Gov. Northen, however, did not hesitate to sacrifice himself and place himself in his just attitude before the people. He appointed a thoroughly competent man, Mr. Patrick Walsh, and announced that he would support Senator Walsh for the succession to the long term. Friends and enemies alike applauded this generous action and declared that he had risen above the ideals of politicians and statesmen. Mr. Northen was married to Miss Mattie M. Neel, of Mt. Zion, Ga., Dec. 19, 1860. He has two children, a son and a daughter. His present home is Atlanta.

DR. JOHN COOKE OLMSTED, one of the most erudite physicians of the south, was born in Pittsburg, Chatham Co., N. C., Aug. 25, 1851. Five years later he was taken by his parents to South Carolina, they settling near Society hill, where they stayed two years, and then moved to Yorkville, remaining there about a year and then going on to Chester, S. C. At the last-named point Dr. Olmsted began his education, but his studies were cut short, for his parents again removed.

this time to St. John's parish, Berkeley district, where he lived until the war closed. During the time he lived in St. John's parish he had a private tutor. In 1865 he accompanied his parents to Rondout (now Kingston), on the Hudson river, in New York, and a year later to Rhinebeck, at which point the father is now rector of the church of the Messiah. Dr. Olmsted remained in Rhinebeck until 1869, when he went to New York city, and there accepted a mercantile position, which he held until 1872, at which time he returned to Rhinebeck and began the study of medicine with Dr. I. F. Van Vliet, with whom he stayed one year. He then matriculated at the University of Virginia and graduated in medicine there in 1876, when he returned to New York and attended lectures at the university there one year. In the fall of 1877 he moved to Atlanta, and has there practiced his profession ever since. Dr. Olmsted is a member of the American Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine and the Georgia State Medical association. He was made a permanent member of the American Medical association in 1879 in honor of his volunteer service in the yellow fever epidemic at Chattanooga, Tenn., in 1878. For two years he held the chair of genito-urinary and venereal diseases in the Southern Medical college at Atlanta, and was professor of physiology in the same institution from 1889 to 1891. He was also surgeon for the Georgia railway for four years, but resigned that post. Dr. Olmsted is well known in the medical journalistic world, having contributed many valuable articles to the magazines. Notable among these was one entitled "A Plea for the Meatus Urinarius," which appeared in the "Universal Annual of the Medical Sciences," published in New York, and attracted great attention at the time of its appearance. He is vestryman in St. Philip's Episcopal church. In 1879 Dr. Olmsted was presented by the city of Chattanooga with a gold medal as a recognition of his valuable services in the yellow fever epidemic, for which he had refused compensation, notwithstanding that he nearly lost his life while on duty, the physicians attending him having given up all hope of his ever recovering. He was married in 1881 to Sally, daughter of Frederick G. Edwards, Louisville, and a grand-niece of Zachary Taylor. Dr. Olmsted's father is Aaron F. Olmsted, who was born in Hartford, Conn., and married in 1844 Caroline E. Cooke, a native of Catskill, N. Y. They had nine children, four of whom were sons, Dr. Olmsted being the eldest. The father served in South Carolina as a member of the reserves, doing patrol duty. Dr. Olmsted was appointed president of the pension board of Atlanta by President Cleveland.

DR. FRANCIS HODGSON ORME, physician, Atlanta, was born in Dauphin county, Penn., Jan. 6, 1834. For five generations his paternal ancestors lived in Maryland, the first of the name, Robert (father of Rev. John Orme, 1691-92), having emigrated from England to the then colony of that name in the seventeenth century. His maternal great-grandfather, Dr. Joseph Priestly, the discoverer of oxygen, also emigrated from England, so that he is of English stock. His great grandfather, Col. Archibald Orme, was a colonel in the revolutionary war, and on account of this connection, as well as his descent through his grandmother from Col. Richard McAllister, of Hanover, Penn., also of revolutionary fame, Dr. Orme is one of the Sons of the Revolution. His father, Archibald Orme, having died when he was six years old, his mother with her family moved to Milledgeville, Ga., where he was under the care of his uncle, R. M. Orme, well known as the editor of the "Southern Recorder." Having received a preparatory education through various academical institutions and at the hands of private tutors, he entered the office of Dr. James B. Gilbert, of Savannah, in 1850, as a student of medicine. After a four years' course of assiduous study, embracing courses of lectures in the medical department of the university of New York, he received his diploma as a doctor of medicine from that college in 1854. He returned to Savannah and formed a partnership with his preceptor's successor, Dr. W. H. Banks. The very first year tested the metal of the young physician and found it of a satisfactory temper. It was the year of the most violent epidemic of yellow fever ever known in the city. But two physicians escaped the fever, both men of advanced years, while eight physicians and two medical students lost their lives, a fearful mortality in a city of about 20,000 souls—one-half absent. Dr. Orme was prostrated ten days with the fever. During two weeks of the worst of the plague he was the only one of five homeopathic physicians of the city who was able to attend to patients. The responsibility was fearful for one of his years. His successful application of homeopathic remedies, and his faithful adherence to his professional duties, fully established his practice, and he had no protracted novitiate period to pass. Family considerations and health caused him to move to Atlanta in 1861, where he has continued in his profession. Although a graduate in old-school medicine, he early became a disciple of homeopathy, and in his practice has done as much for the spread of this branch of the profession as any physician in the south. He is liberal in his views, however, and while being aligned with this school has never professed to exclude from his practice any measures which he might consider conducive to the welfare of his patients, so that a charge of inconsistency cannot be made in his case. At the time he accepted the system there were a mere handful of homeopathic physicians, so Dr. Orme has lived to see an increase of over 12,000 practitioners. He became a member of the American Institute of Homeopathy in 1859, and for more than forty years has been active in its doings, contributing papers, joining in discussions, and holding important positions in connection with the organization. This is the oldest national medical organization in the country, and numbers among its members some of the first physicians in the country. That this association has a just appreciation of Dr. Orme's efforts in behalf of homeopathy is shown by the unusual compliment which was paid him in 1887, when his colleagues elected him to the presidency of the body while he was prostrated on a bed of sickness at home. The election of a man to the presidency of the highest body known to his profession is admittedly placing him at the head of the profession, there being no higher distinction in the way of conferred honor for him to achieve. His address upon the opening of the annual session was a masterful defense of homeopathy, abounded in practical and valuable suggestions, and characterized by fairness, good taste and scholarly finish. In 1878 the president of the American Institute of Homeopathy appointed a committee of eleven prominent physicians of this school, chiefly yellow fever experts, to meet in New Orleans and investigate the subject of the fever, and the effect of its treatment by homeopathy. Dr. Orme was one of the commission, five of whom are now ex-presidents of the institute. In 1867 Dr. Orme was married to Miss Ellen V. Woodward, of Beaufort district, S. C. His family consists of a daughter, Miss Elizabeth Woodward, and a son, Frank. He has one living brother, A. J. Orme, and a sister, Mrs. J. W. Culpepper, both of Atlanta. Dr. Orme has been earnest in devotion to his profession and has never allowed politics, speculation or other pursuits to interfere with his duties. He enjoys the respect and friendship of physicians of different schools from his own, having been always liberal and fair in his dealings with them. An unsullied record has firmly established him as a man of probity, and as a friend his reliability is unconquerable. Dignified, and yet always courteous in private life, he is one of the most genial and interesting of companions. He is a man broad in his views, of liberal opinions, a man of taste and culture, without pedantry. Besides his professional accomplishments he is a thinker and writer, who in public addresses and contributions to medical journals has shown himself possessed of literary qualifications of a high order. A distinguished colleague has referred to him as "a very able, influential man, who, by exemplary character, exceptionally clear and forcible writings and devotion to his work, to his family and friends, is a worthy representative of a noble profession." Dr. Orme's personal character, his marked professional success and his general usefulness, have placed him among the representative men of Atlanta. A physician cannot be measured like a soldier or a statesman by special brilliant achievements. He must be judged by his general success and integrity, and there are few titles more honorable than the family physician or the good doctor.

JOSEPH THOMPSON ORME, city treasurer of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Atlanta, July 28, 1860, and has since resided in this city. He passed with distinction through the public schools and also received instruction from a private tutor. Leaving school at the age of fifteen years he became collector in the private bank of W. M. & R. J. Lowry, now known as the Lowry Banking company. From this lowest position he has risen by successive appointments to his present office of cashier—having assumed this duty in 1888. He has also been honored by election to the place of director in the same institution. In 1890 Mr. Orme was united in marriage to Mary A., daughter of Charles H. Dickerson of Detroit, Mich. They have two children: Annie Ashley and Joseph Priestly, who was named after his great-great-grandfather, Dr. Joseph Priestly, fellow of the Royal Society of England.

Mr. Orme is treasurer of Atlanta, of the West End Cemetery association, the Young Men's Democratic league of Fulton county, the Fulton Loan and Building association, and director in the Bankers' Guarantee Fund Life Assurance company. In 1889 he was first elected city treasurer for the term of two years. For the succeeding term he was defeated, but re-elected in 1893 and 1894. Mr. Orme is a member of the Georgia chapter of the Sons of the Revolution. He has been for twenty years identified with Atlanta's banking system, and the highest confidence is reposed in his integrity. Mr. Orme's father was William Priestly Orme, a native of Dauphin, Penn., the son of Archibald Orme, supervisor of the Pennsylvania canal, and the grandson of John Orme, a rice planter in McIntosh county, Ga. He came on a visit to Georgia in 1840, and soon after was connected with the Georgia railroad, and acted as agent in Atlanta. He was subsequently engaged in manufacturing enterprises with Richard Peters, J. F. Alexander and W. P. Harden. He was treasurer of both the A. & W. P. R. R. and the old Western railway of Georgia. After the war he was a member of the cotton commission firm of Wilson, Calloway & Co., New York, which was afterward succeeded by R. T. Wilson & Co. He was a director in the Atlanta Savings bank, the rolling mill and other enterprises. He retired from active business in 1886, and settled on his farm near East Point, Ga., where he died in April, 1893. His farming operations have been highly approved—especially the system of terracing and grading, which has been extensively copied. His wife was Miss Julia Thompson, a daughter of Joseph Thompson, also one of the earliest of Atlanta's citizens. His life was one of unquestioned probity, free from the slightest scandal. In disposition he was modest and retiring. Judge Bleckley once paid him this glowing tribute: "He possessed in a marked degree the instincts, sentiments and principles of a gentleman, and his bearing and deportment were always in harmony with these characteristics. Both internally and externally, both in fact and in appearance he was a true gentleman of the purest and most elevated type. None could know him at all without respecting him, and those who knew him well added to their respect the double tribute of admiration and affection." His mother was a Miss

H. E. W. PALMER.

Priestly, a granddaughter of Dr. Joseph Priestly, the eminent scientist and discoverer of oxygen. Mr. J. T. Orme's mother was a native of South Carolina, who moved to Atlanta with her parents when that city was but a village, and for many years her father was president of the Atlanta Medical college. She died in 1885. Mr. Orme is one of six children, the others surviving are: Richard W., Joseph T., Julia C., and Jane, wife of W. H. Harrington of Rome, Ga.

HON. HOWARD E. W. PALMER of Atlanta, Ga., has lead an active life, which is now at the beginning of its prime, with the promise of increasing usefulness. His ancestors on both sides came to Georgia from Virginia and the Carolinas. His paternal grandfather was Edmund Palmer, a planter of Burke county, Ga., and his grandmother was Jane Allen of Richmond county, in the same state. Prof. James E. Palmer, his father, was educated at Emory college, Oxford, Ga., and graduated with distinction. After his graduation he established a boarding school at his home in Burke county known as Grove Mount, and which some called "Rugby." After conducting this school awhile Prof. Palmer was elected to fill the chair of Latin in Emory college, in which he displayed the abilities of a true educator until December, 1861, when his highly useful life was cut short by death, when he was only about thirty-three years of age. The mother of Judge Palmer was Mary M. Weaver of Greensboro, a descendant, in the paternal line from the Weavers and Daniels of North Carolina. Her connections, by blood and marriage, extended among the Mounger, Wingfield, Eve and Grimes families of Georgia, forming a very wide and influential relationship. His mother is still in life and graces the home of her son as a member of his family. Judge Palmer was born in Burke county, Ga., Oct. 19, 1854, but on the election of his father to the professorship of Latin in Emory college, the young family moved to Oxford, where the father died; and after this bereavement, Judge Palmer's boyhood was spent in Greensboro and Burke county, Ga. At Greensboro, when but a lad he learned the printer's trade in the office of the Greensboro "Herald." His education was secured in Emory college where he was graduated in the class of 1872, and afterward he taught school for two years. This was followed by his entering the law office of Judge P. B. Robinson as a law student, and his admission to the bar in the superior court at Greensboro during the September term, 1874, Judge George T. Bartlett being then the presiding judge. His first office and practice as a lawyer was in Greensboro, where he was admitted, but in 1876 he moved to Waynesboro, Ga., and in 1877 was appointed when only about twenty-two years of age to the office of judge of the county court of Burke county by Gov. Colquitt. After discharging the duties of this honorable position nearly a year, he resigned in order to form a law partnership with his uncle, by marriage, Judge S. A. Corker, under the firm name of Corker & Palmer. His course of life was changed a few years later when, in 1883, he accepted the voluntary tender to him, by Gov. McDaniel, of the position of secretary of the executive department, and moved to Atlanta, where he has remained to this date. This important position was held for nearly five years, and terminated by his resignation and appointment as assistant United States district attorney for the northern district of Georgia, during the first administration of President Cleveland. This office, however, he resigned after holding it about a year, to accept a responsible and new position as the southern manager of the Thomson-Houston Electric company, which he held for several years. The electric business was then somewhat of a novelty, but Judge Palmer entered with his natural, enterprising spirit into the work, and to him is due the credit of a pioneer in establishing the electric system, which is now in such successful operation in Atlanta. The Edison company and the

Thomson-Houston Electric company afterward combined and formed the General Electric company, which Judge Palmer represents in Atlanta as attorney. Having resigned the place of general manager to resume his profession, the firm of Palmer & Read was formed, and does a successful general practice. Judge Palmer, since his removal to Atlanta has been influentially interested in many business enterprises besides those above mentioned. He was among the earliest and most earnest advocates of the Cotton States and International Exposition. Without any solicitation on his part, he was unanimously elected to the position of director-general, when this important work was organized, but unfortunately, and unexpectedly, he was stricken with a serious and protracted illness—typhoid fever—which caused him to resign. He has, however, done very efficient work on several committees. Judge Palmer has been an active friend of general education and, in appreciation of that interest, he was elected the alumni trustee of his alma mater, Emory college. The present successful movement to endow a chair of history and political economy in that college, through the voluntary donations of alumni, was inspired by him, and he is practically at the head of the enterprise. Recently he was elected president of the Atlanta branch of the Alumni association, and may be relied on for intelligent activity in promoting the general interests of education as well as the particular welfare of his college. In his church relations he has confided to him the positions of superintendent of the Sunday school of the First Methodist church south, in Atlanta, and is also chairman of the board of stewards. He has a delightful home in the suburbs of Atlanta. Early in life he married Miss Emma Stone, daughter of Prof. G. W. W. Stone, who for nearly twenty-five years, and to the date of his death, was professor of mathematics in Emory college. Mrs. Palmer is the granddaughter of the distinguished and lovable Bishop William Capers, who, as is well known, devoted his great life with singular consecration and eminent ability to the Christian ministry. She is as earnest in church work as her husband, and is constantly found in association with others in active benevolence. Judge Palmer, now just past forty years of age, enjoys a fine physique and has strong vital force, which he employs in a great deal of hard work. He speaks forcibly, often eloquently. Cordial in manners, earnest in whatever he undertakes, with his equipment of natural abilities and educational attainments, he is destined to large success in life. In politics he is a democrat and always active in support of his party, but has never aspired to office.

DR. WILLIS B. PARKS was born on a farm in Forsyth county, Ga., in 1853, there grew up and received his early education. At the age of nineteen he entered the academy at Gainesville, Ga., remaining there two years, during one of which he studied medicine with Dr. Henry Long. In 1874 he went to the Georgia Military school, at Marietta, and a year later located at Neosho, Mo., where he took up educational work, pursued his studies and read medicine with Dr. J. W. Weens until 1878, when he returned to the state of his nativity and entered the Southern Medical college at Atlanta, graduating therefrom in 1881. He immediately began the practice of his profession which now so fully attests his skill and aptitude in and for it. Dr. Parks is a member of the Georgia State Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine—having served as treasurer of the latter institution for two years—and holds the chair of diseases of children in the Atlanta polyclinic. He is medical examiner to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and surgeon to the Atlanta Gas company in addition to being retained by several large factory companies. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church (south). He was married in 1886 to Annie, daughter of Dr. S. E. White, Carrollton, Ga. They have one daughter, Sarah A. Dr. Parks' father was Rev. J. W. Parks, who was born in Franklin county, Ga., and died in 1889, aged sixty-seven years. His wife was Sarah F. Newton and they had eight children, six of whom are now living. Rev. J. W. Parks was a Methodist Episcopal clergyman and served as a captain in the war of 1812. His eldest son, W. A. Parks, also a clergyman, was chaplain to the Forty-third Georgia regulars, and his second son, Isaac G., was a soldier in Capt. Rufus Kolb's legion during the late war. Sarah F. Parks died in 1883. Dr. Willis B. Parks and his wife are great social favorites, an enviably successful future stretching out before them.

GEORGE W. PARROTT, president of the Capital City bank of Atlanta, Ga., was born on a farm in Jefferson county, Tenn., Jan 4, 1843. He lived on this farm until he was about fifteen years of age, going to school there one year. In 1858 he went to Knoxville, Tenn., and entered the East Tennessee & Virginia railway office as an office boy, remaining there until 1862, when at the age of nineteen he was made agent of the company at Knoxville, which position he held until 1863, when he came to Georgia and took service with Maj. Campbell Wallace as general agent of the East Tennessee & Georgia railway, with headquarters at Augusta, Ga., where he remained until the war closed. In July, 1865, Mr. Parrott began a small grocery business in Decatur street, Atlanta, in connection with C. I. Brown. This partnership was dissolved in 1866, Mr. Parrott continuing the business alone until a year later, when, with W. D. Fain, he organized a wholesale grocery business under the firm name of Fain & Parrott, which was continued until the fall of 1870. Then, Mr. Parrott's eyesight failing, he gave up business for three years and removed to his farm in Jefferson county, Tenn. In the autumn of 1873 he returned to Atlanta and engaged in the cotton trade with his two brothers, Theodore F. and Samuel F., until 1879, when they gave up the cotton-buying business, and Mr. Parrott associated himself with Dr. J. D. Turner and H. T. Inman in organizing the Atlanta Compress and Warehousing company, of which he was then made and is still the president. After this mercantile enterprise had been thoroughly organized he retired from its active management, and with J. W. English, A. B. Steele and W. B. Lowe, in 1885, organized the Chattahoochee Brick company, of which Mr. Parrott was also made, and still remains, the vice-president. In December, 1889, in company with J. J. West, W. B. Lowe, J. W. English and I. Cheeves, Mr. Parrott established the Parrott Lumber company at Richwood, Ga., of which he was made president. He still holds that position and is the principal stockholder. This lumber company was organized with but $50,000 capital and has continued to grow until now it has $200,000 of capital and employs 250 men. Its annual product is about 24,000,000 feet. In October the Capital City Land and Improvement company was converted into a bank, and Mr. Parrott was asked to take a directorship, which he did, and a year later was made vice-president. He is now president. In 1887 the Chattahoochee Brick company built the Columbus Southern railroad, from Columbus to Albany, Ga., the brick company being the principal owners. Mr. Parrott was made secretary and treasurer and still holds these offices. In 1881 after the exposition was held in Atlanta, Mr. Parrott, with twenty-four other associates, bought the exposition buildings, and afterward agreed to build on the land which was owned by the city, provided the municipal officers would grant them title to the realty, a cotton mill of 10,000 spindles. The city fathers agreed to do so and sold them the land. They erected the mill of 17,000 spindles, which is now in operation, employing 500 hands. Mr. Parrott has never taken any part in politics, belongs to no secret orders, but is a member of the Presbyterian church. He was married first in 1867 to Miss Fain, who died in 1876, leaving one son—George W. Parrott, now living. He was married again in 1881 to Miss Martin, daughter of the late Rev. J. H. Martin, for many years pastor of the first Presbyterian church of Atlanta.

W. P. PATILLO was born on Jan. 27, 1837, in Harris county, Ga., the son of John and Mary Patillo. He passed the first sixteen years of his life on a farm, entered Emory college when his age permitted, and was graduated from that institution in 1857. One year later he taught school in Alabama, removing thereafter to Texas, was admitted to the Eastern Texas Conference of the Methodist church, and three years followed the calling of an itinerant preacher. In 1860 he was made assistant principal of the Fowler institute of Henderson, Texas. He resigned this position seeing that its requirements were incompatible with his other duties. Soon after he moved to Hickory Hill, Cass Co., assumed charge of a private school and remained there until the civil war began. When the call was made for volunteers, he enlisted in the Third Texas cavalry in June 1861, and in Mississippi, Missouri, Arkansas and Indian Territory did valiant service for the cause. He was appointed chaplain of the regiment, but resigned just after the fall of Vicksburg and left the regiment at Jackson Miss, July 6, 1863. He returned to his home in Georgia, and was made pastor of a colored church in Athens, Ga. Just after the war the Methodist church was financially reduced to an enormous extent, and it was decided to withdraw a number of the regular pastoral charges. Mr. Patillo's was among those selected. With a dislike for idleness bred of energy, and with determined will he moved to Atlanta in January, 1866, and accepted the agency for the Southern Mutual Insurance company of Athens, of which his father-in-law was then secretary. Coming to a city that was just recovering from the ravages of war, and having to combat and oppose the large companies and corporations of the north, he found it difficult to overcome instantly the obstacles that confronted him. But with a never-failing heart and a persistency that not only anticipates but wins success he has pressed on and by a yearly increase in the volume of his business has widened its dimensions until to-day none is comparable to it. The Aetna and other fire insurance companies were added in 1868, and it has been estimated that Mr. Patillo controls one-fifth of the fire insurance of the city. W. F. Patillo, a nephew, was admitted as a partner in 1878. They represent the Southern Mutual, of Athens, Ga.; Georgia Home, of Columbus, Ga.; Home, of New York; Phoenix, of Hartford, Conn., and the Hamburg-Bremen, of Germany. For the last-named company they are general agents for the south. Mr. Patillo has achieved a remarkable success; one due wholly to dealing impartially with competitors, to perseverance and exceptional business ability. He is a gentleman of affable manners, engaging presence, and a friend to be cultivated. His religious inclinations have prompted him to a broad mission work in Atlanta, and large, liberal contributions to the cause of religion. The community respects and feels toward him a gracious confidence.

WILLIAM H. PATTERSON, a successful broker of Atlanta, was born in Paulding county, Ga., in 1850, and has lived in various sections of both Alabama and his native state. In 1860 his father came to Atlanta, and here William received his education at the public schools of the city. That same year he began work in a brick yard owned by a Mr. Whaley, remaining there one year, and then in a grocery store owned by Mr. J. Pitts, and clerked for the same length of time. After leaving this position he was employed in a factory, located in Atlanta, and managed by the Confederate government, employed in the manufacture of gun caps. From the latter part of 1863 until July, 1864, he acted as salesman in a cigar store. In this month he was captured by General Sherman and taken to Nashville, Tenn., where he was held several months. After being released he remained in Nashville until July, 1865, and then returned to Atlanta to follow the occupation of newsboy and clerk for a year, after which he entered the office of John H. James, broker, banker, and continued in his employ for seven years. Resigning this position he became teller and general bookkeeper of the Citizen's Bank of Georgia (now defunct). In February, 1880, he was made cashier, and acted as such for fifteen months. In April, 1881, the bank failed. After this misfortune Mr. Patterson, having held since 1875 the office of treasurer of the Dade Coal company, proffered his resignation and was appointed superintendent of the iron mines and railroad controlled by this firm in Bartow county. A year later he returned, after severing connection with the coal company, and engaged in his present business. For several years Mr. Patterson was manager and treasurer of the Metropolitan Street Railroad company of Atlanta, which was purchased finally by the Consolidated company. In the latter company he was a director until 1894. From April, 1893, to September, 1894, he was manager for the Venable Bros. Stone company of Lithonia, Ga. Mr. Patterson is an ex-member of the city council of Atlanta, having served in that body as representative of the fourth ward during the term of 1879-1880. Throughout the term he was chairman of the finance committee. When he became a member of the council the city was struggling under a floating debt of $400,000, paying 10 and 12 per cent. interest thereon. In the first year Mr. Patterson funded the loan at 6 per cent. He was in the legislature of the state during the years 1880 and 1881. Also a member of the finance committee of the house, being third on the list. Mr. Patterson was married in 1872 to Flora, daughter of Perino Brown, of Atlanta. They have five children, as follows: Eva, W. H., Jr., Dumont C., Ernest B. and Baxter H. Besides being a member of the Methodist church, he has received election to the stewardship, and is secretary of the board of stewards. Mr. Patterson gives much of his attention to real estate, and its relative worth. He is director and treasurer of the Atlanta Suburban Land company. He does an excellent business in his chosen line. He has the city's welfare at heart, and as his record in the municipal council attests, needs but the opportunity to display true loyalty.

GEORGE F. PAYNE, M. D., Ph. G., F. C. S., state chemist of Georgia, was born in the city of Macon, Ga., April 7, 1853, residing there and receiving a common school education and training in his father's drug store, until 1873, when he entered the School of Mines, Columbia College, of New York city, and took extensive special courses in all its branches of study during the years 1873 and 1874. At this institution he passed all the examinations with much success, making a specially high record in analytical chemistry and mathematics. In 1876 he was graduated from the New York College of Pharmacy after taking a two years' course. During 1876 he returned to his native city and immediately entered his father's well-known pharmacy which had then been in active operation for thirty-six years. He also opened a fine analytical chemical laboratory at the same time, which he operated with great success. In 1882 he assumed entire control of his father's business, becoming a partner, and in 1884, after the death of his father, became complete owner. In 1890 Dr. Payne was appointed state chemist of Georgia, which high scientific position he still holds. In 1891 he was appointed a member of the Georgia state board of pharmacy, a board of five members who examine all applicants who wish to obtain licenses to operate drug stores in the state. During his residence in New York, covering the period from 1873 to 1876, Dr. Payne attended medical lectures at the University of the City of New York, and also at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of that city. On his return to Macon he continued the study of medicine, and in 1891 was graduated at the Atlanta Medical college. Since 1891 he has held the chair of materia medica and toxicology in the Atlanta College of Pharmacy, and since 1894 the chair of pharmacy in the Atlanta Medical college. At both these institutions he only lectures in the evenings after office hours at the capitol, being very conscientious in regard to letting anything interfere with his state work. Dr. Payne is a prominent member of the Georgia Pharmaceutical association, being elected first vice-president in 1894; is a member of the American Pharmaceutical association, an influential body of about 2,000 prominent pharmacists. He represented his state at the last decennial revision of the United States Pharmacopoeia, which was accomplished at Washington, D. C., in 1890. He is a life member of the Georgia State Agricultural society; a member of the Medical Association of Georgia; a member of the American Chemical society; a member of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and a fellow of the London Chemical society. He is a member of the Episcopal church. In 1884 he married Anna Ruby Nichols, daughter of Colonel J. H. Nichols, of Nacoochee, White Co., Ga. They have one child, a daughter, Gladys Nichols Payne. Dr. Payne's father was by birth a South Carolinian, who came to Georgia in 1840 and located in Macon, where he established the drug store mentioned above, where his son had his first chemical training. He continued in this business until his death, in 1884, at the age of sixty-seven years. He was the first pharmacist licensed by the state of Georgia. During the late civil war he served as lieutenant in the Silver Greys, a company of men past military age, which was organized in Macon at that time, and in this position took an active part in the battles fought around that place. He married Emily H. Sims, a daughter of Frederick Sims, a prominent citizen of Georgia, who resided at the Indian agency on the Flint river, and at one time represented Crawford county in the legislature. He eventually removed to Macon, becoming one of the influential men of the place, serving in many honorable positions, that of postmaster and of mayor being among them. To the marriage of George Payne and Miss Sims were born five children, two of them boys, of whom Dr. Payne was the elder. Dr. Payne's paternal grandfather was William Rex Payne, one of the younger sons of a wealthy English family. These younger sons came to the United States to make a career for themselves, as all the property was entailed upon the eldest son. From these brothers sprang many of the Paynes of Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina and Georgia. William Rex Payne settled in Charleston, S. C., and there married the widow of a German officer named Sharden-Weaver, the widow having fled from Germany to this country upon the death of her former husband, who was killed during the religious persecutions in Germany and France. She was one of the ladies who aided in the first establishment of the orphan asylum in Charleston. Dr. Payne's maternal grandparents were Frederick Sims and Katherine Wellborn, his great-grandparents were Copley Wellborn and Martha Cleveland, his great-great-grandparents were Cleveland and Katherine Stone; his great-great-great-grandfather was Gen. Ben. Cleveland of revolutionary fame, who commanded the continental forces at the battle of King's Mountain, N. C. On the Sims side of the family his great-grandparents were John Sims and Mildred Wingfield; his great-great-grandparents were Thomas Wingfield and Elizabeth Terrell, and his great-great-great-grandparents were John Wingfield and Sarah Garland. The coat of arms of the family is an interesting one, with the motto "Fidelite est de Dicie."

MR. J. CARROLL PAYNE. It has been observed of the Atlanta bar that it contains more of the younger element of the profession than any bar in the state. That may be due to the fact that Atlanta is comparatively a young city, being only a little more than a half century old, but the talents and legal acquirements of her professional men place her in the front rank of American cities. Among the younger members of the profession in Atlanta, whose success at the bar has suggested the foregoing reflection, is Mr. J. Carroll Payne. Though Mr. Payne has resided in Atlanta for only ten years, he has thoroughly identified himself with the social and professional life of this city. The subject of this sketch is a native Virginian. He was born at Warrenton, in that state, on Sept. 24, 1856. His father, Rice W. Payne, was a lawyer of legal scholarship and of eminence in the profession. He was a native of Fauquier county, Va., and was a loyal citizen of that state until the time of his death. During the late war he was a captain in the Black Horse cavalry, and made a gallant Confederate officer. He afterward served under Gen. Longstreet with the rank of major, and remained in the field until peace was finally declared. Maj. Payne died in 1884. He was engaged in the practice of his profession before and after the war. Between the ages of fourteen and twenty the subject of this sketch, having received a good preliminary training, entered the Georgetown university, graduating from that institution in 1876, the year of the American centennial. Environment, and possibly inheritance, has contributed to form an ambitious desire in the heart of the young student to enter the practice of law. He took an interest in all the debates of the college, and manifested a decided preference for those studies that tended to develop his mind in that direction. Having reached a conclusion on this point he entered the university of Virginia, immediately after graduation and commenced the study of law at that institution. After a course of lectures at the law school of the university he decided to further equip himself for the practice of his profession by a course of legal studies, supplementary to those already prosecuted, at the university of Louisiana, at New Orleans. Graduating from this law school in 1878 he entered the law office of his uncle, Hon. Thomas J. Semmes, in the Crescent city, and remained with him in the general practice until 1885. Believing that a better field awaited him in the capital city of Georgia, he came to Atlanta in the fall of that year. The wisdom of his choice has been happily demonstrated by his marked success in the profession. Shortly after coming to Atlanta Mr. Payne formed a legal partnership with Mr. Alexander Hull, a bright and promising young member of the profession. This combination lasted for about two years and was then dissolved. In 1890 the present partnership was formed, the junior member of the firm being Mr. John L. Tye, whose sketch also appears in these memoirs. This firm has been interested in much of the litigation of Fulton and adjacent counties since the time of its organization. For two years they represented the Atlanta & Florida railroad and since 1890 the firm has been counsel for the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis railroad. Messrs. Payne & Tye also represent the Equitable Mortgage company of New York, the Atlanta Banking company, and the Atlanta Trust and Banking company, in addition to various other local institutions and a large miscellaneous clientage. Mr. Payne has never courted political office and has never taken an active part in any local campaign, except in behalf of his immediate friends. He has been satisfied to merely discharge the duties of a good citizen and has steadily adhered to the practice of his profession, believing that the interests of his clients could be best served by devoting himself strictly to business. For the last two or three years the demands of his practice have been quite heavy and the time that might have been devoted by him to pleasure and recreation has been occupied by his professional engagements. Mr. Payne was united in marriage in 1885 to Miss Helen F. Hill, the daughter of Mr. W. Rhode Hill, one of the most successful business men of Atlanta. They have three bright and promising children, two girls and one boy: Helen H., Laura H., and John Carroll. The family group is an interesting one and Mr. Payne has much in his home life to make him contented and happy. Mr. Payne is fond of good reading and possesses a considerable amount of literary culture, in addition to a wide range of general information. He keeps himself thoroughly posted on current topics and is a close observer both of men and events. He is a member of several social organizations and has a host of warm personal friends. The inherent manliness and culture of the Virginia gentleman are distinctly portrayed in the character of Mr. Payne. Polite, chivalrous, dignified and obliging, he embodies in his charming manners the knightly traditions of the old dominion. Mr. Payne is a member of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, and is loyal in his adherence to the Catholic faith.

MR. JOHN CALVIN PECK was born at Sharon, Litchfield Co., Conn., Aug. 25, 1830. He passed his early years on a New England farm, attending a common country school two terms (of four months each) during the year. When nine years old his manual services became indispensable, and consequently he could spend only one term in school, but even with these slight advantages developed into an excellent speller and mathematician. Later he entered the Watertown academy to pursue the higher branches of science and literature, and won the first prize in each class of this college. In the spring of 1850, receiving an offer to go to Catskill, N. Y., as a carpenter, having acquired great proficiency in this occupation, he removed his residence and remained there three years, with remarkable success. May 4, 1853, while still in New York, he married Frances Josephine Hoyt, daughter of Starr Hoyt, of Huron county, Ohio, and immediately thereafter removed to Stamford, Conn. He was there employed as foreman and contractor, but having developed an asthmatic trouble, determined to move south. The first town to which he came was Atlanta, then small and almost unknown. But obtaining no work, continued on to Knoxville, Tenn., where no better opportunity offered, so he returned in the spring of 1857 to Connecticut. The asthmatic affliction again became a source of deep annoyance, and in January, 1858, he migrated south a second time, locating in Atlanta. Mr. Peck readily found employment with a Mr. Boutell, rose rapidly in this gentleman's esteem, and was soon placed in a responsible, lucrative position. He directed the construction of some of the most important buildings in Atlanta, and displayed a skill that recommended him as the leader of his trade. This has been his home since that year. His wife and two children joined him on April 1, 1858. In 1859 he associated himself with A. H. Brown and Edwin Priest, under the firm name of Brown, Priest & Peck, and erected on Decatur street the second of Atlanta's planing mills. At the end of the year the interest of Brown was purchased by the other partners, and in the summer of 1860 Mr. Priest sold out his share to John T. Bowman. The political condition of the country was unsettled and boisterous. Mr. Bowman volunteered in the Confederate army, and Mr. Peck, at Gov. Brown's request, began the manufacture of pikes to aid the secessionists. Soon after a reward was offered for twenty-five rifles made after a certain mould, of given length and calibre. Having never had any experience of this kind, yet believing that he could accomplish the task satisfactorily, he set to work and in a short time had completed the desired number. But money had depreciated, and the sum offered by the Confederate government would not defray the expense. Therefore he sold them to the Roswell factory. They were afterward captured by Gen.

JOHN C. PECK.

Sherman, and two are now in the museum at Washington, and were on exhibition at the Atlanta exposition in 1895. Mr. Peck was employed as superintendent of wood work in the Atlanta arsenal a few months, but finally his health, failing, went to Thomasville, Ga., and from here worked his way through the lines to Minnesota. Recovering strength and vitality he returned to Atlanta in August, 1865. In connection with Mr. Schofield, Mr. Peck rebuilt his planing mill and conducted this until 1873, when it was substituted by a finer and more complete plant, the firm being J. C. Peck & Co. It was sold in 1875 to Wm. Markham. Mr. Peck converted the mill into the present Markham house Nov. 16, 1875. In 1866 he erected the old capitol building, and four years later the old Kimball house, at a cost of $643,000. He was superintendent of construction of the International Cotton Exposition, and a member of the executive committee. He was an original promoter and stockholder in the Atlanta cotton factory. At the Piedmont exposition Mr. Peck held the same office, creditably and well, and had the contract for the wood work of the custom house. He was an organizer of the Fulton county spinning mills. In religious belief Mr. Peck is a Unitarian, and belongs to the royal arch Masons. He has had six children, those who survive are: Frank H., of Atlanta, who married Reba G. Pierce; Cora B., the wife of E. M. Williams, and Lily L., wife of A. P. Davis, of Atlanta. Those who died were George S., Charles C., and Arthur J. The latter died in 1886, leaving two children, John C. and Arthur J.

HENRY CABANISS PEEPLES, junior member of the prominent law firm of Harrison & Peeples, was born in Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., the seat of Georgia's university, Oct. 1, 1856, and a few months afterward was taken by his parents to Forsyth, Ga., and at the age of nine years to Griffin, Ga., where he resided until he was fifteen years of age, attending school and imbibing the elementary branches of learning that make the foundation of a successful professional career. He came with his parents to Atlanta in 1871, and in 1873 entered Mercer university at Macon, Ga., and was graduated in two years with the degree of A. B., sharing with Rev. E. A. Keese the first honor in his class. He returned to Atlanta and began reading law with his father, the late illustrious Cincinnatus Peeples, judge of the Atlanta circuit, who died suddenly while at work in his office, in 1877. This sad termination, when in the midst of his labors, was characteristic of his life. His devotion to duty in everything was untiring and earnest to the end. Henry Peeples was admitted to the bar in October, 1876, and went to Forsyth, Ga., and formed a partnership with his uncle, Thomas B. Cabaniss, late member of congress from that district. This partnership continued until his father died. He then returned to Atlanta, practiced alone for four years, and later became associated with his present partner, Col. Z. D. Harrison, clerk of the supreme court of Georgia. Mr. Peeples was assistant clerk of the state supreme court from 1881 to 1887, and was at that time appointed to the reportership to fill the unexpired term of J. H. Lumpkin, now judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit. He was re-elected by the supreme court in January, 1893, for a succeeding term of six years. Mr. Peeples was married in December, 1885, to Lillie D., daughter of Gen. W. S. Walker, of Atlanta, Ga. They have a happy household of four children, two sons and two daughters. He attends and leans toward the Baptist church, though he is neither a member of the church nor of any secret order, except his college fraternity, the S. A. E. Mr. Peeples' father was born in Edgefield district, South Carolina, in 1816, and when a child came to Georgia with his parents and located in the upper part of Hall county. In 1856 he was elected to the state senate from Clarke county, Ga., and served one term as mayor of Athens, Ga. His record as a soldier is stainless, and in the battles around Atlanta in July, 1864, he was on the staff of Gen. Gustavus W. Smith. Mr. Peeples' mother was Eliza Cabaniss, daughter of Elbridge Gerry Cabaniss, a native of Virginia, and of French descent. He was an ardent whig before the war, and a strong advocate of Henry Clay. Mr. Peeples' grandfather was a lawyer by profession, and at one time judge of the Flint circuit. Mr. Peeples inherits the principles that led his ancestors into eminence and renown. They were eloquent, kind, and generous. He inherits the virtues that not only promote his business relations, but recommend him as an invaluable friend.

JOHN T. PENDLETON, a practitioner of the Atlanta bar, was born in Hopkinsville, Christian Co., Ky., March 24, 1845. After his earlier years were past and his mind instructed in the simpler branches of literature and science, he became a student in Bethel college, Russellville, Ky., and there remained until the outbreak of the civil war interrupted his senior year, and the Confederacy summoned him to service. In May, 1861, he enlisted in Company A of the First Kentucky cavalry as a private, and until captured in the battle of Missionary ridge, continued in this station. In the enumerated engagements Mr. Pendleton took active part and established a reputation for valor and prowess: Murfreesboro, Tenn.; Perryville, Ky.; Shiloh, Chickamauga and Missionary ridge. He was with Forrest in the memorable raids, after the battle of Chickamauga, and in West Virginia, including the fight at Trenton. He supported Bragg in 1862, and was with Wheeler bringing up Bragg's retreat in eastern Kentucky after the battle of Perryville. In this campaign he was captured by bushwhackers, but escaped, and by forced marches night and day, reached Knoxville, Tenn. He received but one injury during the war. In the battle of Perryville a canister ball inflicted a painful wound, from which he suffered severely. After his release from prison Mr. Pendleton returned to his home in Hopkinsville, Ky., where he was occupied about two years in winding up the estate of his father, who died in the army. Having accomplished this task he entered Washington and Lee university in 1868, studied law for nine months and was graduated in the spring of 1869, delivering the valedictory to his class, and received a diploma signed by Gen. R. E. Lee. The latter has been sacredly preserved. In April, 1870, he moved to Atlanta and was admitted to the bar during the same month. Mr. Pendleton was elected auditor and recorder of the city of Atlanta in 1874, for the term of four years. He also served five years as assistant city attorney from 1883 to 1888. In 1889 Mr. Pendleton represented the Central Railroad & Banking company of Georgia, and the Atlanta & West Point railroad in Fulton county, under Calhoun, King & Spalding, general counsel. In 1891-92 he represented as division counsel the Richmond & Danville railroad. Mr. Pendleton was associated with Hon. Hoke Smith until the latter's appointment as secretary of the interior. Mr. Pendleton affiliates with the Second Baptist church; for ten years has held the office of deacon, and lately was superintendent of the Sunday school and Bible class teacher. He is a member of the Barnes lodge I. O. O. F., No. 55, and the Empire encampment, I. O. O. F. He married Ella J., daughter of Walter Bowie, of Westmoreland, Va., in 1870. They have two children: Kate, and Mary B., wife of E. C. Stewart, of the firm of Stewart, Cole & Callaway, Atlanta, Ga. Mr. Pendleton possesses a pure, moral character, and is deeply learned in the varied divisions of his profession. His father was William Henry Pendleton, a native of Christian county, Ky., born in 1825. He was a merchant in Hopkinsville, Ky., and when the war first began was made commissary of the First Kentucky cavalry, and died in harness during 1862. His wife was Isabel Major, of Christian county. They had three children, the surviving ones being John T. and McCallum Dawson, of Atlanta. The mother passed away on May 21, 1891. Mr. Pendleton's grandfather was Rev. John Pendleton, a Baptist minister of Spottsylvania county, Va., married there, and about 1812 emigrated to Christian county, Ky. His great grandfather was a native of Virginia, the son of Henry Pendleton, who served in the revolutionary war. (Vol. I, 4th series of American Archives, published by order of congress.)

EDWARD CONYNGHAM PETERS, capitalist, Atlanta, Ga., son of Richard and Mary J. (Thompson) Peters, was born in Atlanta, Oct. 23, 1856. Mr. Peters received his primary education in the city of his birth and then went to Penn Lucy institute, near Baltimore, Md. When nineteen years of age he was appointed on the United States coast survey, and was assigned to duty in Texas. Returning to Atlanta in 1876 he was appointed cashier's clerk of the Atlanta Street Railroad company, of which a short time afterward he was made superintendent. In 1889 he was elected president of the company, which office he retained until the system was sold to the Thomson-Houston syndicate. In 1890 Mr. Peters was made president of the Peters Land company, which was organized in 1890. He is also president of the Atlanta Savings bank, a director in the American Trust & Banking company, the Southern Loan & Banking company, the Exposition Cotton Mills company, the Cotton States and International Exposition company, and a member of the general council of the city of Atlanta. Mr. Peters early practical training and his subsequent extensive and varied business and financial experience makes him a much sought and valuable accession to any undertaking requiring enterprise and superior financial and executive ability, especially if the best and highest interests of Atlanta and her advancement are involved.

JOSIAH SEAMANS PETERSON, journalist, Atlanta, Ga., only child of John P. and Rebecca B. (Seamans) Peterson, was born in Providence, R. I., May 15, 1820. His father was born in Copenhagen, Denmark, in 1790, and left there a sailor boy at the age of fourteen, and followed the sea all his life. He was in the employ of Brown & Ives, New England ship owners, and died of cholera, about 1832, leaving the son with not a relative of the paternal family on this side of the ocean. On his mother's side, Mr. Peterson is of Welsh Puritanic lineage, and her father and grand-uncles were soldiers in the patriot army during the revolution. At the age of thirteen Mr. Peterson began to earn his living, entering a grocery store as clerk and bookkeeper. His schooling was consequently meagre, though about this time his grandfather proposed to send him to Brown university, but knowing his grandfather was dependent on his earnings at his trade he declined, an action showing a trait of character that is found in his whole life. In the fall of 1836 young Peterson went to Savannah, Ga., and thence to Augusta, where he arrived on Christmas eve. He obtained a temporary position with George H. Metcalf, and later obtained a situation with a wholesale grocery house, which failed during the panic of the summer of 1837. One of the partners went to Athens, Ga., taking Mr. Peterson with him and opened a fancy grocery store, which also closed the next August, leaving the seventeen-year-old youth a thousand miles from home, unknown and a stranger among strangers. For the next three years he was employed by Mays & Clayton, a leading dry goods firm. Mr. Mays' wife was a sister of the wife of Hon. Charles Dougherty, and while here he was a member of Mr. Mays' family and was treated as a son. In 1841 he was associated with the "Chronicle and Sentinel" as traveling agent, and the following year found him a clerk at Lexington, Ga., during which time J. H. Lumpkin and William McKinley urged him to read law and Drs. Sims and Hanson urged him to read medicine. Having conscientious scruples as to law, he began the study of medicine under Dr. R. D. Moore; but later relinquished his purpose to accept a position as bookkeeper of the Scull Shoals factory, where he remained until the same was burned down in 1845. Under his direction the factory was conducted during these years with a handsome profit, a marked contrast with its operation of a few previous years. In 1846, by special request of the editor of the "Chronicle and Sentinel," he wrote a series of articles on cotton manufacturing which attracted the attention of Col. H. H. Cummings and largely influenced the establishment of the great manufacturing interests whose benefits to Augusta are incalculable. Mr. Peterson embarked in business for himself in Athens in 1850 as a partner in a book store under the firm name of Chase & Peterson. During this time he was instrumental in organizing the first loan and building association formed in the state and was its treasurer. He was a member and secretary of an association, of which Dr. Alonzo Church of Franklin college was president, organized to support a free school. He was also a leader in the Sons of Temperance; an organizer of the lodge of Knights of Jericho and held the office of grand chief of the state lodge for ten years. Again Mr. Peterson was strenuously urged to study law, Hon. Cincinnatus Peeples, afterward judge of Fulton circuit, presenting him with an excellent opportunity; but the offer was declined. The book business having been a failure Mr. Peterson was employed as an agent of the Lawrenceville Manufacturing company of Gwinnett county, until August, 1857, when he came to Atlanta as associate editor of the "National American," a newspaper owned by Col. C. R. Hanleiter. While here he, unexpectedly to himself, developed great strength and versatility as a political writer. His early training as a business man and bookkeeper fitted him particularly for the commercial department of the paper and as statistical writer, and along these lines he made a very enviable reputation, which he still holds. As associate editor he advocated the public school system for Atlanta, the Georgia Air Line railroad, and Georgia Western railroad, cotton manufacturing in Atlanta and direct trade for the south. In 1861 he organized the Commonwealth Publishing company, which published a twenty-four column paper, of which he was editor, reporter, business manager and sometimes carrier. The paper achieved considerable success, considering the conditions existing at that time and grew into influence and standing. He sold the paper in 1863. In 1866 he accepted service on the "Daily New Era," in which paper he pressed the organization of the chamber of commerce and was its first secretary. He was secretary of the executive committee of the representatives of the thirty-three southern railways, who gave a two-cent a mile prospecting rate over their lines in 1869. Mr. Peterson prepared an elaborate pamphlet demonstrating the necessity and prospective and financial value of the Brunswick & Albany railway and the Cartersville & Van Wert railway. In 1871 he was the author of a review exhaustively presenting statistics and arguments in support of the construction of the Bainbridge, Cutlbert & Columbus and the Columbus & Atlanta Air Line railway, with extensions almost due north to Cincinnati. From 1875 to 1889 he was engaged in various publications, preparing sundry pamphlets and doing correspondence, nearly all of which Georgia and Atlanta were the paramount themes. In 1889, as assistant secretary of the Manufacturers' association, he prepared a pamphlet of nearly 100 pages, entitled, Atlanta, the Coming Metropolis of the South, which represented incontrovertible facts on which an unanswerable argument is based in support of the proposition. Although this is his last work of importance he has not been idle and is now well equipped and stands ready for more effective work in Atlanta, in the advocacy of advanced and improved traveling facilities; of the multiplication of manufacturing industries and the development of Georgia's resources. Charged years ago with being "wild and visionary" when advocating railway construction over what seemed to others to be impossible routes, and particularly for his forecast for Atlanta, whose growth her envious rivals quoted as "mush-room," he has lived to see every railroad he advocated to be a prosperous reality and to see Atlanta a queen of growth and prosperity far beyond everything he ever claimed. Unselfish and generous to a fault, as the world goes, it has ever been a greater pleasure to him to aid and promote the interests of friends and the community in which he lives than his own. Busy in helping the interests of others he neglected his own. His characteristics are those which make him invaluable to others, while perhaps almost valueless to himself. He is probably one of the few men who might be bought for his own price and sold at profit. It is safe to say that few citizens of Georgia, even those in public life, are more extensively or accurately informed as to the general history of the state, its prominent citizens, past and present, than Mr. Peterson; and it is even safer to say that none has a greater conception than he of the extent, variety and value of these resources, and the possibilities of the state under favorable legislation as a great manufacturing commonwealth; as a conductor and controller of commerce, within and without her borders; as to intellectual and religious advancement in every field and along all lines of human endeavor. Mr. Peterson was married June 6, 1844, to Miss Matilda Truly Manley, who died Oct. 16, 1882. Nine children were the fruit of this union, of whom five survive: Seamans Manley, locomotive engineer; Rebecca Matilda, widow of Robert S. Jackson; Mary Ann, unmarried, living in Spalding county; Albon Chase, mechanic; Virginia Lee, wife of Clinton Gunby, Tampa, Fla. He was married to his second wife, Catherine Anna, daughter of Col. C. R. Hanleiter, April 25, 1889. Before the war Mr. Peterson was an old line Henry Clay whig, an uncompromising anti-secessionist, consequently a stanch republican on all lines of national policy, a dyed-in-the-wool protectionist. He is a royal arch Mason, and working Methodist. He has been three score and two years in active business life and cannot recall as many as thirty days that he has been kept from labor by sickness.

THOMAS S. POWELL, a public benefactor, whose life has been devoted to his fellow-men, and one whose faithful services are destined to survive him in the grateful appreciation of the people of this state, is Dr. Thomas S. Powell, the president of the Southern medical college. As the executive head of this famous institution Dr. Powell has equipped hundreds of young physicians for the practice of their profession, besides devoting a large part of his own time to alleviating the ills of suffering humanity. His name has become a household word in every part of the country, and no man is more highly honored for his professional attainments, or more sincerely beloved for his true nobility of character. Dr. Powell has always occupied a high seat in the confidence and esteem of his medical brethren, and this is due to the fact that he has not only been a skillful practitioner, but that in spite of the seductions of a large and growing patronage, he has never bartered his principles for gain or overlooked for a single instant the moral ethics of the profession. Dr. Thomas S. Powell is a native of Virginia, and was born in Brunswick county in that state. His parents were both of Welsh descent, and illustrated the hardy characteristics of that splendid stock. After completing his primary studies he commenced his collegiate education at Oakland academy, in Brunswick county, under the able direction of Prof. J. P. Adkinson. He subsequently attended the Lawrenceville Male institute, then in charge of the celebrated Prof. Brown, of William and Mary college, graduating, in due course of time, with the highest honors of that institution. Coming to Georgia at an early age, and shortly after beginning the practice of the medical profession, Dr. Powell has been identified with the practice in this state for more than forty years. He has been a member of the State Medical association since 1856, and has also, for a number of years, been a member of the National association. Making Atlanta his home, Dr. Powell has always been a loyal and public-spirited citizen of that community. The genius of enterprise has been one of his distinguishing characteristics, and his mind has been constantly active in devising new plans and methods for promoting the welfare of his profession. In 1870 he founded the "Southern Medical Journal," one of the best edited and most influential magazines of this section of the country. The scientific productions that have come from the pen of Dr. Powell have been widely copied and extensively read by the members of the profession, beyond the immediate circulation of the journal. For several years Dr. Powell occupied a professorship in the Atlanta Medical college, and was recognized as one of the ablest preceptors in the faculty of that institution. His connection with the college terminated in 1866. Immediately his friends suggested to him the advisability of starting a new college, urging upon him as a reason that Atlanta was sufficiently well known as a medical center to warrant the establishment of such an institution, and that every state in the south would contribute to its support. The idea grew upon Dr. Powell as he revolved it in his mind, but he preferred to move slowly in the matter, rather than suffer the consequences of any hasty action that he might take. Finally in connection with Dr. Robert C. Word and Dr. W. T. Goldsmith, he decided to establish the college, and after a brave effort in subduing unexpected and almost overwhelming difficulties, the following board of trustees were selected: T. S. Powell, M. D., R. C. Word, M. D., W. T. Goldsmith, M. D., Hon. A. H. Stephens, Judge S. B. Hoyt, G. T. Dodd, C. M. Irwin, D. W. Lewis, A. F. Hurt, Rev. A. J. Battle, Rev. H. C. Hornady, Geo. M. McDowell, D. D., W. W. McAfee, and J. J. Toon. A charter was subsequently obtained and the first meeting of the board of trustees was held Feb. 21, 1879. At this meeting Dr. Powell was elected president, Col. J. J. Toon vice-president, and Dr. R. C. Word secretary. A building committee was appointed, consisting of Dr. T. S. Powell, Judge S. B. Hoyt, G. T. Dodd, W. W. McAfee, and Dr. W. T. Goldsmith, whose duty it was to select a lot and secure bids for the erection of a college building. A lot was purchased on Porter street, in the rear of the present Equitable building, and the erection of the building commenced as soon as the funds could be raised by Dr. Powell. For this purpose a stock company was organized. On June 25, 1879, the following faculty was elected: A. S. Payne, M. D., professor of theory and practice of medicine; William Rawlings, M. D., professor of the principles and practice of surgery; T. S. Powell, M. D., professor of obstetrics and diseases of women, and lecturer on medical ethics; R. C. Word, M. D., professor of physiology, and lecturer on medical literature; G. M. McDowell, M. D., professor of materia medica and therapeutics; professor of chemistry (to be filled); William Perrin Nicolson, M. D., professor of general and pathological anatomy; W. T. Goldsmith, M. D., professor of diseases of children, and lecturer on clinical gynecology; H. F. Scott, M. D., professor of medical and surgical diseases of the eye and throat; G. G. Crawford, M. D., professor of operative and clinical surgery; Lindsay Johnson, M. D., demonstrator of anatomy. Auxiliary professors: J. F. Alexander, M. D., auxiliary professor of practice of medicine, and lecturer on clinical medicine; W. G. Owen, M. D., auxiliary professor of physiology, and lecturer on diseases of the nervous system; G. G. Roy, M. D., auxiliary professor of materia medica, and lecturer on toxicology and medical jurisprudence; H. B. Lee, M. D., auxiliary professor of obstetrics and diseases of women; J. C. Olmsted, M. D., lecturer on the genito-urinary organs and venereal diseases; Lindsay Johnson, M. D., auxiliary professor of surgery, lecturer on minor surgery, and instructor on splints and bandages; A. J. Pinson, M. D., assistant to the lecturer on minor surgery. The college building was completed in November, 1879, and the school opened with sixty-four matriculates. The growth of the institution, commencing under such favorable auspices, has never relaxed, and the college, under the administration of Dr. Powell, has become one of the greatest medical institutions of the south. In October, 1882, Dr. Powell decided to erect a hospital to be operated in connection with the college. The ladies of Atlanta organized an association, and funds were raised by them for this purpose. The Central Hotel on Ivy street was subsequently purchased, and after being improved to the extent of $2,000, was opened for the reception of patients. For several years the hospital took care of all the city patients, and managed to be self-sustaining. In 1879 a dental department was added to the college. This department for several years was under the direction of Dr. L. D. Carpenter, one of the ablest exponents of dental surgery in the south. He resigned in 1895, and was succeeded by Dr. C. V. Rosser. On account of the rapid growth of the institution it was found necessary to erect a new building for the accommodation of the students, and accordingly a magnificent brick edifice was erected a few years ago, directly in front of the Grady hospital. A separate building for the dental department was subsequently erected. The college is one of the best organized and most thoroughly equipped in the south; and its faculty, composed of the leading practitioners of Atlanta, is one of the ablest in the country. The services that Dr. Powell has rendered the community and the medical profession in the establishment of this institution cannot be estimated. In life it has been to him a source of pride and delight, and in death it will prove a lasting monument to his memory. In 1847 he married Miss Julia L. Bass, daughter of Rev. Dr. Larkin Bass, and granddaughter of Gov. Rabun. She was a highly educated and accomplished lady, beloved by all who knew her for her beautiful traits of character. In December of 1882 Dr. Powell was united in marriage the second time to Mrs. Jennie Miller, of Virginia, a lady of rare beauty and mental attainments. She was a lineal descendant of a renowned Scotch family, "Roxboro," from whom the town of Roxborough was named. In the archives of the Historical Library of Philadelphia may be found the family history from 1724 to 1880. The work is entitled "Rosebrugh," the name at present. Mrs. Powell's grandfather was a most eminent Presbyterian minister, born and educated in Scotland, but spent the greater portion of his life in and around Philadelphia. His sons have all attained positions of honor and distinction wherever they have become citizens. His eldest son, Robert Rosebrugh, who went to Virginia in early boyhood, was the father of Mrs. Powell. Dr. Powell is a royal arch Mason, and a member of the M. E. church.

CHARLES A. READ, the son of a prominent Virginia physician, was born in Rappahannock county, Va. He resided in the neighborhood of his birthplace until he completed his primary and high school studies, and then went to the university of his state to continue his education and pursue the higher and classic branches of literature and science. He took the degree of bachelor of law and bore triumphantly the honors of his class. In 1881 he came to Atlanta and opened a law office, and since then he has followed the practice of his chosen profession with exceptional success. Mr. Read possesses a philosophical and analytical mind, delights in research and investigation, and devotes much time to solving intricate and vexing problems that occur in all the fundamental branches of science. In 1888 he formed a partnership with H. E. W. Palmer, a progressive and popular lawyer of the Atlanta bar, which still continues. Mr. Read is an officer of the Young Men's Library association, a member of the Philosophical society, and secretary of the vestry and junior warden of St. Luke's Episcopal church. He has shown a conscientious devotion in laboring for church organization, and encouraging the performance of religious and moral obligations. Mr. Read was married in 1882 to Mary Brent, daughter of the late George W. Brent of Alexandria, Va. Her mother was Miss Goode, of the same city. They have one son, Herbert Read. Mr. Read is an untiring worker. He has an eagerness for knowledge and a perseverance in obtaining it that brooks no failure, and is without limit. The demands of his profession and its duties have not prevented him from devoting a good deal of attention to literature. He contributes poetic and prose originals to the press frequently and these articles always command the respect of the best scholars. In the pursuit of his profession he is earnest and practical. He excels in orthography and in numerous competitive "spelling bees" has outclassed all opponents. Mr. Read is yet a young man and a highly esteemed member of the Atlanta bar. His profound knowledge of the fundamental principles of law and his ripe scholarship entitle him to a conspicuous position among his contemporaries. This position is accorded him heartily by the entire bench and bar.

JOHN CALVIN REED, one of the lawyers of Atlanta, prominent in civil business, was born at Appling, Columbia Co., Ga., Feb. 24, 1836. He was thoroughly prepared for college by his father, a famous teacher, and, having spent three years at Princeton, N. J., he graduated, in 1854. The next three years he taught Greek and Latin in his father's school at Woodstock, in Oglethorpe county, Ga., and, in the meanwhile, under the direction of Mr. T. R. R. Cobb, he read all the books in the course of the law school of Virginia university. Having spent a few months in Mr. Cobb's law office he was called to the bar in 1857, and commenced practice at Lexington, Ga. In 1859 he removed to Greensboro, Ga., where he stayed until he entered the service of the Confederate states as second lieutenant in Company I, of the Eighth Georgia volunteers, the famous regiment of Bartow. He rose to the captaincy of his company at the Wilderness. Omitting innumerable minor engagements, he was in the first and second Manassas, Gettysburg, where he was wounded severely, the assault on Fort Loudon, the Wilderness, the fighting immediately afterward until Spottsylvania court house, the operations around Petersburg, Fuzzle's Mill, and in the last fight of his regiment, at Farmville, Va., two days before Gen. Lee's surrender. Paroled at Appomattox court house he walked home, and resumed practice as soon as the courts were opened, settling at Lexington, Ga., where he remained till Jan. 7, 1875, and, from then till the spring of 1882, when he settled in Atlanta, he was engaged as counsel in many celebrated cases in Oglethorpe, Wilkes and Taliaferro counties, of the northern circuit, and also in Clarke and Greene. His detection in December, 1868, of the thieves who had stolen some $10,000 from Dalton, and recovery of $7,000 of the money; the prosecution and conviction, in 1871, of Reese, the leader of a band of dangerous outlaws in Taliaferro; the Deupree will case, in which he was original counsel for the executors, and earned a fee of almost $5,000; his success in eight or nine homicide cases, always winning, whether he was for the prosecution or defense, are some of the experiences of his large and varied practice before he became a member of the Atlanta bar. He had a memorable political career in Oglethorpe county. Nominated by the democrats, in 1868, as candidate for the legislature, the bayonet supporting the other side, he failed of election. In the presidential election in the following November, the military being withdrawn, under his lead defaulting taxpayers were excluded from the polls, which resulted in a democratic victory, unexpected by all except his few chosen assistants, pledged to stand by the execution of law. For this day's good work he was reported to the reconstruction committee. In 1870 the republicans had planned to perpetuate their plunder and riot in the public property of the state. Under their new law the managers were to be of their own appointment; there were to be different polling places, and a three-days election, to give large opportunity for repeating; and the military was to be used in aid of the statute. Shortly before the election, the democratic club, bearing in mind the victory of 1868, made (to use the words of their unanimous resolution) Mr. Reed dictator, to conduct the party in the election. He provided picked men with alphabetical lists of the disqualified voters, who kept watch at every voting place, and whoever voted illegally was at once arrested on an affidavit sworn out by Mr. Reed, personally. After two or three arrests the disqualified voters staid away from the poles, and the democratic victory was more decided than it was at the former election. Some two years later Mr. Reed seemed to be sure of a nomination to congress by the democrats of his district, but he succeeded in securing it for Mr. A. H. Stephens, who was not then expecting or seeking it. After this Mr. Reed turned his back on politics and devoted himself to the law more assiduously than ever. When he removed to Atlanta, in the spring of 1882, Gen. Toombs being practically out of the local practice, Mr. Reed was really the leader of the northern circuit, a circuit illustrated by W. H. Crawford, J. H. Lumpkin, Toombs and Stephens, T. R. R. Cobb, Thomas W. Thomas and other distinguished lawyers. He does a general practice in Atlanta. He is virtually out of the criminal practice, but he is engaged as counsel on some of the cases involving the largest interests in the courts. In 1873 appeared his first book, Georgia Criminal Law; in 1875 the first edition of his Conduct of Lawsuits; and in 1882 his American Law Studies. In 1876 he published, in the "International Review," his article, entitled, "The Old and New South," which was the origin of the now much-used phrase. He has by him The Life of Gen. Toombs, in manuscript, but has not yet decided to publish it. His father was Rev. John W. Reed, a Presbyterian minister, a native of North Carolina, closely related through his mother to some of the prominent signers of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence, while his paternal grandfather, a native of northern Ireland, was wounded in the leg at the battle of Brandywine while serving in the American army. Rev. John W. Reed was very famous as a school teacher, especially while he lived at Woodstock. Before this he had prepared Lyon and Benning for college, each one of whom afterward became a judge of the supreme court of Georgia. While he kept school at Woodstock, Mr. A. H. Stephens assisted many poor boys to get an education by sending them to this school, and this great man was in the habit of attending public examinations. In July, 1862, Mr. John C. Reed came home with the body of his brother, who had been mortally wounded at Seven Pines, and before his return married Gennie James, who died in 1865 without issue. He married Sarah Platt in 1880, and by her has a son, Prentiss B.

WALLACE PUTNAM REED, an editorial writer on the staff of the "Atlanta Constitution," a position which he has held since 1883, is a native of Wilcox county, Ala., where he was born in 1849. His early boyhood was passed in Montgomery, but in 1859 his parents moved to Atlanta, Ga., where he has since resided. His education was interrupted by the war, but two years' hard reading in a bookstore, where he held a clerkship, fitted him for his chosen profession of journalism, which he entered before he was twenty. At the age of fifteen his first story appeared in the "Southern Field and Fireside," and during the past twenty-five years hundreds of his sketches and short stories have had a wide circulation. He was admitted to the bar before he was twenty-one, and during a brief period of practice he held the office of solicitor of the Rockdale county court. The law proving unremunerative, young Reed gave it up and devoted himself to journalism. He edited two country papers, the "Rockdale Register" and the "Conyers Weekly," and at various times has held reportorial and editorial positions on the "Intelligencer," "New Era," "Post Appeal," "Journal" and "Constitution" in Atlanta, besides contributing to the "New York Independent," "Detroit Free Press," and several other periodicals and magazines. He is also the author of a History of Atlanta, a large volume of 700 pages. Mr. Reed is of northern parentage, and is a great-grand-nephew of Gen. Israel Putnam, and a lineal descendant of John Rogers, the martyr. He married Miss Kate Shaver, of Virginia, the daughter of Rev. David Shaver, D. D., a famous Baptist divine who was for many years the editor of the "Richmond Religious Herald," and the "Atlanta Christian Index." Mr. Reed gives most of his time to his editorial work, and rarely ever takes a vacation. He is a lover of art and literature, and his books and a few congenial friends make his ideal world.

HARRY MAURRELLE REID, lawyer, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Blairsville, Union Co., Ga., Feb. 15, 1853, and lived there until he was seventeen years old, receiving his primary education at the schools at that place. In 1870 he entered Meson academy at Lexington, Ga., for the years 1870-71, and from there he went to Atlanta, studying one term at old Oglethorpe university, now extinct, and leaving in his junior year. Immediately afterward he commenced the study of law with a relation, Marshall L. Smith, at Dawsonville, Dawson Co., Ga., and was admitted to the bar in 1873. He located in Campbell county, Ga., and began to practice his profession in 1875, being six years later elected by the state legislature solicitor-general of Coweta circuit for the term of four years. His term of office expiring he was re-elected for four years more, and soon afterward removed to Carrollton, Ga., a city in the same circuit. In January, 1889, he came to Atlanta and very soon entered into partnership with J. B. Stewart, with whom he was associated under the firm name of Reid & Stewart until April 1, 1894. Since that date he has practiced alone. In 1887 Mr. Reid was chairman of the board of commissioners of Palmetto, Ga., and while a resident of Carrollton he was a member of the board of school commissioners. Up to a late date he has always taken a very active interest in democratic politics. He is a master Mason and a member of the Presbyterian church. In 1877 he married Gertrude, daughter of John Carlton, of Campbell county, and they have two sons and two daughters: Willie Katherine and Jessie Cicely (twins), Arthur M., and Carlton. Mr. Reid's father was Simpson Reid, and was a native of North Carolina, and was serving as a member of the Georgia state senate from the Fortieth senatorial district at the time of his death in 1864. Simpson Reid was a lawyer by profession, the principal field of his practice being the old Blue Ridge circuit.

EVERARD HAMILTON RICHARDSON was born in Cedar Valley, in what is now Polk county, Ga., upon the plantation of his father, Dr. E. H. Richardson, Sr., a few miles from the village of Cedartown, Jan. 16, 1850. He is the product of widely dissimilar strains of blood. His paternal ancestors were cavaliers and his maternal stock were Puritans. It has often been remarked that this blended blood of the sturdy, uncompromising Puritan, and of the gallant, aggressive, warm-hearted cavalier, has produced a stock of men in America in whom all the elements of manhood are well mixed. The Puritan and the cavalier were both English, with all of English purpose in each type; but they were representatives of views that for centuries had disturbed the public peace. In the settlement of America the north half, with Massachusetts as the center, was peopled mainly by Puritans, and the south half, with Virginia as its center, was occupied by cavaliers. But in the long run of the years these have so co-mingled throughout the Union as to produce the energetic, determined and gallant class of American citizens to which the Richardsons belong. His paternal great-grandfather, Daniel Richardson, came from England, settled in Virginia, served as a lieutenant in the revolutionary war three years under Washington, and received a large tract of land from the United States government for services in the war. He married Fanny Long, who had seven brothers in the revolutionary war, most of whom were officers of distinction. His grandfather, Armistead Richardson, was born near Raccoon ford on the Rapidan river, Culpeper county, Va., in the year 1788. In the early portion of the nineteenth century he moved from Virginia to Georgia, settling at Eatonton, Putman Co., where he owned a farm, living in Eatonton, and marrying Elizabeth Griggs. Being more than six feet in height, a born commander of men, and of strong mentality, he was a conspicuous figure in any presence. He was a major in the Indian war of 1813, under Gens. Floyd and Andrew Jackson. In 1834 he removed to Cave Springs, Ga. During his entire life he was a prominent and conspicuous member of the Baptist church. Notwithstanding he was more than seventy-five years old, he held a commission of colonel of state troops under Gov. Brown during the four years of war between the states. He was a knightly character, and possessed in a very eminent degree the martial and independent spirit of cavalier ancestry. From his loins sprang many eminent families in Georgia. Among them are the Hamiltons, Harpers, and Wrights, of Rome, Ga. Dr. E. H. Richardson, Sr., the second son of Armistead and Elizabeth Richardson and father of Everard H. Richardson, Jr., was born in Eatonton, Ga., 1814. In 1834 he was a private student of medicine in the office of the distinguished Dr. N. Chapman of Philadelphia, professor in the university of Pennsylvania. Graduating there he returned to Georgia, beginning the practice of medicine in Crawfordville, Ga., in 1835, thus starting his professional life at the same time and at the same place with his warm personal friend, Alexander H. Stephens. On April 6, 1837, E. H. Richardson, Sr., was married at Penfield, Ga., to Mary A. Frances Janes, daughter of William and Silah Janes. The product of this union was nine children: Jane Thomas, Lavinia, Rosaline, Absalom Janes, Susan, Everard H., William Janes, Mary Silah, and Armistead Richardson. The last mentioned, Armistead Richardson, is a prominent lawyer of north Georgia. For four years he was solicitor-general of Tallapoosa circuit, and his ability and zeal in the fearless discharge of the functions of his office made him a terror to malefactors against the law. He has been mayor of and attorney for the town of Cedartown. He is a man of affairs. He is a democrat, but politics are thoroughly distasteful to him. His lofty integrity of character, his loyal devotion to truth and the right, his uncompromising hostility to shams and frauds and dishonesty in high places, have made him a tower of strength in his community. Brave, true and chivalric by nature, the crowning glory of his character known by all men is that he is unimpeachable. Mary Frances Janes was the daughter of William and Silah Janes, of Greene county, Ga., and the mother of E. H. Richardson, Jr., was born and reared in luxury's lap. The youngest child of wealthy parents, she was the indulged and idolized pet of the home circle. Endowed with a brilliant mind, beautiful in person, sweet and gentle in spirit and soul, she was the impersonation of those virtues and charms that made the ante-bellum southern woman the grandest type of woman that any civilization in the world's history has ever produced. Her beautiful life was the inspiration of her children. Her lofty conception of the Christian religion and her Spartan-like devotion to the Christ she adored, led her gently and sweetly through the sunset of life, and triumphantly her faith bore her through the valley and shadow of death to heaven's portal, into a blissful immortality beyond the stars. William Janes, her father, was born in Virginia. His ancestors, however, settled in 1637 in Connecticut, coming originally from Normandy with William the Conqueror. In the beginning of the present century William Janes moved from Virginia and settled in Wilkes county, Ga. He was a shrewd financier, and in his day was one of the wealthiest men in Georgia and a pillar in the Baptist church. He reared twelve children, educating his boys at the state university (then Franklin college), and his girls at Augusta, Ga. He left a large fortune to each of his children. In 1839 E. H. Richardson, Sr., and his young wife purchased a large tract of land in the fertile Cedar valley, in what is now Polk county, Ga. For some years after Dr. E. H. Richardson, Sr., practiced his profession there, at the same time conducting his large planting interests. Owning a large number of slaves, he gradually ceased the practice of medicine, and lived a life of elegant ease, educating his children and exercising general supervision of his estate. He was always fearless and outspoken in his convictions, priding himself in being void of policy and freedom from hypocrisy. The subject of this sketch, Everard H. Richardson, received a common school education from the schools of Cedartown and Cave Springs, Ga. In 1869 he began the study of medicine, attending his first course of lectures at the medical department of the University of Louisiana, at New Orleans, 1870-71. In March, 1872, he was graduated at the medical department, University of Georgia, at Augusta, Ga. He entered upon the practice of medicine at Cedartown, Ga., practicing there five years. Young, ardent and ambitious, by this time he had paid, being necessitated by the vicissitudes of war and the consequent wrecking of his father's fortune, from his earnings for his medical education, and he accumulated a sufficiency to spend five months in New York city, taking a post-graduate course in the further preparation for his life's work. There he took private courses under Darby, Bryant, Loomis, and Austin Flint, Sr. Returning to Cedartown, he resumed his practice, accumulating property and constantly enlarging his field for usefulness. During the succeeding years, till 1889, he worked assiduously and constantly in his profession, without a break for recreation, except occasional trips to New York and Philadelphia, to go to medical fountains to acquire fresh knowledge in his profession. In 1878, Dr. E. H. Richardson married the daughter of Dr. E. C. Jones, of Madison, Ga., who is a lady of rare loveliness of character, cultivation and attainments. Three children have come from this union—Everard Dugas, Marion Sims, and Florine E. Richardson. In 1889, Dr. Richardson had accumulated, by long toil, a comfortable competency, and had arrived at the top of his profession in his section. His clientele extended as far as Broken Arrow, in Alabama, and Chattanooga, in Tennessee, and to Rome, Ga. At this time Dr. Richardson decided to enlarge his stock of medical lore by an extended sojourn in Europe. Beginning his studies in Vienna, he remained there several months, attending the great clinics of Billroth, Albert Dittol and Kapoosa, after leaving Vienna, going to Paris and studying under such teachers and distinguished savants as Guion, Charcot, Pdean, Apostolli, Rene Appert and Tarmier. His longest stay was in London, where he was a member of Guy's hospital club for the year 1890, and was an interne of Guy's hospital, enjoying the matchless advantages from the greatest English teachers of this century. There he enjoyed the friendship and kindly interest of Mr. Jacobson, Mr. House, Davies Colley, Mr. Lane-Golding Bird and Clement Lucas. During the year 1890 he attended the British Medical association at Birmingham, England, and visited that great seat of learning, Edinburgh. Before returning to America, he traveled extensively in Europe, going to Lyons, Marseilles, Cannes and Nice, in France; Monte Carlo, in Monaco; Mentone, San Reno, Genoa, and Roine, in Italy—going as far south on the Mediterranean coast as Naples and Pompeii, and Venice, on the Adriatic. Returning to America, and, determining to still further enlarge his field of work, and to give his children superior advantages, he purchased a home in the capital city of his native state and settled at Atlanta, Ga. Here, devoting himself to the general practice of medicine, he has built up an extensive clientele, being called frequently to the adjoining states of Tennessee and Alabama. An indefatigable student, he has kept fully abreast with all the real advances in the science and art of medicine; but, possessing a level head and sound judgment, he has never been one to ardently embrace every new fancy and fad that would-be promoters in the ranks of the medical profession are constantly seeking to foist upon the credulous and unwary. Dr. Richardson expresses himself as having no other ambition than to have the privilege of working in his chosen profession and equipping his children for the battle of life. He is a member of the American Medical association, the Medical Association of Georgia, where he has served as vice-president, orator and censor; the Atlanta Society of Medicine, and the Capital City club, of Atlanta, Ga. Dr. Richardson has always voted with the democratic party, but being independent in spirit and thought, he has never endorsed unqualifiedly the dogmas of any political party. Dr. Richardson is widely known in the journalistic branch of his profession, the following being a partial list of some of his contributions to current medical literature: "Congenital Pheniosis, Producing Paralysis of Motion and Dementia, Operation and Permanent Relief." "Radical Surgery, the Best Surgery in the Treatment of Extensive, Lacerated and Contused Wounds of the Extremities." "Treatment of Hydrocele by Injection of Carbolic Acid." "Removal of Portion of Cranium Resulting from Traumatism of Long Standing." "When Should We Interfere in Threatened Puerperal Convulsions?" "Treatment of Compound Communated Fracture with Plaster of Paris." "Continued Fever Occurring in This Climate." "Cholera Infantum." "The Medical Side of Appendicitis." "Report of a Case of Atresia of Cervix Uteri, Produced by Nitric Acid, Relieved by Bilateral Division of Cervix." Dr. Richardson ranks high in the medical profession, and as a physician and a man of affairs, his views and opinions have always challenged respect. He has never sought office. He was director in the C. R. & C. R. R., surgeon for the same, and of the E. & W. R. R. of Alabama; also, one of the directors of the Cherokee Land company, which has done so much for north Gorgia. He is now in the prime of mental and physical manhood. Ambitious, capable, learned, and skillful in his profession, inspired by hope and faith in the power of work, the future is bright with promise for him.

FRANK P. RICE, was born in Claremont, N. H., Oct. 28, 1838. His parents who were of English and Welsh extraction and descendants from revolutionary ancestors, were natives of Vermont. They came to Georgia when their son, Frank P. Rice, was only nine years of age, and located in Atlanta, which was then in its infancy, having a population of about 1,200 or 1,500. Impressed by his father with the necessity and the duty of industry, he began, when a mere boy, to grapple with the stern realities of life as a vender of newspapers and such other articles as were readily sold about the passenger depot and on the streets of Atlanta. Many of the old people who knew him in his boyhood bear testimony to his energy and industry. The quality of a business man, exemplified in his childhood, has proved a distinguishing characteristic of his subsequent life. When eighteen years of age he conceived the purpose of learning a trade, and soon, with the consent of his father, bound himself for three years and a half to Mr. William Kay of Atlanta, to acquire a knowledge of the art of book binding. The contract of apprenticeship was signed in due form, placed properly on record, and faithfully obeyed until the term of his service ended and he was an acknowledged master of his trade. His faithful observance of every obligation as an apprentice was illustrative of his future life, in which he has been true to all of his contracts, never having suffered a debt to remain unpaid a day beyond its maturity, or violated any agreement into which he has entered at any time. The skill he had attained, and his habits of industry and temperance, soon secured him a good situation at fair wages. Atlanta was then making her first strides in the path of her "manifest destiny," and Mr. Rice, with keen perception, saw opportunities to accumulate money more rapidly by abandoning his trade. He, therefore, decided to hold it in reserve for possible emergencies, and engaged in the business of contracting for stone masonry and other work of material improvement, then greatly in demand in the growing young city. In this business he exercised a faultless judgment and realized good profits on all of his contracts. When scarcely arrived at manhood he undertook, by contract, to construct all of the stone work required on the line of the Savannah, Griffin & North Alabama railroad, and carried out his agreement with fidelity and to the satisfaction of the railroad company. On Aug. 2, 1861, he was most happily married to a daughter of the Rev. I. G. Mitchell of Atlanta, who has ever proved a noble and devoted helpmate. Their first child, a son, died in early infancy. Their second son, Mr. Charles F. Rice, a young man of true promise, and their only surviving child, occupies the position of deputy clerk of the city of Atlanta. Every dollar that Mr. Rice realized, in excess of his family expenses, was invested in Atlanta city property. With his habitual foresight he discovered her future prospects and felt safe in putting his surplus earnings in her real estate. When the war of the states came on he joined the Third regiment of state troops, and was chosen lieutenant of Company B of that regiment. At the conclusion of his military services he was appointed special agent of the Atlanta & West Point railroad, in which position he was vigilant, faithful and successful. As a consequence of war, Atlanta was laid in ruins. Thousands returned to find their once fair city a literal mass of bricks and ashes. Among the number who resolved to rebuild and advance the city far beyond her previous attainments was Frank P. Rice. Still confident of her great future he went to work with energy, and from that day to the present has labored to promote her varied interests, material or otherwise. No citizen has accomplished more in this respect than Mr. Rice. Considering the contemplated Air Line railroad (now the Richmond & Danville) an important auxiliary to the growth and general prosperity of Atlanta, he gave his influence freely to the success of this enterprise, and before its completion purchased large bodies of land along the surveyed line of this road, giving the right of way through his purchases. When this road was finished he embarked extensively in the milling and lumber business on its route, and for eighteen years prosecuted this enterprise with great profit, furnishing a large portion of the lumber used in building up the city. The Georgia Western railroad, designed to connect Atlanta with the coal fields of Alabama, and to constitute an artery of general travel and transportation, had been chartered and was a hopeful project for the Gate city. After years of delay and doubt as to its completion, the charter became the property of a syndicate interested in its defeat. Mr. Rice comprehended their plan and determined, if possible, to checkmate it. To accomplish this purpose he, with some others, prepared and procured a charter for a railroad passing from Atlanta to Alabama in the same general direction, and having corresponding privileges to those granted the Georgia Western railroad. When the syndicate owning the old charter saw that a road would be built under the new charter, they sold their franchise and the Georgia Pacific was completed under the latter grant, accomplishing for Atlanta all that was anticipated from the Georgia Western. Mr. Rice contributed largely to this splendid result. The entry of Mr. Rice into the political arena was mainly due to the fact of having devoted his influence for years to political advancement of friends. Anxious for their success, he applied himself to the study of "men and measures," and soon became one of the best informed citizens in regard to the material, financial and political questions of the day. Naturally modest, he regarded the knowledge he had acquired and the influence he possessed as the property of others who sought political preferment, and was always ready to aid in the election of those whom he considered most devoted to, and most able to promote the interests of the city, county, state or republic. He was, therefore, frequently appointed as a delegate to political conventions to nominate candidates for city, county, state and federal offices. It is a known fact that his friends were always successful. But the time came when observant men, impressed with his popularity and capacity for usefulness as a representative citizen, urged him to become a candidate, in 1871, for councilman of the city of Atlanta. He consented and was elected triumphantly. In 1873, 1875 and 1887 he was re-elected to the same office. His majority over his opponents was in each instance large, for he received the support of the people without regard to color, condition or party, although he had always been an avowed democrat. This demonstrated the high esteem in which he was held, an esteem resulting from his just, charitable life. Mr. Rice assisted in establishing the splendid system of public schools which has proved so great a blessing to the children of Atlanta, and so important a factor in the increase of her population and wealth. The first appropriation of $100,000 to this grand educational conception received his favor and his vote. No one has been more in sympathy with the policy of general education, nor has any one proved a more earnest advocate of the most liberal system of free schools that could be supported by the people. He has uniformly given his influence to Atlanta's educational system, so adjusted as to distribute its benefits equitably to the children of the several wards without respect to race or color. As councilman he has always been placed on the most important committees, such as finance, tax, public property and others, involving the greatest amount of practical work in behalf of the material interests of the city. He has invariably favored the judicious application of available funds to the solid improvements, embracing streets, water works, sewerage, etc., and has also given his aid to the organization of an efficient fire department and an effective police force. Mr. Rice was one of the organizers of Atlanta's board of health, and was a member of that board continuously for nine years. During this long period of service no one was more vigilant in looking after the healthfulness of the city, and no one evinced greater wisdom in suggesting and enforcing hygienic rules to preserve the public health. When the question of locating the state capital was submitted to the people of Georgia, Mr. Rice, as a member of the citizens' committee, labored most zealously in behalf of Atlanta, and deserves, with others of that committee, credit for the result that followed, viz.: the selection of Atlanta as the capital of the state. In the year 1880 he was elected to the house of representatives from Fulton county, defeating his opponent by a very large majority, and leading all other candidates in the race by several hundred votes. He was regarded as one of the most industrious and practical members of the house and pursued a course that gave him the highest standing with the members of that body, affording by all his actions and votes great satisfaction to his constituents. As a consequence he was elected to succeed himself in 1882, the term of service being two years. During his membership of the house of representatives, he was placed upon many important standing committees, among which may be mentioned the committees on finance, corporations, railroads, public property and military affairs. He was also appointed as a member of several special committees of importance, such as the committees to draft and report a general railroad law and to redistrict the state. During the session of 1880 a bill was introduced by a member of the house to provide for the building of a new capitol of the state in Atlanta. This measure was defeated, notwithstanding the ability with which it was advocated. Its defeat had the effect to place the location of the capital again in a condition of uncertainty, many regarding the action of the house as an expression of public sentiment, indicating danger to Atlanta. In 1882 Mr. Rice, impressed with the very great importance of finally settling the capital question in favor of the Gate city, resolved to devote all of his influence to the passage of a bill providing for the building of a state capitol which would satisfy the people and prove equal to the demands of the commonwealth. Actuated by this purpose, he went into council with his own mind, studying the question earnestly and critically. He then, unaided by any one, prepared a bill which commanded the approval of his judgment and introduced it in the house of representatives on Nov. 3, 1882. For this measure he labored day and night until it received the executive sanction on Sept. 8, 1883. To say that he was untiring in the advocacy of this bill and that he watched every step of its progress with sleepless vigilance is but to state an undeniable truth. Although unaided in the preparation of the bill, in the work of passing it to a law, it became necessary to command the support of a majority of each branch of the general assembly, and it was for this object that he gave his influence. He followed the measure to the finance committee of the house, to which it was referred, urging a favorable report with all the zeal and ability possible, and having gained his point there, followed it back to the house, where its passage was secured by his able advocacy. Still inspired by his resolve to make this bill a law, he pursued it into the senate, and having no voice or vote in that body, he used every influence in his power with the finance committee and with individual senators to insure its success. It was the offspring of his own brain which he was determined to foster and conduct to final triumph. In the intervals of legislative sessions he called upon members of the house and senate, in detail, urging the importance of settling the capital question and passing his bill. If any legislator ever deserved credit for a legislative enactment Mr. Rice deserves the gratitude of the people of Atlanta and the state at large for his achievement in this case. It gave to Georgia a splendid capitol which is the pride of every citizen and the subject for the admiration of all visitors. It was built at smaller cost than any similar building on this continent and without any extra appropriation. The history of this bill from its preparation to its introduction into the house, and its passage by both branches of the general assembly, shows the capacity of its author to conceive its many details and his power to conduct it over strong opposition to ultimate success. To accomplish this result it was necessary to combat a multitude of arguments based on sectional prejudices or timid fears. It was known that the passage of the measure would fix the capital in Atlanta, thus defeating the hopes of all rival localities, and many were fearful that the taxpayers would disapprove the imposition of an additional tax to meet the expenses of construction. Mr. Rice, convinced that the interests of Atlanta and of the entire state would be advanced greatly by deciding the question as to the location of the capital at the Gate city, worked as if inspired to accomplish the result. He was resolved that the decision of the people in favor of Atlanta should not be revoked. It is now known and appreciated how ably and triumphantly he served Atlanta and Georgia in this emergency. Mr. Rice also introduced and conducted to a successful issue, the bill by which that great corporation, the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railroad, was chartered. The importance of this road and its vast benefits to Atlanta and the state cannot be overrated. He was a member of the special committee that framed and reported to the house the present railroad law of Georgia, and gave him his influence to its enactment. During both of his terms of service in the house of representatives he answered to every roll-call and was present at every meeting of the committees of which he was a member. All who were associated with him then will bear testimony to his constant industry, his keen perception of every measure of legislation and his watchfulness of everything which directly or indirectly affected the interests of his constituents or the people of the state at large. On questions of finance, taxation, education and internal improvements his opinions were always sought, for his judgment was considered an unerring guide. As a consequence his views were generally impressed on the reports of the committees of which he was a member. In 1882 he was one of a committee of the general assembly appointed to visit and report upon the technological schools of the north. For some time he had considered the establishment of such a school for Georgia. When the committee returned his zeal in behalf of this measure was greatly increased. The visit referred to was the beginning of a movement by the legislature which resulted in the establishment of a technological school in Atlanta for the state. This institution has proved of great practical benefit to Georgia. The young men who graduate from this school go out as thoroughly educated and scientific mechanics and engineers, capable of supervising mining, manufacturing and other enterprises of their state and the development of her varied resources. The history of Mr. Rice is intimately joined with that of this great educational institution and he feels a just pride in the fact that he so earnestly and successfully labored for its establishment. On Oct. 3, 1888, Mr. Rice was elected to the state senate from the thirty-fifth senatorial district, composed of the counties of Cobb, Clayton and Fulton, and served in the capacity of senator during the years 1888 and 1889. In this campaign he had a severe contest. He defeated his opponent in the primary election by a majority of more than 500 votes. Although placed before the people as the democratic standard-bearer of the district, he was opposed by an independent candidate who used every effort in his power to secure his own success. The election of Mr. Rice by a majority of about 1,500 votes was the result. Entering upon his senatorial duties he was appointed as chairman of the committees on corporations and public property and as a member of the committees of finance, railroads and auditing. The committee on corporations did more work during the sessions of 1888 and 1889 than any other, and much of the business that came before it was of great importance, involving in many cases intricate questions of law. He evinced his customary industry and sound discretion, acquitting himself with distinction. Many of the bills which were referred to that committee were in conflict with the constitution of the state. None of these escaped the critical observation of the chairman, but were reported back to the senate, with a clear expression of his views, which in every instance were approved and confirmed by that body. Always present at the meetings of the committees of which he was chairman or a member, the impress of his opinions was generally stamped on every report. He was a member of the special committee that framed the bill providing for the present lease of the Western & Atlantic railroad, and aided in its passage through the senate. This was a measure of importance to the people of Georgia, resulting in a lease of the Western & Atlantic, or state road, for a term of twenty years at an annual rental of $420,000. In 1891 Mr. Rice was elected an alderman of the city of Atlanta and served as such for three years. During this period he rendered most efficient and beneficial service to the city. As chairman of the finance and tax committees he was untiring in his efforts to advance the financial interests of Atlanta. His reports as chairman of the committees mentioned, submitted in 1892, show a perfect familiarity with the city's resources. A fund of information is contained in each of these reports, which could have been obtained only after a degree of investigation which no other person but Mr. Rice was likely to have performed. These reports are tabulated and comparative, showing the property, resources, etc., of the city, not only for the year of the reports, but of previous years, so that at a glance the true financial status of Atlanta could be known. The report of the tax committee presents a comprehensive view of the material improvements of the city, such as street paving, sewerage, the amount of taxes levied and collected, amount of taxes in default and contains many wise suggestions in regard to the policy which should be pursued by the municipal authorities. It is a most creditable fact that under his administration as chairman of the finance committee all of the current expenses of the city in 1891 were paid from her income, leaving a clear surplus of $16,300. The current expenses of the year 1892 were also paid from the city's income, leaving at the end of the year a surplus of $6,300. During his aldermanic term, as chairman of the tax committee, large sums were added to the annual receipts of the city treasury. The splendid bridge which spans the railroad excavation on Forsyth street is mainly due to the influence of Mr. Rice. It was his conception and he gave his advocacy to the measure. As one of the committee to whom the execution of the plan was confided, he worked with his usual zeal and energy until its completion and formal delivery to the authorities of Atlanta. Mr. Rice is a member of the board of directors of the International and Cotton States exposition, and also a member of the executive committee. No one connected officially with this grand enterprise is more thoroughly determined to make it an eminent success, and no one is doing more to insure this result. He is devoting his entire time during the year 1895 to the advancement of the various details of the exposition and all who know him will be more hopeful because of this fact. The parents of Mr. Rice were educated, intelligent and moral. They took special care to impress him with correct rules of life. Yielding cheerfully to their advice and instruction, he has pursued a moral, honorable, conscientious and charitable career. About ten years ago he became a member of the First Methodist church of Atlanta, and very soon thereafter was chosen as one of the stewards of that church. He often expresses regret that he deferred this step so long, but since his membership has been a zealous worker in the cause of Christianity. By frequent judicious investments and close attention to business, Mr. Rice has become one of the most wealthy men of Atlanta. He owns a large amount of central and well-improved city property, from which he derives a handsome income, and has invested much money in lands near, but beyond the corporate limits. A strong faith in the future growth of Atlanta, which he still entertains, caused him to invest in suburban lands. It is a remarkable fact that although he has made a great number of sales of real estate in and around Atlanta, there has never followed therefrom a single legal controversy. This indicates his customary care in the examination of titles and an integrity that avoids everything that savors of unfairness. He has certainly demonstrated that a man may become rich while scrupulously preserving his honor. For many years he has been a close student. He has one of the best selected libraries in Atlanta.

Every volume is a treasure, while the whole comprises all that a gentleman may need to fit him for usefulness in social, business or political life, or to gratify his taste for history, poetry and romance. All of his books are printed and bound in elegant and substantial style, so that they will last for generations with careful use. He is devoted to his library and has already gained therefrom a fund of varied and useful information, constituting him one of the best posted men in Georgia. Naturally modest, he makes no display of knowledge which is not necessary for practical purposes, though versed in all matters pertaining to the past or the present. Mr. Rice has been quite an extensive traveler, and has learned much by this means. A close observer and strong thinker, he has gathered information in passing from place to place and country to country. As a financier and politician, as well as a legislator, he deserves to be ranked with the most distinguished citizens of Georgia. By his life work he has demonstrated intrinsic virtues and powers that challenge the respect, approval and admiration of all worthy and appreciative people. Already he has accomplished as much real good for Atlanta and the state as any man who can be mentioned, and he is still in the meridian of life with the prospect of many years of usefulness. His familiarity with the financial and political history and interests of state and national governments fits him for great achievements and higher honors. It is no exaggeration to say in a quaint and popular phrase, that he is the "best all around man" in Georgia. From the beggar on the streets to the president in his mansion, he is the same—always genial and cordial, and ready to speak or act as becomes an intelligent and noble man. Promotion makes no change in his demeanor, and whether he meets the rich or the poor, he wears the same kindly expression, willing to listen to the wants of all without discrimination. As councilman, alderman, representative or senator, he could be approached by all of his constituents with perfect freedom, and with full confidence that he would hear and consider their wishes carefully and practically. To the reader is left the work of collating his excellencies as they may appear in this imperfect sketch. An impartial review of his record will reveal him as an honorable, good and eminently useful man, who has done his utmost to serve his city, county and state, and advance the welfare of each. Those who know him best have unlimited confidence in his integrity and judgment, and many consult him on all questions affecting their interests. Such a man cannot hide himself from an intelligent and appreciative public, nor should he resist their call to higher political positions.

WILLIAM GILKES RICHARDS was born in London, England, Feb. 11, 1837 (the year of Victoria's coronation). In 1843 the family emigrated to Penfield, Ga. There were four boys and one girl—William being next the youngest; the eldest being the late Robert H. Richards, one of the founders, and at the time of his death vice-president of the Atlanta National bank. In his younger days William was a clerk in a book store, then being kept by his elder brother in La Grange, Ga. In 1856 he entered the Georgia railroad shops in Atlanta as an apprentice to the machinist trade. In 1859 he went on the road, and excepting short intervals in the shops, his life was on the foot-board of a locomotive until 1875, when he was elected engineer of the water works then being erected at South River. In 1878 he was elected superintendent, a position which he has held ever since. He has devoted the best twenty years of his life in earnest labor for the welfare of this department. In 1860 Mr. Richards married Miss M. J. Haynes, whose parents were among the very first to settle in Atlanta, having located here in February, 1843. His family consists of Robert H. Richards, residing in New York city; Mrs. Charles B. Wallace, Jr., of Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. Wm. Lyon Wallace, Jacksonville, Fla.; Charles H. Richards, Atlanta, Ga.; Mrs. George A. Clarke, Atlanta, Ga. One daughter, Mrs. Charles T. Wurm, died in 1885. Mr. Richards' work in the construction of the new water works plant is well known to the public. It may be said that its successful completion with the scant means provided for the work is almost a miracle and redounds much to the credit of himself and his intimate associate, Mr. Robert M. Clayton, the able city engineer.

MR. FRANCIS MARION RICHARDSON, who died Nov. 13, 1894, was a pioneer citizen of Atlanta, and gave his efforts to her expanding prosperity when only a "handful" of houses were grouped about the railroad station, where now the Union depot stands. He was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., June 17, 1827; passed his youth in Upson county, and at one time was a prominent merchant in Thomaston, Ga. Moving to Atlanta in 1858, he entered the employ of Rawson, Gilbert & Burr. About 1861 he formed a partnership with Robert Faulkner, and this firm gave valuable aid to the Confederate army, in furnishing and forwarding supplies. Mr. Richardson received frequent letters from Gens. Hood and Joseph E. Johnston, commending his loyalty in the efficiency with which he promoted the cause of the south. After the desolation of war had interrupted Atlanta's development, he was among the first to become identified with the rebuilding of the city. During the destructive smallpox epidemic of 1866 Mr. Richardson displayed a devotion and sacrifice that the people of his city will never forget. He was chairman of the relief committee of the municipal council, and worked with untiring energy for the thousands of suffering souls. The city treasury was depleted, and could render no assistance, but this fact did not discourage him, for after gaining the consent of the council he applied to other cities for aid and succeeded in raising a large sum of money and many supplies for the distressed, stricken victims. Mr. James E. Williams, mayor at that perilous time, says of his conduct: "During the whole of Mr. Richardson's term of office no man could, in my opinion, have discharged his official duties more efficiently. I shall never forget his noble work during the smallpox epidemic of 1866. I have known him nearly forty years, and I do not know of anyone who has done more both for the moral and physical welfare of Atlanta than he." Mr. Richardson from his early youth was a member of the Methodist church, and labored in the field of Christianity with a true appreciation of the Gospel's teaching, and a love of morality and honor that bestowed on his endeavors the respect, confidence and admiration of the people. For many years he served as superintendent of Trinity Sunday school. He founded a Sunday school on Fair street, which grew into St. Paul's church, and gave years of ardent labor in that field. He also, with Dr. T. A. Kendall and Miss Laura A. Haygood, established Trinity Mission Sunday school, for which he labored as superintendent twelve years and up to his last illness. His especial delight was to help the poor and friendless, and no man in Atlanta was ever more beloved among that class of its population. A beautiful evidence of their devotion to him was given at his funeral, when hundreds of poor children marched past his coffin, each laying thereon a simple flower as token of their love for their dead superintendent. Miss Laura A. Haygood, who was associated with him in much of his Sunday school work, has said that she does not know of any man in Atlanta's history who has done so much good among the poor as did Mr. Richardson. He was one of the most active factors in building up Methodism to its great strength in Atlanta. Mr. Richardson for many years was engaged in the stove and house furnishing business in Atlanta. In 1882 he accepted a position as general southern agent for Jones & Abbott, stove manufacturers of Zanesville, Ohio, and held it with marked success until his death. He left a widow and four children. The eldest of these is F. H. Richardson, editor of the Atlanta "Journal." The others are: Mrs. R. W. Rood, Atlanta; Edward Richardson, of the United States pension office; and W. W. Richardson, an Atlanta journalist. Mr. Richardson was of Scotch-Irish stock. His father, Rev. Allen Richardson, served in the war of 1812 and moved from Virginia to Georgia in 1825.

DR. ROBERT BEMAN RIDLEY, one of the most successful and distinguished medical practitioners of Atlanta, belongs to a family of physicians—all eminent in the profession, he having two brothers, Dr. Charles B., and Dr. Frank M. Ridley, both located in La Grange, Troup Co., Ga., the last named having been in 1895 elected president of the Georgia State Medical association. Dr. Ridley was born in LaGrange in October, 1842. His father, Dr. R. A. T. Ridley, was a man of unusual prominence, and was equally distinguished in his profession and in public affairs. He was born in the historic village of Mecklenburg, N. C., and was graduated with distinction from the Charleston Medical college. For a number of years he practiced his profession, with lucrative results, in Troup county; and taking an active part in politics he represented his county in the legislature and also served the district for several terms as state senator. He was a man of blameless character and of wide personal influence. His wife, whose maiden name was Mary E. Morris, was a daughter of John Morris, of North Carolina, and was born in that state in 1812. Dr. Ridley, the elder, died at LaGrange in 1872. The subject of this sketch spent his boyhood days in Troup county and derived his academic education from the LaGrange high school. He was just preparing to enter the junior class at the state university when the declaration of war, calling the south to arms, prevented him from carrying out this cherished intention. In May, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the LaGrange light guards, which was subsequently attached to the Fourth Georgia Confederate regiment, commanded by Col. George Doles. This regiment performed its first service at Norfolk, Va., going to Richmond after the evacuation of that city, and participating in nearly all the important battles of the Virginia campaign, among them the following: Seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Wilderness (May 5 and 6), Spottsylvania court house, where he received two wounds, one in the leg and one in the shoulder; Winchester, Cedar creek, Sailors' creek, and Appomattox. The regiment during this campaign formed a part of Gen. Rodes' division in the celebrated corps of Stonewall Jackson. On the death of this lamented leader Gen. Ewell succeeded to the command. The young soldier for his gallant behavior was promoted to the rank of lieutenant. After a furlough of sixty days he rejoined his regiment and remained in the active service until Gen. Lee's surrender. After the war the subject of this sketch returned to his home at LaGrange and was soon after unanimously elected captain of the La Grange light guards. He subsequently engaged in mercantile pursuits at Augusta, but finding this sort of life distasteful to him he decided to adopt his father's profession, and thereupon commenced the study of medicine. Under his father's supervision he commenced his studies and was soon prepared to enter the Jefferson Medical college at Philadelphia. Graduating from this institution in 1869, with such men as Dr. A. W. Calhoun and Dr. J. S. Todd, he returned to LaGrange and entered upon the practice of his profession. Leaving LaGrange in 1874 he decided to spend a winter in the hospital practice in New York, after which he located in Atlanta. Since coming to this city he has enjoyed a large and constantly growing practice. For two years he was associated with Dr. J. S. Todd, the style of the firm being Ridley & Todd; but since that time he has practiced alone. Dr. Ridley has devoted himself in recent years chiefly to obstetrics, in which department of the practice he occupies the leading rank. He is held in the highest esteem by his professional brethren and is regarded in the community as a man of talent, uprightness and integrity. Dr. Ridley is a member of the State Medical association of Georgia, and also of the Atlanta Medical society. In 1892 he was appointed one of the visiting physicians of the Grady hospital. Dr. Ridley was united in marriage on Nov. 23, 1875, to Miss Emma Leila Hill, a daughter of the late Senator Benjamin H. Hill, a lady of rare beauty and culture, who died on May 19, 1883. Five children were born to them, of whom three are living. In February, 1886, Dr. Ridley was married a second time, to the widow of Capt. John F. Kiser, of Atlanta, and five children have been born of this union, two sons and three daughters. Possessed of a genial and attractive disposition, the personality of Dr. Ridley is magnetic and engaging. He is extensively read not only in his profession, but in general literature, and his conversation is rich, fascinating and instructive. He is a man of progressive ideas and believes in keeping abreast of the times. In his private life his reputation has always been that of a just, conscientious and upright man.

DR. ULOF O. ROBERTSON, an eminent and learned physician of Atlanta, is a native of north Europe, having been born in the kingdom of Sweden July 12, 1846. In that country he passed his first two decades attending the schools that afforded a liberal education and later entered the university, graduating a few years afterward. In 1865, when peaceful relations were resumed between the contending sections of the Union, he decided to try his fortune in the new world, and embarked for America, landing in New York city, and remained in this, his first destination, for a few months, and subsequently moved southward, locating in middle Georgia. Having received a scientific and technical education, and being thoroughly acquainted with the practical working of machinery, he easily found a desirable position in a locomotive shop, and a few years later in a large saw mill, and began his labors immediately; but being unaccustomed to the warm climate, and as yet not acclimated, contracted a contagious malarial fever. There were no physicians in the neighborhood to whom he could apply for relief, and in fighting the disease himself, and in aiding and restoring his associates, who were alike attacked with the malady, he became interested in the science of hydrotherapeutics, and began investigations in this system. He was fascinated with the study, and resolving to prosecute medicine as a life-work went to New York, enrolled as a member of the Hygeio-Therapeutic college of that state, and was graduated in 1875. He then returned to Bartow county, Ga., practiced his profession for four years, and in 1879 removed to Atlanta, where he has since resided. Dr. Robertson was married in Chicago May 21, 1879, to May B., daughter of C. H. Horine, a native of Kentucky. They have no children. He affiliates with the Episcopal church of Atlanta. Dr. Robertson controls the only Hydro-pathic institute in the city. As manager and professional director he has encountered and effected cures in some of the most difficult cases on record. The method of water treatment frequently proves the agent to combat disease when allopathy, homeopathy, the eclectic, and the various additional schools of medicine, have fruitlessly exerted their curative properties. To have established this boon to the sufferer in a city where no similar treatment is available is an act laudable and commendable. Dr. Robertson has a large, steady and growing practice, such as his skill and knowledge warrant; and his future prosperity, as indicated by his present increasing success, is undeniably assured.

REV. JOHN B. ROBINS, D. D., is the son of T. S. Robins, and was born in Putman county, Ga., Sept. 21, 1851. His parents were of Scotch descent, and have transmitted to their son the peculiar traits of this vigorous and prosperous race of people. His father was a prosperous planter and slave owner before the war between the states. At its close his property was all gone, and in common with the survivors of "the lost cause" he had to struggle to maintain his family. As a result John B. was brought up on the farm, where he learned those habits of industry and self-reliance that have marked his career in subsequent life. In 1872 he graduated from Emory college, and in 1873 he was admitted to the bar in Greensboro, Ga., with a bright future before him. On Jan. 11, 1874, he married the sweetheart of his boyhood, Miss Mason A. Alford, and in September of that year he removed to Putman county, Ga., and entered his chosen profession in the town of Eatonton, with great energy and bright hope of brilliant success. But God had better things in store for him. He was converted and called to preach in 1871, while in school, but was disobedient to the heavenly calling, and for six years he played the roll of Jonah, and came near being swallowed by worldliness. To use his own language, in 1877 he "abandoned forever a life of sin, and gave himself to his church." He was licensed to preach Oct. 27, 1877, and was admitted on trial in the north Georgia conference, M. E. church, south, in December of the same year. He entered the work of the ministry with great energy and enthusiasm, and in three years' time he was transferred from the country to the city charge. After ten years' successful labor as a stationed preacher he was made presiding elder of the Dalton district, and such was his popularity in the district, and such his devotion to the work, that he regarded it as a great trial to leave Dalton, and to go to First church, Atlanta; but on his arrival in Atlanta his reception was so cordial and the co-operation of his people so hearty, that he at once entered on the labors of the year with his characteristic energy and devotion, and was soon recognized as one of the most popular preachers and pastors in this great city. His brethren in the pastorate gave expression to their confidence and esteem by electing him president of the Pastors' conference. As pastor of the First church he occupies one of the most honorable and responsible positions in the M. E. church, south. He is a terse and forcible writer, and a frequent contributor to the periodicals of his church. In 1895 he received the honorary degree of doctor of divinity from his alma mater, Emory college, and the week following the same degree was conferred on him by the university of Georgia. His pastorate of First Methodist church will end Nov. 20, 1895, at which time he will, under the law of his church, be appointed to another field of labor. For four years this church has been crowded Sunday after Sunday, and several hundred persons have been added to its membership. It is one of the largest, most influential and most intellectual churches in southern Methodism. Such a son is an honor to his parents and a blessing to his church. In addition to newspaper and periodical work he has written several books. His famous book, Christ and Our Country; or, A Hopeful View of Christianity in the Nineteenth Century, has given him rank among the best thinkers and writers of to-day. He is a ripe scholar and profound thinker, a finished writer and forcible speaker, and enjoys the confidence and esteem of all who know him.

PAUL ROMARE, vice-president of the Atlanta National bank, is a Swede by birth, having been born on the shores of the Cattagat, in the town of Torekov, province of Skane, Sweden, Nov. 20, 1828. His history is a most interesting one. His father was a sea captain and when a small boy he delighted in accompanying his father on long and difficult voyages. He came to America several times both with his father and brother, who followed the same occupation. Once when in the harbor of New York and an opportunity given to view the surrounding city and compare its attractive features to the towns of the old world, he became enamored of its charms, felt that liberty was the inspiring sentiment that governed its people, and believing that this was the place for the display of ambition and the field for individual accomplishment, he escaped from the ship in which he had crossed the sea, having had a difficulty with the captain the previous day, and eluding the search that was made, led by his brother, he remained securely concealed until all danger was past, and then emerged from his place of hiding to find a new world before him. Without a word of English at his command he was at first baffled by his condition, but seeing a brig bound for Mobile he boarded it and during the journey acquired a small vocabulary with the aid of Two Years Before the Mast. He made several trips after this, going to Cuba, Mexico and the West Indies. He soon after obtained a position with a fellow-countryman in the iron works of Cooperville, S. C., as interpreter, and later as clerk and bookkeeper, remaining here from 1850 to 1854. It was a prosperous industry, manufacturing pig iron, bar iron and hollow ware. In the summer of 1854 he revisited his old home, being warmly received after a long absence, and returned to his adopted land after a short visit. Through the personal friendship of George S. Cameron he secured a situation in the bank of Chester, S. C., and here the opening of the war found him. He enlisted in the Confederate service and contended with the same patriotism as a native-born southerner. The war over he returned to Camden, S. C., but in the fall removed to Atlanta to accept a position in the Atlanta National bank. This was also through the instrumentality of his old friend, Mr. Cameron. He received the first deposit ever placed in this bank. Here he has labored ever since. These are his noble words: "I have made my home in Atlanta; here I expect to spend the rest of my life, and departing bequeath to this city and her people my fondest wishes and blessings." Mr. Romare was married in Grace church, Camden, in 1863, to Miss Lucy Fisher. They have an accomplished, interesting family.

SIDNEY ROOT, retired capitalist, Atlanta, Ga., son of Salmon and Elizabeth (Carpenter) Root (of Puritan ancestry), was born in Montague, Mass., March 11, 1824. The family genealogy shows that it went from Normandy, France—whence it fled to England on account of the persecutions of the Huguenots. The original name was Racine, was afterward anglicized to Rootes—a spelling still preserved in Virginia. He was educated in the public schools, but never went to school more than three months in any one year, having to work the other nine. His father was a farmer, and about 1836 moved to Vermont, and bought a farm in Craftsbury of an ex-governor in whose honor the town was named. He early manifested a strong taste for architecture (inherited from his mother), and begged to study it; but his practical father decided he had better make a living, so apprenticed him to a jewelry concern at $2.50 and board per month, where he became an expert in the watch-making industry. In 1843 he borrowed $60 from his brother-in-law, W. A. Rawson, late of Atlanta, and came to Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., where he entered his general merchandise store as a clerk at $250 a year. Two years later, at the age of twenty, he was admitted to a partnership, and three years afterward bought his partner's interest and assumed control of the business. Superior business capacity and methods, and the high standard of commercial honor he fixed for his guidance and observance, secured for him a large and lucrative business and phenomenal financial success. His great capabilities and largely augmented capital demanded a broader field for profitable and useful employment, he set about seeking it. He visited several large cities, and after careful investigation and profound thought he decided that Atlanta presented the most advantageous field for his ambitious commercial aspirations; so, in 1858, he came to Atlanta, and was largely instrumental in inducing his cousin and brother-in-law, the late E. E. Rawson, to come to Atlanta also. Entering into partnership with Mr. John N. Beach, a gentleman of capital, and engaged in the dry goods business under the firm name of Beach & Root. Their business soon exceeded in amount that of any other house in Atlanta, and was the first to engage in direct importation and the wholesale trade. Before the war they wholesaled goods to merchants in the southern part of Alabama and Mississippi, and filled orders for goods at retail to middle western Georgia and eastern Alabama. When the "unpleasantness" was "precipitated" Mr. Beach went to England, and with the confident expectation of southern independence three houses were established: Beach & Root, in Atlanta and Charleston, and Beach, Root & Co., in Liverpool. A prodigious business resulted, chiefly in exporting cotton and importing supplies through the blockade for the Confederate states. During the four years of "the war between the states" this firm did, perhaps, the largest business ever done by one firm in the south. In the autumn of 1864, charged with an important and delicate mission of the Confederate government to the governments of Europe, he went abroad and remained about eight months, visiting England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Spain, and many of the West India islands. His business, especially his confidential relation with the Confederate government, brought him into direct contact with all its prominent officials, and enabled him to become pleasantly acquainted with many of the most distinguished men of Europe and other foreign realms, giving him advantages in this respect probably not surpassed by any other American citizen. On his return in July, 1865, Mr. Root found his property in ruins, his servants gone, his children uneducated, and himself under arrest. He was held for three weeks on the charge of holding Confederate property, while the fact was that the government owed his firm a vast sum. The value and magnitude of his business transactions, and his losses, may be inferred, when it is stated that the firm had thirteen or fourteen stores consumed by the destruction of Atlanta, immense stores of merchandise and war supplies and two thousand bales of cotton in various places in the south, besides several ocean craft. In 1866 he sold most of his Atlanta property (his dwelling house to ex-Gov. Joseph E. Brown), and went to New York. There his business connection was maintained with Charleston and Liverpool for two years, when the firm was dissolved. Although his office was in sight of the stock exchange and the gold board, Mr. Root never speculated to the extent of a dollar, although in the thick of the "black Friday" he saved himself and all his friends from loss. A curious, but exceedingly interesting episode occurred in 1875. One day several negroes came to him at his office, 42 Broadway, and said they had been turned out of church for starting a mission on Twenty-sixth street, and asked him to preach for them. He demurred, telling them he was no preacher, that he had been a slave holder, a rebel, etc. They said they knew all that, but he came from their country (the south), they had but few friends and wanted his aid. He consented to try the experiment. The first meeting there were six in the congregation; but he persevered in the "experiment" until the hall was crowded, and, after great difficulties, he finally organized Mt. Olive (colored) church, which now has 1,000 members, who worship in a marble church on Thirty-third street, toward the building of which Mr. Root's friend, J. D. Rockefeller, gave $12,500. Mr. Root remained in New York until he returned to Atlanta in 1878, since when his time and valuable services have been devoted to general public and special education and religious development. When it was determined to hold the International Cotton exposition in Atlanta in 1881 Mr. Root was commissioned to travel in furtherance of its objects and visit the principal cities of the United States and Canada, and during the exposition he had charge of the public comfort and foreign departments. In his final report Director-General H. I. Kimball makes the following voluntary complimentary mention of the services rendered by him: "Probably none of the officials will be better remembered by visitors to the exposition than Mr. Root, whose painstaking and earnest efforts to accommodate and oblige all who fell within range of his official duties, made him deservedly popular." When in 1883 Col. Lemuel P. Grant made his munificent donation of 100 acres of land to the city for a public park, Mr. Root was made president of the park commissioners, which he continued to be for many years, and is now serving as secretary. It is due to his tasteful suggestiveness and intelligently enthusiastic co-operation with the landscape engineer that the drives and walks are so artistically laid out and appropriately christened, that the park to-day is so well equipped and so delightfully attractive as a recreative resort, of which the city is justly proud. For many years Mr. Root has taken a lively interest in the efforts to preserve and extend American forests, has attended many meetings held by the International American Forestry congress, and is an enthusiastic member of the Southern Forestry congress, of whose meeting in 1887 he was president pro tem. His literary tastes are critical and very refined; his reading extensive, while select, and his scholarly attainments far beyond those of most persons engaged in commercial affairs, while he is a writer of unusual brilliancy and ability. In 1865 he wrote a much-admired book of travels, which was published in London, and he also wrote a short story founded on incidents of the war, entitled History of a Union Spy, which was reprinted in London, and has contributed numerous interesting articles to various publications on different subjects. In religious and educational matters Mr. Root has been equally industrious, earnest and useful as in other fields where his services have been so efficient and valuable. In this work, particularly as connected with Sunday schools, his labors have been long continued and self sacrificing. For ten years he was superintendent of the Second Baptist Sunday school, Atlanta, and during his twelve years' residence in New York he was superintendent of the Fifth Avenue Baptist church Sunday school, was secretary of the board of trustees, a trustee of Rutgers Female college, and a member of several benevolent societies. He prepared a work, A General Bible Question Book, which had a very extended sale. For about fourteen years he has had largely under his care the Atlanta Baptist seminary for the theological and normal education of colored young men. For some twelve years he has been resident trustee and general supervisor of the famous undenominational Spelman seminary, which has grown from eleven pupils, two teachers, no property and few friends, to nearly nine hundred pupils, thirty-eight teachers and property worth $150,000. This institution for the industrial and Christian education of colored girls is favorably known all over the country, and is the largest institution of the kind in the Union. He has acted in Atlanta as the fiduciary agent of Mr. J. D. Rockefeller in the disbursement of more than $100,000 in building Rockefeller hall and other extensive improvements connected with and a part of Spelman seminary. It is safe to affirm that no man more fully enjoys the unreserved confidence of this distinguished philanthropist than Mr. Root. Of education Mr. Root has been an ardent, persistently working friend all his life. His life-long useful career is nearing its end. Its vicissitudes he has met as it became a true man. He has experienced its greatest extremes—a poor boy starting alone and moneyless to solve life's problem; then a millionaire in the flush of a sturdy young manhood; now comparatively stripped of wealth, bereft of wife and his beloved oldest boy, advanced in years and infirm in body, though strong in will and faith, he calmly awaits the final summons. But he does so with a mind unimpaired and a spirit joyously buoyed with the unshaken belief in an endless reunion in the great hereafter. Mr. Root's distinguishing characteristics are unswerving honesty, lofty conceptions of and self-sacrificing devotion to duty, ungrudging contribution of time, talents and money in furtherance of all movements calculated to promote local interests and advance intellectual and religious progress, regardless of locality and boundaries. The world is better for his having lived in it—will miss him when he leaves it. He would not swerve from a firm conviction as to what he felt to be his duty to gain the most cherished object of life; and it is, therefore, no wonder that he has the unstinted esteem, the implicit confidence of all who ever came in contact with him. Mr. Root was happily married in 1849 to Miss Mary H., daughter of Judge James Clarke, of Stewart county, Ga., sister of the late Judge John T. Clarke, and of ex-Judge Marshall J. Clarke (of Fulton superior court), and a niece of the late Judge Marshall J. Wellborn. It was an exceptionally happy union, from which sprang three children: John Wellborn, who became the world-famed architect of Chicago, and chief architect of the World's (or Columbian) exposition, who died just as he had planned the stupendous exposition, and to whose memory a tablet has been erected at the university of New York; Walter, a leading architect of Kansas City, Mo., and a daughter, wife of James E. Ormond, Atlanta, who graduated from Rutgers's college, New York, taking the first and second honors, the first instance of the kind in the history of the institution.

JOHN WELLBORN ROOT, architect, deceased, son of Sidney and Mary Harvey (Clarke) Root, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., Jan. 10, 1850, and died in Chicago, Ill., Jan. 15, 1891. His grandfather, Salmon Root, was a farmer, first of Massachusetts, and afterward of Vermont. Mr. Root's father was born in Massachusetts, where he lived until the family moved to Vermont. When fourteen years old he was apprenticed for four years to a jeweler, at the end of which time, when eighteen, he came south and clerked for W. A. Rawson, Lumpkin, Ga.; and at the end of two years was admitted as a partner. In 1858 he came to Atlanta and engaged with J. N. Beach—firm name, Beach & Root—in the dry-goods trade. They soon built up the largest trade then known to Atlanta, and theirs was the first house to do a wholesale business, and to import direct from Europe. Mrs. Root, a most excellent and exemplary Christian lady, died some years ago; but Mr. Root, honored and loved by all who know him, yet lives, delighting in offices of kindness, charity and usefulness—calmly awaiting the summons that shall call him to join the loved ones who have gone before. John Wellborn Root received his primary schooling in Atlanta; but in 1863 he was sent through the blockade to England to complete his education. He attended school at Birkenhead—opposite Liverpool, England—three years, and passed an examination for Oxford; then returned to the United States and entered the university of New York in 1868, whence he was graduated as a civil engineer and architect. In 1872 he entered the office of Drake, Carter & Wright, Chicago. About the same time, D. H. Burnham, another young architect, entered the office, and the following spring the two young men formed a partnership. They commenced business immediately after the disastrous conflagration left such a large portion of Chicago in ruins; and business and reputation increased apace and together. The ambitious and progressive city called for greater and grander structures—structures that should surpass others elsewhere in magnitude and eclipse them in beauty. This demanded originality and genius of the highest order, and these young men so developed as to prove equal to the emergency. Mr. Root was soon recognized as the foremost architect of Chicago; his fame spread, and his services were in demand in all the principal cities, from Chicago to San Francisco, inclusive. Some of the largest and most beautiful and imposing buildings—private residences and public buildings of every kind—in Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, San Francisco and Atlanta, and residences innumerable in hundreds of places, were designed by him and built under his direction. If not at the time of his death at the head of his profession in the Union, that honorable distinction, by general consent, would soon have been his. The high estimation in which he was held, professionally and socially, is best shown by the following extracts from editorials, resolutions, and the discourse delivered on the occasion of his funeral. He was consulting architect of the great World's Columbian exposition, and had called a meeting of architects from other cities for consultation. His death occurred just before the meeting, at which, after stating that they had been "met by calamity in the death of John Wellborn Root," they resolved that, "We formally put on record our sense of professional loss, because his professional genius, his well-trained intellect, and his large artistic resources were doing unusual service in advancing the architecture of the country. That to the public, in a national sense, is due our testimony that in this event a loss has occurred which can hardly be remedied." The buildings and grounds committee of the exposition, by resolution, said: "Possessing high genius, exquisite taste, and a genuine love of all that is true and beautiful in art, we had looked up to him confidently to select with masterly skill the best designs. But the quick intellect, the skillful, unerring judgment of this architect and designer are lost to us forever. It will be difficult, if, indeed, possible, to fill his place." Mr. Van Brunt, the eminent Kansas City architect, said: "I doubt if there is a man in our profession who can do the work he had in hand as acceptably as he would have performed it." Eugene Field, of Chicago, wrote: "Genius is rare! Yet a man of genius, we, in our brief day, have had with us. Has he been too close to us for us to perceive what he was? John Wellborn Root is dead, and this city of triumphs and misfortunes which had high triumph in his work, has suffered in his death profoundest misfortune. The city will still be great, powerful, prodigious; the hands—the two hands which could mold its ambition into beauty, its greatness into grandeur—are done with work. One may look over the earth and say that no architect of immortal name in any age did more for his own fame or for the world of beauty than he, who twenty years ago was a boy, and who now is dead.

'Till wasteful war shall statues overturn,
And broils throw down the work of masonry,'

he will be remembered. As long as one stone remains above another, those stones will have a tongue to proclaim his genius! The ruins will furnish examples for newer days." Mr. Root was not a member of the masonic fraternity—yet so closely did he symbolically and practically work to the "Square," the "Level," and the "Plumb," in his planning and supervision of the Masonic Temple, that Chicago Oriental Consistory volunteered the following tribute: "We join with our citizens generally in the deep sorrow felt at the loss of this prominent citizen, whose personal worth and professional skill brought him in close contact with this ancient fraternity as a designer of the great Masonic Temple, the erection of which had so auspiciously begun under the direction of his master mind." In his charming discourse on the occasion of the funeral, Bishop Cheney said: "Only here and there is to be found a man who can successfully organize the work of others. And when, as in the case of him who sleeps yonder, the two—industry and executive ability—are cojoined in the same individual they constitute a consummate flower of intellectual supremacy. He who thus unites them is a king of men! This was a man who only can be compared in his intellectual development to a crystal of many facets, all reflecting the light. He possessed a varied, yet not a superficial scholarship. His professional attainments were those which place a man in the forefront of his contemporaries. His business aptitude was recognized by all. Social grace added to his influence. His acquaintance with every branch of art broadened his devotion to that department of artistic work to which his talents were given. Even in the realm of music his singularly refined taste added to the charm which he carried into the social circle." Mr. Root possessed an exceptionally active and powerful intellect—his mental grasp was wonderfully broad, far-reaching, retentive. These great gifts were fostered by years of study, supplemented by travel, reading and observation. His capacity for work was prodigious—his work was done well—done quickly. Thorough intelligence characterized every performance. Splendid monuments to his professional skill stand in every prominent western city; and in every part of the country where architecture is appreciated, his name is known. In every-day life he was essentially a social and winsome man. He was secretary of the National Institute of Architects, corresponding member of the Royal Institute of Architecture of Belgium, one of the only two honorary members of the Art institute, was a member of the Union league, and of quite a number of other unions and clubs. He contributed many valuable papers to these various bodies, and published many articles on architecture and kindred topics in various magazines, the article in "The Century" on "Architecture in the West" attracting wide attention. He married a daughter of Henry S. Monroe, a lawyer and old citizen of Chicago, and left three children—two daughters and a son.

LUTHER ZIEGLER ROSSER, one of the leading attorneys of the Atlanta bar, was born in Gordon county, Ga., Dec. 30, 1858, and here remained until four years of age, removing after this interval to Randolph county. His boyhood and early youth were spent on a farm. He attended school in the neighborhood, learning the elementary branches of an education. The rugged life of the farm strengthened his nerves and muscles and gave him the sturdy constitution that has proven a valuable aid to his professional labors. In 1873 he left home to pursue a course of study at Emory college, located at Oxford, Ga. He applied himself diligently to the mental tasks imposed by his professors and graduated in 1879. Mr. Rosser, after receiving his degree, thought the experience of a pedagogue would prove of vast merit in disciplining his mind and faculties for future use, and went to Mitchell county, Ga., where he obtained a small school and taught successfully for eighteen months. In the fall of 1879 he began the study of law with Mr. L. S. Roan, in Fairburn, Ga., and was admitted to the bar in 1880. He followed his legal practice in connection with Mr. Roan until 1884, and then came to Atlanta, still continuing the partnership. Mr. Roan, however, remained in Fairburn. During 1886 this joint interest was dissolved and Mr. Rosser formed a partnership with Mr. E. V. Carter, of Atlanta, which still exists. Mr. Rosser was married in 1887 to Miss Julia, the daughter of Thomas W. Conally. To them have been born one son and two daughters. Mr. Rosser is prominently connected with the local secret organizations, and is a loyal member of the I. O. O. F. and the Red Men. His father is Rev. James A. Rosser, a minister of the Methodist church, who was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1834. He married Temperance Ziegler, a native of Screven county, Ga. They were blessed with five children, one of whom died. The surviving ones are L. Z., the subject of this sketch; Dr. Warren A., of DeKalb county, Ga.; Dr. C. V. Rosser, of Atlanta; and Nora F. Mr. Rosser's mother died in 1892. His grandfather, Aaron Rosser, a native of Georgia, died a short time before the civil war. Mr. Rosser has practiced his chosen profession profitably and prosperously in the city of Atlanta. He is looked upon by his associates and the people at large as possessing a thorough knowledge of the law, and in his construction of it exercises nice discriminations. He has figured as counsel in a number of important cases. His speeches and the manner of conducting the testimony indicate deep application and research. He is exceptionally shrewd in the examination of witnesses, and frequently defeats an opponent and receives a verdict by virtue of his skill. As a fluent, convincing speaker Mr. Rosser has few equals.

EGBERT B. ROSSER, president of the Exchange bank of Atlanta, Ga., was born on a farm in Walton county, Ga., Nov. 7, 1838. He was instructed in the country schools in the neighborhood of his home, and there, surrounded only by the charms of nature and its valuable lessons, cultivated the sturdy precepts that have guided his life in a prosperous and honorable channel. He resided here until the age of eighteen and then went to Decatur, Ga., remaining a year as clerk for his uncle, Elijah Rosser. Leaving Decatur he removed to Covington, Ga., and having saved a few hundred dollars, he invested this as capital in a general store and conducted this business with success until March, 1862, when the cause of secession summoned supporters from every state in the south. He left his mercantile interests and enlisted in the first available company. This was Company F of the Forty-second Georgia regiment. He was contented to remain a private throughout the four years, for it was principle and not personal notoriety that he was fighting for. This spirit has characterized his after life. For fourteen years after the restoration of peace he prosecuted the occupation of merchandising in Conyers, Ga., having re-established his old business. He came to Atlanta in 1879 and engaged in the cotton warehouse and storage industry for the succeeding ten years. For a year or two following he conducted a general trading business, until 1892, when the Exchange bank was organized and he was chosen its president, which position he now occupies with notable credit. During Gov. A. H. Colquitt's administration Mr. Rosser was appointed judge of Rockdale county court, but resigned after two years' excellent service. In 1877 he was elected a delegate to the constitutional convention from the twenty-seventh senatorial district of Georgia, but with this exception he has never taken active interest in politics, having no inclination in this direction. It was through the distinguished efforts of Mr. Rosser that the clause protecting the present school system in Georgia was inserted in the Georgia constitution. He has always been a strong advocate of education. Mr. Rosser was married in 1862 to Sarah, daughter of William Greer, of Chambers county, Ala. To this union three children were given: R. M. R., W. G. R., and Belle Rosser. Mr. Rosser affiliates with the Christian church and has accomplished untold good by his Christian charity and unselfish labor. His father is John W. Rosser, a native of Georgia, now living at the ripe old age of eighty-one years. He has farmed all his life and for many years held the office of justice of the peace in various counties in Georgia.

DR. GUSTAVUS GARNETT ROY, one of the most successful practitioners of medicine in Atlanta, is a native of Virginia, and was born in Essex county in that state on June 8, 1836. The talents of the family for generations have been identified with the medical profession. Dr. A. G. D. Roy, the father of the subject of this sketch, was a very eminent physician, and enjoyed, for more than forty years, the lucrative practice of his profession. He was born in King and Queen county, Va., on Nov. 12, 1804. His marriage with Miss Lucy Carter Garnett on March 6, 1834, inaugurated a most happy alliance and one that supplied him with all the encouragement that lies within the range of a noble woman's influence. Miss Garnett was a member of one of the oldest and best families of Virginia, being a daughter of Col. John I. Garnett, of that state. She was born on July 8, 1816. After sixteen years of wedlock this gentle lady died on Feb. 16, 1850, mourned by everyone who knew her. Dr. A. G. D. Roy died on Nov. 23, 1873. Dr. G. G. Roy, the subject of this sketch, passed his boyhood in his native county. He was prepared for college by private tutors, completing his literary education at Richmond college, one of the most thorough institutions of learning in the south. After reading medicine under his father, who took a paternal pride in giving direction to the studies of his young son, he attended, for a short while, the medical department of the university of Virginia. He then took a special course of study at the Jefferson Medical college of Philadelphia, graduating from that institution in the spring of 1857 with high honors. By virtue of his exceptional qualifications he was chosen, in the absence of the regular appointee, to serve as resident physician of St. Joseph's hospital, Philadelphia. Returning to his native county in Virginia he practiced medicine with his father until the breaking out of the late war. In the spring of 1861 he raised a company of volunteers, subsequently known as Company D of the Fifty-fifth Virginia regiment, in Field's brigade of Gen. A. P. Hill's division. He served as the captain of this company, and afterward as major of the regiment until the second battle of Manassas, after which he resigned the command and came to Atlanta, accepting the position of assistant surgeon. He was acting as post surgeon, in charge of the hospitals of the city, at the time of its destruction by Gen. Sherman. He was subsequently ordered to Andersonville for the purpose of organizing hospitals at that point. Having been promoted to the full rank of a surgeon he remained in charge of the hospitals until the close of the war. Dr. Roy was in quite a number of bloody engagements during his military experience. At Urbana, Va., he participated in the hostile encounter by which the Federals, in making an effort to land troops from their gun boats on the Rappahannock river, were disastrously repulsed. He was also in the seven days' fight around Richmond, taking part in the battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines' mill, Frazer's farm, and Malvern hill. It was during the siege of Atlanta that Dr. Roy was promoted from the rank of assistant surgeon to that of surgeon. As a soldier Dr. Roy was noted for his gallantry on the field of battle, and as a surgeon for his skill and tenderness in binding up the wounds of his comrades who had suffered from the bullets of the enemy. After the war Dr. Roy moved to Bartow county, Ga. He remained in the county for three years, spending the last year in the town of Cartersville. He enjoyed a very successful practice in that county, and might have remained longer had not peculiar circumstances interfered. In 1869 he paid a visit to his old home in Virginia, and finding his father broken in health and wholly unable to give any attention to his practice, he decided to remain in Virginia as long as his father lived. His father died in 1873, and after winding up the estate he came to Atlanta in 1875, where he has since resided in the successful practice of his profession. Dr. Roy was united in marriage on Nov. 21, 1860, to Mrs. Flora Fauntleroy, a native of Greenesboro, Ala., and a daughter of John W. and Priscilla (Carlton) Dillard. Miss Ella Fauntleroy, the daughter of Mrs. Roy by her first husband, is now the wife of Dr. C. S. Webb, of Atlanta. Three children sprang from her subsequent union with Dr. Roy: Charles Dunbar Roy, Rosa G., and Jennie T., the latter two, who were twins, dying at the age of sixteen. Dr. Charles Dunbar Roy is one of the brightest young practitioners in Atlanta. In 1879 Dr. Roy assisted in the organization of the Southern Medical college. He was made a member of the faculty, and now occupies the chair of materia medica and therapeutics. He also lectures on clinical gynecology. Though Dr. Roy has never taken a very active part in politics he was elected to a seat in the city council in 1886, and served as the chairman of the sanitary and relief committees of that body. Dr. Roy is a master Mason, a member of the Legion of Honor and the Royal Arcanum, and also a member of the First Baptist church. In courtesy Dr. Roy has always illustrated the manners of the typical Virginia gentleman. The sterner qualities of his nature have come to him from his Scotch ancestry and these have never failed to command for him the loyal respect and confidence of his fellow citizens.

DR. CHARLES DUNBAR ROY, the only son of the foregoing, is considered one of the most intellectual and promising members of the medical profession in Atlanta. He was born in that city in 1866. During his early infancy, however, he accompanied his parents to Essex county, Va., the boyhood home and birthplace of his father, and remained at the old family homestead in Virginia until attaining his eighth year. He then returned to Atlanta, where he completed his primary education in the public schools of that city. He subsequently graduated from Richmond college, Richmond, Va., in 1887, with the degree of bachelor of arts. In the following year he graduated from the medical department of the university of Virginia, completing his course of lectures in that institution in a wonderfully short length of time. After this he went to New York and stood a competitive examination, securing the fourth place among a large and brilliant number of professional applicants. He entered the Charity hospital of New York city and was also at the same time assistant in the New York Polyclinic institute. He remained in the Charity hospital for eighteen months and in the Polyclinic for the same length of time. Returning to Atlanta he entered upon the practice of his profession as a specialist. In order to perfect himself thoroughly for the practice, and to gain the advantage of the best instruction, he decided to spend a year in Europe and devote himself to the study of his profession under the celebrated instructors of the old world. He became the assistant in the Eye and Ear hospital at Leipzig and also studied in Vienna, becoming assistant in the Royal Ophthalmic hospital. Returning to America he immediately resumed the successful practice of his profession in Atlanta. In 1893, while a student in Europe, young Dr. Roy was elected professor of ophthalmology and otology in the Southern Medical college of Atlanta, which chair he accepted and now fills with credit. Dr. Roy belongs to the Georgia State Medical association and also to the American association and to the Atlanta Medical society. Recently before the state and national associations he read two interesting and remarkably well written papers, which elicited the warmest commendations of the fraternity. No young physician in Atlanta enjoys a higher degree of prominence or has a more inviting future awaiting him in the practice of his profession. Socially Dr. Roy is a man of universal popularity, due to his personal and intellectual graces and to his genial and sunny disposition. He is a member of the First Baptist church of Atlanta.

TINSLEY W. RUCKER, assistant United States district attorney, was born in Elbert county, Ga., on March 24, 1848. In this county he was reared and instructed in the primary branches of an education. When nine years of age he moved to Athens, Ga., with his parents, and there prosecuted his studies still further, and in a short time entered the state university located there. After attending here two years he went to Princeton, N. J., and continued through the junior year. When this term was completed he returned to Athens, Ga., and began reading law with Col. W. L. Mitchell, a distinguished practitioner, now deceased. He was admitted to the bar in Atlanta, Ga., during 1871, by Judge John L. Hopkins, and first undertook the practice of his chosen profession in Athens, remaining there twenty-two years. In 1893, he was appointed assistant United States district attorney, and then moved to Atlanta. Mr. Rucker was city attorney of Athens, Ga., for eight or ten years. He was married on Sept. 27, 1876, to Miss Sarah M. Cobb, daughter of Gen. Howell Cobb. This union has been blessed with five children: Tinsley W., Jr., Lamar Cobb, Mary Ann, Kate Baxter, Sarah Mildred. Col. "Tinney" Rucker, as he is popularly known, is a favorite with the other members of his profession and every one who is so fortunate as to be numbered among his friends and acquaintances, for a jolly nature surrounds a big, noble heart. He is noted for his gift of sparkling repartee, and is considered a brilliant representative of the Atlanta bar. In the cross-examination of witnesses, his keen, penetrating and sagacious interrogations rarely fail to reveal to him a vantage point; and before a jury, with a ready command of wit, sarcasm, eloquence and forceful argument, he is virtually invincible. During the trial of the Georgia Ku Klux, in March, 1895, as assistant United States district attorney, he conducted the cases with such marked ability that all of the accused were convicted. Mr. Rucker, as a vigilant legal officer for Uncle Sam, is convincing in debate, vigorous in ferreting out crime, and powerful in asserting the principles embraced in the statutes.

FRANK THEODORE RYAN, ex-city clerk, Atlanta, Ga., son of Lewis and Huldah Ann (Whitney) Ryan, was born in Talbotton, Talbot Co., Ga., July, 1838. His father was a native of Philadelphia, Pa., who came to Georgia in early manhood, was a merchant and sold goods all his life, and died in 1847. He was a soldier in the Creek war, 1836. Mr. Ryan's mother was a native of Connecticut, daughter of Stephen Whitney. They had two children: Frank T., the subject of this sketch, and Charles Roscoe. Mrs. Ryan is still living and makes her home with her son. Mr. Ryan was raised in Monticello, Ga., to which place his father moved from Talbotton when he was an infant. During his boyhood he attended school in Monticello—which, when the family first went there, was a relay station for the United States stage line between New York and New Orleans. At the age of twelve years he was sent to Reading, Conn., where he attended a high grade preparatory school three years, returning home in the fall of 1852. In 1853 he came to Atlanta, where he continued his studies until 1855, when he entered the machine shops of the Georgia railway. He worked there until 1859, when he went to Arkansas as a journeyman machinist. There he ran a steamboat until March, 1861, when he enlisted in Des Arc, Ark., as a private in an independent company, which, with other companies, captured the United States arsenal at Little Rock, and the fort at Fort Smith, Ark. In May, following, these independent companies rendezvoused at Mound City, Ark., and formed what was afterward known as the Twenty-fifth Arkansas regiment, commanded by Col. (afterward Gen.) Pat Cleburne. He served with his regiment until August, 1861, when he joined the First Arkansas Mounted Rifles, as a private, sharing in all the battles in which it was engaged until Sept. 20, 1863, when, at Chickamauga, he lost his left leg. In consequence of this he was out of active service about a year. In October, 1864, he was assigned to duty at Quitman to collect the tax-in-kind and to purchase supplies for the army, and in December following was transferred to Thomasville, in the same service. Here he surrendered, with all his supplies, when the war ended. During his service he was in the following among other battles: Elkhorn, where he was captured, and a week later escaped by crawling between the pickets; Farmington, Miss.; six weeks' fighting around Corinth; the Kentucky campaign under Gen. E. Kirby Smith, participating in the fight at Richmond, Murfreesboro, Tenn.; Jackson, Miss. (a week of fighting), and Chickamauga. After the surrender he returned to Atlanta to render what aid he could in rebuilding it—and his appreciative fellow-citizens kept him pretty busy for many years. In 1867 he was elected clerk of the market, and held the office until 1870, when he was elected city tax receiver and collector, and served one year. In 1871-2 he was assistant city clerk, and in 1873 was elected city clerk, and was continuously re-elected—serving seven years—until 1880, when he went into the plumbing and gas-fitting business, continuing it three years. In 1882 he was elected a member of the city council and served one term, and in 1883 was elected assistant clerk of the superior court, filling the position two years. Retiring from the public service, he has since given his attention to his private interests and private financial and improvement organizations. Mr. Ryan was married, in Memphis, Tenn., in 1872, to Miss Elizabeth C., daughter of the late Frederick Fisher, Ironton, Mo., by whom he has had three children: Frank T., Jr.; Anne Louise, and Paul. He is a member, and in 1889 was elected vice-president of the Fulton County United Veterans' association; a member of Tullulah tribe, No. 29, I. O. R. M.; a member and vice-chancellor of Empire lodge, No. 47, K. of P.; a member of the lodge and encampment, I. O. O. F., and has served as state grand representative; is a member of the Scotch-Irish society, and a liberal, zealous and exemplary member of the Presbyterian church.

Charles Roscoe Ryan, his brother, enlisted as a private in an Arkansas regiment and did gallant service through the war. After the war he was prosperously engaged in merchandising in Memphis, Tenn., for many years, but died in Colorado, where he had gone for his health, leaving a widow and four sons: Charles R., Lewis W., William H., and Baxter.

GEORGE W. SCIPLE, of the firm of Sciple Sons, dealers in building materials and coal, of Atlanta, was born in Mobile, Ala., Jan. 14, 1855, where he lived for only two or three years, and then, with his father's family removed to Columbus, Miss., living there until the civil war opened. They then settled in the neighborhood of Columbia, Tenn., on a large plantation, and remained for eighteen months. Then, returning to Mississippi, located in Macon, and came to Atlanta, Ga., in November, 1865. In this city George W. attended school irregularly until the age of eleven years, when he began work in his father's grist mill (now the old Atlanta water works), located near Atlanta. In 1866 the father opened two general stores in Atlanta, and our subject assisted in these enterprises. Throughout his boyhood and early youth he had a decided inclination to barter, and even when eleven years old purchased old junk, comprising iron, brass, and lead, obtained from the local battle-fields, with $1.50 capital, and sold the same at 300 per cent. profit. This encouraged and whetted his eagerness to buy and sell. He secured a second lot, which he disposed of at $12.50. Suddenly occurred to him the feasibility and financial gain in cornering the chestnut market. He carried out the idea, bought all that were offered by all sellers, and held them, at the same time watching the eastern quotations until the price advanced sufficiently, and then sold them at $5.00 per bushel, clearing several hundred dollars. He continued trading until his father bought the grist mill, which stood on the site that the water works now occupy. Mr. Sciple aided his father in this industry two years. About this time he received an intimation that luck and good fortune would attend his days, for, investing $30 in the Georgia state lottery, he drew out $500, and magnanimously gave it to his father. In 1869 the family bought a farm, embracing 600 acres, in Bartow county, Ga., but after living here two years the father and son returned to Atlanta, with the intention of establishing a dray line, but finding the conditions unfavorable, abandoned their determination. It was in February, 1872, that George, his father, and brother, Charles E., founded the firm of Sciple & Sons. Having no capital, they purchased a train-load of wood on credit, borrowing $50 to pay the freight, and upon this base, industry, energy and integrity have built a considerable fortune. Later they added coal and different kinds of building material to the stock. In 1880 the firm began the manufacture of lime at Rogers' Station, Ga., and Rockmart. The former was discontinued in 1883; the latter is still in operation. Mr. Sciple's father, a pioneer of Atlanta's history, who aided her in establishing commercial intercourse with other cities, and strove earnestly for her advancement and progress, died in 1885, the stricken mother surviving her husband only one week. This sudden passing away of both parents was a severe shock to the sons. The firm has since continued as Sciple Sons. Mr. Sciple was united in marriage on October 22, 1884, to Lidie, the accomplished daughter of the late Col. Samuel Elam, of Americus, Ga. They have had five children, three of whom are living: Marie Alma, George W., Jr., and Carl Ellsworth. Mr. Sciple co-operates largely with religious organizations and is steward in Trinity Methodist church, of Atlanta. In 1892 he organized the Young Men's Real Estate Investment company, and was elected and is now president of the same. The company paid in its first year a dividend of 65 per cent. Mr. Sciple is now and has been for a number of years a director of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce. He is not a politician, nor does he care for notoriety. He is a business man, pure and simple, and has the pluck and genius that achieve laudable ends. He is a useful and honored citizen, modest and retiring, and is esteemed by the entire community.

DR. HENRY FORT SCOTT, a very prominent physician of Atlanta, was born in Fredonia, Chambers Co., Ala., June 26, 1853, and lived there until he was about four years old, when his parents removed to Marietta, Ga., and from that point to Lexington, Ga., in 1865. One year later they located in Augusta and finally settled in Atlanta late in 1867. Young Scott attended school in Lexington and Augusta, his preceptor in the latter city being Maj. Capers, a noted educator of that day. When his parents removed to Atlanta his education was resumed at a private school conducted by James A. Richardson and E. G. Moore. In 1870 he entered Bowdon Collegiate institute, which was situated in Carroll county, Ga., and from there he went to Oglethorpe university, from which he graduated in 1872. After his graduation he began the study of medicine with Drs. H. V. M. Miller and John M. Johnson, going subsequently to the Atlanta Medical college and graduating in 1874. He was the youngest of his class, which numbered forty-two members, stood the highest in his examinations and took the only prize offered. In the year in which he graduated he was appointed demonstrator of anatomy in his alma mater and served in that capacity in 1874-5, acting as city physician at the same time. Determined to broaden the field of his observation and professional experience, Dr. Scott sailed in the spring of 1876 to the European continent, visiting Paris, London, Vienna and Berlin, spending the most of three years at the German capital, and graduating (magna cum laude) in 1877 from Frederic William university—the second highest grade attainable. Returning to Atlanta he resumed the practice of general medicine.

but two years afterward contracted the field of his work and adopted as a specialty the treatment of the eye, ear and throat. For two years he lectured on diseases of these organs in the Southern Medical college, holding a full professorship. His eyesight failing and rendering difficult the inspection of delicate organisms, Dr. Scott resumed the practice of general medicine, which he now enjoys. He is a member of the Georgia State Medical association, the Atlanta Society of Medicine and the American Medical association, in addition to holding the office of medical examiner to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen. He was orator for the State Medical association when that body met in Thomasville in 1875, and has contributed several widely-read articles and papers to professional magazines. He is a Knight Templar Mason and an honored member of the Methodist Episcopal church south, having also served as a steward of that denomination. Dr. Scott was married in 1879 to Lula S., daughter of Stephen Felker, Monroe, Ga., and they have two sons: Henry F., Jr., and Hugh M., and one daughter, Lula Belle. His father was Henry M. Scott, a native Georgian, who has had a remarkably successful mercantile career; has now retired and lives in Atlanta. Henry M. Scott enlisted in the Confederate service at the outbreak of the war and served until 1863, when he was discharged on account of physical disability, but afterward was engaged in supplying stores to the army of the south. His wife was Sarah J., daughter of Burrell Ragland, and Henry Fort Scott is their only living child. Archibald, the great-grandfather, was of the famous family of Scott, was born in Scotland and emigrated to Pennsylvania about 1770. He was educated in part by Dr. Ramsey, a distinguished physician of that state, whose daughter he subsequently married. He completed his education at Liberty Hall, in Rockbridge Co., Va., from which afterward sprang Washington college and still later Washington and Lee university. About 1772 Archibald Scott was licensed to preach by the Lexington presbytery, of which he was an honored member until his death in 1798. He settled in Middlebrook, between Staunton and Lexington, Va., and, a thorough whig during the revolutionary period, did much by his patriotic counsels to sustain constitutional liberty. As a Presbyterian minister he established some of the leading churches in Augusta and Rockbridge counties, Va. A number of his male descendants have been distinguished ministers in both the Presbyterian and Methodist churches. Among them were Dr. W. A. Scott, Winchester, Va.; Rev. W. C. Scott, Farmville, Va., celebrated as a minister and as an author; Rev. Joseph Morton Scott, of Missouri; Rev. Dr. Scott, Galveston, Tex., and Rev. Dr. Scott, Atlanta, a veteran of the North Georgia conference, who have all occupied prominent appointments, the last-named being especially famous, both in his ministerial capacity and as an author. This venerable clergyman's eldest son, Archibald Henry Scott, was a graduate of Washington college and was afterward greatly distinguished as a classical teacher throughout the length and breadth of Georgia, having presided at the academies of Greensburg, Salem, Milledgeville and Hamilton. At these points he educated a very large number of the most eminent statesmen and jurists of Georgia, Alabama and several of the western states. Judges Harris, Crawford and Stephens, of the Georgia supreme court; Hon. Alfred Iverson, United States senator from Georgia; Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar and Hon. John A. Campbell, of the United States supreme court; Bishop Pierce, of Georgia, and other celebrities were among his favorite pupils. This great scholar and educationist died in Alabama in 1852, and was borne to his grave by the students of the Southern Military university at Fredonia, Ala. His wife, not less esteemed for her Christian character and scholarly attainments, followed him a few years later, dying at the house of her daughter, who was the wife of Chancellor Foster, of northern Alabama.

WILLIAM LINDSAY SCRUGGS, journalist and diplomat, of Atlanta, Ga., is a native of east Tennessee, where he was born Sept. 14, 1834. His remote paternal ancestor, Schroggs, came to England with William the Conqueror, where the name became anglicized first to Scroggs and then to Scruggs. In one term of the Cromwellian protectorate two of the brothers Scruggs emigrated to America and settled in Eastern Virginia as tobacco planters. The great-grandfather of William, whose name was likewise William, was a gallant soldier in the patriot army during the war of independence. He subsequently liberated his slaves (whom he established in the Northwest Territory) and migrated to east Tennessee, then a portion of North Carolina, where he settled in what is now Jefferson county. He was a successful farmer and stock-raiser, and filled many positions of civic honor and trust. William's grandfather, Frederick, as also his father, Frederick, were likewise successful planters and stock-raisers, and men of exceptionally high character. The maternal ancestors of the subject of this sketch were the Kimbroughs, the Lindsays, Hales, Conways and McIntoshes, all of Scotch extraction. They settled in Virginia in the early colonial days; one of them was William Lindsay, an Episcopal clergyman who figured prominently in the struggle for independence. Mr. Scruggs was sent to college at the age of fifteen, and admitted to the bar when twenty-one years of age, but did not enter upon the practice. In 1856, at the early age of twenty-two, he was appointed a school commissioner of Tennessee, and six months later he was elected principal of Hamilton Male academy, where, young as he was, he won merited distinction as an educator. In 1861 he came to Georgia and settled in Columbus, where he was made editor-in-chief of the "Daily Sun," which, through his able and forceful editorials and sagacious management, attained to commanding influence. In 1866 he came to Atlanta, and in conjunction with Col. John S. Prather, established the "Daily New Era." He was the editor of the "New Era" from that time (with the exception of eighteen months) until 1872, when he was appointed by President Grant to the uncongenial office of United States assessor of internal revenue. He was one of the founders of the Young Men's Library association, and largely instrumental in establishing the present admirable public school system of Atlanta, his practical experience as an educator being of great service in this direction. In 1873, in recognition of his efficient service as an official, the government honored him with the appointment of minister to Colombia, South America (succeeding Gen. Stephen A. Hurlburt, of Illinois), in which position he developed an aptitude for diplomatic service which attracted the attention of the government and commended him for promotion. In 1878 he was appointed United States consul to China—first at Chin Kiang, and afterward at Canton. In 1882 he was tendered the consul-generalship at Panama, which he declined. Two weeks later, without solicitation on his part, he was appointed minister to Colombia a second time. He resigned this position in 1886, and in 1889 was, at the instance of Secretary Blaine, appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the republic of Venezuela. Mr. Scruggs has developed a remarkably decided capacity for diplomatic service, and the government's appreciation of it was manifested by his almost continuous retention and rapid promotion. Tactful, courtly and well-versed in international law and diplomatic usage, he made an unusually able minister, and during his twenty years of diplomatic service he negotiated several important treaties and adjusted many long-standing and vexatious disputes. While first at Colombia he was selected as arbitrator in an old and vexatious dispute between that republic and Great Britain. His arbitrament greatly pleased both governments and was highly commended by his own, and established a precedent for the amicable settlement of similar disputes between the South American republics and European powers. In consideration of the timely service thus rendered, and as a token of their high appreciation, the Colombian and British governments gratefully presented him silver souvenirs, which he accepted in 1877 when he was temporarily out of commission. It was in his editorial capacity Mr. Scruggs attracted public attention and became influential while yet a very young man. Intellectual, unusually well-informed on all subjects, and always scholarly, his editorials were strong, logical and finished. In politics he was a Federalist-whig, uncompromisingly opposed to Jeffersonian democracy—hence he has found his views rather inconvenient in Georgia; nevertheless, he has firmly maintained and ably defended them, always with courtesy, power and dignity, so as to command the respect and friendship of his political opponents. Of late years he has been an able and welcome contributor to the local press, and many leading American and European magazines, such as the "Law Review," "Magazine of American History," "North American Review," "Political Science Quarterly," etc., and has now, it is understood, ready for publication, two volumes of his writings on political, judicial and international subjects. Mr. Scruggs was married early in life to Miss Judith Ann, daughter of the late Col. John H. S. Potts, of Stafford county, Va.

MR. ROBERT F. SHEDDEN, one of the youngest as well as one of the most successful general agents of the Mutual Life Insurance company of New York, was born in New York city on June 28, 1867. His early education was received in a school near his home, and his youth and early manhood passed in that great American metropolis. When fifteen years of age he entered the service of the Mutual Life as a clerk in the actuary's department, and displayed such receptive ability that he was soon transferred to the supply department and subsequently became secretary to the vice-president of the company, remaining in this position until 1887. At this time he began active agency work as assistant general agent with Mr. E. C. Benedict, and later was associated with Mr. A. T. Cunningham in Atlanta, Ga., under the firm name of Cunningham & Shedden. In January, 1893, he became sole agent for this company in Georgia, and in that position has added materially to the bulk and effectiveness of the business. It is a responsible office, requiring a thoroughly posted man to conduct its interests and multiply its influence. Since 1888 the amount annually collected in premiums has increased from $229,862 to $558,407, while the insurance in force has grown from $6,937,330 to $15,895,633. The "Weekly Statement," published by the Mutual company, compliments Mr. Shedden highly, and closes by saying: "He is a bright, active, clear-headed young man, and if his success in the past can serve as a criterion, he has a most promising future." Mr. Shedden is a member of the Capital City club of Atlanta, and a potent factor in the circles of society. No one is more popular nor enjoys the pleasure of so many social functions as he, for being clever personally and a happy conversationalist, his companionship is desired and sought. With a vim and perseverance that accompany inherent merit, he has worked with a never-failing spirit or ambition from boyhood, until to-day, achieving one success after another, and is as familiar with the principles of insurance as others of longer experience and more advanced years. His upward progress from an humble position to that of agent, controlling vast southern territory, has been steady and pronounced, for promotions invariably follow when capacity, integrity and devotion to obligation are revealed. Mr. Shedden has a magnificent business, and the company with which he is connected has on numerous occasions manifested its sincere appreciation in a substantial manner.

JUDGE T. J. SIMMONS, chief justice of Georgia's supreme court, is a native of Crawford county, Ga., born June 25, 1837. His early education was received in the common schools of the neighborhood and completed at Bromwood institute at La Grange, Ga. He read law under Col. A. D. Hammond of Forsyth, Ga., was admitted to the bar in August, 1857, and began the practice of his profession in Knoxville, Ga., near his home. He prosecuted this with prosperous results until April, 1861, at the commencement of the war. He enlisted with the first company that was organized in his county, and was elected lieutenant at once. He came first to Atlanta, where his company was made a part of the Sixth regiment, commanded by Col. A. H. Colquitt, and from there was ordered to the Virginia frontier. In 1862 he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Forty-fifth Georgia regiment, of which Col. Tom Hardeman was colonel. In the fall of the same year he was promoted to colonel. A few months before the war closed he was recommended as brigadier-general of infantry by Gen. Lee, but his commission was never received because of the immediate surrender. After returning home he was chosen a delegate to the constitutional convention in November, 1865; when this duty was fulfilled he was elected senator from the twenty-third senatorial district. He was elected solicitor of the Macon circuit in 1867, but after a few months' service was displaced by Gov. Bullock appointing a republican to the office. In 1867 he removed to Macon, and four years after was made senator from the twenty-second district. He filled the chairmanship of the finance and bond committees. On the latter his suppression of fraudulent bonds was loudly commended. The state was saved an unnecessary expense of $11,000,000. While in the senate he served for two terms as its president. He was again elected to the constitutional convention in 1877, was appointed chairman of the finance committee, reported the financial scheme of the present constitution and saw it adopted without material change. During November, 1878, he was elected judge of the Macon circuit superior court, and held that office nine years. In September, 1887, he was chosen to fill the vacancy on the supreme bench caused by the death of Judge Hall. He was re-elected the following year without opposition, and unanimously nominated to fill the unexpired term of Judge Bleckley, chief justice, by the democratic caucus. "The Green Bag" says of him: "His mind is characterized by that rare and valuable faculty 'the genius of common sense.' His intellect intuitively perceives the substance of the case and is under no temptation to get away from it. This is the temperament that makes safe and conservative judges." This compliment is just, for Judge Simmons is able, conscientious and generous.

MAJ. W. F. SLATON, the efficient superintendent of the Atlanta public schools, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., March 6, 1831. After a thorough home training, where the principles of truth, integrity and honor were instilled in his young heart, he entered a school in Autauga, Ala., whither the family had moved, and here he obtained the foundation for higher and more difficult studies. Leaving this primary institution he was for a long time under Dr. Charles P. Beman, the most distinguished educator of the day, and one who has, above all others, inspired the minds of Georgia youths with patriotism and true greatness, and prepared their intellects for high positions in both state and national governments. Under this famous tutor the young student advanced rapidly. His excellence was not confined to a single topic, but seemed to grasp with a ready comprehension and unravel the knotty problems of every branch of learning. All his faculties were developed simultaneously, and he found a delight in mastering every science. Dr. Beman often complimented him upon his ripe and scholarly attainments.

Thus intellectually armed to meet life's conflict, he began his first professional labors in a small school located in Oak Bowery, Ala. Seeing the discipline he maintained and the ability displayed, the parents placed their children under his tutorship. The members increased daily and the success of the school was established. About this time he met Miss N. J. Martin, a young lady of wealth, beauty and accomplishments, the daughter of an influential southern family. He became at once enamored of her charms, and they were united in marriage Dec. 6, 1853. With his bride he went to Auburn, Ala., established a large, prosperous high school, and was instrumental in founding the military college at Auburn. When the south took arms against her northern brothers he was among the first to enlist in her ranks. He fought with intrepid courage at Corinth, Iuka and Vicksburg. As an officer he was commended by his generals and lauded by those who touched shoulder to shoulder with him in the fierce engagements. Prudence, honor and bravery characterized his career. During the war Maj. Slaton was twice captured, once at Vicksburg, but was soon after exchanged and returned to his command, and once at Lookout Mountain. From here he was taken to Johnson's island, Lake Erie. In 1871 Maj. Slaton moved to Griffin, Ga., accepted the principalship of Sam Bailey institute, won cordial praise for culture and management, and remained until 1874. At that time he was elected principal of the boys' high school of Atlanta, Ga. He popularized the school by his industry and skill and built it gradually from an inefficient factor of education to its present flourishing state. In 1879 he was elected superintendent of the public schools above a great number of competitors, and has since occupied this position. By magnetism, discipline and new methods he invigorated the school system, infused a popularity that has never waned and made of them the educational standard of the south. Maj. Slaton has delivered numerous addresses that pronounce him an earnest, erudite leader. Chief among these were lectures before the Peabody institute and the National Association of Superintendents in New York. In personal appearance Maj. Slaton is erect, soldierly in bearing, with noble and attractive features. He is an orator, eloquent and persuasive. By a genial disposition and magnetic personality he has gained innumerable friends; by energy, strength of character and indomitable will he has perpetuated a reputation for powerful mental attributes. Maj. Slaton's father was a resolute, industrious planter and influential citizen of Georgia. His mother is a member of an honored Georgia family, possessing practical judgment, benevolence and a guarded, kindly love in the rearing of her children.

JOHN MARSHALL SLATON, of the law firm of Glenn, Slaton & Phillips, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., Dec. 25, 1866, and lived for five years on a farm, consisting of 2,000 acres, that had belonged to the family more than one hundred years. From this extensive plantation he moved in 1871 to Spalding county, Ga., and during the four succeeding years attended a small school of that neighborhood. In 1875 he came to Atlanta, passed with distinction through the grades of the public schools, and received a diploma from the boys' high school in 1880. He then entered the sophomore class of the university of Georgia, Athens, at once asserted a leadership, which continued throughout his entire course, and was graduated with first honors and a M. A. degree in July, 1886. He returned to Atlanta, and, having determined from early boyhood to become a lawyer, entered upon his studies with this intention in the office of Hopkins & Glenn. After thorough study he was admitted to the bar in July, 1887, and began practice alone, continuing until February, 1893, when he formed a partnership with John T. Glenn. When Mr. Glenn succeeded Hon. Hoke Smith in the firm of Smith, Glenn & Smith, the partnership of Glenn & Slaton was dissolved, and Mr. Slaton resumed practice alone. Mr. Slaton is a democrat of the old Jefferson type, and amid the political tumult of to-day maintains and espouses the principles that have guided and controlled the party in the past. In 1891 he was honored by election as president of the Young Men's Democratic league, an organization composed of 1,200 members, representing the leading professions and occupations of the city. Mr. Slaton is a Mystic Shriner, past grand of the I. O. O. F., past sachem of the Comanche Tribe Independent Order Red Men, and a member of the Capital City lodge Knights of Pythias. He is a Methodist by religious faith, and belongs to the Trinity Methodist church of Atlanta. In April, 1894, Mr. Slaton again entered partnership, this time with John T. Glenn and B. Z. Phillips. The firm is Glenn, Slaton & Phillips. He is a young attorney, who is rapidly forging to the front. With zeal and energy, integrity and perseverance, his success has steadily emerged from the domain of doubt, and is now decidedly assured.

ALLEXANDER WYLY SMITH, one of the most prominent young lawyers of Atlanta, was born in the rural district of Habersham county, Ga., June 24, 1861, and lived in that county until he was seven years of age, when his parents removed to Athens, Ga., and he subsequently attended school in that city for four years. In September, 1872, he entered the public schools of Atlanta, completing his course with first honors in June, 1876, and winning a prize scholarship in the university of Georgia, Athens. He studied at the latter institution until the completion of his junior year in 1878, when he left the university and returned to Atlanta, engaging in the wholesale grocery business with his father, Henry Lamar Smith, until June, 1883. At this time he began the study of law with Judge Marshall J. Clarke, was admitted to the bar Oct. 2 of the same year, and immediately commenced the practice of his profession. In June, 1885, Mr. Smith formed a partnership with B. F. Abbott, which continued until March 1, 1891, when he retired and associated himself with his brother, Victor, in company with whom he still practices. He is a democrat but not an active politician; nevertheless taking the greatest interest in his party's success. Mr. Smith was married September, 1885, to Ida, daughter of the late Samuel S. Kendrick, a native of Vermont. They have two children, a son and a daughter. Mr. Smith's father, Henry L. Smith, is a Georgian by birth and has been one of Atlanta's most prominent business men, having been engaged in the wholesale grocery trade for many years before his retirement. He served as captain of Company I of the Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment in the early part of the late war, and was afterward made judge-advocate-general, acting as such until the cessation of hostilities. Alexander Wyly Smith is a great favorite professionally as well as socially, and has been connected in his practice with many famous causes. As auditor of the Cotton States and International exposition, and chairman of its committee on privileges and concessions, he has contributed largely to the successful management of that great enterprise.

BURTON SMITH. The Atlanta bar is indebted to its younger members for much of the legal scholarship, judicial learning and forensic eloquence that have made it luminous in recent years. Conspicuous among these members as a talented and successful advocate is Mr. Burton Smith. Though aiming at results, rather than display, Mr. Smith has rarely ever failed to carry his point before the jury and his record in this respect is a happy exemplification of the fact that juries are more easily persuaded by the logic of plain facts than by passionate appeals to sentiment or prejudice. Mr. Smith was born at Chapel Hill.

N. C., on Sept. 18, 1864. His father, Prof. H. H. Smith, is one of the most cultured citizens of Georgia, and a man of robust mind and character. At the time of his son's birth he occupied a professorship in the university of North Carolina, located at Chapel Hill. Surrounded by these refining influences the life of young Burton Smith received its first impressions and he lost no time in the selection of a definite ideal. His mind was essentially legal in its operations even as a boy and his future career was not only revealed distinctly to himself but plainly foreshadowed to all who came in contact with him. His father's connection with the university of North Carolina ended only when the institution was closed as a result of reconstruction. He then organized the public school system of Shelbyville, Tenn., and Houston, Tex., and afterward became president of the Texas State Normal school. Young Burton attended school at these several places, receiving very thorough training under his father, and was finally prepared to enter the state university at Athens, Ga. Graduating from this institution in 1882 as one of the leaders of his class and honored with a speaker's place at commencement, Mr. Smith came to Atlanta and entered the law office of his brother, Hon. Hoke Smith, the present secretary of the interior. After reading law he was admitted to the bar in June, 1883. He and his brother remained together under the firm name of Hoke & Burton Smith until 1892, when the partnership dissolved, Mr. Smith branching out by himself. Surrounded by a well organized force of associates Mr. Smith controls a large and lucrative practice and one that is steadily growing. A conscientious advocate, as well as a profound student of the law, Mr. Smith feels it incumbent upon himself to give each client, regardless of the issue involved and blind to all thoughts of compensation, the benefit of his legal skill and research. He has never been known to surrender or abandon the interests of his client, and his loyalty in this respect is largely the explanation of his phenomenal success at the bar. Mr. Smith, in addition to a large practice, including his connection with the M. & N. G. railroad receivership of the G. C. & N. railroad and the celebrated Ryan case, has been chiefly distinguished at the bar by his successful prosecution of suits for personal injury. He is the attorney for the Atlanta "Journal," the Southern Bell Telephone company, and the Atlanta Accident association, together with several smaller corporations. A firm believer in Atlanta's assured destiny, Mr. Smith has made large investments in Atlanta real estate, and he has always been loyal to the interests of the city, and, though he has never in any way sought office, he has always taken interest in municipal affairs. He is posted on all questions of local and national interest and possesses a rich store of political and general information. Mr. Smith was the temporary chairman of the meeting called for the purpose of organizing the Young Men's Democratic league, and he has ever since been a devoted, though an unofficial, worker in the ranks of that organization. From 1884-88 he served as a member of the board of directors of the Young Men's Library association. He was a member of the board of curators of St. Luke's church for six years, serving four years under Bishop Beckwith and two under Bishop Nelson, and resigning in June last. He is on the executive committee of the State Bar association, a member of the American Bar association, and delegate from Georgia to that association. In June, 1888, Mr. Smith was united in marriage to Miss Fanny Gordon, daughter of United States Senator John B. Gordon. They have only two children—a boy of six and a little girl of two years. In his home life Mr. Smith is supremely happy and from the rosy faces that gather about the fireside his successful career at the bar has received its crowning inspiration.

HOKE SMITH, secretary of interior, lawyer, Atlanta, was born at Newton, N. C., in September, 1855. His great-grandfather was a colonel in the revolutionary war, and his grandfather, William True Smith, was a graduate of Dartmouth college, and a man of prominence in New Hampshire. Prof. H. H. Smith, LL. D., father of Hoke Smith, was born in New Hampshire and is a graduate of Bowdoin college. He moved to the south about forty years ago, and was president of Catawba college at Newton for several years. In 1858 he moved to Chapel Hill and became a professor in the state university at that place. In 1868 he located in Lincolnton, and in 1871 he became connected with the public schools of Atlanta. From 1873 to 1878 he was superintendent of the Shelbyville high school and then moved to Texas, where he organized the public schools of Houston. He then succeeded Prof. Bernard Mallon as president of the State Normal school at Huntsville, Tex. He returned to Atlanta in 1882, where he is now principal of the girl's high school. Prof. Smith married Miss Mary (Brent) Hoke, a lady of English and German descent, the daughter of Michael Hoke, of Lincolnton, N. C., a lawyer of great powers. Mrs. Smith comes of a family, nearly all of whose male representatives were public men. Her grandfather owned the first iron furnace and cotton factory in North Carolina. Her brother, R. F. Hoke, was one of the youngest major-generals in the Confederate service. Hoke Smith was educated at Chapel Hill until his thirteenth year, and from that time was continued under the direction of his father till he commenced the study of law in the office of Collier, Mynatt & Collier, in Atlanta, in May, 1872. He taught school for one term in Waynesboro, and in 1873 was admitted to the bar at the age of seventeen. At this early age he exhibited the characteristics of self-reliance, earnest acquisition of knowledge and industry, inherited from his ancestry, and before he had attained his majority he was in possession of a lucrative practice. He began his career in a strange city, where he was practically unknown, dependent entirely upon his own resources, which makes his rare success the more remarkable. He first gained distinction in the Stafford murder case, appearing as assistant prosecutor; then three years later he aided the prosecution in the Hill murder case, securing conviction in both cases. Among his earlier civil cases was that of Tanner vs. Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line railroad, a case of personal injury, and involved legal questions then undecided in Georgia. Mr. Smith secured for the plaintiff a verdict for $16,000. From this time Mr. Smith's practice has been unsurpassed by any lawyer in the state. It has been general in character, but in late years has been largely corporation and commercial litigation. Mr. Smith's debut in politics was made in 1876. When only twenty years old he was chairman of the democratic executive committee of Fulton county. In the contest relative to the removal of the state capital from Milledgeville to Atlanta he was sent on the stump to represent his home. He espoused the cause of tariff reform in the campaigns in his state since Mr. Cleveland's first administration, and was called to the cabinet of the president on his second election. For the first ten years of his practice Mr. Smith was alone, but in 1883 his brother, Burton Smith, became associated with him. Mr. Smith was president of the Young Men's Library association in 1881-83; was among the founders of the "Atlanta Evening Journal," and is president of the Journal Publishing company. Mr. Smith was married in 1883 to Miss Birdie Cobb, daughter of Gen. T. R. R. Cobb, of Athens, Ga. As a lawyer Mr. Smith is noted for clear and forcible presentation of argument. He is practical in his order of thought and work, and in his talk goes to his object with incisive directness. Few lawyers of his age have been so many years in practice or have had such successful experiences in all the avenues of litigation.

COL. HENRY FRANKLYN STARKE, of Atlanta, Ga., would attract attention anywhere on account of his commanding figure and martial bearing. Six feet three inches high and very erect, he was just such a man as Napoleon would have selected for a place in the Old Guard. His father, J. H. Starke, resided in Richmond, Va., where Col. Starke was born in 1841. Eben Starke, his grandfather, was a citizen of New Hampshire, and his great-grandfather was the distinguished Gen. Starke of the American revolution, a friend of Washington and a hero of many hard-fought battles. This gallant revolutionary soldier distinguished himself as lieutenant of rangers in the old wars with the French and Indians, during all the campaigns of Abercrombie and Amherst. On the first news of the battle with the British at Lexington he hastened with a party of New Hampshire men and fought at Bunker Hill. He joined Washington's forces in 1776, and took a part in the battle of Trenton. He afterward won great distinction and was commissioned brigadier-general with a vote of thanks by congress for the brilliant victory won by him at Bennington. Subsequently he served most gallantly under Gates and Washington, and at the close of the revolutionary war had command of the northern department. The people of New Hampshire in reverence for his memory have erected a fine granite monument in his honor, which is said to be exceeded in height only by the Washington monument, and his statue was recently placed in the capitol at Washington as a tribute to the worthy bravery of one of New England's greatest sons. "A man with a noble ancestry," says Pauline in Bulwer's Lady of Lyons, "is like a representative of the past." But like the supposed prince to whom this was applied, though possessed of an honored ancestry, Col. Starke is not "a pensioner on the dead." He has carved out a character of his own and his fame rests on personal merit. Depending on his own resources and energies, he has made fame on the battle-field and won success in many business achievements. His own luster mingles gracefully with the glory of his ancestry. Col. Starke was sent at an early age to England, where he was carefully educated, principally by private tutors, and after several years thus profitably spent in Europe, returned in 1857 and made his home in Texas. About this time he conceived a passion for the legal profession, read law and, though young, stood a brilliant examination and was admitted to the bar. He was in Dallas, Tex., when the civil war began, and enlisted in the spring of 1861 in the Sixth Texas cavalry regiment, of which he was made color-bearer. He served in this position about a year, after which he was gradually promoted, until at the time of the surrender he was a lieutenant-colonel of a separate cavalry command. His entire record was brilliant and on the field of Corinth he was promoted for gallant conduct. He participated in the following battles, serving under Gen. Ross, the brave Texas leader, viz.: Chaustenalla, I. T.; Elkhorn, Ark.; Springfield, Mo.; Corinth, Iuka and Farrington, Miss.; Murfreesboro, Resaca and Atlanta, Franklin and Nashville, and was also in many other engagements in several states on both sides of the Mississippi river. At the battle of Hatchie bridge, just after the battle of Corinth, Col. Starke was wounded, and left for dead on the field, where he was found by the enemy and held as a prisoner two weeks. After the war Col. Starke went to Egypt and served in the Egyptian army for a year, holding a commission in the army of the khedive as bey, answering to that of captain in the United States army, and was assigned a position on the staff of Sir Samuel Baker, with whom he served in Egypt, Syria, Dorfer and Khartoum. He resigned his commission in 1866, and after traveling through Africa, Europe and Asia, to increase his knowledge of the world, returned to the United States. He went to Canada, and arriving there during the oil excitement, operated boldly and successfully. He then engaged in the lumber and mercantile business in Chautauqua county, N. Y., and after continuing there two years moved to Canandaigua, N. Y., and went into the insurance and mercantile business. Col. Starke came to Atlanta in 1885, and soon after locating here went into the real estate business, and has been interested in many large and successful enterprises. He is now president of the Henrico Land company, and of the Georgia Hedge company, and was the president of the Ingleside Land company. Col. Starke was married in Canandaigua, N. Y., in 1876, to Miss Cornelia B., daughter of Hon. W. H. Lamport, then a member of congress. He is a member of the Virginia society, of the Confederate Veterans' association, of the Sons of the Revolution and of the Scotch-Irish society, of which he is vice-president. He is a Knight of Pythias, a Mason and a member of the Presbyterian church.

ANDREW PERRY STEWART, the present tax collector of Fulton county, was born in Jackson, Butts Co., Ga., Dec. 14, 1848. His father was Frederick S. Stewart, a native of Oglethorpe county, Ga., who, by profession, was a contractor and builder. He served in the last war as a member of the Sixth Georgia battalion of artillery, led a Christian life of charity and benevolence, and died at Charleston, S. C., in 1887. Mr. Andrew P. Stewart remained in Jackson for ten years, receiving instruction and gaining the elements of an education. From here he removed to Griffin, and then to La Grange, Ga., where public schools afforded better facilities for learning. When the curriculum of the schools was completed he left home for Atlanta, seeking a position where he might gain a livelihood. He secured one with the late F. M. Richardson, working for him constantly for three years. He then, finding a more profitable opening with L. B. Langford, the hardware merchant, entered his employ and remained there for ten years, after which time Mr. Stewart purchased the stock of Mr. Langford, who was desirous of withdrawing from business, and pursued this mercantile occupation until 1888, when he sold out to Mr. C. A. Conklin. Mr. Stewart has taken a close interest in municipal politics throughout his residence in the city. In 1878-79 he represented the fifth ward in the city council. In 1889 he was honored by election to the office of tax collector, and re-elected in 1891, 1893 and 1895. The re-elections signify the confidence expressed by the community in his capability, integrity and honor. Mr. Stewart was married in the year 1872 to Miss Fanny S., daughter of the late Judge Jetho W. Manning of Atlanta, and one child—a son, Ovid—has blessed their marital life. Mr. Stewart co-operates largely with the secret organizations and societies. Believing that they are productive of unlimited good, he gives them a broad encouragement and support. He is a Mystic Shriner, and a Knight Templar Mason, also a member of the I. O. O. F., and a deacon in the First Baptist church. In the past he has served as superintendent of the Sunday school. Mr. Stewart is a conscientious, pious worker for that which is loved. As a sturdy guardian of the county's finances and a pronounced pillar in the city government he is respected and admired.

JUDGE G. H. TANNER. Perhaps no county in the state can boast of a more efficient lot of public servants than the county of Fulton. Faithful, conscientious, public-spirited, devoted to the welfare of the county, they are model office-holders, and, as such, deserve the recognition and respect of all who admire fidelity in the discharge of high official duty. Among this number of devoted and trustworthy public servants may be mentioned Judge George H. Tanner, the popular clerk of the superior court of Fulton county. Judge Tanner is a native of the adjoining county of Clayton, and was born not far from Atlanta in the year

1855. His father, Mr. J. B. Tanner, was a native of this state, and was a man of influential standing and of high respectability. He believed in giving his children the benefit of a good start in life and of setting before them, in his own personal conduct, a pattern of sobriety and independence. The subject of this sketch passed his boyhood days in Clayton county, receiving his primary education from the schools of that vicinity. Emulous of all that was noble in the characters of those who won his admiration, and desirous of making a name for himself in the world the young student devoted himself to his books with a zeal for learning that was rarely displayed by a boy of his age. He was soon far enough advanced to enter the university of Georgia at Athens, and, leaving home for the first time, he became a student at that institution. Graduating from the university in 1875 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, he came directly to Atlanta for the purpose of making a start in life. His first efforts at earning a livelihood were exerted as a member of the local staff of the "Atlanta Herald." He remained with the paper for several months, during which time he became familiar with all public questions and cultivated a wide personal acquaintance. Having made up his mind to enter the legal profession he retired from the journalistic field to enter the law office of Col. Luther J. Glenn, one of the oldest and most successful practitioners in Atlanta. After several months of studious application, directed by the advice of his friend and counsellor, the young student was formally admitted to the bar, having passed an exceptionally fine examination. He enjoyed a lucrative practice from the start, and, by virtue of his legal attainments, unusual for one of his years and brief experience at the bar, he was appointed justice of the peace and notary public, serving in that capacity for more than ten years. During the period of his public service as a justice of the peace, Judge Tanner enjoyed the confidence and esteem of all classes in the community. Justice, without fear or favor, could always be obtained in his court, and no one hesitated to carry their legal business before him. A thorough knowledge of human nature, and a quick intuitive perception of the motives influencing witnesses on the stand, enabled him in nearly every case to arrive at the truth of the issue before him. The respect of the community, and especially the business public, for his rulings, was based not only upon his legal qualifications but upon his stainless personal integrity. A high sense of honor characterized him in all his dealings both private and official, and no one ever charged him with injustice or viewed his conduct with suspicion. In 1888 Judge Tanner, having retired from his magisterial office, became the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county, to which position he was elected by a vote that emphasized his popularity in a very gratifying manner. By the exercise of the same zeal and fidelity that characterized him in the discharge of his duties as a magistrate he proved himself an acceptable clerk of the superior court, and he continues to hold that office in the security of one who is conscious of having faithfully discharged his duty. Each year adds to his increasing popularity, and he will no doubt continue in office as long as he possesses the inclination to serve the county. For one term Judge Tanner served as a member of the city council, representing the first ward in the deliberations of that body. Imbued with a deep love of brotherhood, the spirit of fraternity is strongly developed in Judge Tanner's nature. He is intensely social in his disposition, and is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the brotherhood of Red Men, the Odd Fellows and the Masons. In each of these organizations he occupies a high stand and enjoys the esteem and respect of all his brethren. Judge Tanner was united in marriage in 1882 to Miss Annie E. Murphy, daughter of Mr. Anthony Murphy, of Atlanta, and has two promising boys, William and Henry. Genial, open-hearted, generous and faithful, the career of Judge Tanner has been one of unblemished usefulness, and his influence in the

JOSEPH MERIWETHER TERRELL, the present attorney-general of Georgia, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., June 6, 1861, in Greenville, a little village of seven or eight hundred inhabitants, where he has resided all his life, with the exception of five years—from 1876 to 1881—when he lived on a farm in the same county. His father, Dr. Joel E. G. Terrell, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1834, and moved to Meriwether county with his parents when a child. He studied medicine in Greenville with Dr. J. W. Anthony, and was the first graduate of the Atlanta Medical college. He is also a graduate of the Jefferson Medical college of Philadelphia. He practiced medicine in Greenville to the day of his death, Nov. 30, 1886. He was one of the most prominent physicians in that section of the state, and was stricken with paralysis while at the bedside of a patient and died the same day. He suffered from physical disability, which prevented his acceptance for service in the late war. Joseph Meriwether Terrell's grandfather was David Meriwether Terrell, a native of Wilkes county, Ga., where he lived until after his marriage, when he moved to Meriwether county, where he died Nov. 29, 1882, aged over seventy years. David M. Terrell married first Miss Chapman, and they had two children, Dr. Joel and Ann. His second marriage was to Mrs. Russell, nee Boozer; they had one daughter. He was a soldier in the Confederate service during the late war, serving with the state troops as long as they were in the field. His father was Joel Terrell, who was born in Virginia and emigrated to Wilkes county, Ga., where he died, having been a farmer all his life. His wife was Frances Butler. Joseph M. Terrell's maternal great-grandmother was a Hamilton, of Scotch descent, and his maternal grandmother was a Render, who belonged to one of the oldest and most prominent families of Meriwether county. Joseph Meriwether Terrell attended school up to the age of fourteen in Greenville, Ga., at which age he took charge of his father's farm, managing it for five years. He then studied law with Maj. John W. Park for a year and in February, 1882, was admitted to the bar by Judge S. W. Harris of the superior court of Coweta circuit. Since that time he has practiced his profession in Greenville, meeting with success from his initial effort. In 1884 Mr. Terrell was elected to the state legislature from Meriwether county, being the youngest member of the house. He was re-elected in 1886, defeated by the alliance wave in 1888, but was elected in 1890 to the state senate, defeating the alliance candidate after one of the most hotly contested campaigns ever held in the state, Mr. Terrell having not only to defeat his opponent in the convention but also in the election following. In 1892 Mr. Terrell was nominated and elected to the office of attorney-general for two years, and was re-elected in 1894. He first received the nomination for attorney-general by a two-thirds vote of the convention against the opposition of two prominent lawyers and was unanimously indorsed in 1894 by the democratic convention for re-election.

In 1884 he, while in the legislature, was a member of several important committees: Judiciary, local bills, and temperance. In 1886 he was chairman of the committee on county affairs, and a member of the committee on judiciary. In 1890 while in the state senate he was made chairman of the finance committee, member of the committee on rules, of the judiciary committee, of the committee on congressional districts and committee on public schools. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the Baptist church. He was married Oct. 19, 1886, to Jessie Lee, daughter of Thomas Spivey, a native Georgian, now living in Texas. Mr. Terrell's mother was Sarah R., daughter of Dr. Anthony, his father's medical preceptor. He is one of eight children, of whom two died in infancy and six survive—five sons and one daughter. The eldest son, Dr. E. B. Terrell, is now practicing in Greenville. Another son, W. A. Terrell, is a farmer in Meriwether county. J. R. Terrell, another son, is a partner with his brother in the latter's office in Greenville. Dr. Henry W. Terrell, another son, is also a practicing physician in Greenville. The only daughter is Annie L., wife of Hines Holt, Columbus, Ga. The Terrell family is of English descent and the name was originally spelled "Tyrell."

COL. L. M. TERRELL is a native of Indiana. He served as an officer of the Union army in the late war, and in 1869 entered the railway mail service as postal clerk between Louisville, Ky., and Nashville, Tenn. He was promoted to head clerk in 1870. In 1871 he was appointed a special agent of the postoffice department, and assigned to the duty of organizing the railway mail service of Texas. The following year he was transferred to Nashville in connection with the same service. In 1874 he was appointed superintendent of the fourth division, comprising the states of Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and the Carolinas, with headquarters at Chattanooga. His headquarters were moved to Atlanta in 1876. He held that position until 1883, when he was transferred and assigned to the superintendency of the third division, at Washington, D. C., where he remained for one year, when, at his own request, he was returned to the fourth division, with headquarters at Atlanta. He resigned this position April 1, 1887, and was reappointed April 1, 1889. In all he has served a period of over twenty-five years in the railway mail service. On Dec. 18, 1894, a banquet was tendered Mr. Terrell by his co-workers and the tributes that were paid this true and tried official, now gray in the service of his government, were eloquent, fervid and spontaneous, and the manner of their utterance clearly evinced the sincerity of their expression. The Atlanta "Constitution" of the following morning, after narrating the honors paid Mr. Terrell, closes with this deserved compliment to the gentleman: "Col. Terrell is perhaps the best-informed man in the United States mail service to-day. He has lived his entire life practically in the service, has held offices from the humblest to the highest, and has enjoyed such experience as enables him to be a perfect master of the situation under any and all emergencies and conditions. He is a splendid disciplinarian, and with more than five hundred mail clerks under him as superintendent of the division, he has brought about one of the most perfect systems of railway mail service to be found in the United States. All of the men like Col. Terrell, and admire him for his strict business methods and for his personal magnetism as well. He has been gradually improving the mail service of the south for years past and receives, as he deserves, the unstinted praise of the public generally throughout the entire region of the country. Everybody feels like congratulating him upon the anniversary of his twenty-fifth year in the service of Uncle Sam, for everybody in Atlanta and this section of the country feels gratitude for his untiring work looking to the perfection of the system which he has so signally accomplished." Col. Terrell is a gentleman of the highest order of intellect, is civil, uniformly accommodating, and is methodically industrious and accurate. He is beloved by all his subordinates and commands the respect of all with whom he is thrown in contact. Col. Terrell was married to Miss Mattie Bell Hammond, in Louisville, Ky., Sept. 15, 1874, she being a daughter of William Harvey and Virginia B. Hammond, of that city. Four children have blessed this happy union: French Jay, Lina Severson, W. H. H., and Norwood Lynch.

COL. LOVICK P. THOMAS, a prominent dealer in real estate and a citizen who has identified himself with Atlanta's prosperity and development, is a native Georgian, having been born in Clarke county, March 24, 1835. Here he passed his boyhood days, learning from the simplicity of his rural surroundings the great truths taught by nature, which lend strength and fortitude to character. At the age of fourteen years he began the study of text books and advanced rapidly, displaying a superior talent and ability. In 1851, Mr. Thomas, becoming imbued with the "gold fever" so prevalent among the young men of the south, and fascinated by the love of travel and adventure, left his native home and state, and in company with a number of friends embarked for California. The ship was an old-fashioned sailing-vessel and consumed much time in traversing the distance from Georgia's coast to the isthmus of Panama. Landing at this point the adventurers continued their march until they arrived at the city of Panama, and came in sight of the placid waters of the Pacific. Among the gold fields, along the rivers, in the mines, up and down the canons he labored continuously for four years with moderate success. Large "finds" were occasionally made, but the time elapsing between them served to depress the buoyancy of his hopes and discourage further efforts. Great privations and sufferings were endured and the exposure which the work necessarily entailed, tended to cause the undermining of health and strength. Consequently in 1855 he returned to Georgia, locating in Gwinnett county, and with the intention of making his western gains the nucleus of a fortune, opened a general store in Lawrenceville, and conducted it with profit until 1862. When the tocsin of war was sounded and the south rallied to the support of her honor and the assertion of her rights, Mr. Thomas, in the spirit of loyalty and justice raised a company of soldiers from the neighboring country, and drilled their awkward ignorance into order and discipline. Gov. Brown, in recognition of his martial ability, and the control possessed over his comrades, appointed him captain. The company, when ready for marching, was assigned to the Forty-second Georgia regiment and known as Company A. In the engagement at Resaca our subject commanded the entire regiment and in the deference of fortitude here displayed was promoted to major. As the war progressed his superiority became more thoroughly manifest, and a short time before the battle of Bentonville, N. C., he was made lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. Col. Thomas remained in the war until its close and fought bravely in the following battles: Cumberland Gap, Tazewell, Tenn., the campaign around Vicksburg, lasting forty-seven days, including Baker's creek, Big Black and others; Missionary Ridge, Dalton, Ga.; Resaca, New Hope church, Kennesaw Mountain, the defense of Atlanta and fights in the adjoining vicinity; Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville, Tenn.; Kingston, Goldsboro and Bentonville, N. C. Through them all he passed unscathed, except at Kennesaw Mountain, where he was slightly wounded by the explosion of a shell. During the siege of Vicksburg the subject of this sketch was captured and held a prisoner within the Federal lines for about one week. When the surrender of Gen. Lee's sword pronounced the cessation of hostilities, the forces of the south were disbanded and her cavaliers, with heavy hearts, returned to their desolate homes. Col. Thomas came to Atlanta with only a tattered uniform, his horse and twenty dollars in gold. With these limited possessions, but a determination and indomitable will that assured the triumph of ambition over the gloom of environment, he began anew the struggle of life. For twelve years succeeding the close of the war our subject acted in the capacity of traveling salesman for a number of firms throughout the state with marked success, and in 1879 was honored by election to the office of chief of the Atlanta police force, which position he held for one term and then resigned to accept the office of deputy sheriff. In 1884 he was elected sheriff of the county of Fulton and as such served three consecutive terms. Since vacating this office he has been engaged in the real estate business in Atlanta. Col. Thomas' private life, as his public career, has been one of perfect felicity and happiness, yet seasons of sadness and grief have crept in to add melancholy to pleasure. He was first married in 1857 to Jennie J., daughter of W. J. Peeples, of Gwinnett county, Ga. She died in 1844, leaving seven children, of whom the following survive her: Lovick P., Jr.; Fannie J., wife of C. S. Winn; Walton L., and Eugene P. Afterward he was married again to Jeannette R. Payne (nee Wagnon), and by the last wife he has three children: Annie O., Alice L. and Edward L. Col. Thomas is now president of the Peachtree Park association, president of the Cotton States Building and Loan association and director of the United Confederate Veterans' association of Fulton county. He is considered one of Atlanta's founders—a pillar of this municipality, who has ever had the welfare of the city at heart, guided her faltering footsteps through the darkness of reconstruction, and now that she has become the foremost metropolis in the south, he feels a pardonable pride in recalling his efforts toward the growth and unfolding of her greatness. Col. Thomas, as his record will attest, is a bona fide colonel. The title is no fancied or flattering appellation, for it was won on sanguine fields, and amid the silence of the bivouac. As an officer of the Confederate Veterans' association he is esteemed and loved. He has been prominent in every undertaking, for in the fulfillment of both public and private duties he has demonstrated remarkable versatility and force of character. As a solid, substantial business man, a promoter of enterprise and thrift, a strong thinker, a cultured, chivalric gentleman and a valuable personal friend, Col. Thomas has impressed the community and the state.

LEWIS WIMBERLY THOMAS, solicitor of the criminal court of Atlanta, Ga., was born in Centerville, Talbot Co., Ga., April 22, 1851. His father moved to Whitfield county, Ga., about 1855. In 1866 he matriculated in Emory college, Oxford, Ga., of which his uncle, James R. Thomas, was at that time president. He continued a student here until 1867, and in December of that year accompanied his father to Vacaville, Cal., where he attended the Pacific Methodist college. In this institution his uncle had been made president and his father professor of languages. He graduated from this institution, taking the degree of A. B. Later he entered the law office of Thomas & Pressley at Santa Rosa, Cal., remained for a few months and returned during December, 1873, to Sparta, Ga. His father's family removed back to Georgia in that year. Mr. Thomas went directly to the university of Georgia, graduated from the law department in June, 1874, taking both courses in one, with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, and afterward located in Athens, Ga. On Feb. 23, 1876, he was appointed solicitor of the county court of Clarke county by Gov. James M. Smith, for four years, when the court was dissolved and merged into the city court of Athens; he was appointed by Gov. A. H. Colquitt on Sept. 15, 1879, solicitor of that court for the same term, but resigned before its expiration and came to Atlanta in 1882 to continue the practice of law. In May, 1891, he was appointed solicitor of the city court of Atlanta by Gov. Northen, and when by an act of the legislature, changing this court to the criminal court of Atlanta, the act creating the court likewise made him solicitor of it. This occurred on Feb. 5, 1892. His term expires Feb. 23, 1896. He has been also admitted to the state supreme court, and the United States circuit and district courts. Mr. Thomas was married in March, 1882, in Savannah, Ga., to Georgia E., daughter of the late Andrew J. Miller, a native of Pennsylvania, and after coming south, a merchant in Savannah and Atlanta. Mr. Thomas is a member of the I. O. O. F., having been noble grand and steward in the First Methodist church of Atlanta. His father was a native of Hancock county, Ga. He was instructed by Dr. Beman, a distinguished scholar who taught at Mt. Zion, Hancock county, and afterward took a full course at Randolph-Macon college, Virginia. Here he graduated with high honors, and later took a course in medicine in Augusta, Ga., and Charleston, S. C. His fame as a physician extended throughout the southern states. He was a member of the secession convention, being elected as a co-operationist, but finally espoused the state's cause and changed his vote in the convention in favor of secession, believing his allegiance was first due to his state. He now resides in Sparta, Ga. Mr. Thomas' mother was Almira Narcissa Wimberly, daughter of Col. Lewis Wimberly, of Talbot county, who died some years ago. Before the war he was one of the wealthiest and most influential citizens in his county. Mr. Thomas is making a remarkable record as solicitor, one of the best who ever held the office. He is a strong advocate, an untiring worker, and a brainy lawyer, as well as a courteous, lovable gentleman. No member of the Atlanta bar is more worthily esteemed.

WILLIAM SYDNOR THOMSON, lawyer, Atlanta, Fulton Co., Ga., son of Warner A. and Frances (Sydnor) Thomson, was born at Summit Point, Jefferson Co., in what is now West Virginia, April 12, 1843. His father was a teacher, in connection with which he conducted a farm. His mother was a daughter of William Sydnor of Virginia. They raised five children, Mr. Thomson being the third. Besides himself, one only is living—John, in De Soto county, Fla. Mr. Thomson was raised on the farm and received a good common school education. When seventeen years of age he commenced teaching near his home; and in August, 1860, he went to east Tennessee and was engaged in teaching near Calhoun. In April, 1861, he returned to Virginia and enlisted in Company G, Second Virginia regiment, and served fifteen months. He then re-enlisted in Company B, Twelfth Virginia cavalry, and served with it as a private until the fall of 1863, when he was transferred to the Stewart Horse artillery, and served with it until the surrender, winning promotion to the rank of lieutenant and adjutant of the command. With his command he participated in many battles, among others the following: First Manassas, Kernstown, Port Republic and Cedar Mountain. After joining the cavalry he participated with his command in a number of battles and skirmishes, among others was the battle at Brandy Station, June 9; that at Upperville, June 21, 1863, where he was wounded in the right leg, and at Warrenton Spring. For his gallant conduct at this battle he was promoted to the rank of sergeant of artillery, and assigned to Stewart's Horse artillery. Following this he was in the Wilderness and Valley campaigns, in the battle of Trevillian Station, and surrendered at Greensboro, N. C. After his surrender he returned to his Virginia home, where he remained until August, 1865, when he came to Marietta, Ga., where he taught as a private tutor, and studied law under George N. Lester, now dead, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1866. For a year afterward he engaged as law clerk with Col. Lester, and then was admitted to partnership with him. The firm practiced in Marietta until 1871, when its headquarters were removed to Atlanta, continuing the partnership until 1874. That year he entered into partnership with ex-Congressman Milton A. Candler, which still exists. In 1889 Mr. Thomson was elected attorney for the board of county commissioners, Fulton county, and was re-elected annually afterward until 1895. He has been a member of the board of education seven years, of which he is now the vice-president. Mr. Thomson was married Nov. 2, 1871, to Miss Nena, daughter of the late David Danner, of Knoxville, Tenn., formerly of Virginia. They have eight children living: Fannie, William D., Albert D., John D., Edith, Logan D., Adelaide and Mildred. He is a master Mason, and a member of the Methodist church, and is chairman of the board of stewards of Grace church, North Atlanta.

JUDGE HENRY B. TOMPKINS, of Atlanta, Ga., is a native of Barbour county, Ala., where he was born in 1845, the son of Henry M. and Henrietta (Bethune) Tompkins. After leaving the primary schools and entering the higher institutions of learning with the intention of completing his education, the outbreak of the civil war prevented further application to study and in consequence he enlisted in the Thirty-ninth Alabama regiment of Confederate infantry, commanded by Col. Henry D. Clayton, who is now president of the university of Alabama. Mr. Tompkins was appointed adjutant soon after joining this regiment, which served in the western division of the army under Gens. Bragg, Hood and Johnston, and by a signal display of bravery, and with a career that challenged his comrades, he was made captain of one of the companies and adjutant of the regiment. During the four years' conflict Mr. Tompkins was painfully wounded on three occasions: At Chickamauga, when Gen. Johnston was making a rapid retreat below Dallas, and in the battles around Atlanta. The last being a wound through the body, was most serious in its nature, and rendered its victim too weak physically to resume command for many months. He, however, rejoined the company when able to walk and remained until the surrender in 1865. Mr. Tompkins at once took up the study of law, received the able instruction of D. M. Seals, of Clayton, Ala., was admitted to the bar and began practice in Alabama. From there he removed to Memphis, Tenn., and thence to Savannah, where for four years he sat on the superior court bench of Chatham county, retired at the expiration of the term and was re-elected in 1881, again resigning after a service of twelve months. He came to Augusta in 1883, and has since resided here. He is counsel, vice-president and general manager of the Sheffield and Birmingham Coal, Iron & Railway company. He is counsel for numerous additional corporations. Mr. Tompkins formed a partnership with Mr. Morris Brandon some years ago. It remains to-day Tompkins & Brandon. Judge Tompkins is an able practitioner, and a zealous laborer for his clients. He is a gentleman of social distinction and admirable qualities. He was married in February, 1882, to Miss Bessie Washington of Tennessee, who died in August, 1887. He was united in marriage again during 1893 to Miss Nora Palmer of Washington, Ga., a lady possessing beauty and mental attractions. Judge Tompkins' paternal ancestors were from old England stock, the guardians of the Lion Empire, who emigrated to America, locating in Virginia, but removed to South Carolina just previous to the revolutionary war.

PAUL B. TRAMMELL, collector internal revenue, Atlanta, Ga., was born in Catoosa county, Ga., April 3, 1859. When the civil war began he was taken to White county, Ga., where he remained until after the surrender, when he came to Gordon county, where he lived two years and went thence to Whitfield, where he attended school and prepared for college. He then entered the university of Georgia, from which he graduated with the degree of A. B., in 1878. Coming to Atlanta he clerked in a dry-goods store one year, and then entered the employ of S. M. Inman & Co., the great cotton dealers, with whom he remained three years. Returning to Whitfield county he engaged in farming, and bought an interest in a cotton compress plant at Dalton, which he still retains. In 1888 he was elected to represent the forty-third senatorial district in the general assembly, and was placed on the committees on finance, railroads and corporations. So satisfactory were his faithful services as senator, that he was elected in 1890, and re-elected in 1892, to represent Whitfield county in the general assembly. In the house he served on the committees on railroads, agriculture and military affairs. In the sessions of 1890-91 he was chosen speaker pro tem. of the house. In these several positions of honor and responsibility he exhibited fine business qualifications, political sagacity, and legislative capacity. Mr. Trammell was married Dec. 12, 1883, to Miss Fannie, daughter of Dr. J. R. McAfee, Dalton, Ga., by whom he has had three children, one daughter, Ruth, who died at three years of age, and two sons: Paul B., Jr., and McAfee. Mr. Trammell is a Knight of Pythias, a royal arch Mason, and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

JOHN L. TYE.—A young lawyer of marked prominence and ability, who has rapidly come to the front at the Georgia bar, and who bids fair to become one of the most useful members of the profession, is Mr. John L. Tye. John Lewis Tye, the subject of this sketch, was born at McDonough, Ga., in Henry county, in March, 1859. He received his elementary instruction from the schools at McDonough, making rapid progress in his books and giving promise of unusual excellence in his acquirements as a pupil. At the age of thirteen he entered a preparatory school at Kirkwood, Ga., near Atlanta, and was soon equipped for entering the state university at Athens. Graduating from this institution in 1876, having for his classmates such men as Andrew J. Cobb, Thomas R. Gibson, Prof. L. M. Landrum, H. P. Moore, Prof. B. M. Hall and George D. Thomas, he immediately entered the Columbia law school at Washington, D. C., and received his diploma from that institution in 1879. As a debater the young law student was always ready to lock horns in argument with any one who might come along, and was the peer of the brightest minds, both at the law school in Washington and at the state university. Coming to Atlanta in 1879 Mr. Tye was admitted to the bar directly and also to the supreme court of Georgia. He found a good clientage awaiting him and his efforts were remunerative from the start. He allowed no side issues of any kind to withdraw his mind from the work of his profession, but with ambitious zeal and a steadfast purpose he applied himself to the mastery of legal principles and to the faithful and conscientious service of his clients. In this respect he has proven himself worthy of the confidence reposed in him by influential clients, and has further demonstrated his ability to manage any case that requires legal skill and ability. In his ready grasp of the legal merits of all cases brought to him Mr. Tye has no superior among the younger members of the Atlanta bar. In 1884, as an evidence of the popularity acquired by the subject of this sketch, shortly after coming to Atlanta, and also as a compliment to his loyalty as a young democrat, Mr. Tye was made a presidential elector during that year to cast the vote of this state for Grover Cleveland. As a democrat Mr. Tye has always been steadfast in his devotion to the principles and traditions of the party, and in spite of the vicissitudes and defeats has steadily remained loyal to the party organization. Mr. Tye formed a legal partnership with Mr. J. Carroll Payne, in 1890, and since that time they have been associated together in the practice of the law. As general counsel for the Western & Atlantic railroad company and several banks and corporations, his firm has, perhaps, the largest corporation business of any law firm in Atlanta. In nearly all the important railroad litigation of the last few years they have taken an active part and have made a brilliant reputation at the bar by the shrewd and successful management of the cases before the court and the jury. Noteworthy among their railroad cases was their success in retaining jurisdiction by the state court, in administrating the Atlanta & Florida railroad company, where the United States had acquired possession of the railroad for which they were allowed by the court a fee of $25,000. Mr. Tye was united in marriage to Miss Carrie Wilson, the daughter of Mr. B. J. Wilson of Atlanta, in 1883. He has four children, three sons and one daughter, and his home life is a picturesque and happy one. Fond of his home fireside he spends much of his time in the indulgence of his taste for those diversions that make an ideal household. Mr. Tye has never sought political preferment of any kind. He has confined his aspirations to the practice of the law and has never permitted his ambition to go beyond that boundary. Endowed by nature with rare social, as well as brilliant mental gifts, Mr. Tye is one of the most popular members of the Atlanta bar, and his friends are legion. A thoughtful reader and a close observer, he is always posted on the topics of the day and is familiar with the current literature of the times as well as with the standard authors. In conversation he is bright, fluent and captivating, and his manner, both in the courtroom and the parlor, is that of the cultured gentleman who claims the respect and confidence of all by virtue of his inherent nobility. Mr. Tye is still in the prime of his young manhood and has a future of brilliant promise before him at the bar. A high sense of honor has always marked him in his relations to the professional and business world, and his record as a lawyer and as a man is alike above criticism and defies reproach. In speaking of Mr. Tye, Judge Tanner, the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county, recently said of him: "He is one of the ablest young lawyers at the bar," and to this Judge Van Epps has added the opinion that no young lawyer who has ever appeared in the city court is better equipped for the practice of his profession.

JUDGE HOWARD VAN EPPS. One of the most distinguished members of the Georgia bar who has worn the judicial ermine of the city court of Atlanta for nearly ten years, and whose contributions to the literature of the profession have given him a high prestige, not only in Georgia, but throughout the south, is Judge Howard Van Epps. Dignified in his demeanor on the bench, just in all his decisions, recognizing neither friend nor foe in the discharge of his official duties, Judge Van Epps has displayed the qualities of an able, upright and conscientious judge, and no one has ever dared to impute to him a motive that questioned his reputation as a man or brought reproach upon his judicial ermine. The ancestors of Judge Van Epps, as the name implies, lived in Holland. Distinguished by the same traits that have characterized its members in this country the family was recognized as one of the oldest and best of that name. The first member of the household to emigrate from his fatherland was the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch. He came to this country during his early youth and settled in the state of New York. The Van Epps in Holland followed the ancient pursuit of farming and were all sober, industrious and thrifty. The grandfather of Judge Van Epps was a native of the Mohawk valley. He was a private soldier in the American revolution and valiantly espoused the cause of American liberty. He reared a large family of twelve children, all of whom settled around him in the Mohawk valley. Among this number was Amos C. Van Epps, the father of the subject of this sketch. He was born in Schenectady, N. Y., in 1824, but in early manhood migrated south and located in the state of Alabama. He was married in 1845 to Miss Caroline L. Howard, daughter of Gen. Nicholas Howard, of Columbus, Ga. Subsequently, in 1848, he moved to Chattanooga, Tenn., but afterward refueged to Georgia during the bombardment of that city. After the war he located in Atlanta and entered the merchandise business. He retired, however, from active business in 1887 and settled on his farm in De Kalb county, where he died in 1890. Mr. Van Epps was married a second time in 1867 to Miss Julia Cooper, of La Grange, Ga., his first wife having died in Chattanooga, Tenn., on Dec. 21, 1860, the anniversary of her son Howard's birth. By his first wife Mr. Van Epps had five children, three of whom were living at the close of the war: George C., who served as a private for three years in the Nineteenth Tennessee infantry, died in 1872; Howard, the subject of this sketch; and Ida, the wife of Dr. George A. Wilcox of Augusta, are still living. Two children died in infancy. By his second wife he had three children: Claude, Lily, and Amos C. Van Epps, who live with their mother in De Kalb county. Mr. Howard Van Epps, the subject of this sketch, was born in Eufaula, Ala., on Dec. 21, 1847. In early infancy, however, he moved with his parents to Chattanooga, Tenn., where he lived until his sixteenth year, attending the schools of that city and receiving a good primary education. In the spring of 1864, though still a mere lad, he enlisted as a private in Company A of the Nineteenth Tennessee infantry, Strahl's brigade, Cheatham's division, Hardee's corps. He served as a private in the ranks of the Confederate army until early in 1865, when he was severely wounded at Egypt station, Miss., while on detached service, remaining in the hospital at Lauderdale springs, Miss., for two months suffering with gangrene. He obtained a furlough to return home and, at the close of the war, his wounds were still unhealed. The young soldier figured in the battles around Atlanta, including the bloody engagement of July 22, the battle of Jonesboro, after the evacuation of Atlanta, and the engagement at Egypt station, Miss., at which place he received his wound. After the war he located in Atlanta, his father having preceded him to that city. In the spring of 1866 young Howard entered the freshman class at the state university, graduating from that institution in 1869 with the second honors. Among his classmates were Judge A. Pratt Adams of Savannah, Samuel Barnett, Charles A. Collier, and Judge W. R. Hammond of Atlanta, Judge William H. Fish of Americus, Emory Speer of Macon, and Benjamin H. Hill of Atlanta. The class was one of the largest and brightest that ever attended the university. After taking a law course in 1870, he located in Atlanta and entered upon the practice of his profession. Two years later, in 1872, he was appointed by Gov. James M. Smith, solicitor of the city court of Atlanta, and served in that capacity for four years. Prior to that time he served for two years as ex-officio solicitor under the appointment of Judge Robert J. Cowart. In 1880 the subject of this sketch formed a partnership with Patrick Calhoun, Esq., under the firm name of Van Epps & Calhoun. Mr. A. C. King was subsequently admitted into the firm in 1882, which was then changed to Van Epps, Calhoun & King. In 1885 Mr. Van Epps retired, forming a partnership with ex-Chief Justice O. A. Lochrane. This legal association, however, was dissolved in November of that year by the appointment of Mr. Van Epps as judge of the city court of Atlanta by Gov. Henry D. McDaniel. His ability as a judicial officer was so pronounced and his services on the bench of the city court so conspicuous for their fairness, purity and justice, that he was subsequently reappointed by Govs. John B. Gordon and William J. Northen. Judge Van Epps' present term of office expires on Jan. 19, 1896. He has frequently intimated his intention of resigning, but his friends and associates at the bar have persuaded him to remain on the bench, for which position he is so well qualified by reason of his shining talents, no less than by his unimpeachable integrity. Soon after going upon the bench Judge Van Epps began, at odd hours, to work upon an Analytical Index and Digest of the Supreme Court Reports of Georgia, from volume 62 to volume 81 inclusive. He finished this undertaking in October, 1890, and the splendid result of his labors has received the highest indorsement of the Georgia bar. He is now engaged in association with Judge John W. Akin, Cartersville, Ga., in the preparation of a more extended work—a digest of the Supreme Court Reports from volume 1 to volume 100, the appearance of which book is eagerly awaited by the bar. As judge of the city court of Atlanta, Judge Van Epps has presided in the hearing of nearly all the heavy damage suits against corporations during the last nine years. The work of the city court became so burdensome in 1891 that a provision was made by the general assembly of Georgia for the division, taking away the criminal jurisdiction of the city court of Atlanta, and vesting it in a new court, known as the criminal court of Atlanta. When not engaged in the hearing of criminal cases the judge of this court sits as associate judge of the city court of Atlanta. During his tenure of office Judge Van Epps has decided quite a large number of legal questions, all of them demonstrating his marked judicial ability. Judge Van Epps is a member of the Independent Order of Red Men, and is a vice-president of the American Bible society of New York. He is also a vice-president of the American Sunday School union of Philadelphia. Intensely religious in his nature, he is an active worker in the Central Presbyterian church, of which he is a member, and teaches the young ladies' Bible class, which is one of the largest in the city. Judge Van Epps was united in marriage on Feb. 12, 1873, to Miss Minnie C. Thomas, daughter of Mr. Stevens Thomas, of Atlanta, Ga. By this marriage several children were born to them, only two of whom are living: Minnie and George D. Few men possessing the talents of Judge Van Epps have devoted them so unselfishly to the welfare of their fellow men. He has never thought of accumulating money; and his highest ambition has been to honor the profession of the law and make himself useful, at least in a measure, to the cause of God and humanity.

DR. EMILE VAN GOIDTSNOVEN was born in Belgium Nov. 2, 1839, where he resided until his twenty-first year and attended the schools in that country. In 1858 he entered the university of Lourain for the purpose of taking a medical course in that celebrated institution, but before finishing his studies he came to the United States with Hon. L. de Give, the Belgian consul, as chancellor, and located in Atlanta, where he engaged in mercantile business and in which he continued for about twenty years. He then attended the Southern Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1883, established an office in the city, and has since practiced his profession with eminent success. Dr. Van Goidtsnoven is a member of the State Medical society and of the Atlanta Society of Medicine, of the latter of which he has been treasurer. He also had the chair of diseases of children and was treasurer of the Atlanta polyclinic. He was first married in 1868 to Kate, daughter of Thomas Kelly, of Fairburn, Ga. His first wife having died without issue, in 1888 he was married to Jessie A. Phillips, of Brooklyn, N. Y. They have two children, William L. E. and Marie Roberta. Dr. Goidtsnoven is city physician of the second ward of Atlanta, examining physician for branch No. 20, Catholic Knights of America, and is surgeon for the Atlanta division of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia (now Southern) Railroad company. He is still connected with the Belgian consulate as chancellor. The father of Dr. Van Goidtsnoven was Adolphus Joseph Goidtsnoven, a native of Belgium, where he lived and died. Dr. Van Goidtsnoven is a devout member of the Roman Catholic church and a highly esteemed gentleman.

COL. A. J. WEST is widely known throughout Georgia for valuable public services and as one of Atlanta's most successful business men. His grandfather, Andrew West, was one of the first settlers in Monroe county, Ga. His father, James F. West, was murdered in Vera Cruz, Mexico. His mother, Anne Elizabeth, was the daughter of Capt. Henry Butts, a member of one of the best known and most highly esteemed families in Georgia. By the death of his father in early life Col. West was thrown upon his own resources and began in his boyhood to take care of himself. At the age of seventeen he joined the Troup light guards, which became Company E, Forty-first Georgia regiment, Col. Jack Cartwright commanding, and shared in the battles of the army of the Tennessee to the final surrender at Greensborough in May, 1865, and actively participated in the chief battles, such as Vicksburg, Shiloh, Tupelo, Perryville, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Atlanta, Franklin, Nashville, and indeed in active service until the close of the war. He was several times mentioned for gallantry in battle and was promoted twice by special distinction. In the famous charge of Bragg's army at Perryville West is named as the first man to reach the enemy's battery. He was severely wounded in one of these battles and left on the field as a dying soldier and attributes his recovery to the kindness of a Kentucky girl, Miss Lizzie Everhart, now the wife of Dr. Amos Fox, Atlanta's efficient postmaster. When the army of Tennessee surrendered at Greensborough, N. C., West returned to Troup county on foot, ragged and shoeless, but bravely resolved on making the most of his life. After a few months in school he moved to Atlanta, where he organized and worked up one of the largest wholesale grocery and commission houses in the south. The panic of 1873 prostrated this extensive business, bringing the loss of all he had made to the enterprising founder. Surrendering everything, he entered the real estate business, which, under his management, has grown to be one of the most extensive and reliable in the state. Realizing that the military spirit should be maintained in the south, Col. West organized the Fulton Blues, equipping the company at his own expense and commanding it for several years. Gen. Gordon, on his election to the office of governor, summoned him to his staff, and this honor was repeated by Gov. Northen, who appointed him quartermaster-general of Georgia. Gov. Atkinson renewed the appointment in that important office. Mr. West, with the rank of colonel, now serves the state. Through his energy and skill the state encampment of the military was instituted and Camp Northen, near Griffin, made efficient. Col. West is also adjutant-general of the Georgia division, United Confederate Veterans, director of the Cotton States and International association, and is associated with prominent citizens in many enterprises to advance the interests of the state. Affable, energetic and prudent, he has won a high place in public esteem, which will grow with the coming years. He is a prominent and advanced member of the masonic fraternity, and an active and much valued member of the First Methodist church, Atlanta.

THOMAS P. WESTMORELAND. One of the most distinguished, upright, useful and respected citizens of Atlanta is Judge Thomas P. Westmoreland, the present judge of the criminal court of Atlanta. Judge Westmoreland was born in Greeneville county, S. C., on Aug. 5, 1843. His paternal ancestors were nearly all of English birth, the first of the number to emigrate to this country being Robert Westmoreland, a native of Westmoreland county, England. He came to America with his two brothers, William and Thomas, in 1746, one settling in Virginia, one in North Carolina, and Robert, the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, locating in South Carolina. He was subsequently united in marriage to Miss Lenoir, of North Carolina, a sister of Gen. Lenoir, one of the most distinguished officers of the American revolution. His son, John Westmoreland, was born in South Carolina, and was a gallant soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Westmoreland, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Greeneville, S.

C., in 1808. He was a farmer by choice of occupation and devoted his life to that ancient and honorable calling. For several years he served as a magistrate in his native county, and was also a captain of the old state militia. Prior to the war he served with distinction as a member of the state senate of South Carolina, and was also a member of the "Wallace house" of 1876. His wife's maiden name was Miss Martha V. Crymes. She was a native of South Carolina and belonged to one of the oldest and best families of that state. Eight children, as follows, sprang from the union thus happily formed: William M. C., of Cuthbert, Ga., who served throughout the entire war; John L., who was also a gallant soldier in the Confederate army, now residing in Greeneville county, S. C.; Dr. Jesse M., who served throughout the war, first as assistant surgeon of the Sixteenth South Carolina regiment, and afterward in one of the hospitals at Staunton, Va.; Thomas P., the subject of this sketch, who was also in the Confederate service; Preston Calhoun, and George, both of Atlanta. It is the highest proof of the sturdy characteristics of this splendid family that all of its members have succeeded well in life and have exercised a good influence in their respective communities. Judge Westmoreland spent his boyhood days in Greeneville county, S. C. Here he received his primary training from the common schools, and as soon as he was far enough advanced in his books he entered the military institute at Columbia. In 1861 he matriculated as a student in Emory-Henry college, but in June of that year returned home for the purpose of enlisting in the Confederate army. He entered the service as a private in Hampton's legion, but subsequently became a member of the staff of Gen. W. H. Whiting, serving in that capacity for a year and a half. On account of ill-health he was placed on detached duty for a year, after which time he rejoined the army and served under Gen. Johnston until the war closed. He commanded Gen. Johnston's escort, and was in the last battle of the war at Bentonville, N. C. The subject of this sketch was in the following battles: Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond. At the battle of Gaines' Mills, Va., called by the Federals Cold Harbor, the young soldier was complimented for his gallantry on the field, and afterward a written commendation of his behavior was embodied in the report of Gen. Whiting. Immediately after the war the subject of this sketch entered Firman university, in Greeneville, S. C., subsequently commencing the study of law in the office of C. J. Elford, in Greeneville. In November, 1866, the young applicant was admitted to the practice of his chosen profession by the supreme court of that state. Though he did not engage immediately in the practice he remained in Greeneville until the summer of 1867, and then came to Atlanta. Here he devoted himself with studious zeal and unremitting fidelity to the labors of his profession, remaining in the active practice until 1891, when he was appointed judge of the criminal court of Atlanta for the trial of state offenses. Under this appointment he also serves as judge of the second division of the city court of Atlanta, with jurisdiction to try civil cases. In his capacity as a civil magistrate Judge Westmoreland has succeeded in breaking down the practice of gaming in Atlanta, and in restoring a condition of law and order in that community. He is absolutely without fear, and is upright and conscientious in all his judicial rulings. An abler or more faithful officer never devoted his talents to the public service than Judge Westmoreland. In civil, as well as in criminal matters, he has acquired a broad reputation, and his court is recognized as a tribunal before which justice can always be obtained. Judge Westmoreland has always been a friend of temperance, and has directed his energies to a very great extent against the liquor traffic, finally succeeding in his loyal and patient adherence to this movement in forcing it into its present restricted limitations. Judge Westmoreland is a member of Trinity Methodist church, of Atlanta, and is also a steward and trustee of that church. He was united in marriage in 1874 to Miss Carrie V. Rawson, daughter of Mr. Edward E. Rawson, of Atlanta. As a lawyer, a jurist, a citizen and a man, Judge Westmoreland has always commanded the affectionate esteem and confidence of the community.

MR. GEORGE WESTMORELAND, the youngest brother of Judge Thomas P. Westmoreland, is a distinguished young member of the Atlanta bar. He was born in Greenville county, S. C., and received his preliminary education from the schools of that county. At the age of sixteen he entered a drug store in the town of Greenville, and served in the capacity of a clerk for eight years. During this time his ambition was not allowed to pine in despondency. He managed to prepare himself for college by studying one night and reciting the next, at the same time acquiring a thorough knowledge of the principles of bookkeeping. He left the drug store in 1875, having kept the books of his employer for six years in addition to his other work, thus saving enough money to defray his college expenses. Entering Firman university at Greenville, S. C., he applied himself with diligence to his books for two years, after which he began to read law in the office of Earle & Wells. By a special act of the legislature he was admitted to the bar, after a brief preparatory course of fifteen months, the law of the state requiring twenty-four. He was examined in open court by Capt. George E. Wells, Solicitor J. S. Cawthorn and Judge Joseph N. Noston, who pronounced the young applicant brilliantly qualified to engage in the practice of his profession. He was at once taken into partnership by his preceptors, the new firm being that of Earle, Wells & Westmoreland. This partnership continued until 1880, when Capt. Earle moved to Washington city. The subject of this sketch remained in Greenville, S. C., until 1891, when he came to Atlanta, leaving the second best practice in Greenville. During the last year of his residence in that city he and his partner, H. J. Haynsworth, realized the handsome sum of $10,000. Coming to Atlanta Mr. Westmoreland formed a partnership with Mr. L. B. Austin, of that city, which continued until Jan. 1, 1893, when he became a partner of Hon. John B. Goodwin, at that time mayor of the city. The subject of this sketch was for several years county attorney of Greenville, S. C. He is a member of the Masonic brotherhood, and belongs to the Baptist church. Mr. Westmoreland was united in marriage Dec. 15, 1880, to Miss Eliviva T. Smith, daughter of the Rev. Julius C. Smith, of Greenville, S. C., and granddaughter of the late Rev. Basil Manly, the great Baptist divine of Alabama, and president of the university of Alabama at Tuscaloosa. Four children have been the result of this happy union: Carrie, Sarah, Eliviva, and John L. The family is an interesting one, and the young barrister never fails to find at his home fireside a domestic remedy for all the cares and vexations of his profession. As a lawyer Mr. Westmoreland ranks among the best in the city, and his success at the bar is already defined and well assured.

DR. WILLIS F. WESTMORELAND, who enjoys one of the largest practices in Atlanta, is a native of Milner, Ga., where he was born July 23, 1864, his parents having been compelled to flee Atlanta because of the surrounding hostilities provoked by the civil war. Two or three months after his birth they returned to Atlanta, and there he received his early instruction that found ready access to his receptive faculties. In 1879 he entered the university of Georgetown, but remained only a few months, and came to Atlanta to commence the study of medicine under the guidance of his father. He attended a course of lectures in the Atlanta Medical college, graduating in 1884. During four or five succeeding years he passed several months of each year in New York and Philadelphia, perfecting and rounding his knowledge in his favored science. In 1883 Dr. Westmoreland was united in marriage to a daughter of the late eminent Judge O. A. Lochrane. They have two children: Elma L., and Willis F. Jr. Dr. Westmoreland's great ability is recognized far and wide. He is a member of the American Medical association; the Southern Surgical and Gynecological association; the Tri-State Medical society, of which he was president in 1894; the Mississippi Valley Medical association, and the Atlanta Academy of Medicine. He is a worshipper at the Episcopal church, and affiliates ardently with the secret organizations, belonging to the Knights of Pythias, the Odd Fellows, the Elks, and the Knight Templar Masons. Dr. Westmoreland is an honorable, courageous man, who knows the minutest details of his profession, attends closely to his practice and has the respect of his co-laborers and the good will of all Atlanta. His father was Dr. Willis F. Westmoreland, the ablest and most skilled surgeon of his day. His influence was not bounded by state lines nor devoted entirely to pecuniary gain; for his patients came from all sections of the Union and when too poor to engage his services were gladly treated gratuitously. His power for good was superlative. Dr. Westmoreland inherits the profundity of his father.

JOHN CHARLES WHITNER was born in Edgefield county, S. C., not far from Augusta, Ga., Sept. 23, 1831, the youngest of nine children. His father, Benjamin Franklin Whitner, was the eldest child of Joseph and Elizabeth Shackelford Whitner, both of whom lived and died near Pendleton, S. C. Joseph Whitner was a revolutionary soldier, entering the Continental army when quite young, and serving from the commencement till the close of the war of independence, a part of the time under the celebrated Gen. Marion. His father, John Joseph Whitner, who came to Charleston, S. C., about 1757, was a German by birth, and son of Joscf Whitner, a man of position and wealth in that country. Elizabeth Shackelford Whitner, was the daughter of William Shackelford, of Halifax county, Va., who was a lieutenant in the revolutionary army and died at Dumfries, Va., in 1779. He was a son of Roger Shackelford, who emigrated from England to Hanover county, Va., in 1730. Benjamin Franklin Whitner was a man of fine attainments and remarkable intellectual ability. He graduated at the university of South Carolina, and entered immediately upon the practice of law, ranking with the ablest in that profession in his state. He was importuned to enter fully into politics, but declined further than to serve in the legislature, and for some years as state superintendent of internal improvements, conducted according to the states rights theory of that day. He gave up the law practice, and turning it over to his younger brother, Judge J. N. Whitner, who for years graced the bench of that state, embarked extensively in financial and commercial affairs. With a partner, he established a large business at Hamburg, opposite to, and then a rival of Augusta, Ga., and a branch at Charleston. In the course of time they owned and ran two steamboats, the "Pendleton" and the "Lowndes," regularly between Augusta and Charleston. Major John C. Whitner's mother was descended from the finest English ancestry. She was Eliza Ann Spann, the youngest child of Capt. James Spann, an officer of the revolutionary army, who married Mrs. Elizabeth (Fox) Turner, widow of Capt. James Turner, killed by the Cunningham gang during the war. She was a daughter of James Fox of England, and sister of John Fox, the wealthy and aristocratic Englishman who lived and died near Augusta, Ga., both relations of the great English statesman of that name. When John C. Whitner was but a small child, his parents removed to Florida, settling in Madison county. The Indian war soon became severe, and much trouble was experienced in this county, so that the home of Col. Whitner, father of John C.

JOHN C. WHITNER.

Whitner, was visited by the savages who destroyed much property, including many valuable family relics, though fortunately the family was absent at the time. This caused another removal to a lovely place situated upon Lake Jackson, about eight miles from Tallahassee. Here Col. Whitner established an elegant and attractive home, known as Casa de Lago, not surpassed in its hospitalities and social pleasures by any home in the south. In Florida he also became a leading citizen, his warmth of heart causing him to be as devoted to principle as he was to good works. It was largely under his advocacy and careful blocking out, that the foundation of the free school system in that state was laid far back in the "forties," and subsequently, that the railroad system was established, which has since constituted the trunk lines running east and west. He was for years president of the Union bank, and leading financier even up to his death, which occurred at the age of seventy-five, in October, 1864. His services in behalf of the southern cause, and in aid of the families of the soldiers in the army, are still gratefully treasured up by the survivors of those times. From Tallahassee John C. Whitner came to the university of Georgia, entering that institution in 1850, and graduating in 1853. His room mate for three years was Gen. John B. Gordon, between whom and himself there was then formed and still exists, an intimacy and affection equal to that existing between brothers. Expecting to lead the life of a planter, Major Whitner, though taking a high stand generally in his class, followed his preference and strove mainly for the front rank as a writer. This he attained, he and the late Col. James D. Waddel leading the class in this line. He was made one of the editors of the "Georgia University Magazine," a monthly then conducted by each senior class, which attained its highest success and distinction during the management of the class of 1853. The month after graduating, Sept. 28, 1853, he married Miss Sarah Martha Cobb, youngest daughter of Col. John Addison and Sarah Robinson (Rootes) Cobb. They went immediately to his home on a plantation about eight miles south of Quincy, Fla. His father and mother, though the former was president of a bank in Tallahassee, lived with them a good deal of the time. In October, 1854, his mother died, and that determined him one year after to give up plantation life, and take his wife and child to live nearer her relations. So in December, 1855, relying proudly upon his own efforts, without calling upon his father and therefore with capital borrowed elsewhere, he bought a half interest in a general store at West Point, Ga., and took up residence just across the line in Chambers county, Ala. A few months after starting business, Mr. Whitner bought out his partner, and continued alone the remainder of his mercantile experience. He managed so well as to be able to return within a year and a half all the capital borrowed, and still to keep his business easily going. In the fall of 1856 he was appointed agent of the Georgia R. R. Bank of Augusta, and the next year was appointed agent also of the Farmers' & Exchange bank, of Charleston, S. C. These positions he filled successfully, making money for those banks and for himself. His home was a happy and hospitable one, seldom without friends and visitors. Yet his work was conducted with careful attention. Just before the war started, a representative of the majority stockholders of the Bank of Montgomery tendered him the cashiership thereof, the president having died, and Mr. Hannon, the cashier being promoted to the presidency. But the time seemed too threatening to authorize any change, and the matter was dropped, the bank itself being subsequently wiped out by the war. Secession became successful, the provisional government was constituted in Montgomery, and Hon. Jefferson Davis was elected president. When his cabinet was determined upon, a friend of Major Whitner, in a personal interview, presented to him from the secretary of the treasury the question of acceptance of the position of Confederate states treasurer. Doubtless those bank men in Charleston with and for whom Mr. Whitner had worked for years, had something to do with the offer. He hesitated as to his qualification for the position, and though urged by prominent friends to accept, finally declined. Major Whitner was appointed to a position upon the staff of Gen. Howell Cobb, and was with him in Virginia and North Carolina. His own health gave way, and thus continued for many years after the war. He was placed upon special duty, and in the fall of 1863 having had committed to him certain secret archives of the Confederate government, was stationed in Atlanta, subject to staff duties to any commanding general requiring his services. Judge John P. King, president of the Georgia R. R. and Banking company, urged him to take position in service of the bank department in Atlanta, as assistant to Judge W. W. Clayton, the agent. Under the circumstances, this could not at first be considered, but as the bank was overwhelmed as depository of Confederate government funds, Judge King had matters arranged for Major Whitner to give a portion of each day to the bank whilst in Atlanta. This position he satisfactorily filled until about June 1, 1864. Several patriotic gentlemen were advised by Major Whitner, who in turn was so advised by a superior officer, to buy one of the four daily papers published in Atlanta, and change it into a Davis administration paper. The other dailies were criticising President Davis because Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was retained in command of the army. Gen. Johnston complained about this to an officer, because as he said it was calculated to hurt the spirit of his troops. The paper purchased was the "Daily Register," which had refuged from Knoxville. Major Whitner became a stockholder with others, the firm name adopted being Whitner, Brown & Co. To his surprise, he was made editor-in-chief, and entered immediately upon the duties of the position, having to devote to his editorial duties the night and the few hours of the day that could be used. He was wise enough to impress into his service as patriotic assistants to meet special needs, such writers as Gen. William M. Brown, who was editor of the "Constitution," a paper published in Washington during Buchanan's administration, Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar, Gen. Howell Cobb, Charles H. Smith (Bill Arp) and other able writers. The paper in its first issue under the new firm turned completely round, and was welcomed as one of the warmest defenders of Mr. Davis and of Gen. Johnston. Gen. Johnston sent expressions of his high appreciation of the good service rendered, and President Davis wrote a prominent gentleman his appreciation also. After a while, the paper was compelled to leave Atlanta and was afterward published in Augusta, Ga. Major Whitner was put under orders, and was telegraphed to leave, which was done upon the last train that went out on the West Point road before Atlanta was evacuated. The Confederate archives were under his care, his orders coming direct from Richmond. Upon entering Alabama, another order came to move away, and not having any positive information as to danger, he found himself nearly within the folds of a large force of Federal cavalry, commanded by Gen. Rousseau. From this time, Major Whitner's orders came more rapidly, and he was stationed at different times at Columbus and Augusta, Ga., and Columbia, S. C. The field of operation becoming so circumscribed, the Federals approaching from all sides, there was no place of safety where Major Whitner's family were willing to be left. So upon being ordered from Atlanta, his good wife accompanied him with five little ones. While privations were great at the best protected homes at that time, they were far worse to a family having to move from place to place, often in storms of rain and snow, besides being exposed to every kind of danger. At length when stationed in South Carolina, after Columbia was burned, orders came to return to Georgia, and accompanied by a guard he came on to Athens. The trust was of such value that Major Whitner wished no longer to risk its safety as had been done before. It occurred to him that the boxes and their contents should be placed in greater security. He had been often within sight of the enemy, frequently almost captured by them, so that for their safety till the war was decided one way or another, upon his own responsibility, he offered Rev. Dr. A. A. Lipscomb, chancellor of the university of Georgia, to commit to that institution these archives—as a present if the south failed—yet upon the condition, that the matter of storage should be kept a profound secret, and that the records should be surrendered to authorities over himself whenever demanded. The terms were accepted, and by Dr. Lipscomb's appointment they were carried about 11 o'clock one Sunday night to the campus, where the venerable chancellor and Professor Williams Rutherford were met, and the boxes carried into the library building, and deposited. Here they remained for several months. The surrender of armies soon came, first of Gen. Lee's, then of Gen. Johnston's, followed rapidly by the surrender of subordinate officers under these two generals. At the time, Major Whitner was under command of Gen. Howell Cobb. When the war closed Major Whitner was left practically penniless. His faith in the success of the south was strong and his calculations were based thereupon. Considering his obligations sacred for goods purchased in New York in the fall of 1860, he did all in his power to pay the same. He continued sending money to New York up to the last possible opportunity. He borrowed money upon honor for this purpose. At the end of the war these latter obligations were presented and fully met, sweeping away all property he had. There was some $25,000 due upon his store books, and these books were also turned over for the benefit of creditors. It was, therefore, no mere joke, which Major Whitner wrote to his old friend J. B. Bennett, manager of the Aetna Insurance company, Cincinnati: "My inventory of earthly possessions is briefly this: One wife, five children, six chairs, two beds, one table, a few religious books and one cow." Under these circumstances, Major Whitner had to start life as it were entirely anew. He had risked all for the southern cause and lost all so far as worldly possessions and business were concerned. The change was a complete revolution, affecting every concern of life. One at this distance of time cannot even imagine a change so radical. Yet he determined to start again life's struggle, even though more burdened and less equipped than when ten years before he first left parental counsel and help, for his first struggle. Without going into details, a tender little incident may be related. With no money, in a country where there was nothing to buy, even if there had been money, at one meal every vestige of food was eaten by the hungry ones around him. A little daughter sitting nearest and not appreciating the circumstances, looked into his face and said most plaintively, "Please, just another little piece of bread, I am so hungry." The father rose scarce able to keep back the tears which sprang to his eyes as he walked away, and then as by inspiration, the thought filled his soul, "why not try a letter to the 'New York Herald!'" It was carefully written, and there being no mail facilities the express agent kindly deadheaded it to that paper. In return came a few words written by the elder Bennett himself, accepting the article, asking for another, and enclosing a crisp greenback. Though Major Whitner's success in this line was good, and flattering offers were made for the future, still he was bent, if possible, upon starting some permanent business. With this object he came to Atlanta in May, 1865, and soon entered upon a successful career. Major Whitner's insurance life began not long after he commenced business at West Point, Ga., somewhere about 1858. Mr. C. C. Hine, the distinguished insurance journalist of New York, then special agent of the Aetna Insurance company, in its western department, visited West Point and gave him that company. The business, though small in comparison to his other large affairs, was still very attractive, and he studied for the depths of its mysteries in every branch. Mr. Bennett being pleased with him, repeatedly wrote him on different subjects, and requested him to investigate and make a report upon cotton storage and cotton fires, which was satisfactorily done. Even while stationed in Atlanta during the war, though expecting everything to be but temporary, companies found him out and forced themselves upon him. Of course many a wink was given during the hours detailed to the bank, and some policies then written having been practically renewed from year to year by him or his sons up to the present day. Upon coming to Atlanta after the war, several offers of business were made Major Whitner, and he accepted that of wholesale and retail drugs, which, however, after a trial was abandoned and insurance adopted as his sole occupation. It was not long before his agency led in insurance business in Atlanta, and after a little while he was appointed general agent of the Home Insurance company of New York. He afterward had the management of the southern department of the British America Insurance company, and then the Merchants' Insurance company of Newark, which he held for over twelve years. Other companies, as the Amazon of Cincinnati, and Hibernia of New Orleans were in his charge as long as they did general agency business. In 1889 he was appointed general agent of Girard Fire Insurance company of Philadelphia, which is still under his management. He also has the general agency of Palatine Insurance company, of England, and of the Sun Mutual Insurance company of New Orleans. Thus Major Whitner it is seen is one of the oldest as he is one of the ablest of southern underwriters. As another has said age has touched him lightly and even not perceptibly, for erect and vigorous his commanding figure is conspicuous at every gathering of importance in his section, and his clear ringing voice, ready command of language and wonderful power to simplify and make lucid all points for which he contends, carry an influence few possess, and make him one of the strongest of debaters. Major Whitner became a member of the Presbyterian church in Athens, Ga., in January, 1853, during his senior year at college. His membership was afterward transferred to Quincy, Fla.; and still later in 1856 to West Point, Ga., where he was made a ruling elder. Moving subsequently to Atlanta, Ga., he was made, in 1865, an elder in the Central Presbyterian church of that city, a position which he afterward resigned. He was for years a successful superintendent of the Sunday school of that church. Some years afterward by invitation and without moving his membership, he accepted the superintendency of the Sunday school of Third Presbyterian (Moore Memorial) church, at a time when that church was in a greatly disturbed condition, amounting almost to a crisis in its existence, with its school entirely broken up. He first started up the Sunday school, then got the church to working harmoniously, and soon everything moved successfully along and a pastor was chosen. This position he also resigned because of failing health. Major Whitner is an unusually well posted Christian gentleman; takes a deep interest in all the work of the church; is a liberal contributor to all its enterprises; an active laborer in such work as he has the opportunity of engaging in; and is loved and trusted and honored by those who know him best. His home is one of the happiest upon earth. His wife who has been a loving companion, a helpmeet indeed, in every joy and sorrow and duty of life since their young days, is just the woman to make home peaceful and happy. As age moves along, truth and peace and piety blend their hearts more perfectly, and surrounded by loving children, they are truly growing old handsomely together. They have been blessed with seven children, never losing one, and each voluntarily applying for church membership before passing twelve years of age. With children, children-in-law, and grandchildren, their house for years has been the home of a family of twenty-seven, with two little grandchildren sleeping at Westview cemetery. Major Whitner's maxim has been, as to home, to make it first a Christian home, and then with that to render it the happiest spot upon earth to every child, by affording enjoyment of every innocent pleasure within reach.

GRANT WILKINS. No citizen of Atlanta has displayed a greater spirit of enterprise or been more actively identified with the development of that city than Mr. Grant Wilkins. As the civil engineer in charge of the work of beautifying the grounds of the Cotton States and International exposition he has achieved perhaps the greatest success of his life and planted his reputation upon a secure and permanent foundation. The subject of this sketch was born in Liberty county, Ga., Feb. 20, 1843. This county, since the beginning of the revolutionary war, has been prolific of brainy and useful men, and is still the home of many of the oldest and best families of Georgia. The genealogy of the Wilkins family runs back to Archibald Wilkins, a native of England. His son, John Wilkins, came to this country in early manhood with the British troops and distinguished himself as a gallant officer in that great struggle which resulted so disastrously to England. His son, Hamilton Wilkins, located in Georgia at the beginning of the present century, and in the little town of Sunbury, on June 5, 1818, Joseph Campbell Wilkins, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born. During early life he followed the legal profession, but subsequently devoted himself to farming, and became quite a successful planter. His wife, Mary Elizabeth Grant, was the daughter of the late Daniel Grant, of North Carolina, in whose house, after his removal to this state, the first Methodist conference in Georgia was held. The subject of this sketch resided in Liberty county until 1860, receiving his primary education from the schools of that vicinity. After this he resided for short intervals in Clarke, Meriwether and Walker counties. In April, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the famous Troup artillery, organized at Athens, Ga., and served as such until after the battle of Sharpsburg. He then entered the signal service under Gen. McLaws and served in that division until after the battle of Lookout Mountain. Going thence to Richmond, Va., he was detailed in the war department and assigned to duty in the signal service. From Richmond he went to North Carolina, where he organized a signal corps for Gen. R. F. Hoke, and served under that officer until after the battle of Drewry's Bluff. He was then sent as a signal officer aboard the "Old Dominion" and later to the "Evelyn," the vessel which carried the last cargo of government cotton out of Wilmington, N. C., to Nassau. Still in the signal service, he next went to Galveston, Tex., and thence to Cuba, on board the "Evelyn," reaching Cuba just after the assassination of President Lincoln. From Cuba Mr. Wilkins next went to Halifax, Nova Scotia, entering the civil engineering corps of the government and remaining there until October, 1867. The subject of this sketch then came to Atlanta. His first acquaintance with the city was in 1860, but his stay at that time was quite brief. He went to work on the Georgia railroad and remained in the employ of that company until the latter part of 1868. He then went into business for himself as a civil engineer, making a specialty of constructing bridges. In this capacity he is still engaged. Mr. Wilkins in 1878 took charge, as general manager, of the old Atlanta rolling mill, and continued with the mill until its destruction by fire in 1881. He then organized the firm of Wilkins, Post & Co. and built the extensive shops of that enterprising establishment, afterward owned by the Atlanta Bridge & Axle company, for which company he served as engineer until October, 1889. Since that time he has been engaged in the business of engineering on his own responsibility. Mr. Wilkins is a member of the board of directors of the Cotton States and International exposition, and as chief of construction has drawn all the plans for the laying off of the grounds. Mr. Wilkins was the engineer of the Forsyth street bridge, and that structure is a monument to his skill and professional responsibility. Mr. Wilkins was married on Jan. 18, 1871, to Miss Julia S. Abercrombie, daughter of Dr. Charles T. Abercrombie, of Russell county, Ala. They have three children: Julia, John G. and Charles A., and the family is a bright and interesting one. Mr. Wilkins belongs to the masonic fraternity and is a consistent and useful member of the Episcopal church. He has never taken an active part in public affairs, but has never hesitated to serve the public in the capacity of a law-abiding and conscientious private citizen.

JAMES ETHELDRED WILLIAMS, retired merchant and ex-mayor of Atlanta, was born in East Tennessee, of North Carolina parentage, Jan. 16, 1826. His great-grandfather, James Williams, was married in Edgecombe county, N. C., about 1760. His grandfather, Matthew Williams, married Elizabeth, daughter of Elias and Sarah (Sugg) Fort, about 1788, and removed with his father-in-law's numerous family in 1791 from Edgecombe county, N. C., to Robertson county, Tenn., where the settlement was named Fort's Station. At this place, in 1793, was born William Fort Williams, the father of the subject of this sketch. At the age of nineteen, when war was declared with Great Britain, in 1812, he volunteered in the First Tennessee regiment, and served under Gen. Andrew Jackson until the close of the war. For the next three years, from 1815 to 1818, he was a farmer and trader, building flat boats near Clarksville, on the Cumberland river, loading them with country produce and floating down that and the Mississippi river to market at New Orleans. At that time this was quite a dangerous business, the country through which they were compelled to pass being infested with Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, as well as lawless whites (Spaniards and Frenchmen) whose depredations were the terror of the rivers. In bad weather and at night when the boats could not run the traders would have to spar them out in the river and keep regular watch to prevent robbery. In 1818 he married Ann K., the youngest daughter of William and Mary Copeland, and purchased the old Copeland homestead in Grainger county, East Tennessee, near Beans Station, forty miles east of Knoxville, on the great stage road from Washington city to New Orleans, where he died in 1840. Ten children were the fruit of this union: Cynthia Elizabeth, Mary Ann, Mary Catherine, James Etheldred, William Matthew, Cornelia, Catherine, Mary Lucretia, Thomas Humes, Lucy Jane and Samuel Copeland, born in the order named from 1820 to 1840. Eight grew to manhood and womanhood and all had the advantages of good schools in the vicinity of their home. James Etheldred, after attending school in Knoxville, went to Holston college at New Market, Tenn. Leaving college in 1844, at the age of eighteen, he sold goods for his cousin, William Williams, at Rocky Springs, East Tennessee (the old country home of his uncle, Etheldred Williams), about two years. In 1846-47 he was in charge of the postoffice at Knoxville, Tenn., during the absence of the postmaster, Col. Samuel W. Bell, who went to Mexico with the United States army. Although only twenty years old when he assumed this very responsible position—Knoxville being at that time one of the most important offices in the south—his discharge of its duties was in every way satisfactory to the public and the postoffice department. After the close of the Mexican war he engaged in business with his cousins, James and William Williams, wholesale grocers and steamboat owners, he being most of the time on the Tennessee river, running from Knoxville to Decatur, Ala., until October, 1851, when the fame of Atlanta's business advantages caused him to leave Tennessee and cast his fortunes with the young Gate city. From 1851 to 1862 he was at the head of perhaps the largest house in the city, handling Tennessee and western produce on commission, numbering among its consignees farmers and merchants of Tennessee and Kentucky mainly, whose confidence in fair and just treatment built up a great business. With characteristic enterprise he during this period built the Athenaeum, which from a theatrical point of view sustained the same relation to the Atlanta of that day that The Grand does to the Atlanta of to-day. This was only given up when in the progress of the war between the states the section of country whence the supplies came was evacuated by the southern army and passed within the Union lines. At this time, in 1862, after the retreat of the Confederate troops from Tennessee, when the general hospitals were moved to Atlanta, two associations were formed, known respectively as the Georgia and Tennessee Relief associations, which had charge of the receipt and distribution to the local and field hospitals of the large quantities of hospital supplies collected from all over the south. To these associations he gave not only his entire time and services, but the free use of his large warehouse on Decatur and Line (now Edgewood avenue) streets, between Peachtree and Pryor streets, and from that time until the surrender in 1865 his service was continuous. During the siege of Atlanta, although incapacitated for field and active duty, he rendered regular military service with the Atlanta fire department, which was mustered into the Confederate service in 1863, and which did post duty all the terrible weeks from July 20 to Sept. 1, 1864, while that city was being shelled by Sherman, and when his beloved home fell by the fortunes of war he left it with the rear guard of the Confederate army on the night of Sept. 1, 1864, and continued with the army until the final surrender in April, 1865. Always taking a strong personal interest in the welfare of Atlanta, he was enabled at various periods by his active efforts to assist in the accomplishment of some of its greatest benefits. He served as a member of the city council as early as 1858 and again in 1862 and 1863. Having returned to the city immediately after the close of the war, he at once set about rebuilding the waste places, and by the support of many of the old citizens, who had also returned after being scattered by the evacuation, he was elected and installed mayor of the city. He was again elected in 1866, and his administration extended over three years, since no election was held in 1867, the military authorities at that time deeming the excitement of an election undesirable. The events of 1866-67 and 1868, the years embraced by his terms of office, were momentous for the fate of the Phoenix city. Reduced to ashes at the close of the war, over-run by the floating scum from two armies, and thronged by thousands of black as well as white paupers who had been fed here by the United States government at a time when that or starvation were the only possibilities, Atlanta needed men of strength and wisdom to guide the cause of affairs. In this task he was most fortunate in having as his co-workers and supporters in the city government such able and efficient men as Richard Peters, Thomas Castleberry, Weldon Mitchell, Edward E. Rawson, George Terry, William Anderson, William B. Cox, Julius A. Hayden, Edward W. Holland and others, who were members of the council, as well as a most reliable and faithful police force headed by Col. Lovick P. Thomas, deceased, as city marshal, to whom much credit is due that never, during all these troublous times, was it necessary to ask the aid of the military authorities to quell disorder or preserve the peace. This was a very critical period in the history of the city and state, and fortunately for the city Mayor Williams proved equal to the extreme delicacy and the emergencies of the situation. He was thrown much into consultation with Gen. Meade and takes much pleasure in speaking of the pleasantness of his personal and official intercourse with that distinguished military chieftain whom, he says, he found to be fair-minded and free from prejudice, and at all times and under all circumstances a courteous gentleman, and anxious and ready in his official position to do everything in his power or that was necessary to be done to preserve good order and promote peace and the welfare of law-abiding citizens. During his administration of the affairs of Atlanta, and largely through his instrumentality the original removal of the state capital from Milledgeville to this city was effected. When the constitutional convention of 1867 was in session a resolution was offered proposing to embrace in it the removal of the capital. He immediately called the city council together, which authorized a proposition to be made which was accepted by the convention securing the removal; and when the legislature met which was elected under the new constitution, after further negotiations the agreement was complied with. During the year 1868, his last year in office, the building of two most important lines of railroad—perhaps the greatest factors in the city's growth—namely, the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line and the Georgia Western (Atlanta to Birmingham, Ala.) were secured by subscriptions of $300,000 to each by the city, which were enthusiastically advocated by him and the immense benefits of which he has had the good fortune to live and see. From 1869 to 1880 Mr. Williams engaged in such general trading in grain, provisions, etc., as would employ his time and capital with fair promise of profitable returns. Since 1880 he has not been actively engaged in business, devoting his years to his family and home, residing at this time at the Terraces, the large and lovely residence which he built in 1866, then at the terminus of Forest avenue, now at the corner of this avenue and Fort street, the latter street, by the way, having been named in his honor by the city authorities, the name Fort being used because there was already a street bearing the name of Williams. Mr. Williams was married in 1852 to Miss Sarah Elizabeth Lovejoy, of Chattooga county, Ga., who is still living. Miss Lovejoy was of the same North Carolina stock as the Williams and Fort families, her ancestors, the Hintons and Bradfords, having come to Georgia from Carolina about the same time as his went to Tennessee. To them eight children were born, all of whom are living: William Fort, Etheldred, Thomas Humes, Jr., James Edward, Martha Lovejoy, Sarah Elizabeth, Cornelia Catherine and Samuel Copeland, Jr. Mr. Williams is a master Mason, past master of Fulton lodge, now a member of Georgia lodge, and affiliates with the Protestant Episcopal church, of which all his children are members. He is also a member of the Fulton County Confederate Veterans' association, and is now serving his third term as the honored president of the Pioneer Citizens' society of Atlanta. Mr. Williams is a man of progressive ideas, public spirited and large-hearted, and in the highest degree sympathetic. During the most trying portion of his mayoralty the city was sorely scourged with smallpox, when he was unremitting in his efforts to check its progress and alleviate the distresses of those afflicted. No citizen of Atlanta is held in higher esteem for public service faithfully and self-sacrificingly rendered and for unblemished business and private character.

GEORGE WINSHIP, manufacturer, was born in Clinton, Jones Co., Ga., Dec. 20, 1835. In this town he was prepared by literary training for his future career, and resided there until seventeen years of age, when he came to Atlanta with his father, Joseph Winship, who established a car manufactory, George aiding him in the enterprise. In 1854 he started a machine shop in connection with his former undertaking, and about 1856 he discovered that the latter was yielding more and better profits than the former, and consequently abandoned the car industry and devoted his whole attention to the machine shop. Here he has since labored and developed the small, obscure business into one of the greatest iron manufactories in the south. In the spring of 1862 he relinquished his pecuniary pursuit and enlisted in Cobb's legion of cavalry as a private, and served in this rank until the irritation of his wounds forced him to leave the army during the winter of 1864. He was engaged in many battles and skirmishes, and was several times the victim of Federal bullets, once near Harper's Ferry in 1862, and once in the neighborhood of Brandy station in August, 1863. In 1866 he returned to Atlanta, resumed his business, rebuilt the shops that Sherman's fire had destroyed and laid the foundation of his present fortune. Mr. Winship was married first in 1860 to Eugenia Speer of Fort Valley, Ga. She died in 1869, leaving two children: Mrs. Robert Taylor of Baltimore, Md.; and Mrs. J. H. Nunnally of Atlanta. Mr. Winship was married again in 1879 to Lula, daughter of Thomas J. Lane of Macon, Ga. They have two sons: George and Joseph. Mr. Winship is a thorough business man and in the commercial firmament is among the brightest lights. He is a director in the Atlanta Home Insurance company, the Trust company of Atlanta, the Merchants' bank, the Fidelity Banking and Trust company, the Atlanta Banking company, and has served for six years on the board of water commissioners. He affiliates with the First Methodist church, and has been elected steward and trustee in that religious organization. Mr. Winship's father was a native of Massachusetts and came to Georgia in 1820. Mr. Winship is a model citizen—quiet, reserved and dignified, his influence is widely disseminated.

DR. BERNARD WOLFF, one of the leading specialists of Atlanta, was born at River Bound, Prince Edward Co., Va., March 27, 1868. When he was but two years old his parents took him to Richmond and there he lived until he was thirteen, going to school at times, but soon the family again removed to Farnville, also in Virginia. At this place he attended school two years, and in 1882 went to Hampden—Sidney college—where he took an irregular course, completing it in 1886. In the autumn of that year he went to Charlottesville, Ga., where he matriculated in the medical department of the Virginia university and graduated in medicine there in 1888. Next fall he was appointed assistant demonstrator of anatomy in that institution and served in that capacity until April, 1889, when he went to New York and spent a year in the College of Physicians and Surgeons. Then he served in Roosevelt and Chambers street hospitals and was for a time assistant resident physician in Williard-Parker hospital, the latter being devoted to contagious diseases. Next he served a year at the Vanderbilt clinic and afterward became a private pupil of Dr. Geo. T. Elliott, the well-known dermatologist. In May, 1892, Dr. Wolff went to Europe, traveling through Germany and England and for some months was assistant to Dr. P. G. Unna, the leading dermatologist of the world. He stayed with Dr. Unna until March of that year, and then journeyed to Paris, where he "walked" the hospitals of St. Louis with Besnier, Hallopeau, Fournier and Vidal. He left European shores in June, 1893, and reaching America again, located in Atlanta, where he now practices as a specialist on skin diseases. He is also lecturer on this subject at the Southern Medical college. He is a member of the State Medical society, the Atlanta Society of Medicine, the New York County Medical association of New York, the Harlem Medical association of Harlem, N. Y., and he is also a fellow of the medical society of Virginia, and of the American Medical association. He is, in addition, a member of the National Scotch-Irish society, the Society of the Sons of the Revolution, of the Capital City club of Atlanta, and of the Presbyterian church. Dr. Wolff's father was Bernard B. Wolff, a native of Virginia, who was a planter, and died soon after the war. He was on Gen. Pendleton's staff in the Confederate service and held the rank of major. Dr. Wolff's grandfather was Christian D. Wolff, a native of Virginia, and his maternal great-great-grandfather was Gen. William Campbell, who was a native of Augusta county, Virginia, and was the brigadier-general in the revolution who was in command at King's mountain. Dr. Wolff's father's ancestors came originally from Germany, the emigrant being John George Wolff, who came from the Palatinate to America in 1730. His mother's emigrant ancestor was Ephraim McDowell, who came to America from Londonderry, Ireland, in 1727. Dr. Wolff is the editor and proprietor of the "Southern Medical Record." He was married Oct. 18, 1894, to Marian Hillyer, daughter of Judge George Hillyer of Atlanta.

STEWART F. WOODSON. One of the most successful young business men of Georgia, whose talents have been employed in the promotion of Atlanta's mercantile interests, is Mr. Stewart F. Woodson. Pluck, energy and perseverance have been the distinguishing characteristics of this enterprising young business man, and from a beardless youth, beginning the struggle of life when only twelve years, he has risen, by virtue of these qualities, to his present high and influential position. As the president of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce Mr. Woodson has made an able and faithful officer and has presided over the deliberations of the body with grace, firmness and impartiality. Mr. Woodson's father, William D. Woodson, was a native of Virginia. He came to Georgia at a very early age and located at Macon. Here he remained for about ten years, engaged in mercantile pursuits, after which he removed to Thomaston, Ga., and established himself in business at that place. The war, however, prevented the realization of his business plans, and as soon as hostilities commenced he entered the Confederate army. He held the rank of captain and remained in the active service until he was killed at Jonesboro, Ga., in 1864. His surviving widow, whose maiden name was Martha Floyd, the daughter of Stewart Floyd, of Morgan county, was left with five children, three of whom are still living: Stewart F., the subject of this sketch; William D., and J. P. Woodson, all of Atlanta, Ga. Stewart Floyd Woodson was born in Madison, Morgan Co., Ga., on Aug. 17, 1859. Here he received his primary instruction and remained in the prosecution of his studies until he reached his twelfth year. He was a strong, vigorous boy, and being ambitious to contribute to the support of his widowed mother and the little family of children dependent upon her, he decided to make a start at that tender age in the business world. Coming to Atlanta with his mother, he entered the establishment of Langston & Crane, wholesale grocers and cotton factors, and clerked for that firm until 1881. He was faithful and prompt in discharging his duties as a clerk, and his businesslike deportment soon attracted the attention of his employers. He acquired a thorough knowledge of the business, and by making a careful study of each day's work he mastered the details of the establishment to such an extent as to make his services indispensable to the firm. In 1881 he acquired a partnership interest in the business, and on the death of Maj. B. E. Crane, in 1885, the style of the firm was changed to that of Langston & Woodson. Mr. Woodson is the president of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce, to which position he was recently elected by the merchants of Atlanta composing that body. It is a position of honor and responsibility and requires from its occupant not only a varied amount of business experience, but the display of other needed qualifications, such as tact, patience, devotion to the public welfare and a tireless zeal in the performance of public duty. Mr. Woodson is also the president of the Wholesale Merchants' association, and is director in quite a number of local organizations. In 1891 Mr. Woodson was elected to a seat in the city council, but on account of the pressure of business engagements he was forced to decline the honor thus conferred upon him. It has always been the rule of Mr. Woodson's life never to assume a greater burden than he could well carry, and hence it may be said of him as a business man that his promise to do a particular thing is always the pledge of its performance. He has also, in his business methods, demonstrated the truth of the old adage that whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well. By virtue of his position as the president of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce it is necessary for him to keep thoroughly posted on all the developments of the business and financial world. It is needless to say that he is rarely found napping and that his business colleagues have unbounded confidence both in the reliability of his judgment and the correctness of his information. His views on the currency are sound and well matured. He takes very little interest in politics, from an active standpoint, but conscientiously performs his duty as a good citizen, and believes that upright and useful men only should occupy positions of trust and responsibility. Socially, Mr. Woodson is a man of engaging manners and is broadly sympathetic in his nature. He is full of the soulful good-humor that makes him a genial companion and the best of friends. His fondness for the latter is one of the distinguishing marks of his character, and no one can outdo him in his willingness to serve his friends or in the test to which his friendship may be put in their behalf. If the prospects of his career are fully realized, Mr. Woodson, without flattering his business record, is destined to become one of the strongest commercial pillars in Atlanta.

WILLIAM AMBROSE WRIGHT, comptroller-general of Georgia, was born in Louisville, Jefferson Co., Ga., once the capital of the state, Jan. 19, 1844. He was brought up and educated there, going to the noted school taught by the equally noted teacher, Prof. W. S. Lourey, who also educated Mr. Wright's father. In May, 1861, he left this school and enlisted in the Third Georgia regiment, organized and commanded by his father, Ambrose R. Wright. He was mustered in as a private and was sent to Norfolk, Va., where he remained a year and then went to Richmond. In August, 1862, when on a march from Richmond to Manassas, Mr. Wright was promoted to be first lieutenant of artillery and ordnance officer of Wright's brigade, his father having been made brigadier. Lieut. Wright served as such officer until about Nov. 1, 1864, when he was assigned to post ordnance duty at Augusta, Ga., remaining there until the surrender. He was in the seven days' fight around Richmond and Second Manassas, where he lost his right leg Aug. 30, 1862. He remained in a farm-house near by three weeks and then went home, staying there from Oct. 1, 1862, till April 1, 1863, when he rejoined his command at Fredericksburg, maimed as he was, and continued in active duty until June, 1863, taking part in the battle of Chancellorsville in May of that year. In June of this year, just after he had, in company with his father, Gen. Wright and staff, crossed the Potomac at Sharpsburg, he was captured by a band of New York scouts and carried to Gen. Tyler's headquarters just across the river from Harper's Ferry. He was first sent to Fort McHenry for two weeks, then to Fort Delaware on the coast, just below Philadelphia, and was kept there three weeks, was sent to Johnson's island, where he remained about ten months, and was then transferred in charge of a troop of sick and permanently disabled Confederate soldiers, some four to five hundred in number. On this journey Lieut. Wright was the only one of the party who could walk. A month later he was regularly exchanged and rejoined his command at Petersburg, where he was in several fights, the most notable one being the Crater. Subsequently he came home and was detailed on service—as before mentioned—at Augusta, having charge of ordnance supplies, equipments, etc., until the close of the war. After the surrender Mr. Wright engaged in cotton planting in Jefferson, his native county, in which business he continued three years. His health failing in 1868, he bought a farm in Columbia county, Ga., and grew cotton there until 1877, when he came to Atlanta and entered the office of the comptroller-general then holding office, Gen. W. L. Goldsmith, holding the position until September, 1879. Impeachment proceedings being then instituted against Gen. Goldsmith, Mr. Wright was appointed by Gov. Colquitt to fill the vacancy. In October, 1880, he was elected to the office of comptroller-general, and has been re-chosen every succeeding election without opposition in his own party. He is a director in the Southern Mutual Building & Loan association of Atlanta. He was the first president of the Fulton County Confederate Veterans' association, serving one term and declining re-election. He is now one of the aides on the staff of commander-in-chief of the Confederate veterans, Gen. John B. Gordon, United States senator from Georgia. He is a member of the Atlanta post, Confederate veterans. Mr. Wright was first married October, 1871, to Nellie, daughter of J. B. Carter, Augusta, Ga. They had three sons and two daughters. He was married again in November, 1880, to Mrs. Mary Sledge (nee Cox) daughter of Judge A. E. Cox, La Grange, Ga. Mr. Wright's father was Ambrose Ransom Wright, born in Louisville, Ga., in 1826, and married there to Mary Hubbell Savage when he was about seventeen. Ambrose Ransom Wright was a lawyer and practiced in the Louisville circuit until 1860, when he moved to Augusta, Ga., and there organized the Third Georgia infantry. He was made its colonel and in June, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general, commanding a brigade until November, 1864, when he was still farther advanced to the rank of major-general and assigned to duty on the coast of Georgia and the Carolinas, where he was at the time of the surrender. Gen. Wright was wounded at Sharpsburg, Va., in September, 1862. After the war he returned to his legal practice in Augusta, Ga., and soon afterward, purchasing an interest in the "Augusta Chronicle," was editor-in-chief of that journal at the time of his death in December, 1872, which took place just after he had been elected to congress. Mr. Wright's grandfather was also named Ambrose Ransom Wright. He was born in Virginia and came with his parents to Georgia when a child. His great-grandfather was Ambrose Wright, a Virginian and a major in the war of 1812.

JAMES ROBINSON WYLIE, vice-president of the Merchants' bank, Atlanta, Ga., son of David G. and Martha (Robinson) Wylie, was born in Chester district, S. C., in 1831. His grandparents were natives of County Antrim, in the north of Ireland, and came to this country, where their children were born and raised, early in this century. Mr. Wylie's father was a farmer, and when he was in his infancy moved to Fairfield district, S. C., where he lived until Mr. Wylie was thirteen years old, when he came to Georgia and settled on land then in Cass, but now included in Gordon county. Here Mr. Wylie was principally educated and grew to manhood. In 1851 he went to Calhoun, the county seat, and engaged as a clerk until 1859, when he accepted a position as a traveling salesman for a wholesale grocery house in Nashville, Tenn. A part of the time when in Calhoun he was interested with his brother-in-law in a small general store. After traveling a year for the Nashville house he returned to Calhoun and re-engaged as a clerk in a store until 1862, when he was appointed agent at Calhoun for the Western & Atlantic (state) railway. He retained this position until the road was destroyed by the Federal army in 1864. After the war he assisted in rebuilding the road between Atlanta and the Chattahoochee river. In the spring of 1865, in company with Dennis Johnson and W. T. Busbee, he established in Atlanta the wholesale grocery house of Wylie, Johnson & Co. A few months later he bought Mr. Busbee's interest and W. H. Dabney was admitted into the firm. A year later he bought the interest of Messrs. Johnson and Dabney and conducted the business on his own account until 1875, when W. T. Wall and T. J. Dabney became associated with him and continued two years. Two years following James Bridge, Jr., had a partnership interest in the business, after which Mr. Wylie conducted it alone and on his own account until 1889. That year he closed his mercantile life to accept the presidency of the newly-organized Traders' bank, which, after a few years' incumbency, he resigned, and became the vice-president of the Merchants' bank. Mr. Wylie was one of the original directors of this bank (first organized as the State National), and had previously, for years, been its vice-president. He was a director in the original Atlanta Street Railway company, since expanded into such magnificent proportions; was a member of the executive committee of the International Cotton exposition in 1881, which did so much for Atlanta; was a promoter and director of the Atlanta & Florida railway, a member of the executive committee of the Piedmont exposition of 1887, manager of that of 1889, is a member of the executive committee of the Cotton States and International exposition for 1895, and chairman of the committee on grounds and buildings, and of that on department of agriculture, and is chairman of the board of jury commissioners of Fulton county, a position he has had for years, and is the only public office he would have. It is simple justice to remark here that Mr. Wylie could probably have any elective office in the gift of Atlanta, or of Fulton county, if he would accept it. No citizen of the county more intimately possesses the entire confidence of his fellow citizens than Mr. Wylie. Every obligation, social, moral, political and financial, has been promptly and faithfully met. As a merchant, starting without means, he built a business as large as he desired it to be—he was not ambitious of doing, and never strove to do the largest—acquired a competency, and made an enviable reputation and record for uprightness and integrity of character, and the highest sense of mercantile honor. As a citizen any young man will do well to adopt him as a model and example. Mr. Wylie has taken great interest in the breeding of Jersey cattle, and in connection with J. H. Porter has a stock farm near Atlanta devoted to the business. For many years he has been vice-president of the Georgia Jersey Breeders' association. It is his pride and ambition—not his boast—to be among the public-spirited and progressive element, and regardless of fame or emolument, to do all in his power to advance the interests of Atlanta and promote the public welfare. Mr. Wylie was married in 1853 to Miss Louisa O'Callaghan, of Calhoun county, Ga., who died in 1871, leaving six children. He was married a second time to Miss Sarah O'Callaghan, sister of his first wife, who has borne him one child.

GILMER COUNTY.

REV. JOHN C. ATKINSON, of Ellijay, Gilmer Co., was born on July 22, 1866, in Heard county, this state. He was educated in the common schools of that county, and in 1885 he entered Bowdon college, where during two years he pursued a classical course of study. He next taught school in Heard county for a period of five years. Later he engaged in church work and was licensed to preach Sept. 22, 1892, at the Roopville quarterly conference of the Methodist Episcopal church south, since which time he has actively engaged in the duties of a Methodist preacher. He was first assigned to the Morganton church in Fannin county, where he remained two years, and where his efforts were successful and were appreciated by the church committee. During the second year of his stay in Morganton he was chiefly interested in building the Blue Ridge high school, an institution having before it a promising future, and which is already largely attended. In December, 1893, Mr. Atkinson was assigned to the church at Ellijay, where his efforts in the cause of religion have met with apt encouragement and success in a marked degree, and where he is admired as a churchman and esteemed as a citizen. On Dec. 25, 1888, Mr. Atkinson was married to Miss Ida L. Williams, of Heard county, Ga. Two children, both girls, have been born of this marriage: Ida Lois, born June 26, 1890, and John, born March 29, 1892. The father of Mr. Atkinson is Joseph P. Atkinson, a native of Sussex county, Va., where he was born Nov. 29, 1832. He moved to Georgia in 1858. He served in the late war and was orderly sergeant of Company K, Thirty-fourth Georgia. For twelve years he was postmaster at Rockdale, Heard county, and is widely known and highly esteemed throughout that county. The mother of Mr. Atkinson was born in Heard county in 1840. She was the daughter of Madison Benifield of that county, and is still living. Mr. Atkinson has five brothers and five sisters living: Robert E., Emily E., Joseph B., Mary A., Martha A., Neadam E., Viola C., William T., Tabitha P., and Henry P., all residing in this state, except Mary A., the wife of Joseph E. Gay, of Texas, where she resides. Mr. Atkinson is a gentleman of affable manners and engaging presence, for whom there is doubtless a brilliant future yet in store.

ELNATHAN WALKER COLEMAN was born Aug. 2, 1861, at Ellijay, in Gilmer county. At an early age he moved with his parents to Talking Rock, in Pickens county, where he lived on a farm until his twenty-second year. He received his early education in the common schools of Pickens county, and at the Ludville academy. In 1881 he entered the North Georgia Agricultural college at Dahlonega, where he graduated in 1884. During seven months previous to 1884 he was appointed to fill the chair of mathematics in that institution, and discharged the duties of that position with credit and ability. He took a prominent part while at college in literary work and was an active member of literary and other class societies. He was, and still remains, a member of the S. A. E. college fraternity, and throughout his college course was frequently the recipient of class honors, standing high in the confidence of the faculty. While attending college he supported himself by teaching in vacations. After completing his college course, Mr. Coleman became principal of Pine Log high school in Bartow county. He next went to Atlanta to prepare himself for the legal profession and entered the office of Henry B. Tompkins. In November, 1885, he was admitted to the bar of the superior court of Gilmer county by Hon. James R. Brown, the presiding judge. Immediately thereafter he commenced the practice of his profession at Ellijay. Mr. Coleman, in a brief period after his admission to the bar, arose to distinction as an able advocate and a judicious counselor. His defense of David Dover at the first term after being admitted to the bar, tried for the crime of arson, was pronounced at the time to be the ablest effort of the kind ever made before a Gilmer county jury, and at once placed him in the front rank of forensic advocates in the Blue Ridge circuit. In 1887 he was elected mayor of Ellijay, and has had frequent occasion to decline re-election to that office. On Dec. 18, 1888, Mr. Coleman was united in marriage to Miss Fannie King of Marietta, Ga. Mrs. Coleman died in June, 1890. In 1893 Mr. Coleman turned his attention to the mining industry. He has invented a mill for the purpose of extracting the gold from the ores. A special feature of his invention is its power to save the precious metal after it has been extracted. He has organized and is interested in several gold-mining companies and has done much to develop the mining industry in the state. Mr. Coleman has been a great advocate of higher education in his section of the state. He was one of the first board of trustees and the promoters of Young Harris institute in Towns county, Ga. He was also one of the originators in establishing Blue Ridge institute at Blue Ridge, Ga., and is vice-president of the board of trustees. He delivered the principal address at the laying of the corner-stone of that institution in 1893, and also delivered the first annual literary address in 1894. He was also vice-president of the board of trustees of the Ellijay seminary for several years. He has also been a member of the board of education, of the north-Georgia annual conference of the M. E. church south for several years. Mr. Coleman's father is Watson R. Coleman, born in Haywood county, N. C., on June 8, 1817, and who moved to Georgia in his early youth. His mother was Nancy A., daughter of Samuel T. and Sallie Wilson. She was born in Buncombe county, N. C., on May 28, 1826, and was married to the father of this sketch in La Fayette, Ala., Oct. 29, 1858. Mr. Coleman has three brothers living: Dr. W. L. Coleman, a practicing physician at Canton, Ga.; James I. Coleman, a mail agent, residing in Atlanta, and W. S. Coleman, editor and publisher of the Cedartown "Standard," at Cedartown, Ga.

COKE ASBURY ELLINGTON, the oldest pioneer citizen of Gilmer county, was born in Jackson county, Ga., Sept. 21, 1812. He was the son of Rev. William Ellington, one of the early pioneer Methodist preachers of Georgia. He came to Gilmer county Feb. 12, 1834, and on Dec. 17, 1835, he was united in marriage to Mary, daughter of Benjamin Griffith, a wealthy planter. He identified himself with the commercial interests of the then young town of Ellijay, and for some time was engaged in the mercantile business, his principal customers being Cherokee Indians. During this period he availed himself of his opportunity to study the manners and customs of the Indians and to learn their language, which he did. He was personally familiar with White Path, the famous Cherokee chief, who was one of Jackson's allies at the battle of the Horse-shoe. In the year 1838, having been appointed a captain in the local militia, and having assisted in the removal of the Indians from this region, he ran for the state senate on the whig ticket, defeating Hon. Neal Cooper, who was then senator, by only one vote. In 1839 he was re-elected to the senate, but was unseated on a contest. Retiring for a time from active politics he was for many years a justice of the peace, devoting his time to the improvement of his farm. In 1850 he was census enumerator for Gilmer, Pickens and Fannin counties. In 1852 Mr. Ellington was again called into prominence, and was elected a delegate to the constitutional convention. Upon the dissolution of the old whig party he allied himself with the republican party. He was a Union man and bitterly opposed secession. He was a refugee during the war, but at its close returned home and was a member of the famous "Johnson convention" in 1865. In the same year (1865) he was elected a member of the general assembly without opposition, and served two years, during the most stormy period of reconstruction. While a member of this legislature he gained much notoriety by his courage in daring to vote for the "fifteenth amendment." Only two members dared to vote for it, so great was the popular prejudice against the measure. The other one so voting was William Humphrey of Fannin county. For his vote on this question he received the editorial endorsement of Horace Greeley. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1868, and was a member of the judiciary committee of that body. Since that time he has been out of active politics, though taking great interest in passing events. In 1873 he was appointed by President Grant commissioner of United States internal revenue, which office he held for three years, doing very little or no business on account of his dislike of the revenue laws. In 1872 he was a lay delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, which met in Brooklyn, N. Y. In later years Mr. Ellington has lived a life of peace and quietude, residing on his estate near Ellijay, at which place he has lived continuously for more than half a century. His domestic relations have always been of the pleasantest. Thirteen children were born to him and his wife, nine of whom are now living, useful citizens of the commonwealth. Two of his sons are prominent Methodist ministers: Rev. A. F. Ellington, of Atlanta, Ga., and Rev. L. D. Ellington, of Dupont, La. Mr. Ellington is now in his eighty-fifth year and his mind is singularly clear on past events. His wife died March 27, 1894, having lived with him for fifty-nine years. He was always prominent in church affairs and is an upright Christian gentleman of the old school. His aim has always been in life to protect his escutcheon from dishonor rather than to accumulate riches.

THOMAS FRANKLIN GREER, of Ellijay, Gilmer county, was born in Watauga county, N. C., on April 27, 1841, where he lived until his eighteenth year, when he moved to Fannin county, Ga. He received a common school education, and taught school in Fannin county for two years. Later he settled in Ellijay, and at the commencement of the war he was engaged in the study of law. In May, 1861, he enlisted in the Eleventh Georgia regiment as a private, and was afterward commissioned captain of Company E, Second Maryland cavalry. He fought at the battle of Malvern Hill, where he was severely wounded, and at Winchester, where he was again wounded and made a prisoner. He remained in confinement at Camp Chase, Ohio, from June, 1864, to March 1, 1865. In the fall of 1865 he returned to Ellijay, completed his legal studies, and was admitted to the bar. He has long enjoyed an active practice in the Blue Ridge circuit and in the district and circuit courts of the United States. In 1866 he was elected to the office of county solicitor of Gilmer county for the term of four years. In 1877 he was appointed by Gov. Colquitt to the office of solicitor-general of the Blue Ridge circuit for the term of four years. He served the full term, and in 1882 he was elected to the senate of Georgia, representing the counties of Pickens, Gilmer and Fannin. In August, 1885, he was appointed judge of the county court of the county of Gilmer for the term of four years, and served through his term to the satisfaction of the public. During his professional and political career, which has been long and useful, Mr. Greer has preserved, and justly so, the unlimited confidence of his constituents and the public, and has at all times discharged his duties with signal ability and characteristic energy. In 1867 Mr. Greer was married to Miss Mary C. Whittington, of North Carolina. Four children survive as the fruit of this union: Alice L., wife of Senator T. W. Craigo; Albert L.; Jack, and Thomas B., all residing at Ellijay. The father of Mr. Greer was Benjamin Greer, a native of North Carolina, where he still lives. The mother of Mr. Greer was Eliza Ingram, a native of North Carolina, now deceased.

WILLIAM FRANKLIN HILL, of Ellijay, in Gilmer county, and a prominent citizen of that county, was born near Asheville, Buncombe Co., N. C., on July 5, 1834. At the age of ten years he moved to Gilmer county with his parents, and settled on a farm near where he now lives. There he grew up to manhood, taking advantage of such opportunities for obtaining an education as the pioneer condition of the country then afforded. At the age of seventeen he taught school, and at intervals engaged in agricultural pursuits until the commencement of the war. In May, 1862, he entered the Confederate service, enlisting as a private in the Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment infantry, commanded by Col. G. W. Foster. His regiment was attached to Jackson's brigade, in Hardee's corps. He participated in the battles of Tanner's Ferry, Kennesaw Mountain, Dallas, Jonesborough, and in the siege of Atlanta. He fought at Franklin, Tenn., and took part in the stampede at Nashville. He was surrendered by Gen. Joe Johnston near Greensborough, N. C., on April 26, 1865. On his return home, he again engaged in school teaching and farming, and in 1877, he was elected to the office of school commissioner of Gilmer county, since which time he has continued to serve the people in that office with ability and has given universal satisfaction. Mr. Hill certainly ranks high as a commissioner of schools among the best educators of the state, and his services have been invaluable to the people of his county. Mr. Hill was married on Jan. 11, 1857, to Ann Osborn, daughter of Rev. N. R. Osborn, a well-known Baptist minister of Gilmer county, and still living in his eighty-ninth year. Five children were born of this marriage: Callie, the wife of Calvin Searcy, of Ellijay—she has six living children; John R., who married Miss Maggie Searcy, of Ellijay—they have three children; Joseph Lee, a resident of Arkansas and unmarried; Edward, a Baptist minister, who married Miss Sally Harper, of Gilmer county, and Mollie, who resides with her parents and is unmarried. The father of Mr. Hill was William Hill, of Rutherford county, N. C., where he was born in 1799. He died in Gilmer county in 1883. The mother of Mr. Hill was Martha De Bord, born in Rutherford county, N. C., about 1800, and died in Gilmer county in 1885. Mr. Hill is of a family of thirteen children. For thirty years he has been an active member of the Baptist church. He is a man of broad views, active, aggressive and progressive, and he has done much to advance the prosperity of Gilmer county.

PINKNEY HARRISON MILTON, of Ellijay, Gilmer Co., was born in Buncombe county, N. C., April 11, 1840. Soon after his birth he moved with his parents to Union county, this state, where his family resided until 1845, when they settled in Gilmer county. He received a common school education at Ellijay. March 4, 1861, at the age of twenty, he enlisted as private in Company H, First regiment Georgia regulars, and accompanied his regiment to Virginia. He first served under Gen. Toombs, and later under Gen. Tige Anderson, and participated in the second battle of Manassas and in all the battles from Seven Pines to Fredericksburg, including the seven days' fight before Richmond. After the battle of Fredericksburg his regiment was ordered to Georgia to recruit, and later to Olusta, Fla., where they were engaged in that battle. His term of service having expired, he enlisted in the navy at Charleston, continuing in that service eight months, until after the evacuation of that city, when he was taken prisoner and was confined in Charleston until Lee's surrender. He returned to his home in July, 1865. The war record of Mr. Milton made him a popular man in Gilmer county, and in 1868 he was elected to the office of sheriff, being the only democrat on the county ticket who succeeded in being elected. His popularity increased during his term of office, and in 1870 he was re-elected to that office, also in 1877 and 1879. He next taught school several years, and that occupation has occupied his time at different periods since the war. In 1885 he was appointed United States deputy-marshal for the northern district of Georgia, and his popularity was such that he continued to discharge the duties of that office, which were burdensome and exacting, during the administration of President Harrison. In 1893 he was again appointed deputy-marshal, and continues to discharge the duties of that position. Mr. Milston was wounded seven times during the war; first at Malvern Hill, twice at South Mountain, at Yorktown, at the second battle of Manassas, and twice at Fredericksburg. On Dec. 31, 1865, Mr. Milton was married to Miss Nancy Caroline Williams, formerly of Buncombe county, N. C. Ten children have been born to them, eight of whom survive: William Franklin, born Sept. 30, 1866; John Edgar, born Aug. 27, 1868; Robert Lafayette, born April 27, 1871; Ida Lerisa, born July 30, 1873; Irene Elizabeth, born Aug. 7, 1877; Emma Louisa, born July 12, 1883; Lilly Rosalee, born Feb. 15, 1886, and died Aug. 27, 1886; Effie, born Nov. 22, 1889; Ellen Agnes, born June 30, 1893, and Daisy, who was born Sept. 8, 1876, and died in infancy. The father of Mr. Milton was William Hamilton Milton, a native of Versailles, France. The mother of Mr. Milton was Elizabeth Love Peoples, a native of South Carolina. She died in 1882 at Ellijay.

He grew to manhood on the farm, and was educated at the common country schools. On attaining his majority he started in life for himself, and, though he has not made a fortune, he has been satisfactorily successful. He owns a good farm, to the cultivation of which he gives his undivided attention, and is a good and prosperous farmer. Reliable and praiseworthy in every respect, he is held in high estimation by his neighbors and fellow citizens. Mr. Avera was married Dec. 25, 1881, to Miss Annie, daughter of William Hadden, of Jefferson county, Ga., by whom he has had six children, two daughters and four sons, all living and promising well.

THOMAS A. BROWN, merchant-farmer, Agricola, Glascock Co., Ga., son of John D. and Mary E. (Jackson) Brown, both of Brunswick county, Va., was born in Brunswick county, Jan. 6, 1855. His father died in 1859, and his early life was spent on his mother's farm and in attendance on the county schools. In 1871 he went to Shoals, Warren Co., Ga., with a view to business, but he left after staying there about six months and went to Warthen, Washington Co., Ga., where he clerked for three years. He then went back to Shoals and engaged in merchandising for three years. After this his brother and himself bought a farm in Washington county in partnership and in connection with it conducted a small general merchandise store. They continued the joint business with very gratifying success until 1889, when he removed to Agricola and established a store and conducted a farm. He has carried these on since, and is now doing a large and thriving business. He takes great interest in everything promotive of the development and advancement of his county. Mr. Brown married Miss Mary, daughter of R. H. Clarke, of Shoals, Ga., who bore him two children, a son and a daughter: Samuel R. and Mamie C. The mother and daughter are deceased. Mr. Brown married for his second wife Miss Janie S., daughter of A. C. Harrison, of Washington county, Ga., a union which has been blessed with two children: Mary and Annie. He was the ninth of eleven children born to his parents; of them ten were boys, three only of whom survive. He was schooled at the country schools, and worked on the "home place" until he arrived at manhood, when he went to farming in Warren county for himself, and has continued it as his life-occupation. In August, 1861, he enlisted in Company I, Capt. J. G. Cain, Twenty-eighth Georgia regiment, Col. T. J. Warthen, and participated in the battles of Yorktown, Williamsburg, Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Mechanicsville, where he was wounded in the wrist, Antietam, and at Fredericksburg. He is well-informed, progressive and public spirited, and stands well with his fellow citizens. Mr. Denton was married Dec. 8, 1857, to Miss Rachel, daughter of James Stapleton, of Jefferson county, Ga., by whom he has had one child, a daughter, who died in infancy. Mr. Denton is a master Mason, and a prominent member of the Baptist church.

SEABORN KITCHENS, farmer, Gibson, Glascock Co., Ga., son of Lawrence and Mary (Brooks) Kitchens, was born in Warren county, Ga., March 8, 1830. He was raised on the farm, and received such education as could be obtained at the common country schools of the locality and period. When eighteen years of age he began life for himself, and made his first money by working on a neighboring farm. Five years afterward he bought a piece of land with the money he had saved and began farming for himself, since which time he has increased his worldly possessions and grown in the public estimation. He was county surveyor of Warren county in 1857-58, and when Glascock county was organized served the new county in the same capacity from 1858 to 1860. He was elected ordinary of the county and served eight years consecutively. He afterward served for a time as clerk of the superior and inferior courts, has been county treasurer, and in 1888 was elected to represent the county in the general assembly. So ably and so faithfully did he serve the people in these various offices of responsibility and honor, that he made himself one of the most popular citizens of the county, and can have bestowed upon him any office in the gift of the county he may desire. His fellow-citizens have implicit confidence in his ability, capacity and honesty. Mr. Kitchens was married in December, 1851, to Miss Martha, daughter of Lindsey Deadwyler, of Fayette county, Ga., who has borne him four children, three sons and one daughter, all living and an honor to their esteemed parents. He is a prominent and honored member of the masonic fraternity.

ROBERT L. KITCHENS, farmer, Gibson, Glascock Co., Ga., son of Seaborn and Martha (Deadwyler) Kitchens, was born in Glascock county Dec. 11, 1861. He worked on the farm and attended the common schools of the county until he reached manhood. He then bought a farm and commenced life for himself. Except three years' merchandising at Mitchell, Glascock Co., farming has been the occupation of his life. He is a good and progressive farmer, and has been successful and prosperous. Public-spirited, of genial disposition and popular manners, and having influential family connections, he may be regarded as having a bright future before him. Mr. Kitchens was married Dec. 22, 1883, to Miss Gracie V., daughter of William R. Hunter, of Glascock county, by whom he has had four children, all daughters, the eldest of whom is dead. The children are: Lillian F., deceased, William, Sallie Kate, Martha M.

GLYNN COUNTY.

FRANK D. AIKEN, ship broker, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Isaac and Fannie M. (Beyan) Aiken, was born on Hurd's island, McIntosh Co., Ga., July 14, 1861. Mr. Aiken's father, of Irish lineage, was born in Winnsboro, S. C., came to Georgia in 1854, and after the war between the states went to Pensacola, Fla., where he now resides. He enlisted in 1861, and was captain of Company B, Forty-seventh Georgia regiment, in which capacity he served until 1864, when he was assigned to the special duty of collecting the taxes from five counties in Georgia. His mother was of English descent, and was the daughter of P. M. and Mary (Ellison) Bryan, of New Berne, N. C. Mr. Aiken, when only thirteen years old and a poor boy, began life for himself. What education he had was mainly obtained at Darien, Ga. In 1887 he embarked in the ship brokerage business in Brunswick, and in 1889 established planing mills. In both these enterprises he has been eminently successful—prospered from the start—and has attained enviable honorable prominence locally and abroad, in the commercial world. He is (and has been since 1888) a director of the board of trade, and has been a director of the Merchants' and Traders' bank since its organization. He was a member of the city board of aldermen two years; in January, 1894, he was elected county commissioner, and in January, 1895, was elected treasurer of the county. In addition to the above he has held several other positions of public trust. He is also second vice-president of the Brunswick club, the only social club in the city. He was first lieutenant of the Brunswick light horse guards until the troop was discharged for the purpose of re-organizing into a naval reserve artillery, which company of fifty-six men—the first and only company of Georgia's navy—he is now commander of. Mr. Aiken's present important and highly honorable relations to the commercial interests of this prospectively great southern seaport, gives promise of an exceedingly brilliant future. Mr. Aiken was married in January, 1894, to Miss Frances B., daughter of Mallory P. King, and granddaughter of the distinguished Thomas Butler King, of ante-bellum fame, half a century ago one of the foremost of Georgia's statesmen.

W. ARNOLD, proprietor of "Ocean View House," St. Simon's island, Glynn Co., Ga., is a son of Frederick Arnold, and was born in Prussia March 4, 1846. His father was a native of Bromberg, Germany, where he spent his days, and where he died in 1849. Mr. Arnold's father gave him a good education preparatory to his studying for the profession of an architect. At the age of seventeen he commenced life for himself, without financial means. In 1869 he came to the United States, and after a short stop in New York came to Tattnall county, Ga., in 1870. Later he determined to settle permanently on St. Simon's island. Selecting the most eligible site, commanding an expansive "ocean view," he purchased thirty acres on the ocean beach, and has built and conducts in luxurious style and on the most liberal scale "Ocean View House," which is fast gaining the distinction of being one of the most attractive, delightful and popular of the summer resorts on the south Atlantic coast. Mr. Arnold was married in 1881 to Miss Anna F., daughter of Charles and Sarah (Hay) Stevens, natives respectively of Denmark and England. Mr. Stevens came to this country when about twenty-two years old, and died in Fort Delaware during the war, when about fifty years old. Mrs. Stevens (nee Hay) came to the United States when about eighteen years of age, is still living, and is about seventy-seven years old. Mr. and Mrs. Arnold were blessed with two children, Leopold and Winniebauld. Mr. Arnold is a member of the Lutheran, and Mrs. Arnold is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

R. C. BAUMGARTNER, meat merchant, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., fourth of ten children, is a son of John and Anna (Naven Schwander) Baumgartner, and was born in Bene, Switzerland, May 13, 1858. His father was a farmer and dairyman, who came to this country in 1867, and settled first in Pittsburg, Pa., but in 1873 removed to South Pittsburg, Tenn. Here his father died in 1884, aged fifty-nine years; and his mother died in 1891, aged sixty-three years. R. C. Baumgartner, when about twenty years of age, left the parental roof—his only capital a hopeful spirit, an honest purpose and a brave heart—to fight the battle of life. His success demonstrates how wisely and how well he has used his capital. In 1882 he came to Brunswick, which has since been his home. By close attention to business, acting justly, and being scrupulously careful about his meats, he has established a good reputation and secured a permanent paying patronage. Mr. Baumgartner was married Feb. 17, 1883, to Miss Amelia, daughter of Van Hauten—himself a native of the United States, but whose father was a native of Holland and whose mother was a native of France. The following children are the offspring of this union: Carl Jackson, Lottie Amelia, Hugh Edward, and Ellen. Mrs. Baumgartner is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mr. Baumgartner has been exalted to the royal arch degree in Masonry and is treasurer of the local chapter.

F. D. BIGGS, liveryman, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., is a son of Daniel and Olive (Collins) Biggs, natives of North Carolina, and was born at Antioch, N. C., July 31, 1858. Daniel was a son of William Biggs, who came from England to the United States when a boy. Mr. Biggs was educated at Trinity College, N. C. When he reached manhood he began life for himself, relying on his own resources and pluck for success. He has lived in three states, and filled several public offices, having been a justice of the peace in Baldwin county, Ala., and Escambia county, Fla., and is now successfully running a livery stable in Brunswick. Mr. Biggs married Miss Cinderilla, daughter of Malcolm and Frances (Turner) Baggett—both Floridians—in 1881. He is a member of the A. O. U. W.; the I. O. O. F.; the Knights of Pythias; the Knights of Honor; and of the Kappa Sigma fraternity. Popular, obliging and enterprising, he is sure to swell to handsome property his already large surplus.

W. G. BRANTLEY, solicitor-general of Brunswick circuit court, is the son of B. D. and Jeanette (McCrae) Brantley, natives respectively of Laurens and Montgomery counties, Ga., and was born in Blackshear, Pierce Co., Ga., Sept. 18, 1860. His father was a merchant, and died leaving a very prosperous business which has been continued as "The A. P. Brantley Co." His mother is still living at Blackshear. Her parents emigrated to this country from Scotland, locating in Montgomery county. Mr. Brantley was liberally educated in the public schools and at the university of Georgia. He read law under Hon. John C. Nichols, Blackshear, was admitted to the bar in 1882, and was at once accepted as a partner by his Blackstonian preceptor, under the firm name of Nichols & Brantley. Two years later he retired from the firm and practiced by himself. In 1884 he represented Pierce county, and afterward the Third senatorial district in the general assembly. In 1888 he was elected solicitor-general of Brunswick circuit and re-elected in 1892. When a member of the senate he took a very prominent part in the passage of the telegraph bill of 1887, and in opposition to the sale of the Western & Atlantic railroad. As solicitor-general he has been exceptionally successful, and is considered one of the ablest of the state's officials. Mr. Brantley also stands high as a practical business man. The best evidence of the estimation in which his professional ability and statesmanlike qualities are held, lies in the fact that he was tendered the judgeship of Brunswick circuit, and other equally honorable official positions. His name was also mentioned in connection with the seat in the United States senate made vacant by the death of Senator A. H. Colquitt. These very flattering manifestations of appreciation, however, fail to inflate or unbalance him. He is as unassuming as his thousands of admiring friends regard him pre-eminently able.

R. E. L. BURFORD, M. D., physician and surgeon and United States sanitary inspector, marine hospital service, Brunswick, Ga., is a son of John and Almeda (Thompson) Burford, and was born in Anderson county, Ky., March 2, 1861. His father, who is a breeder of and dealer in blooded horses and cattle in the famous "blue grass region of Kentucky," is of English and his mother of Scotch descent. Dr. Burford graduated from Georgetown college, Georgetown, Ky., and also from the medical university of Louisville, Ky., and passed the best examinations in all the branches taught, receiving the class honors. He also made an excellent record in his literary studies. One month after his graduation Dr. Burford located and opened an office in Brunswick, Ga., and at once gained the confidence and esteem of the people. In September, 1893, unexpectedly and wholly unsolicited by him, he was appointed United States sanitary inspector, marine hospital service at Brunswick, Ga., and placed in charge of the government station at that port. He has rapidly risen in public estimation and attained to an enviable and well-deserved reputation in his profession. He has already won by his demonstrated superior ability, a large and lucrative patronage. In the highest and most honorable sense of the term, he is a gentleman, and is sure to win his way to professional eminence. He is a member of the I. O. O. F.

HUGH BURFORD, physician and surgeon, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Dr. William B. and Laura (Bryant) Burford, natives, respectively, of South Carolina and Georgia, was born in Hall county, Ga., June 2, 1852. During his childhood his parents removed to Ringgold, Catoosa Co., Ga., where his father enjoyed a large and lucrative practice. Here, in the schools of Ringgold, was laid the foundation of his education; the higher or collegiate education contemplated was cut off by reverses consequent upon the war between the states. After the battle of Chickamauga the family refuged to Orange county, Fla., where young Burford's education was completed under the private tutorage of Rev. Dr. Bell, distinguished for his superior ability as an educator and for his strict religious discipline. After a brief experience in mercantile pursuits, he, with J. Ira Gore as a partner, established and published the Florida "State Journal," a weekly paper, at Cedar Keys, Fla. Later he sold his interest in the enterprise to his partner and began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of his father, and in 1875 took his first course of medical lectures at the Savannah Medical college. During the yellow fever epidemic in Savannah in 1876 several of the professors fell victims to its ravages and the college exercises were suspended, so that he did not graduate until 1879, when he graduated at the head of his class. He took an active part and rendered efficient service during the epidemic until prostrated by yellow fever, and then for four years—1877-80—was assistant to the surgeon in the marine hospital, enjoying a good private practice in the city, beside discharging the duties of demonstrator of anatomy in Savannah Medical college, to which he was elected in 1879. Family and estate matters at his home in Florida necessitated his going there, thus breaking up the prosperous future promised in Savannah. He spent about a year in assisting his widowed mother in settling up his father's business and then, in 1882, came to Brunswick, which has since been his home. While Dr. Burford pays special attention to gynecology and obstetrics he practices in every branch of his profession, in which he has been phenomenally successful, enjoys an extensive practice, ranks among the most eminent of the profession in the state and has attained an enviable national reputation. He is by general consent regarded as the most popular and prominent physician in Brunswick. He is president of the board of health, and in that capacity devoted his untiring efforts to alleviate suffering during the yellow fever epidemic of 1893. He is acting assistant surgeon of the marine hospital service at Brunswick; member of the Georgia State Medical association; of the National Association Railway Surgeons, and of Association Railway Surgeons of the United States. He is also the medical examiner at Brunswick for the following named insurance companies: New York Life, New York Mutual, Equitable, New Jersey Benefit Mutual, Pennsylvania Mutual, Manhattan, Phoenix, Massachusetts Benefit, United States, Maryland Life, Fidelity and Casualty company, Massachusetts Mutual Benefit and several others. Dr. Burford was married in July, 1883, to Miss Mary K.,—born in Tarrytown, N. Y.—daughter of Edward M. and Frances (Rathbone) Hopkins of Savannah, and to them three children have been born: Hugh, aged eleven; Dorothy, aged five, and an infant not named. Dr. Burford is a member of the I. O. O. F., a master Mason and a communicant of the Protestant Episcopal church. Mrs. Burford is a devoted member of the Presbyterian church.

DR. WILLIAM BERRIEN BURROUGHS, of Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., bears an old and distinguished name in Georgia. He can probably trace his ancestry back as far on both sides as any man in the state. The antiquity and prominence of the Burroughs name are seen from the following heraldic records: "The first attempt to reach China by this route (Nova Zembla) was made by the Muscovy or Russian company in 1553, under Sir Hugh Willoughby in three ships, with Richard Chancellor as pilot major. The leader and two vessels with seventy men were lost on the coast of Lapland; the third ship, under command of Capt. Stephen Burroughs with Chancellor, reached the White sea safely and commercial relations were established with Russia. In 1556 Capt. Stephen Burroughs had chief command of another expedition. He doubled Cape North, touched at Nova Zembla, discovered the island Wygatz and Wygatz straits, which separate Nova Zembla from the then supposed continent, and reached north latitude seventy degrees, three minutes—a higher point than had been reached by any previous navigator. He returned to England and published an account of his observations. He was the first who observed the declination of the magnetic needle." Following is the coat of arms as given in the best books on heraldry: "Azure, a Bend wavy argent between two Fleurs de lis Ermine," and was assigned and granted by Robert Cooke, of Clarencieux, Jan. 27, 1586, in the twentieth year of Queen Elizabeth, to William Burroughs, Esq., clerk and comptroller of the queen's navy, son of Walter Burroughs, descended from the Burroughs at Northam, near Barnstable in the county of Devon." Sir John Burroughs was grandson of William Burroughs, of Sandwich, Kent, by the daughter of Basil Gasell, of Newkirk, Bralant, and garter king of arms. He received a classical education and afterward studied law at Grey's Inn. In 1623 he was appointed keeper of records in the tower of London. In June of the same year the earl marshal, to whom he was secretary, appointed him herald extraordinary.

On December 30 of the same year he was made king of arms at Arundel house in the Strand. He received the favor of knighthood July 17, 1624. In 1634 he was made garter principal. He attended his sovereign, Charles I., when he went to Scotland to be crowned in 1633. On April 14, 1636, he obtained a grant to entitle him to the fees of his office of garter while employed beyond the sea in the king's special service. He died Oct. 21, 1643, leaving two sons and two daughters. His son John was knighted by Charles II. The family has continued in London to the present day. Silas M. Burroughs, the head of the largest drug house in the world—Burroughs, Wellcome & Co., of London—is one of this family. John is a family name, for we find in English history John Burroughs, a divine who died in 1386. He was D. D. of Cambridge, rector of Collingham, Nottinghamshire; appointed July 1, 1384, to the post of chancellor of his university. Another John, a benedictine who flourished in 1340, was the author of some books on travels. The progenitor of the family in America was John, born in England, Dorsetshire county, in 1617, and came to America and landed at Salem, Mass., about 1642. He was a member of the long parliament that assembled November 3, 1640, which was dissolved by Cromwell, and with many others fled from England to escape religious prosecution. He moved from Salem to Long Island, N. Y., early in the forties. Long Island was then occupied by the Camassee Indians. He was one of the original settlers of Middleburg in 1652 and paid his share of "the Indian rate," one pound, ten shillings, in 1656. On March 13, 1662, he was elected town clerk and clerk of the court. He was one of the seven patentees of Newtown in 1666. Being a leading man and skillful penman, quite a rare accomplishment in those days, he was continued in office as town clerk for eleven years, and at his death, in August, 1678 (his will is on record in New York and an original copy is still in possession of the family of Mr. George Wyckoff Burroughs), his eldest son was elected to fill his position and held the office for many years. His family continue in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Connecticut. Benjamin Burroughs, the grandfather of our subject, and the great-great-great-grandson of John, was the first to bring the name south. He was born at Newtown, L. I., March 31, 1779, and died at Savannah, Ga., April 14, 1837, aged fifty-seven. He moved to Augusta, Ga., thence to Savannah, and on July 2, 1799, at the age of twenty, married in Savannah Miss Catharine Eirick, daughter of Alexander Eirick, who was a member of the colonial parliament. Isabella, her sister, married Dimas Ponce, and Ruth, a younger sister, married Francis Harney Welman, an officer of the British navy, in January, 1807, whose daughter, Mrs. John H. Reid, of Savannah, a charming and elegant lady of the old school, survives him. Catharine Eirick's mother's maiden name was Ruth Erwin, daughter of Christopher Erwin, born in Antrim county, Ireland, Jan. 8, 1754. One sister of Ruth Erwin married Capt. Loyer, of the French army, from whom are descended the Davants, of Savannah, Ga.; another sister married Gov. Jared Irwin, her cousin, the letter being changed some generations before from I to E on account of religious differences. Benjamin Burroughs, prominent as a cotton and commission merchant in the city of Savannah, was largely interested in the steamship "Savannah." His partner—Mr. Sturges—and himself owned one-third of the ship, and they shipped cotton to Liverpool on her first voyage. Ocean navigation by steam was inaugurated by the voyage of the "Savannah" in 1819 from Savannah to England and Russia; the paddles were made of canvas and the arms of iron, and the wheels were so arranged that they could be dismounted at pleasure, and it was adapted to the use of steam or sails, according to circumstances. She left Savannah May 26, 1819, and reached Liverpool after a passage of twenty-five days, during which the engine was employed eighteen days. Benjamin Burroughs was an elder in the Independent Presbyterian church in Savannah, and gave $5,000 to assist in building the same in 1817. His children were Joseph H., merchant, Savannah; William Howe, planter in Florida, who married Ann McLeod, afterward moved to Savannah and was a cotton merchant—one child survives him—Joseph Hallett; Benjamin Burroughs, Presbyterian minister at Vernonberg, Ga., married Rosa Williams—three children living—James P. Burroughs, Miss Rosa Burroughs and Mrs. Theo. Livingston, of Jacksonville, Fla.; Dr. Henry Kollock Burroughs, physician, and many years mayor of Savannah, married Ella Dessaussure, of Charleston, S. C., who survives him, and has several daughters; Oliver S., planter, of Tallahassee, Fla., married Ann C. Maxwell—two sons, B. M. and E. W. Burroughs, survive him; Elizabeth Reed married Dr. John S. Law, of Cincinnati, O.; their children are John Hugh, Benjamin, Frank, Wallace, Charles Green, and one daughter. Catharine, daughter of Benjamin Burroughs, married Charles Green, of Savannah, Ga. Joseph Hallett Burroughs was the eldest son of Benjamin, and father of William Berrien Burroughs (our subject), was born in Savannah June 30, 1803, was a graduate of Yale college and entered the cotton business with his father. On June 26, 1828, he was married at Savannah to Miss Valeria Gibbons Berrien. On his mother's side the name is none the less known or distinguished. The Berriens are an old French family and the seat of their ancestors was Berrien, a considerable town in the department of Finisterre; their ancestor was a Huguenot, who, during the civil wars of France was forced to flee and take refuge in Holland. Cornelius Jansen Berrien was the first of the name that emigrated to this country, and was the progenitor of the family here. He settled at Flatbush, Long Island, N. Y., in 1669, and married Jeannette, daughter of Jan Stryker, and being a person of character and education, he enjoyed offices in the town government, and was a deacon in the Dutch church. After his death he was succeeded by his son John, who held several positions of honor and trust. Cornelius, a son of John, married Sarah Hallett, and lived on Berrien's island, near Long Island. He was the grandfather of William Berrien, D. D., rector of Trinity church, New York, for thirty-three years, in which parish he ministered in holy things for fifty-two years, and married Jane, daughter of Elias B. Dayton, of Elizabethtown, N. J. Peter was a son of Cornelius, was a surveyor by profession and became a large land-owner and served several years as supervisor. He gave the land upon which the first Dutch church in Newton was erected. Cornelius was a son of Peter. He was a prominent man—elder in the church, magistrate, etc. His son John was chosen on the committee of safety in 1775. John Berrien, son of Peter, married Margaret Eaton; he lived at Rocky Hill, Somerset Co., N. J. He was one of the judges of the supreme court of judicature of that state (then colony). Gen. Washington was visiting his family, and made it his headquarters, and it was from the door-steps of this house that Washington's farewell address was delivered to his army; the address is familiar to every schoolboy. Their children were Ionna, who married a Mr. Spencer, of Maryland, whence Spencer Baird; Valeria, who married a Mr. Le Conte, whence Dr. Joseph and Dr. John Le Conte, and John, who emigrated to Georgia in 1775; at fifteen years of age he was lieutenant in the First Georgia regiment; at seventeen he was captain in the same command; at eighteen he was appointed by Gen. Lachlan McIntosh brigade-major in the northern army; he was conspicuous in the battles of Monmouth and Valley Forge, and in several other engagements, and continued in service until the close of the war. He married Miss Margaret MacPherson, of Philadelphia, daughter of Capt. John MacPherson, and sister of Gen. Wm. MacPherson, of revolutionary fame, and sister of Capt. John MacPherson, aid-de-camp to Gen. Montgomery, with whom he fell at the battle of Quebec, thus connecting the Berriens with that well-known family. Maj. John Berrien's second wife was Williamana Moore. Their children were Dr. Richard McAllister Berrien, who married Elizabeth B. Deloney, of St. Mary's, Ga., about 1819; Martha, the only child of that marriage who still survives, married Dr. Hugh O'Keefe Nesbitt, of Augusta, Ga., who died in October, 1855. Their children: Robert Taylor Nesbitt, present commissioner of agriculture, who married Rebecca L. Saffold, eldest child of Dr. Thos. Saffold and Mary Harris, of Madison, Ga.; Eliza B., who married Dr. Bayard L. McIntosh, of Trenton, N. J., and Mary Eleanor, who first married Col. Thos. B. Brown, of Montgomery, Ala., and afterward Col. John Screven, of Savannah; one daughter, Lila McIntosh Screven, who married Samuel C. Atkinson, attorney-at-law at Brunswick. Col. Thos. M. Berrien married Virginia Pepper (nee Mabry), of Camden county, Ga. Weems Berrien married Miss Noble, of Rome, Ga. Julia married John Whitehead, of Jefferson county. Sarah married James Whitehead, of Jefferson county. Ruth married Samuel Dowse, of Burke county. Eliza married a Mr. Casey, of Columbia county. John MacPherson Berrien, son of Maj. John Berrien, and grandfather of our subject, was born at the residence of his paternal grandfather at Rocky Hill, near Princeton, N. J., Aug. 23, 1781. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Nicholas Anciaux, quartermaster-treasurer of the French Royal Deux Ponts regiment, whose commission, signed by Louis XVI. is now in the possession of Dr. Burroughs. Nicholas Anciaux was born on Frankfort-on-the-Main in Germany. His father was Chevalier DeWiltteisen. The children by this marriage who survive him are Valeria G., who married Joseph Hallett Burroughs; Eliza A., who married Chancellor J. P. Carroll, of South Carolina; Wiltielmina married Henry Williams, of Savanna, Ga.; Louisa G. married Gen. Francis S. Bartow. Judge Berrien married a second time—Miss Sarah Hunter, of Savannah, Ga. The children of this marriage are Harriet, who married Theodore Cone; Sarah, who married Dr. A. J. Semmes, of New Orleans, La.; Catharine, who married Maj. Geo. W. Anderson, of Savannah, and L. Cecile, who married Miss Rosa Falligant, and is now living in Jacksonville, Fla.—the only son to bear his name. Judge John MacPherson Berrien, LL. D., graduated at Princeton college, and from this institute received his degree of bachelor of arts at the early age of fifteen. After serving as recorder of the city of Savannah and solicitor-general, he was elected state judge at twenty-nine years of age, and served ten years. He was elected state senator, and was United States senator 1825-1829; United States attorney-general 1829-1831, and a third time elected United States senator 1847-1852. He declined the mission to England, which was offered him by President Jackson. (Commodore John M. Berrien, born in Georgia, and appointed from this state in the United States navy commandery, navy yard at Norfolk, 1865, was a member of this family). William Berrien Burroughs was born in Savannah, Ga., April 7, 1842, and is the son of Joseph H. and Valeria G. (Berrien) Burroughs. He is the seventh son in a family of ten children, only four of whom survive, the other three being Richard B., prominent physician in Jacksonville, Fla., and surgeon of the F. C. & P. R. R.; John W., a lawyer in Savannah, Ga., and Charles J., a physician and four years health officer of Jacksonville, Fla. William B. received his primary education in Savannah and entered Oglethorpe university, near Milledgeville, Ga., in 1859. At the breaking out of the war between the states he left college and joined the Randolph rangers as a private. This company, with others, formed the Seventh Georgia cavalry, and became a part of Gen. P. M. B. Young's brigade, Hampton's division, army of northern Virginia. He was made first sergeant of Company G of this regiment—going with it through the battle on Borden's plank road, Dinwiddie court house, Stony creek and other points, and received his parole at Appomattox. At the close of the war he studied medicine with Dr. R. D. Arnold, of Savannah, and graduated from Savannah Medical college in March, 1867. He moved to Camden county, Ga., where he practiced his profession for fifteen years, doing a large and successful business, and accumulating quite a fortune. In 1881 he moved to Brunswick, Ga., and invested his money in real estate, bonds, shipping and other enterprises that were for the benefit and advancement of the city. He also opened a real estate and insurance office. He is to-day the oldest real estate and insurance agent in the city, and is recognized as an authority on all real estate matters. He has erected over 100 small cottages for home-seekers. As an evidence of the interest that he takes in the development of the section, as well as the confidence in which he is held by his fellow-citizens and business associates, we mention that he is a director in the National bank of Brunswick, and in the Brunswick Savings and Trust company; is a director in the board of trade and chairman of statistics; a director in the Kennon Cotton factory and a director in the Brunswick Foundry and Machine Manufacturing company. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and has been grand vice-chancellor of Georgia. He was appointed a delegate by Gov. W. J. Northen to the national Nicaragua convention which assembled at St. Louis in June, 1892, also to the national Nicaragua convention which assembled at New Orleans in 1893, and at each convention was elected executive committeeman for his state by the Georgia delegation. On Jan. 17, 1872, Dr. Burroughs married Miss Elizabeth P. W. Hazlehurst, eldest daughter of Maj. Leighton Wilson Hazlehurst, who married Miss Mary J. McNish, of Savannah, Ga. He was a large and successful rice planter on the Satillo river, Camden county, and had his summer seat at Waynesville, Ga. Dr. Burroughs has six children: Mary McNish, Lilla H., Josephine H., William B., Leighton H. and Mac H. Before closing this article we will mention some of the worthy members of this family who reside in the north, among whom was Stephen Burroughs, born in 1729, strictly a cold water man, and never sick a day in his life. About 1755 he planted the germ at Rocky Hill on the Pequonnock harbor, Conn., by starting his grist-mill and engaging in mercantile pursuits. It was he who planted the corner-stone of the now wealthy and growing city of Bridgeport, Conn. He was an active whig, and raised and equipped a military company called Householders during the revolution, of which he was elected captain. He was for many years a justice of the peace and a representative in the general assembly, and owned the parish grist-mill called the Burroughs mill that stood where the Pequonnock woolen mills now stand. He invented the system of Federal money as now used in the United States, which was adopted by congress in 1790. Up to that time all business was done under the old English system of pounds, shillings, pence and farthings, two of which last-named made a copper, and four of which made a penny. After completing his system he carried it to the Hon. William Samuel Johnson, who, impressed with its simplicity and great convenience, caused it to be brought before congress in 1784, when he was a member of that body, where it was considered, but nothing done at that time except an enactment under which Connecticut and Massachusetts began in 1785 to coin copper cents, for many years denominated copper pennies. In 1792 the dollar was made the unit in money, and its coinage established by law. He was quite proficient in astronomy and was blind for twenty years before his death. He was buried at Bridgeport, Conn. Upon his tombstone is inscribed this epitaph: "Stephen Burroughs, Esq. A man distinguished by his industry and his talents and acquirements. Self-taught and original, he explored the vast field of mathematical and astronomical science beyond all the efforts of a Cassini or a Newton, and made discoveries of the most useful and astonishing nature. But in consequence of his blindness his discoveries are lost to the world. He died Aug. 2, 1817, aged eighty-eight." From lecture of Rev. Samuel Orcutt, historian, delivered before the Fairfield County Historical society, Capt. Stephen Burroughs and His Times.

M. M. BUSH, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., is a large and prosperous manufacturer of tools used in the turpentine industry. He is a son of John and Malcy (Russ) Bush, born respectively in Duplin and Bladen counties, N. C., and was born in Bladen county, N. C., Feb. 11, 1842. His father followed farming and merchandising until he died, at seventy years of age, and his wife died when about sixty-five years old. Mr. Bush's grandfather was of Irish, and his grandmother of German descent. The Bush family, as far back as they can be traced, were farmers and merchants. Mr. Bush enlisted June 11, 1861, and was captured at the fall of Roanoke island. He was sent home on parole. After remaining at home six months he re-enlisted, was made a non-commissioned officer, and in 1864 had the misfortune to be captured again at Cold Harbor, Va. This time he was sent first to Point Lookout, and afterward to Palmyra, N. Y., where he was kept in captivity until the close of the war. He was twenty-eight years of age when he started to see what the world had in store for him, and he has already found much that it had. He is now industriously and energetically working for the larger remainder he feels encouraged to hope and work for. And he has many willing friends lending him their aid. He now owns a one-third interest in an eighty-acre tract of Florida orange land, twenty-eight acres in grove, fifty unplanted; a one-fourth interest in a $40,000 wharf property, a steam tug (the "Amanda"), a small plantation in North Carolina, and a fine home residence in Brunswick. Mr. Bush was married in 1882 to Miss Georgia, daughter of Malcolm McCrae, who bore him one child, when she died. In 1892 he married Miss Jackie, a daughter of John Brown, of Atlanta, by whom he has had two children, twins: Robert M. and Edna. Mr. Bush is a master Mason, and himself and Mrs. Bush are Methodists, he being one of the stewards of the church.

HON. A. J. CROVATT, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., judge of the county court of Glynn county, is a son of William and Theodora (Williams) Crovatt, and was born in Charleston, S. C., June 23, 1857. His father was a son of Gibbs Crovatt, of Charleston, whose wife was Miss Rebecca Frazier. Judge Crovatt was educated at the high school, Charleston, at Charleston college, and also at the Carolina Military institute, from which last-named institution he graduated in 1877. At college he was a member of the S. A. E. fraternity, and took a very active and prominent part in the exercises of the literary society to which he belonged, and of which for some time he was president. While at college he began the study of law, which after graduating he continued under A. J. Smith. After being admitted to the bar he formed a partnership with G. B. Mabry, the then solicitor-general, and who, later, was judge of the Brunswick circuit court. Dissolving this partnership he practiced alone a few years; then in 1883 he entered into partnership with Judge Bolling Whitfield, which is still in existence. Judge Crovatt was mayor of Brunswick in 1883 and 1884; and the last year, though opposed by the most popular man in the city, was re-elected by a handsome majority. On the expiration of his second term he was importuned to accept the mayoralty again, but preferring the county judgeship, he declined. As mayor he was progressive and aggressive, ever alive and on the alert to push to consummation every movement and improvement he believed would advance the interests of the city. His services as mayor were invaluable. Among the many things accomplished were: The sinking of two artesian wells, whose value to the city cannot be over-estimated; the reorganization and increased efficiency of the police force; the building of brick guard and engine room; and the improvement of the park. As mayor Judge Crovatt originated and perfected the gas and water contracts and was largely instrumental in securing the location of the Brunswick & Western railway shops at Brunswick. Judge Crovatt as county solicitor, and the firm of Crovatt & Whitfield as city attorneys, have made brilliant records for themselves in their management of cases; and as practitioners in the city, county, state and United States courts their clientage has been large and is increasing—they having been eminently successful. Judge Crovatt has been chairman of the county democratic executive committee, and has represented the county in senatorial, congressional and gubernatorial conventions. As an attorney Judge Crovatt already ranks very high, and he is rapidly rising in reputation. As a man of affairs he has few equals—no superiors—and no citizen has a stronger hold on the confidence of the people in regard to general soundness of judgment, unswerving integrity, firmness of purpose and character, and high sense of honor in the matter of personal and public obligations. He is a born politician. Added to extreme boldness, undaunted courage, and an almost reckless aggressiveness, are an intuition and seemingly unerring judgment, that make him irresistible and invincible as a leader in a political contest. With such a splendid record as his career so far presents, and with abilities and characteristics such as he is acknowledged to possess, almost any position, private or public, he may desire or aspire to would seem to be assured him. Judge Crovatt was married in 1880 to Miss Mary Lee, a daughter of Charles L. and Frances Schlatter, a union which has been blessed with three children: William Cecil, Alfred Hayne, and Mary Lee. Judge and Mrs. Crovatt are members of St. Mark's Protestant Episcopal church, of which he has been vestryman. The judge is a Knight of Pythias, a member of the I. O. O. F., and of the Legion of Honor.

HORACE DART, ordinary of Glynn county, Ga., son of Urbanus and Eliza R. (Moore) Dart, was born in Brunswick, Ga., April 17, 1837. His grandfather, Cyrus Dart, of English descent, a native of Connecticut, came south when a young man, and was connected with the army as a physician during the Creek Indian war. He was stationed for awhile at Colerain on St. Mary's river. He lived a short time on St. Simon's island, and afterward settled in Brunswick. He was drowned by the capsizing of a boat, on which occasion his son, Urbanus, then an eight-year-old boy, saved himself by swimming to St. Simon's island beach. Urbanus Dart, son of the above and father of Horace, was born in a block house at Colerain, on St. Mary's river, and came with his parents when quite young to Brunswick, which was afterward his home. He served the county as sheriff, represented it in the general assembly several terms, and was a member of the first constitutional convention held after the war. Horace Dart began life as a poor man, but subsequently inherited property from his father (Urbanus') estate, which with his own handsome accumulations insures him a competency at least. In 1861 he enlisted for a short time in the Brunswick rifles, of which he had previously been a member for a short time; but later he enlisted for the war. Being disabled by a wound received at Fredericksburg, he was assigned to hospital duty. In 1865 he was elected tax receiver and served two years. He was afterward elected sheriff to serve an unexpired term and also served a term as deputy-sheriff. After this he was elected ordinary to fill an unexpired term; and at the ensuing regular election he was elected for the full term, not yet expired. In addition to a large landed estate Mr. Dart is largely interested in the following named water craft: Two stanch tug boats, the "Urbanus Dart" and the "Dauntless"—the last-named a very superior boat which cost $30,000, and can easily make from twelve to fifteen miles an hour; and two passenger boats, the "Pope Catlin" and the "Egmont." Mr. Dart was married Aug. 17, 1863, to Miss Harriet E. W. Ashcraft, born in Newnan, Ga., by whom he had seven children, three of whom are living. Mrs. Dart is a member of the Presbyterian church.

E. M. DART, merchant, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Edgar C. P. and Ellen M. (Moore) Dart, natives of Brunswick, was born March 8, 1857. E. C. P. Dart was a son of Cyrus Dart, one of the early settlers, and was a lawyer by profession. He at one time held the office of justice of the peace, and was clerk of the superior court for more than ten years, which covered the period of the "war between the states." His services in this capacity were invaluable, as he kept strict and vigilant guard over the record books and court documents, transporting them from place to place for safe keeping, performed all clerical work required, and at the close of the war delivered the same intact without a cent of charge to the county. Since the war he has filled the office of ordinary and was succeeded by his nephew, Horace Dart, the present incumbent. E. M. Dart started in life a poor man but has managed so well as to have established a fine mercantile business and attained to an influential position in the commercial world, having in the meantime rendered timely and valuable assistance to his father during the panic of 1873. Combining prudence with enterprise, he is sure of splendid success. He is a member of the First Methodist church at Brunswick, and succeeded his father on the board of trustees.

J. E. DU BIGNON, capitalist and banker, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., is a son of Joseph and Felicite (Riffault) du Bignon, natives respectively of Jekyl island and Bordeaux, France, and was born in Brunswick, Jan. 2, 1849. The family is one of the oldest and one among the wealthiest in southeastern Georgia. Mr. DuBignon's great-grandfather, of the royal navy of France, became the owner of Jekyl island in 1791. His grandson, Joseph, Mr. DuBignon's father, was an extensive cotton planter and a man of wealth and influence. This island of Jekyl, so called by Gen. Oglethorpe, after his friend Sir Joseph Jekyl, an eminent English statesman, is a beautiful spot about eleven miles long, and contains about twenty-two square miles. In 1885 Mr. DuBignon had acquired the interests of the family and had become the sole owner of the island, where he organized the famous "Jekyl Island Club," which includes in its membership many of the wealthiest and most prominent business and professional men and capitalists in the north and west, and is the largest out-of-home club in the world. Mr. DuBignon was elected alderman of the city of Brunswick in 1876 and re-elected continually until 1880; was on the finance committee and took an active part in the adjustment of the bond question and in everything relating to the city's interests. In December, 1893, he was again elected a member of the board of aldermen and was placed on the finance and other committees. The estimation in which Mr. DuBignon is held financially and socially is best evidenced by the many prominent and honorable as well as responsible positions he has been called upon to fill. He is president of the Cumberland route, Brunswick & South Atlantic company; president of the Brunswick club; vice-president of the Brunswick Title Guarantee and Loan company; a director and member of the finance committee of the Brunswick Saving and Trust company; in the Brunswick Foundry and Manufacturing company; and in the St. Simon's Transit company; and is principal owner of the magnificent Oglethorpe hotel property. He also owns a fifth interest in the Brunswick Street railroad, and is principal owner of the Brunswick & Altamaha canal property. He was a member of the committee having in charge the extensive sewerage system adopted by the city, and as such took a lively interest in the work, and a prominent and very active part in furthering it, and was largely instrumental in the successful accomplishment of this great, important movement. He is largely interested in many enterprises, public and private, which shows his absolute faith in the future of Brunswick, as well as the confidence of the people in his ability as a general business man and financier. Mr. DuBignon was married in 1876 to Frances, eldest daughter of Col. Charles L. Schlatter, an accomplished and eminent civil engineer, who in early life was chief engineer of the state of Pennsylvania and of the Ogdensburg railroad of New York, etc. Col. Schlatter came to Georgia on account of failing health, requiring a mild climate, and became deeply interested in Brunswick; and to him belongs the credit of originating and organizing the Brunswick & Albany (now Brunswick & Western) railroad. Mr. and Mrs. DuBignon have one daughter. They are members of the Protestant Episcopal church.

JOHAN P. HARVEY, deceased, son of John P. and Charlotte (Gardner) Harvey, both of English descent, and natives of Baker county, Ga., was born in Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., Dec. 25, 1844. His father went to Macon soon after his birth, where he was engaged in mercantile business until he died. His mother died in 1874, aged sixty-one years. Mr. Harvey was educated in the city schools, Macon, Ga., and later in life learned the trade of cabinet maker. In 1861 he enlisted in Jackson artillery of Macon, with which he remained six months, and was mustered out. He immediately re-enlisted in Capt. T. J. Holt's cavalry company, and a year later was transferred to Anderson's artillery company of Pulaski county, which he remained with until near the close of the war; owing to poor health he was sent to the hospital at Macon. After the war he worked awhile at his trade, and then went into a railroad shop as foreman, holding the position eighteen years. Resigning, he became a contractor and builder in Brunswick, but about 1889 re-entered the railway service in the same capacity as before. In 1891 he was elected to the office of sanitary superintendent of Brunswick, and held it until his death. A notable tribute to his worth and general efficiency as a public officer is the fact of his holding the office of alderman of the city for twelve successive years, his service ending in 1888. Mr. Harvey was married to Miss Jane Kendrick, Sept. 16, 1863, who has borne him nine children, six of whom are living: Henry H., Nina (Mrs. Bryant), Estelle, Annetta, Annabelle and Ada. Mr. Harvey was a Knight of Pythias and master of exchequer of his lodge until he declined re-election. Mr. Harvey died Nov. 12, 1894, lamented by a large circle of friends. Mrs. Harvey and her daughters are members of the Methodist church.

THOMAS W. LAMB, collector of customs, Brunswick, Ga., of Scotch-Irish descent on the father's side, and son of Burrill and Matilda (Bunkley) Lamb, was born on Cumberland island, Camden Co., Ga., Sept. 7, 1847. Both parents were natives of Glynn county and belonged to a family among the oldest in the state. His father died in 1881 aged sixty-eight years. His mother, a daughter of Thomas P. Bunkley, died in Brunswick, Jan. 11, 1895, aged seventy-six years. Mr. Lamb was educated at Glynn county academy, and this limited education constituted his capital, as he began life a poor man. What he has, both of property and official reputation, has been acquired since the war, by honest toil, industry and business ability. In the spring of 1862, a mere youth, he enlisted in Capt. McMiller's company, Fourth Georgia cavalry, was promoted to second sergeant, served through the entire war, and surrendered with his command at its close. Since the war he has been called to fill many and varied offices, state and Federal, than which no better evidence could be given of his integrity, faithfulness and efficiency. He has served Glynn county as sheriff six years, represented the county two terms in the house, and the senatorial district one term in the general assembly of the state, was mayor of Brunswick in 1892 and 1893, the last year during the yellow fever epidemic when he bravely remained at his post of duty, and in January, 1894, was appointed collector of customs for the port of Brunswick, Ga., by President Cleveland. Mayor Lamb passed through two yellow fever epidemics, one in 1876, when he had the fever himself, and the other in 1893, exhibiting a moral courage and self-sacrificing spirit rarely equaled. Mr. Lamb has a fine plantation, 1,000 acres, and a number of fine city lots. He was married in 1866 to Miss Laura B. Kendrick, by whom he had eight children, all of whom are living. Mrs. Lamb died in 1889, and Mr. Lamb was married again, Feb. 7, 1893, to Miss Sarah C. Pyles. Mrs. Lamb is a member of the Methodist church.

JOHAN P. LAMB, deceased, treasurer of Glynn county, Ga., son of John and Elizabeth (Webster) Lamb, natives respectively of South Carolina and Connecticut, was born in Glynn county, near where he now lives, July 29, 1825. Mr. Lamb's father was brought to Georgia from South Carolina when a child, and died in Glynn county when about sixty years old, and his mother died when about fifty-five years old. His grandfather, Frederick Lamb, was born in Virginia, and when a boy ran away from home and entered the revolutionary army. The disbandment of the army at the close of the war left him at Camden, S. C., where he met and married Celia Bowen, and not long afterward came to Georgia and settled in Glynn county. John P. Lamb was elected tax collector of the county in 1852 and again in 1856. In 1860 he was elected sheriff, which office he held at the outbreak of the war. On Aug. 17, 1861, he enlisted in the Glynn county guards. His command was stationed on St. Simons island, where batteries were established, and where the guards remained until 1862. He served in the army during the entire war but with the forces assigned to coast defense. He surrendered to Capt. Lee of the "Wamsutta," and was paroled June 1, 1865. In 1872 he was elected treasurer of Glynn county, and was re-elected at each succeeding election, and held it until he died, affording the most conclusive testimony as to his faithfulness and efficiency as an officer, and of his popularity as a citizen. Mr. Lamb was married in 1844 to Miss Martha Middleton, who after bearing him seven children, all of whom are dead, died Nov. 28, 1878. He was again married in July, 1883, to Miss Amy Jones. Mr. Lamb began life as a poor man, but died possessed of a good 1,000-acre farm and half a thousand head of cattle, besides much other stock and property. He was regarded as one of Glynn county's most substantial and highly respected citizens, was a master Mason, and was a member of the Methodist church, of which his widow is a much-prized and exemplary member.

JUDGE M. L. MERSHON, attorney at law, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of William and Elizabeth (Brown) Mershon, natives of Hancock county, Ga., was born in Monticello, Fla., April 26, 1839. The Mershons in this country are reputed to be descendants from a lad whose parents being Huguenots fled from France on the promulgation of the edict of Nantes. His parents having died during the voyage, he, after landing, was apprenticed in New Rochelle, N. Y. Enos Mershon, the Judge's grandfather, was a native of Maryland. Judge Mershon was educated in the common schools of Florida, came to Georgia in 1859, and shortly afterward settled in Brunswick. During 1859-60 he studied law, and in 1860 was admitted to the bar. He enlisted in 1861, and served through the war in the army of the west, mainly under Gens. Bragg and Hood. Judge Mershon was a member of the constitutional convention of 1877; was subsequently elected judge of the Brunswick circuit court twice, but resigned in 1886 before the expiration of his second term, and went to south Florida and practiced law. In 1890 he returned to Brunswick, where he settled and resumed the practice of his profession, acquiring a fine reputation and securing a large practice. In 1892 he was elected to represent Glynn county in the general assembly in which body he made strenuous efforts to have a state board of health established. Judge Mershon is highly esteemed as a lawyer and as a citizen, and is very popular with all classes of his fellow-citizens.

C. G. MOORE, undertaker, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Benjamin and Percy (Stocking) Moore, was born in Litchfield, Conn., March 13, 1832. His great-great-grandfather was an Irishman; his great-grandmother was a Miss Collier, who was born in Scotland. While Mr. Moore was yet young his father had the misfortune to lose his eyesight, and at the tender age of thirteen he started out to solve the problem of life. He was for awhile in New Haven, and while there was a member of the New Haven Blues. In 1855 he came to Georgia, and located in Thomasville. He was in the employ of the Atlantic & Gulf (now Savannah, Florida & Western) railway, and during the war as foreman of the machine shops. In 1866 he permanently established himself in Brunswick, where he has been satisfactorily successful. Not being much inclined to office-holding, he has filled but one, and that was as an alderman of the city for three years. He has established a good business, and is the leading undertaker and director of funerals in the city. Mr. Moore was married in 1866 to Miss Sarah, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Smith, of Patchogue, Long Island, N. Y. Her mother, Mrs. Abbie (Tuttle) Smith, is still living, and at the advanced age of ninety-five can read the New York "Herald" without the aid of glasses. Three children blessed this union: Mary (Mrs. Valentine), Sarah Jane (Mrs. Graham), and William Benjamin. Mrs. Moore died Oct. 6, 1876, of yellow fever, and in November, 1878, Mr. Moore married Miss Annie E. Brooks, a native of Wiscasset, Maine. Mr. Moore is a member of the Methodist church, and Mrs. Moore is an Episcopalian.

TOBIAS NEWMAN, wholesale liquor merchant, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Eberhard and Marguerite (Williams) Newman, was born in Germany, Oct. 22, 1848. His parents were natives of Hanover, Germany, where they lived and died, the father in 1886, aged seventy years, and the mother in 1890, aged sixty-eight years. Capt. Newman came to the United States when only thirteen years old, and followed the sea in the commercial marine service for seven years, when he went on the revenue cutter "Petrel" as quartermaster, and served in that capacity two years. In 1869 he went into business in Columbus, Ga., and remained there until 1886, when he went to Brunswick and established himself in his present enterprise, continuing that in Columbus until 1890. Beginning life a mere boy and poor, he has, as the results of the national traits of his race—patient industry and frugality—built up a profitable business and accumulated a handsome competency. Capt. Newman was married in 1869 to Miss Jennie Evens, born in Apalachicola, Fla., daughter of Jack and Mary Evens. Mr. and Mrs.

Evans were natives of Ireland. To Capt. and Mrs. Newman eight children were born: George, Mollie, Nettie, Maggie, Josephine, Walter, Tobias, Jr., and Eberhard. Mrs. Newman is a Catholic. Capt. Newman is a member and the captain of Oglethorpe division No. 4, uniform rank, Knights of Pythias. He was the proud and exultant winner of the division prize—$200 cash—for the best-drilled company. He is very enthusiastic in regard to everything pertaining to the military company to which he belongs and with whose members he is very popular. He is very much respected in Brunswick as a citizen and business man.

CHARLES D. OGG, merchant broker, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Richard T. and Nannie (Anderson) Ogg, was born in Louisa county, Va., Dec. 9, 1859. His parents were natives respectively of Goochland and Louisa counties, Va. His father is still living in Louisa county, aged about sixty-seven years; but his mother died in 1882, when about forty-eight years old. They had three children, of whom the subject of this sketch was the second, and is the only survivor. Mr. Ogg was educated in the private schools of Rockbridge county, Va., and at Richmond college, Richmond, Va. He began his business life when only thirteen years old, on his father's farm; his father being a railroad man placed the farm in charge of the boy on strict business principles—for a consideration. His father, however, paid for his education; this and his home experience was all the capital he had. What he has now of property and enviable reputation is the result of his own efforts. Prior to 1882 he taught school four sessions and then engaged as a clerk in the general office of the C. & O. railway in Richmond. While thus employed he studied and learned shorthand. About 1883 he went to Hinton, W. Va., as stenographer of the Huntington division of the C. & O. In 1885 Mr. Ogg was made chief clerk in the office under E. H. Barnes, superintendent of that division. In March, 1886, he accompanied Mr. Barnes to Atlanta as chief clerk in his office, he having received the appointment of superintendent of the Atlanta and Brunswick division of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railway. In October of that year Mr. Ogg was appointed general agent at Jesup, Ga., for the same road; and in December, 1888, he was transferred to Brunswick, where he served the company as agent until May 1, 1890. On that date he retired and embarked with Mr. B. A. Hancock in the merchandise brokerage business under the firm name of Hancock & Ogg. Dissolving his connection with Mr. Hancock he entered in partnership with R. F. Bowles in September, 1890, in the same business, the firm being R. F. Bowles & Co. In February, 1892, he bought the Bowles interest and since then has had entire control. His sales annually aggregate the handsome sum of $250,000. Besides valuable real estate and bank and other stocks in Brunswick, Mr. Ogg is largely interested in real estate in Kansas City, Mo. He is a stockholder and director of the Merchants' and Traders' bank and a member of the discount board. He is a director and chairman of the transportation committee of the board of trade. He has been at the head of several delegations to present Brunswick's grievances to the railroad commission in Atlanta, particularly in January and February, 1893. Interested parties had secured rates favorable to other competing points extremely prejudicial to Brunswick; and to the strong and persistent efforts of Mr. Ogg is mainly due the credit of securing an equitable adjustment and a restoration of the old rates. He was also one of the delegates from Brunswick to the first direct trade meeting in Savannah in February, 1893. Mr. Ogg is an ardent and enthusiastic Mason—senior warden of the "blue lodge;" and has recently been instrumental in establishing a chapter of royal arch Masons, of which he is P. S. Mr. Ogg's steady, continuous and rapid promotion from the time he entered upon railway work until he retired from it, is conclusive proof of his industry and his fidelity to the interests of the company and of their appreciation of his services; while his splendid success since he entered upon his present business, and the important and responsible positions he has held and now holds in commercial and fraternal organizations and banking institutions bear gratifying and unmistakable testimony to his business sagacity and sterling integrity of character.

JOHN T. PALMER, boot and shoe merchant, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., son of Dr. John T. and Amanda (Barbour) Palmer, was born in Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., Dec. 27, 1851. His grandparents were John and Nancy (Flood) Palmer, of Waterford, Ireland. Mr. Palmer's father and two brothers and an uncle came from Ireland to the United States in 1832, and located in Pittsburg, Pa. His grandfather, although a man of some means, believed it best for each of his sons to be master of some trade, so he remained in Pittsburg three years that he might accomplish his object. Mr. Palmer's father learned the trade of tailor, and after "graduating," migrated to Athens, Ga., went thence to Washington, Ga., and finally in 1849, went to Lumpkin, Ga. Here he studied medicine under Dr. Thomas Battle, and entering the field of practice, achieved quite a success. He volunteered at the beginning of the war and was appointed assistant surgeon of the Seventeenth Georgia regiment, and remained in the army until after the battle of Chickamauga. Having contracted pneumonia by exposure during the battle, his health failed and he resigned in 1864. He died the next year. Dr. Palmer was a very enthusiastic Mason, and had taken all the degrees except the thirty-third; and he held many positions of honor and trust in the fraternity. He numbered among his particular friends, Alex. H. Stephens, "Bob" Toombs, and many other prominent men of the state and nation. He was a member of the Methodist church, took great interest in all its work, was a class leader and an enthusiastic Sunday school worker. Mr. Palmer, the subject of this sketch, started in business life as a clerk at the age of nineteen, with R. C. Black, Americus, Ga., and steadily advanced in his line until now he has become the leading dealer in Brunswick in every style and grade of foot-wear, with a good start and a bright promise of a competency in the near future. 1878 Mr. Palmer married Laura, daughter of Capt. J. W. Sealy, a native of Marion county, Ga., but now a prominent citizen of Cuthbert, Ga. To them four children have been born: John Sealy; Helen Amanda; Marion Dunwoody and Lucien Key. Mr. and Mrs. Palmer are members of the Methodist church.

A. T. PUTNAM, livery stableman and real estate dealer, Brunswick, Glynn Co., Ga., related by blood to the revolutionary hero, Gen. Israel Putnam, is the son of Willis and Amanda (Thompson) Putnam, and was born about ten miles from Gainesville, Hall Co., Ga., Dec. 27, 1836. Mr. Putnam's father was born in Virginia, and was a descendant of one of the three brothers who emigrated to this country before the eighteenth century, two of whom were named John and Israel, the last named probably the father of Gen. Putnam, who was born in Salem, Mass., Jan. 7, 1718, whose hazardous and courageous exploits of attacking a wolf in its den and escaping from the British by riding down a precipitous rock stairway numbering several hundred steps, and extraordinary bravery during the war, are familiar to all readers of American history. His mother was a daughter of Andrew Thompson. She was born Nov. 13, 1820, and died Oct. 4, 1841. Mr. Putnam received but ten months' schooling at his father's expense; all besides he paid for himself. When fifteen years old he began the battle of life—left to his own resources—and for the first twelve months he was paid $40. He was a messenger for Gov. J. E. Brown in Milledgeville, and in 1861 accompanied Gov. Brown to Atlanta. He served some time with the state troops; but in January, 1863, he enlisted in Company E, Twenty-second Georgia battalion, served through the war and was paroled at Augusta, he being home at the time on a furlough. After the war he settled in Brunswick, where, by enterprise and unusual sagacity in making investments, he has accumulated quite a fortune, including among other valuable property, an entire block of brick buildings. He lost $55,000 by the war. He has served the city as alderman about ten years. Mr. Putnam was married to Miss Mary Harton, of Putnam county, Ga., Feb. 1, 1861, who bore him three children, one of whom only is living. His wife died in 1880. Mr. Putnam contracted a second marriage in 1881, with Miss Viola Johnson, of Houston county, by whom he has had two children, of whom only one is living, Etta. Both the wives of Mr. Putnam were nieces of the late W. B. Johnson, a wealthy capitalist of Macon Ga. Mr. and Mrs. Putnam are active and liberal and consequently influential members of the Missionary Baptist church. The congregation has recently erected a beautiful house of worship which cost about $40,000. Mr. Putnam was chairman of the building committee and contributed largely toward its construction, in addition to which he has become personally responsible for an unpaid balance due on it. Mr. Putnam is a master Mason and a member of the I. O. O. F. He has passed through all the chairs of the last named fraternity, and represented his lodge at the grand encampment. He is also a member of the Legion of Honor. The practical foresight of Mr. Putnam is demonstrated by his carrying a heavy life insurance policy.

J. B. WRIGHT, merchant, St. Simon's Island, Glynn Co., Ga., a son of M. C. B. and Elizabeth (Anderson) Wright, was born in Glynn county, Aug. 5, 1853. His parents were respectively of English and Scotch descent; both were born in Glynn county. Major Samuel Wright, the ancestor of this family, came to Georgia with Gen. Oglethorpe, and first settled in Frederica, on St. Simon's Island. Mr. Wright's father was at one time sheriff of Glynn county; his mother died about 1884 aged fifty-five years, his father at an earlier date. J. B. Wright began life for himself at the early age of fourteen, with no means and no aid from his father; but he managed to wrest from his hard conditions of life a very handsome property. He owns three-fourths of the steamer "Hessix," and manages its business. He was married to Lizzie M. Earle, of Brooklyn, N Y., in 1879, by whom he has had three children; but one only, Mary Elizabeth, is now living. Mrs. Wright is a Catholic. Mr. Wright is a Mason and enjoys the esteem of all who know him.

G. W. WRIGHT, deceased, merchant and farmer, Sterling Station, Glynn Co., Ga., a son of James B. and Ann (Bumett) Wright, natives of Glynn county, was born in Glynn county Oct. 25, 1829. His father was a son of Maj. Samuel Wright, a British officer during the war of 1812, who then made the acquaintance of a lady whom he, after peace was proclaimed, returned to the United States and married. James B. Wright died in 1865, and his widow, aged eighty-four years, died in 1879. Mr. Wright was thrown on his own resources when fifteen years of age, followed farming and farm-managing before the war; and his services in the last named capacity commanding good salaries, enabled him to acquire a fairly handsome estate. In the spring of 1861 he enlisted in the Fourth Georgia cavalry and was made orderly sergeant of his company, an office, however, which he did not long retain. Being regarded as a very cool and brave man, and an unusually good woodsman, he was principally employed in scout work, serving as such in Tennessee and Georgia. He was in the battles of Atlanta and Jonesboro, and when the end came he was guarding a railway bridge at Doctortown, Wayne Co., Ga., where he surrendered and was paroled in 1865. His most thrilling and impressive experiences during the war were two narrow escapes from death —one when a bullet grazed him in front, and another when a bullet grazed him in the back, each passing above the saddle; and on one occasion when all he had to eat for four days was one small “nubbin of corn” about four inches long. When the war ended he had lost everything except his land and a yoke of oxen. Going bravely to work, good farm management and judicious investments accumulated a fair fortune, but he could not be considered wealthy. Mr. Wright had a general merchandise store, carried a large and well assorted stock, owned 5,000 acres of land, and was a stockholder in the Southern bank of the state of Georgia, in Savannah. Unambitious as to political honors he declined offers to place him in office. Mr. Wright was married to Miss Clifford Burnett in 1851, by whom he had one child; and his wife died soon afterward. The child, a daughter, died also at sixteen years of age. In 1857 Mr. Wright was married to Miss Annie E. Taylor, daughter of Silas W. and Marguerite (Lowery) Taylor, natives of Glynn county, and this second union was blessed with nine children: G. W., Jr., J. S., Charlton, Mary Letitia (Mrs. P. W. Fleming), Ada, Daisy, Bessie, Maggie, and one which died in infancy. Mr. Wright was a devoted member of the Protestant Episcopal church, of which his bereaved widow is also an exemplary member.

GORDON COUNTY.

FRANCIS A. FULLER, farmer, Reeves Station, Gordon Co., Ga., son of W. J. and Melinda (Lay) Fuller, was born in Gordon county Aug. 15, 1865. His father was born and raised in Warren county, Ga., but left there in 1844, and settled in what is now Gordon county. His mother was a native of South Carolina. Their union was blessed with nine children: Spivey, deceased; Boon J.; W. G.; Polly; Benjamin H.; Freeman L.; Susie; Ada, deceased; and Francis A., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Fuller was raised on the farm, his educational advantages were very limited, and he started out in life with no capital except good health, an honest purpose and a resolute will. His principal pursuit has been farming; but he has used his surplus earnings in successful trading until he has accumulated considerable real estate, and is regarded as being now one of the solidest men in the county, and, prospectively, one of its wealthiest. He is a progressive farmer, public spirited, alive to the interests and development of the county, a good manager, and a “wide-awake” trader. He is a prominent and active member of the Missionary Baptist church.

M. A. GUNN, farmer, Plainville, Gordon Co., Ga., son of Alexander and Marguerite (Blackwood) Gunn, was born in Lincoln county, N. C., in 1828. His father was born, raised and educated in Glasgow, Scotland. About the beginning of the revolutionary war he, in company with five hundred college boys, came to this country. He settled on a farm and married in North Carolina, where he lived until 1849, when he came to Georgia and settled in Cass (now Bartow) county. Nine children were born to his parents: M. A., the subject of this sketch, Mary A., John M., James T., Jane G., Marguerite C., Henry M., William, and Belda A. Mr. Gunn was raised on the farm in North Carolina, where his educational advantages were very meager. On attaining to manhood he moved to South Carolina, where he lived ten years, and then came to Georgia.

Farming has been his principal occupation, though he has had considerable to do with machinery. He settled where he now lives in 1858, where he has a large, well stocked and well improved farm; and, although he began with very little, is now "full-handed," and is one of Gordon county's most prosperous and substantial citizens. In addition to conducting a large farm he is an extensive fruit grower—one of the largest in that part of the state. He entered the Confederate service during the late war, enlisting in 1861 and serving until the surrender in 1865. Mr. Gunn was married in 1858 to Miss Lucinda, daughter of William and Polly McDonald, of Floyd county, Ga., by whom he has had nine children: William A., John H., Mary A., James P., Robert, M. E., Georgia Lucinda, Rosie, and Thomas P. He is a prominent member of the Methodist church.

JOHN MARTIN GUNN, farmer, Plainville, Gordon Co., Ga., son of Alexander M. and Marguerite (Blackwood) Gunn, was born in Lincoln county, N. C., in 1832. (For sketch of his father see sketch of his brother, M. A. Gunn, preceding this.) Mr. Gunn migrated from North Carolina to Georgia in 1863 and settled in Gordon county. He was exempted from military service during the late civil war on account of physical disability. In addition to farming he owned and operated a grist mill during the war and supplied the Confederate gun factory at Adairsville, Ga., with meal and flour. He is a progressive and good farmer, entirely reliable in every respect, and no citizen of the county is more highly esteemed. Mr. Gunn was married in 1863 to Miss Cornelia L., daughter of John and Katharine Wood, of Clarke county, Ga., by whom he has had eight children: John T. A., Calvin G., Alevia, Minnie, Katharine, Nettie S., Henry, and Benjamin Franklin. He is a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church.

W. R. HARBIN, physician and surgeon, Calhoun, Gordon Co., Ga., son of Thomas W. and Matilda (Reda) Harbin, was born in Oconee district, S. C., April 25, 1832. His paternal grandparents were Thomas and Mary (Wether-spoon) Harbin; and his maternal grandparents were Jonathan and Sarah (Ward) Reda. To his parents the following children were born: Sarah C., Samuel V., Mary E., Jonathan M., Andrew P., Nathaniel W., Harriet Rebecca, and W. R., the subject of this sketch. Dr. Harbin enjoyed excellent educational advantages while growing up, and after receiving his primary and preliminary education, read medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. Robert B. Maxwell, a very successful and eminent practitioner of Oconee district. He then attended lectures at Charleston, S. C., Medical college, from which he was graduated in March, 1858. He immediately located in his native county, where he successfully practiced for thirteen years. In 1871 he came to Georgia and bought a farm and settled in Gordon county, continuing and building up a large and valuable practice. During the war he enlisted in a squadron which was soon converted into the Seventh regiment South Carolina cavalry, Col. J. B. Sloane; saw much active and arduous service, and was in all the skirmishes along the north side of James river, and in all the fights from Richmond to the Appomattox. He was captured at Farmville the Saturday night before the surrender, and remained a prisoner until the news of that event reached him. When released he walked home, a distance of four hundred miles. Dr. Harbin enjoys an enviable reputation in his profession, and has the unlimited confidence of the community. Dr. Harbin was married March 28, 1861, to Miss Mary S., daughter of Thomas R. and Susan A. Shelor, of South Carolina, who has borne him four children: Thomas W., Robert M., William P., and Nina V. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and a prominent member of the Missionary Baptist church.

DR. I. N. HUFFAKER, Plainville, Gordon Co., Ga., son of James L. and Isabel (Kincamon) Huffaker, was born in Bradley county, Tenn., Sept. 2, 1852. In 1853 his father moved from Tennessee to Georgia and settled on a farm in Whitfield county, and in 1889 he moved to Gordon Co., Ga., which has since been his home. Dr. Huffaker enjoyed only moderate educational advantages, having attended the best schools in the country in his boyhood and youth. He attended lectures in Southern Medical college, Atlanta, from which he graduated in 1882. He immediately located in Plainville, Ga., and entered upon the practice of his profession. Success has crowned his labors. He enjoys a remunerative business, both as a physician and merchant. He married Miss Mollie Williamson, oldest daughter of R. M. and Elizabeth Williamson, and two sons have blessed their union, William I. and James R. Huffaker.

MADISON D. PATE, farmer, Sugar Valley, Gordon Co., Ga., son of Madison and Nancy (Tidwell) Pate, was born in Talbot county, Ga., July 31, 1859. His parents were natives of Warren county, Ga., where they were married, and afterward moved to Talbot county, where they died in 1874. Of their children the following survive: Joe E.; George W.; John D.; Annie, and Madison D., the subject of this sketch. When quite young Mr. Pate was taken to Tennessee, where he remained about a year on a farm, and then was brought back to Georgia, to Murray county, where he lived seven years on a farm. In 1881 he entered the machine shops of the Richmond & Danville (old Georgia Air Line), and worked there faithfully eleven years. In 1892 he had the good fortune to draw $15,000 in the Louisiana State lottery, and after remaining in the shops three months he decided on investing a liberal portion of his money in Gordon county. His home is on the land he then bought, and he has one of the finest farms in that section of the state. His educational advantages were very limited, but he managed to obtain between the hours of labor on the farm and in the shops a fairly good English rudimental education. Progressive and deservedly prosperous, he commands the respect of all. He is an ardent member of the Order of Red Men.

JOHAN TALIAFERRO, farmer and real estate dealer, Plainville, Gordon Co., Ga., son of Dickerson and Mary (Harris) Taliaferro, was born March 7, 1828. His paternal grandfather, Charles Taliaferro, was a native of Virginia, who early in life moved to Surry county, N. C., where he settled and raised his family. Mr. Taliaferro's father migrated from Surry county, N. C., to Georgia, in 1846, and settled in the woods, where he cleared a farm in what is now Whitfield county. In 1850 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly. His wife died in 1889 and he in 1893. Mr. Taliaferro enjoyed fairly good educational advantages in Surry county, N. C., where he lived on the farm until he was eighteen years old, when his father moved to Georgia. On reaching maturity he engaged in farming, which has been the principal pursuit of his life. When the war between the states began he enlisted in a company—of which he was made first lieutenant—in a regiment commanded by Col. Wright. After sixteen months' service he was released from further duty on account of his broken-down health. On his return home he resumed farming, and in connection with it dealt in real estate largely to his pecuniary interest. In 1862 he moved from Whitfield to Gordon county, and fourteen years later went to Rome, in Floyd county. In 1880 he moved back to Gordon county, to the place which is now his home. He started in life with no means, but invested so judiciously and financiered so ably that he has accumulated a large property, is one of the most solid citizens of the county, and regarded as one of its ablest financiers—influential and highly esteemed. Mr. Taliaferro has been married twice. Oct. 1, 1859, he was married to Miss Frances, daughter of Samuel and Emeline (Lynch) King, of Gordon county, who died leaving six children: Mary Ellen, Lula, Samuel Dickerson, Charles Harden, George William, and John Henry. July 24, 1887, he contracted a second marriage with Sarah E., daughter of M. J. and Priscilla Velvin, of Carroll county, Ga. He is a master Mason and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

GREENE COUNTY.

COPELAND. Greene county, Ga., has been prolific of men noted for great intellectual endowments, advanced thought and action, broad-mindedness and public spirit, and inflexible integrity of character. Though not politically conspicuous, a worthy representative of the patriotic and self-reliant characteristics of its citizens is the family of Copeland, one of the earliest of its settlers. One of the living representatives of this family is Edward A. Copeland, banker, Greensboro, son of Obadiah and Sarah (Credille) Copeland, who was born in Greene county in 1849. His father was born in Greene county in 1806; was raised a farmer, and followed farming all his life. He was a soldier in the Creek war in 1836, and was a justice of the peace many years. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and of the Methodist church. His mother was a daughter of Dray Credille, who was also of the early settlers. She was born in Greene county and was a very enthusiastic, old-time shouting Wesleyan Methodist. After her marriage she helped clear the land for the farm, and in burning the brush after night. Mr. Copeland was raised on his father's farm, and received a fairly good education, a collegiate one having been prevented by the war between the states, which nearly ruined his father. When about fifteen years of age he engaged as a clerk in the store of C. A. Davis, Greensboro, at $25 a month. He remained there until he was twenty-one years of age, when Mr. Davis loaned him $10,000 with which to buy an interest in his business. During his clerkship he had saved $250, but loaned it to a friend who never returned it. A few years later he became a member of the firm of McCall, Copeland & Co., remaining five years, and then embarked in the grocery business. He continued this for five years with unusually profitable results, when he formed the co-partnership of Copeland, Seals & Armor in 1883, and bought the business of the successors of McCall, Copeland & Co. This firm continued business five years, and although their sales averaged $80,000 annually, they lost only $2,000 in that time. In 1888 he withdrew from mercantile life, and in 1889 built a house and established a private bank. The capital stock of the bank is $60,000, and he has managed it with such consummate financial skill as to have had on Jan. 1, 1895, a surplus of more than $20,000. As a business man and as a financier he has developed extraordinary ability, and takes rank with the foremost, not only in his immediate locality, but in the state. Industrious, prompt, just and of unimpeachable integrity, he has the unlimited confidence of the large and valuable capitalistic constituency he has won and retains. He has served as a director of the Georgia Railroad and Banking company and is now a member of the board of county commissioners. Being comparatively young, with a record such as his already made, it may be safely assumed that not many years hence few men in the state will outrank him as a manager of money or as a man of wealth. Mr. Copeland was happily married in 1879 to Miss Leila J.—born and raised in Greensboro—daughter of William A. and Anna A. (Kinbrough) Davis, by whom he has had two children: Anna and Mary. Mr. and Mrs. Copeland are very prominent members of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward and trustee and superintendent of the Sunday school.

JOHAN T. DOLVIN, farmer, Siloam, Greene Co., Ga., son of James and Margaret (McHargue) Dolvin, was born in Greene county in 1826. His paternal grandparents, John and Nancy (Hogue) Dolvin, were natives of Maryland, came to Georgia in 1783 and settled in that part of Washington county which was organized as Greene county in 1786, on land which has ever since remained in the family. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war seven years; and the lands in this state were acquired under a United States warrant for those services. The subject of this sketch has in his possession the hone and razor used by his grandfather during the war. In 1780-82 he was a justice of the peace in Maryland. Farming was his occupation, but in early life he taught school several years. His wife was a strict and exemplary member of the Presbyterian church, and was a charter member of the first church instituted in Greene county. Mr. Dolvin's father was born in 1792 on the family homestead, and his mother was born on an adjoining homestead, both of which are now the property of Mr. Dolvin. He was educated at the old-time dirt-floor log schoolhouse, with split log seats and stick-and-mud chimney, and was raised a farmer. He was a soldier under Gen. Jackson in the Indian war of 1813-14, acting as orderly sergeant, his commanding officer being Capt. (afterward Gen.) Thomas Dawson. He was a hard worker, temperate in all things, and a forty-years member of the Methodist church, of which he was a steward. He died in 1880. Mr. Dolvin's maternal great-grandparents, Joshua and Lucina McHargue, were natives of Ireland, emigrated to this country early in life and settled in Georgia; and his mother's parents, John and Martha (Thomas) McHargue, were born in Greene county. Mr. Dolvin attained to manhood on the farm and received a good education at the log school house of the period. He was frequently solicited to teach school, but declined. In 1852 he was elected justice of the peace, has been continuously re-elected since, and has never had a single decision reversed. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Capt. Robert L. McWhorter, Third Georgia regiment, Col. Ambrose R. Wright. Among other important battles he participated in the seven days' fight around Richmond, Malvern Hill, second Manassas, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Wilderness, Petersburg, etc. He served through the war without receiving a wound or being captured; he served as brigade commissary, as well as in minor official positions, and surrendered at Appomattox, after which he walked home. His and his wife's family were really pioneers; and, as already stated, he owns and lives on the land settled by their grandparents on which both were born. He owns a thousand acres of as good land as there is in Greene county, is a solid and model citizen, than whom none is more genuinely esteemed. Mr. Dolvin was married in 1851 to Miss Ann, daughter of Johnson and Eliza (Cheney) Boswell, natives of Wilkes county, Ga., who had seven sons and two sons-in-law in the Confederate service during the late "unpleasantness." Seven children blessed this union: James B.; John Gillmore; Martha A.; Sarah E.; Fannie I.; Hattie, and Floyd. Mr. Dolvin was once a member of the I. O. O. F., and is now a master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Presbyterian church.

HART. Very prominent among the leading and most influential families of Greene county is that of Hart, so historically prominent that a territorial subdivision of the state bears its name. A representative and distinguished member of this family is John C. Hart, judge of Ocmulgee circuit, Union Point, Greene Co., son of James and Maria (Collier) Hart, who was born in Greene county in 1854.

His paternal grandparents, Thomas and Anna (Barnett) Hart, were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated on horseback and in wagons to Georgia, and settled in the woods in Greene county. He was an officer in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and the family had in its possession the epaulettes he wore until about three years ago, when, by the burning of a house in which they were, they were destroyed. He was a farmer and also a brick mason, and built the court house in which his grandson, the subject of this sketch, now holds court as judge. He also built the chapel of the university of Georgia at Athens. Judge Hart's father was born in Greene county in 1825, and after "graduating" from the "old-field" school improved upon and finished his education by his own unaided efforts. When a youth he went to Augusta and engaged as a clerk, and later was in partnership with Alfred Baker, under the firm name of Baker & Hart, and ranked with the leading merchants in that go-ahead, progressive city. As a member of the city council of Augusta he superintended the planting of the trees in Greene street, which has made that thoroughfare one of the most attractive and delightful of streets, the equal of any in any city of the Union. During the (now rapidly receding) "unpleasantness" he served in the state militia. On a certain occasion during this time Gov. Brown visited Union Point, and the "boys" (students) at Mercer university, Penfield, planned to "mob" the governor, but Mr. Hart took the matter in hand and prevented the consummation of the outrage. Judge Hart has in his possession the letter written to his father by Gov. Brown conveying his thanks for the service. He died in 1875. Judge Hart's mother was a daughter of Edward and Sarah (Germany) Collier, native South Carolinians. Dr. Collier was a very eminent and popular physician, and was a cousin of James Pettigrew, the great South Carolina lawyer. Judge Hart was raised on the farm, and after receiving a good primary and preparatory education at the schools in the county, entered the university of Georgia, Athens, from which he graduated as bachelor of law in 1875, and located at Union Point, and commenced the practice of law in connection with farming. The year he graduated his father died leaving a debt of $10,000 with 12 per cent. interest on the old homestead. This debt the judge paid, principal and interest. He rose very rapidly as a profound lawyer in the estimation of the people and the bar, soon became a leading member of both the local and circuit bar, and now has a state wide reputation. Since his elevation to the bench his rulings have been generally sustained, and he probably has before him as bright a professional and political future as any member of the legal profession in Georgia. Judge Hart was married in 1877 to Miss Irene, born and raised in Augusta, Ga., daughter of James W. and Georgia Horton, natives of Jackson county, Ga. Three children are the fruit of this union: Henry H., John C., and an infant unnamed. The home of Judge Hart at Union Point is one of the most delightful in the county, and can hardly be surpassed in Georgia. He is a member of the Chi Phi fraternity and a master Mason, and himself and wife are very prominent members of the Presbyterian church.

Virginia Hart, sister of Judge John C. Hart, was born and raised in Greene county, Ga., and was married in 1865 to Samuel H. Sibley, a leading merchant of Augusta, Ga. He was a son of Josiah Sibley, who three score years ago was a very prominent merchant and warehouseman in Hamburg, S. C. A brother of his, Amory Sibley, was a large cotton buyer in Augusta and president of the Mechanics' bank. These brothers were direct lineal descendants of John Sibley, who came to America in 1629.

Samuel H. Sibley enlisted in Company A, Cobb's legion, and gallantly served through the war, at the close of which he engaged in business in Augusta, with increasing success until his death, leaving a widow and four children: Jennie, Katie, Samuel H., Jr. and Hart. Samuel H. Sibley, Jr., after receiving his preparatory education attended the university of Georgia, Athens, from which he was graduated with the first honor in 1892. Subsequently he studied law and was admitted to the bar. Although young he has attained to a front position in the legal profession, his great ability and early success giving promise of a brilliant professional and political career.

S. J. JERNIGAN, farmer, White Plains, Greene Co., Ga., son of Hardy and Frances (Colvert) Jernigan, was born in Hancock county, Ga., in 1811. His paternal grandparents, Needom (Sandey) Jernigan, were natives of North Carolina, who moved to South Carolina, where he enlisted in the patriot army during the revolutionary war and served as a lieutenant till the close of the war, enduring all the hardships and privations incident to that conflict, but escaped capture and was wounded but once. After the war he moved to Georgia and settled in Burke county, coming with pack horses and ox carts held together with wooden pins and hickory withes on oldtime block wheels. At first they lived almost entirely on wild game; the carcass of a deer jerked and dried would last several days. Mr. Jernigan's father was born in South Carolina in 1766, and came to Georgia with his parents after the revolutionary war. On one occasion, when living in Burke county, having killed a beef and salt was needed, he went a long distance for it and it cost one dollar a quart. Returning, riding leisurely along, he spied a coon, and couldn't resist the temptation to attempt its capture. He failed in his attempt and to add to the mortification of his failure his salt fell off into some water and was ruined. He was married in 1790, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. His mother was a daughter of John Colvert, whose family was among the early settlers of Wilkes county. He was a very prominent and leading citizen of the county. Mr. Jernigan grew to manhood in Hancock county, Ga., where he was educated at the oft-described historic dirt-floor log school house, what education he has having been obtained between "laying-by" and "fodder-pulling time." He was a volunteer soldier in the Seminole or Florida war of 1836. On March 31 that year the Federal forces had a fight with the Seminole chief, Osceola, and would have captured him but for Gen. Scott's trustfulness and Osceola's treachery. The Indians had their women and children with them, and displayed a white flag, which Gen. Scott respected, and ordered his troops to fall back. This was Osceola's ruse to gain time, and taking advantage of the time gained, the wily chief transported the live stock and women and children across the river, and then violating their promise to meet in council they stealthily returned and killed many of the Federal troops. Returning from the war he engaged in farming, which has been his occupation since. In 1850 he moved to Greene county and made it his permanent home. He was a major of the militia when it was a local distinction. Mr. Jernigan was married in 1838 to Miss Evaline B., born in Greene county, daughter of Duke and Susan (Weathers) Williams, and to them the following children have been born: John R., Emma, Henry, Charles, James, deceased, William, Mary Willie, Nuna J., Melville and Robert Lee. He was made a master Mason in 1836, is one of the oldest Masons in the state, and has held most of the offices in the blue lodge; and himself and wife are devout and prominent members of the Baptist church.

GWINNETT COUNTY.

ROBERT H. ALLEN, merchant and manufacturer, Buford, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of Washington and Biddy (Mackin) Allen, was born in Gwinnett county in 1841. His father was a native of Virginia, and when a young man came to Georgia and settled in Gwinnett county. He began life as a farmer, but after his marriage he joined his father-in-law in the tannery business. This proved to be very profitable and he accumulated a quite large estate. Mr. Allen was reared on the farm and received a very good education at the near-by country schools. Early in the civil war he enlisted in a company in the Sixteenth Georgia battalion, but not long afterward joined the Thirteenth Georgia cavalry, and during the time he was in the service was engaged in very many bloody skirmishes and hotly contested battles. After the war he engaged in general merchandising in Buford, and in 1868 embarked in the tannery business also. Beginning with an old mule he worked hard and struggled on and made some money which he judiciously invested. Now he has a large general merchandising store and is a leading merchant of the town, has a fine, well-stocked farm, a large tannery, and a factory equipped with a thirty-five horse power engine and its complement of suitable improved machinery, where he makes saddles, bridles, harness and other leather goods. He has an extensive and ready market for his products—good evidence of honest work. Mr. Allen's physical misfortune speaks well for his courage and perseverance and adds vastly to his credit. Some years ago a stroke of paralysis deprived him of the use of his lower limbs and made him a cripple for life. His only mode of perambulation is by a light wagon drawn by a well-trained pair of goats, and in this way he travels the streets on business. He has worthily won the business prosperity and the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens which he enjoys. Mr. Allen was married Dec. 15, 1864, to Miss Emily, daughter of Thomas L. and Emily (Atkinson) Hadaway, by whom he has had one child, Cora, wife of E. W. Vance, who is general manager of his business. Mr. Allen is a member of the I. O. O. F., and has been a master Mason for more than thirty years.

BRAND is the name of a family which within a comparatively few years has forged itself to the front in Gwinnett county, in the person of Charles H. Brand, a leading lawyer and politician at Lawrenceville. He was a son of Egbert M. and Julia (Cooper) Brand, and was born in Loganville, Walton county, April 20, 1861. Isaiah C. Brand, his grandfather, was a native of Virginia, migrated to Georgia about 1818, and settled in the woods in what is now Walton county, near the present line between Walton and Gwinnett counties. He was a justice of the peace in the early years of the county, and attained to considerable prominence. Mr. Brand's father was born in Walton county in 1833. The necessity of working on the farm precluded his receiving even the limited education obtainable at that time at the country common schools. When about eighteen years of age he began life for himself as a clerk at four dollars per month. Managing to save a little money he engaged in peddling chickens, eggs, etc., with a cart and steer, going eighteen miles to market. He made money and finally commenced merchandising, and this increasing, he added farming and accumulated a fortune. When the war began he had 100 bales of cotton, which were set fire to and burned by the Federal soldiers. He was an uncompromising, unflinching Union man, and came near being hung during the war because he would not renounce his principles. He never sought or held an office, but was always ready to aid his friends. After the war he again engaged in general merchandising and farming, and has acquired considerable wealth. Mr. Brand was reared on the farm, and educated at the university of Georgia, and was graduated in the class of 1881—many of whose members have held and are now holding the highest positions of trust in the state. In 1882 he began the study of law with Col. (now Judge) N. L. Hutchins, and the ensuing fall was admitted to the bar. He immediately afterward commenced the practice and forged rapidly forward to a front position at the local and circuit bar. His professional and political advancement has been phenomenal. He has been very successful and has a large practice, which increases as the years roll by, and his fellow-citizens have the most implicit confidence in his judgment and integrity. It has been aptly remarked that his is "an old head on young shoulders." He has served Lawrenceville as mayor three years; has been chairman of the county democratic committee twelve years, was chairman of the ninth district congressional conventions of 1892 and 1894; has been a delegate to the last six congressional and the last four gubernatorial conventions, and is now a member of the democratic state executive committee. In 1894 he was elected to represent the thirty-fourth senatorial district in the general assembly, where his ability and influence were at once recognized, and he was elected president pro tem. of the senate. Mr. Brand was married in 1885 to Miss Estelle, daughter of Col. S. J. and Sallie (Simmons) Winn, who died, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, in 1893, leaving two children: Luelle and Julia. He is a prominent member of the I. O. O. F., of which fraternity he is a grand officer, and in line of promotion to its highest honors.

L. M. BRAND, real estate and insurance, son of Egbert M. and Julia (Cooper) Brand, was born in Loganville, Walton Co., Ga., Feb. 7, 1867. (For sketch of his father see sketch of C. H. Brand in these Memoirs). His mother was a daughter of Levi M. and Martha Cooper, descended from early settlers of Georgia. Mr. Cooper was a prosperous farmer and a prominent citizen. Four of his sons were in the Confederate service during the war between the states, one of whom was killed. Mr. Brand was educated in the public schools of the county, and afterward taught school for a short time, and subsequently graduated from the university of Georgia in 1888.

JOHN F. ESPY, farmer, Buford, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of Robert and Eliza (King) Espy, was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1839. His paternal grandparents, John and Elizabeth Espy, were natives of North Carolina, and came to Georgia soon after the revolutionary war, during which he was a soldier in the patriot army. He was much esteemed and popular, and held many public offices. Mr. Espy's father was a native Georgian, born in 1795, and grew to manhood on the farm with very meager educational advantages. He began life very poor as a farmer and blacksmith, and became quite rich. He served many years as a justice of the inferior court. His mother was a daughter of John and Eleanor E. (McCutchings) King, who were natives of Virginia, and early in life migrated to Georgia. He was a soldier in the revolutionary army. Mr. Espy was reared on the farm, and after receiving a fairly good country school education, entered the Martin institute at Jefferson, Jackson county. Soon afterward the "war between the states" began; in 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Capt. D. L. Jarrett, Eighteenth Georgia regiment, Col. W. T. Wofford. Among the many hard-fought battles in which he participated were those in the peninsula, Malvern Hill, Seven Oaks, all through the campaign against McClellan, the seven days' fight around Richmond, etc. He served as county commissioner four years, and on the county board of education about ten years. In 1892 he was elected to represent Gwinnett county in the general assembly. He filled all these offices with credit to himself and acceptably to his fellow-citizens. He meets every obligation, private and public with scrupulous fidelity, and no citizen is more respected. He began life after the war without a dollar, but by hard work and close economy he has, with steady progress, gradually come to the front and acquired a competency. Mr. Espy was married in 1869 to Miss Mary, born and reared in Gwinnett county, daughter of Washington and Biddy (Ballew) Allen, and to them five children have been born: Leila, Cotta, Washington, Ferdinand and Ruth. Himself and wife are exemplary and influential members of the Methodist church.

NATHAN LOUIS HUTCHINS, deceased, a very prominent lawyer in his day, and an ex-judge of the western circuit of Georgia, was born near the headwaters of the Savannah river in old Pendleton (afterward Anderson) district, S. C., April 11, 1799. His father was without means, and the greater part of his education was acquired by studying at night by the flickering light of a pine knot. He began life for himself as a clerk in a store. Later he came to Elberton, Ga., where he acted as deputy for the clerk of the superior court, Mr. Bowen. While thus employed Gen. John A. Heard advised him to read law, which he did, and at which he made rapid progress. Having been admitted to the bar—Judge Dooly presiding—he located in Lawrenceville, Gwinnett Co., Ga. In 1825 and 1827 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, after which he devoted his entire time and attention to the practice of his profession, ranking with the foremost among the very able men—the Cobbs, Dougherty, Hillyer and others—who made the bar of the western circuit so distinguished. In 1857 he was appointed judge of the circuit by Gov. Herschell V. Johnson, and held the office continuously by re-appointment, or election by the people, until 1868, when he was removed by those who “in form of law exercised authority.” Retiring to private life he died Feb. 11, 1870. He was a man of extraordinary nerve and of unflinching courage, and one of the most affable and kindly disposed. He was loved most by those who knew him best, and was held in high estimation as judge, lawyer and citizen.

NATHAN L. HUTCHINS, judge superior court, western circuit, Lawrenceville, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of Nathan Louis and Mary Dixon (Holt) Hutchins, was born in Lawrenceville, Oct 4, 1835. His father (see sketch) was an able lawyer and a former judge of the western circuit. His mother was a daughter of Hines Holt, Sr., at one time treasurer of the state. Judge Hutchins received his primary and preparatory education at the schools in his native town, and then attended Emory college, Oxford, Ga. After his graduation he read law, and was admitted to the bar just before the civil war began. He enlisted in a company which was a part of the Sixteenth Georgia regiment, and was made first lieutenant. He was soon promoted to a captaincy, in which capacity he served with conspicuous gallantry until June, 1863, when he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Third Georgia battalion sharpshooters. With his command he participated in the fiercely-contested battles of Malvern Hill, Crampton Gap, Sharpsburg, Fredricksburg, Gettysburg, Knoxville, Wilderness, Cold Harbor and in all the battles of the memorable campaigns of 1864 and 1865, in defense of Richmond. He was three times wounded: first at Sharpsburg, then at the Wilderness and lastly at James river, when Grant sprung his mines near Petersburg. He was taken prisoner at Sailor's creek April 6, 1865, and after having been confined in Washington some time he was sent to Johnson's island, where he was detained until July, when he was paroled. During his army service he was conspicuous for the faithful discharge of his duties in their minutest details, and for his cheerful endurance of the dangers, privations and hardships incident to army life. His genial disposition and unostentatious bravery tested on many a sanguinary field, won for him the regard of officers and men, including brigade and division commanders, such as Gens. Howell Cobb, Thomas R. R. Cobb, Wofford, Du Bose, McLaws, Kershaw and others. Col. Hutchins took an active part in the famous charge of Longstreet's corps at the battle of the Wilderness, by which the left wing of Grant's army was checked, and in the noted flank movement of Wofford's brigade, which contributed so much toward Confederate victory. For skill and gallantry in the operations around Knoxville in 1863 he was especially complimented in the report of the commanding general. Returning to his home after the surrender he entered actively upon the practice of his profession, in which he at once took a front position and quickly secured a clientage both valuable and influential. In 1872, as an applicant for the judgeship of the western circuit, he was generally and strongly endorsed by the bar and the people; but Judge Rice, an older and more experienced applicant, was given the appointment. In 1876 he was elected to represent Gwinnett county in the general assembly, having five opponents, and in 1878 was re-elected without opposition. As chairman of the finance committee, and on the floor of the house in general legislative work, his faithful, eminent services won for him an enviable reputation. In 1880 he was again elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and was again made chairman of the finance committee. In 1882 he was elected judge of the western circuit by the general assembly, and the January following assumed its duties. In 1886, and again in 1890 and 1894, he was re-elected. Judge Hutchins is justly respected and held in high esteem by the bar for his profound legal attainments and his dignity and impartiality on the bench. With the people no citizen enjoys greater or more deserved popularity. Judge Hutchins was happily married March 27, 1866, to Miss Carrie Orr, of Lawrenceville. Politically he is and always has been an ardent and uncompromising democrat.

JONES. The name of Jones is one not unfamiliar to readers of American history; and the record of one of the family's representatives in Gwinnett county, Ga., is not altogether devoid of interest. George H. Jones, farmer, late keeper of the penitentiary, Norcross, Ga., son of Thomas H. and Margaret (Hoyle) Jones, was born in Gwinnett county in 1833. His paternal grandparents, Wyley and Margaret (Pegram) Jones, were natives of Wales, who at length emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia, where they were rated among the best and worthiest of citizens. Mr. Jones' father was born in Virginia in 1799, and in 1821 migrated to North Carolina, where he entered the employ of a merchant named Hoyle as a clerk. The second year of his residence there he was made deputy sheriff of the county, and after serving in that capacity some time was elected sheriff. Resigning the office he came to Georgia and settled in Gwinnett county and engaged in merchandising at Hoyle & Jones' old stand, near the present site of Norcross. He accumulated a large property, but was about ruined as a result of the war. About the first money he received after the surrender was for some black walnut trees grown from seed planted by him in the corners of the fence when he settled on the place. The trees were sold to a lumber firm in Atlanta, and a part of the product was used in the construction of what is now the governor's mansion. He was one of the promoters, a firm friend and strong advocate, and a member of the first board of directors, of the Georgia Air line, recently the Richmond & Danville railway. He was the soul of honor, and one of the most highly esteemed citizens of Gwinnett county. His mother was a daughter of Adam and Sarah (Fite) Hoyle. He was of German descent, and the family was among the early settlers of North Carolina. He came to Georgia in 1827 and engaged in merchandising with success and profit. In religion he was a Quaker and later a Presbyterian. Mr. G. H. Jones was raised on the farm, and his educational advantages were far from good. He was the fourth of seven children, and his mother died before he was four years old. His brothers mostly engaged in business or professional life, while he preferred that of a farmer. In 1862 he enlisted in Company A, Capt. Thomas, Forty-second Georgia regiment. Taking the measles, he was left at Knoxville, but as soon as he recovered he rejoined his company at Tazewell, Tenn. After the battle there, in which he was a participant, he was detailed by special order to duty in the quartermaster's department, Chattanooga, and was sent to southwest Georgia to purchase provisions for the army. But in August of 1863 he voluntarily went back to his company, when he was detailed as a scout, a branch of the service in which he continued until the surrender, and at the same time held a commission as captain in the quartermaster's department. He saw much hard service, passed through many thrilling experiences and dangers, and had many narrow escapes from death by being individually shot at while scouting. He went right and left and was nearly all the time scouring the country around Sherman's army, generally returning with valuable information, and was with Johnston's army on its retreat. After the fight at Jonesboro he was sent from Lovejoy's command to Gen. Wheeler, when in east Tennessee, with important dispatches, which he delivered successfully at Decatur, Ala. He was captured several times during the war, but always managed to escape; the last time just before the close of the struggle. On this occasion he was left under guard of one man while others of the squad which captured him went in pursuit of his comrades. Watching his opportunity he knocked the guard down and made his escape. During the war he had the misfortune to lose his right eye by the concussion of a shell. In 1872 he was elected to represent Gwinnett county in the general assembly and was one out of forty-five who steadfastly fought a law passed by the legislature during Gov. Bullock's official term leasing the state road, which they regarded as a fraud. In 1888 he was elected to represent the thirty-fourth senatorial district, performing his duties here with the same fidelity as in the lower house. In 1891 he was appointed principal keeper of the penitentiary by Gov. Northen, and made one of the most efficient officers the state ever had in that position—retiring in 1895. He has been a member of the Agricultural society since about 1866, of which he was elected vice-president two years ago, and still holds that position. He has been an active member of the executive committee fifteen years, and of the fair committee ten years—always maintaining an intense interest in the affairs of the society. Mr. Jones is an active and an enthusiastic, untiring worker in any cause or movement promising the public good and progress, and is one of the best of the county's citizens. Mr. Jones was married Dec. 23, 1857, to Mrs. Ann E. Harrison (nee Martin), daughter of A. W. and Exer (Smith) Martin, a union blessed with four children: W. G., R. H., Thomas F., and Clara. The mother of these, an estimable and exemplary member of the Methodist church, died in May, 1867. In October following he married Miss Sarah L. Martin, a sister of his deceased wife, by whom he had two children: George L., and Mamie H. She, also a devoted member of the Methodist church, died in November, 1872. In October, 1876, he contracted a third marriage with Miss Lulu, daughter of

John G. and Lucinda L. (Walker) Trammell, members of noted old Georgia families. Mr. Jones has been a member of the I. O. O. F., is an active and ardent master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent and influential members of the Methodist church. He and others organized a Sunday school at the old church near his country home, known as Mt. Carmel, in 1867, of which he has been its beloved superintendent nearly all the time since.

T. T. KEY, retired physician, farmer, Norcross, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of George and Madeline (Stephens) Key, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Jan. 2, 1835. His great-great-grandfather, Martin Key, was a native of Wales, England, came to this country and settled on Manhattan island. He was the Key who leased thirty-six acres of land for ninety-nine years, now a part of Broadway and Central park, New York city. The lease expired in 1878, and the subject of this sketch, with other heirs, have been trying to effect a settlement, but as yet without success. His great-grandfather—son of the above—was born in Virginia, and was the father of Chiles Terry Key, Dr. Key's grandfather, who married Miss Clark. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, immediately after which he came to Georgia and settled in the woods in what is now Elbert county, and cleared a farm. Dr. Key's father was born in Elbert county in 1808, and, as might be expected, had very limited educational advantages. He was raised a farmer, was a successful one, and made it his life-occupation. In 1837 he moved to Henry county, Ga., and in 1851 moved to De Kalb county, Ga. His mother was a daughter of Thomas Harden Stephens. When they were married he had $80—one year's salary as an overseer—and his wife had a piece of heavy cloth she had woven. This is what they began life with. They settled in the woods and lived awhile in a tent made of that piece of cloth; yet he lived to become a quite wealthy man. Nine children were born to them, and when they married he gave to each of them four negroes, and later gave each two more. When he died, in 1859, he had thirty slaves that were sold for division, showing that he was a thrifty, practical farmer, and a very superior manager of surplus income. Dr. Key was raised on the farm, and received but a limited education. When nineteen years old he began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. T. M. Donald, and was a member of the first class that attended the Atlanta Medical college in 1855. He afterward went to Philadelphia and attended lectures at the Jefferson Medical college, from which he was graduated in March, 1856. He immediately located in Gwinnett county and had very promising success; but in 1860 he decided to go to Louisiana. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Twenty-seventh Louisiana regiment. He was made a lieutenant of his company, and in a quiet, private way was their physician, his comrades paying him for the same through friendly, neighborly consideration. In the fall of 1863 he was taken sick, given up to die, and requested to resign, which he did. After the war he returned to Gwinnett county to find himself a ruined man—nearly everything gone except his land. He commenced farming and chopping wood to haul to Atlanta, and not long afterward resumed the practice of his profession, which he continued with satisfactory success until 1883, when his impaired health compelled him to relinquish it. He then engaged in the real estate business in Atlanta and followed it in that city until 1894, when he came to Norcross, where, in connection with farming, he still engages in the real estate business. Dr. Key stands high with the profession as a skillful practitioner, has achieved success as such, has the implicit confidence of the people among whom he has lived and now lives, and is held in the highest estimation as a Christian gentleman. Dr. Key was married in January, 1857, to Miss Rhoda—born and raised in Gwinnett county—daughter of John and Elizabeth (Malona) Carroll. Six children are the fruit of this union: George O., William D. Q., James L., Lola L., Maude M., and Anna I. He is a member of the Pioneer Citizens' society of Atlanta, a master Mason of long standing, and himself and wife are very devoted working members of the Methodist church; the doctor, often, by request of the local preacher, occupying the pulpit.

JOHN J. M'DANIEL, farmer, Lawrenceville, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of James and Elvina (Johnson) McDaniel, was born in Gwinnett county in 1831. His great-grandfather, James McDaniel, was a native of Ireland, who emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia. His grandfather, William McDaniel, was born in the state of Virginia, and migrated to the state of South Carolina, where Mr. McDaniel's father was born in 1812, and was nine years old when his father moved in ox-carts, most of the way through virgin forests, to Georgia and settled in Gwinnett county. Too old for service during the war, he was detailed to stay at home and look after the families of the soldiers in the field. Mr. J. J. McDaniel was raised on the farm, and the meagre education he received was obtained at the primitive dirt-floor log school house, with slab seats, stick-and-mud chimney, with light graciously admitted through square holes sawed through the logs in the sides. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F—of which he was made orderly sergeant—Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment. He saw no little hard service, and participated in some of the most important battles of the war, among them: Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fair Oaks, the raid into New Jersey, second Manassas, where his commanding officer, Col. Thomas, standing by and a witness, he shot two horses to death at one time, that were drawing a cannon, the object being its capture. He was also at Harper's Ferry and Fredericksburg. He was one of the three detailed to set fire to Manassas—which was effectually destroyed. At Fredericksburg he was seriously wounded and lost his left leg; but he remained with the army a long time afterward. After he came home he taught school awhile, and began life anew on one hundred and twenty-five acres of land, which he has added to by subsequent purchases until now he is one of the large land owners of the county, and is recognized as one of its leading citizens. He was elected tax receiver since the war and served six years. Mr. McDaniel was married in 1855 to Miss Martha Wills, who died soon afterward. In 1872 he contracted a second marriage with Miss Vina, daughter of T. D. and Adaline (Barrett) Matthews. Of six children born to them four survive: Zella; Paul E.; Eva, and Mary. Himself and wife are active members of the Baptist church.

S. T. M'ELROY. But few of the citizens of Georgia, who were such before the late calamitous conflict, are without war records; fewer still have one of as thrilling details as the subject of this sketch. S. T. McElroy, merchant-manufacturer, Norcross, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of William and Margaret (Tilley) McElroy, was born in 1844. His paternal grandfather, Samuel McElroy, was a farmer, and a South Carolinian. In 1826 he came to Georgia in an ox-cart and settled in the woods in De Kalb county, where he cleared a farm, on which he lived till he died. Mr. McElroy's father was born in Anderson district, S. C., in 1813, came to Georgia with his father in 1826, and made farming the pursuit of his life. His mother was the daughter of Stephen (Still) Tilley. They, also, were South Carolinians and among the early settlers of DeKalb county. Mr. McElroy, in common with the majority of boys and youths born and raised in upper Georgia about the time he was, received a very limited education. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Capt. Morton, Thirty-sixth Georgia regiment, Col. Jesse Glenn, and, with his command was in many fiercely fought battles. At the battle of Baker's Creek,

May 16, 1863, he was twice wounded; first by a shot in the left side, and then in about two minutes afterward in the left leg just above the ankle. This occurred about noon, in the hottest part of the fight, and he was left on the field, where he remained until late in the afternoon of the next day. After he was wounded the Confederates were forced back, but rallying later in the day, they regained their lost ground, and the new lines of battle were so formed that he lay between them perfectly conscious of what was going on, and of the extreme peril he was in. During the long-continued cannonading which followed language is inadequate to express the excruciating agony he experienced physically from his wounds, and mentally from impending further bodily mangling or sudden shocking death. Late in the next day—the 17th—he, with many other wounded soldiers, was carried to a farm house, but it being already full he was placed on the ground in the yard. When the surgeon reached and examined him he very unceremoniously amputated his leg. He was afterward taken to Clinton, where he was placed in a ward in charge of Dr. James Camak. The people were very kind to the wounded men, but Mr. McElroy gratefully remembers and mentions two ladies who were especially so; one was Mrs. Hill, a school teacher who, during the intervals between school hours, would bring food and delicacies and suitable beverages, and feed and minister to the sufferers with her own hands. Another kind lady was a Mrs. Jungherr, who carried Mr. McElroy to her own home and there cared for him until he was able to come home, when she went with him in her carriage to the station to take the train. When the train reached Jackson it was found that the track was torn up. He and some of his companions hired a cart and oxen and were hauled ten miles to a railway, and a train was taken to Demopolis, Ala., where a Confederate parole camp was maintained, and he was furloughed and came home. He reached Atlanta on the Fourth of July without a cent. He called on a supposed friend for help, who put him off till the next morning, and then sent a negro with a dray to carry him home. When about a mile and a half from Atlanta he discharged the negro and got another friend to help him homeward. After the surrender he found himself penniless, at “the foot of the ladder,” so to speak, and but one leg to help him climb. Being the oldest of four children he had the family to provide for, and the outlook was far from encouraging; but he bravely assumed the duty. Sustained by conscious integrity, a quiet courage and an inflexible will and purpose, he went courageously to work, and the result shows what these characteristics can accomplish. He began on the farm and made and saved some money. In 1870 he engaged in merchandising in Norcross and has achieved remarkable success; his enterprise has proved profitable and his business has increased until his firm has become one of the leading ones of the county, with a financial standing not surpassed. In 1887 the firm of S. T. & J. E. McElroy was formed and the manufacture of chairs was entered upon; and two years later the manufacture of a general line of furniture, beds, etc., was added. The establishment now employs fifty hands, and has a daily capacity of 250 chairs and fifty beds, besides an indefinite quantity of furniture. To these, which have proven so remunerative to him, and which are so valuable to the community and county by developing its resources and affording employment to the industrious needy, he has added a corn and wheat mill. For his sagacious enterprise Mr. McElroy richly merits his success and the gratitude of his fellow-citizens; and he has set an example which should be emulated in every community throughout Georgia and the south; “hard times” would then disappear. Mr. McElroy was married in 1866 to Miss Laura Lively; a union which was blessed with six children: Leonora; William; Beatrice; Minnie; Lovick, and Ruby. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died in 1883. In 1885 he was married to Mrs. Kate Folley, who died childless in 1887, and the following year he contracted a third marriage with Miss Jane Dobbs, who has borne him two children—Newton T. and Mary L. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and since boyhood has been a devoted member of the Methodist church. Mrs. McElroy is a consistent member of the Baptist church.

TANDY K. MITCHELL, physician and surgeon, Lawrenceville, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of Madison R. and Mary A. (Key) Mitchell, was born in Jackson county, Ga., Sept. 17, 1832. His grandfather, Thomas Mitchell, was a native of Virginia, who early in life and early in the present century, migrated to Georgia and settled in Clarke county. He became quite wealthy, and one of the most prominent and influential citizens, evidenced by the fact that for seventeen terms consecutively he was elected to represent the county of Clarke in the general assembly. He was a broad-minded man of liberal, progressive, statesmanlike views. He was an active and influential member of the committee which reported favorably on the building of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, and was its friend and advocate from its inception, and a staunch supporter of the railway policy inaugurated by the state during his legislative service. Dr. Mitchell's father was born in Virginia in 1799, came to Georgia with the family when young, became a prosperous and wealthy planter, and died in 1858. He was a model citizen and was highly respected and esteemed. His mother was a daughter of Col. Tandy Key, a relative of Francis S. Key, the distinguished author of The Star-Spangled Banner. Dr. Mitchell was reared on the plantation in Gwinnett county, in whose country schools he received his primary education, finishing at Athens, Ga., and Summerville, Ala. He then read medicine under Dr. Jesse Lowe, a leading physician in Lawrenceville, and afterward attended lectures at the Medical College of Georgia, Augusta, from which he was graduated March 3, 1857. He immediately located in Lawrenceville, purchasing his old preceptor's (Dr. Lowe's) office, fixtures and interest, and succeeded to his practice. He was succeeding admirably, but responding to the call for volunteers, he enlisted in 1861 in Company F, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment—his company being the second one from Gwinnett county. Shortly after his enlistment he was appointed assistant surgeon, in which capacity he served until the close of the war. Of the 100 young men who formed his company and went into the service with him, he was the only one who was present at the surrender at Appomattox. He was present on twenty-one battlefields, including many of the most sanguinary of the unhappy conflict. It is safe to say that few, if any, of the medical staff of the army performed more arduous service or displayed more skill—certainly none were more faithful and attentive to the sick and wounded. After the war he returned to his home and resumed his practice, which at once assumed large proportions and severely taxed his time and strength. With a large and exacting local practice, demanding care, he has urgent calls from adjoining counties, and oftentimes is away from home several days attending groups of patients remote from his office. Skillful, anxiously attentive and unusually sympathetic, he has been remarkably successful and gained great popularity. Although somewhat advanced in years he continues vigorous, and bids fair to live many years yet to dispense comfort and consolation and give relief to the sick and afflicted. Dr. Mitchell was married Nov. 15, 1866, to Miss A. W., daughter of Col. James P. Simmons, now deceased, then an eminent member of the Lawrenceville and western circuit bar. Seven children have blessed this union: James M., Lillian Mary, Thomas W., Annie E., Tandy K., Jr., Ida S., and Pearl. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church, his membership covering forty years.

MOSES RICHARDSON. Of the citizens of Gwinnett county who have attained to honorable distinction through their own exertions, none are more deserving of mention than Dr. Moses Richardson, Norcross, Ga. He was born in Newton county in 1830, and was the son of Levi Richardson, a native of South Carolina. His father came to Georgia in 1817, bringing his "goods and chattels" in an ox-cart on wooden wheels, held together with wooden pins and hickory withes, the family walking most of the way, and settled in the woods in what is now Rockdale county. His father was a blacksmith and wood-worker, and followed it many years. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, became quite prominent in his new home, and served as a justice of the peace twenty years. Dr. Richardson was raised on the farm, and his educational advantages were very limited, his schooling being such only as could be obtained at the primitive log school house of the locality and period. In 1852 he entered upon the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. A. G. Hulsey, and overcoming the many disadvantages consequent upon his defective education, prepared himself for college. In 1854-55 he attended lectures at Nashville, Tenn., and in 1856 graduated from the Philadelphia Jefferson Medical college. Locating at or near his present home he has remained there, growing in professional reputation all the time, and winning the love of the people. When he located the population was sparse, public roads few, poorly worked and hard to travel. He would sometimes have to respond to calls twenty-five miles distant, and be away from home several days at a time. In 1862 he organized Company H, Sixteenth Georgia regiment, of which he was made captain, and went to Richmond, Va. He was soon taken sick and had to resign and come home. Subsequently he received a medical appointment, returned to the army and remained till the close of the war. Beginning with little education and without means, he has worked up until now, besides an ample fortune, he enjoys a professional reputation of rare excellence for ability and skill and the unlimited confidence of the people among whom he has spent his useful life. Dr. Richardson was married in 1856 to Miss Mary A. Carroll, by whom he has had two children: Clodissa, wife of P. F. Connley, and Virgil, who died at the age of seven years. He has been a member of the I. O. O. F., and is a master Mason, and served as master of his lodge for twelve or fifteen years. The doctor is an active and prominent member of the Baptist church and his wife is a devoted member of the Presbyterian church.

W. T. SMITH. The unfortunate war between the states developed thousands of cases of remarkable courage and endurance on both sides, in all arms, and in every grade of the army, but few if any surpass what is detailed in the following sketch. W. T. Smith, farmer, retired merchant, Buford, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of G. I. and Martha L. (Palmer) Smith, was born in Butts county, Ga., in 1842. His father was a farmer, born in Georgia in 1821, and served a short time in the late civil war. His mother was born in Anderson district, S. C., and both of them have been members of the Methodist church fifty-four years. Mr. Smith was raised on the farm, and what little education he received was obtained at the old-time, oft-described, dirt-floor, log school house, at which so many others of Georgia's prominent men "graduated." In 1861 he enlisted in Company H—of which he was made first lieutenant—Sixteenth Georgia regiment, which was a part of Gen. Howell Cobb's command. He was soon afterward taken sick, relieved, and came home. On the recovery of his health, in 1862, he joined Capt. B. P. Weaver's company, Forty-second Georgia regiment, and for a time was orderly sergeant. He held this position until the battle of Tazewell, Tenn., after which he was promoted to a first lieutenancy. From this time forward he was in almost continuous active service, and was in some of the most obstinately contested battles of the war. The captain of his company being sick he was in command of it at Richmond and Perryville, Ky., Chickasaw Bayou, Baker's Creek, Big Black, and forty-eight days' siege at Vicksburg, where he surrendered July 4, 1863. After being exchanged, his command became a part of Stephens' division and went to east Tennessee, and was in the movement on the extreme left of the division which held Gen. Hooker's forces in check all day at Missionary Ridge, finally inflicting on that famous Federal general his first defeat. Gen. Joseph E. Johnston assumed command of the army about this time, and went into quarters at a place known as Buzzard's Roost Gap. Right here Lieut. Smith claims one of the greatest and grandest fights of the war occurred, for here his regiment whipped out a whole brigade and captured many prisoners. Flanked by Gen. Sherman, the Confederates were forced back to Resaca, during which movement his regiment lost 188 men. On one occasion at this time a friend of his, Dr. Hollingsworth, on entering a charge, told him he would be killed in that charge, and, sure enough, he was. Later, at the battle of New Hope Church, a Capt. McTear, of an artillery company, was wounded in the side, but he after that took charge of a cannon and heroically fought the remainder of the day without giving an inch. The next noted engagements were Pumpkin Vine Creek and Kennesaw Mountain. Lieut. Smith was with Gen. Johnston from Chattanooga nearly to the Chattahoochee, and lost not a wagon or the wheel of one, nor anything else. The next battle, he thinks, was one of the grandest of any he was in. It was the battle of Atlanta, July 22, 1864, and during the fight the command he was with captured a large number of Federals. When they discovered how few they had surrendered to they opened fire on their captors, but without effect, as they were overcome and whipped again. His next engagement was on the Sandtown road, afterward at Jonesboro, where two corps of the Confederates charged six corps of Union troops. He was named as commander of detail to convey women and children within Confederate lines when Gen. Sherman issued his order for all citizens of Atlanta to go north. This was the saddest scene of his life. He then went with the army to Tennessee, and was in the hard-fought, bloody battle at Franklin, after which he was commissioned a captain, and served as such during the war—being the youngest captain in the service. In this desperate battle only two men in his company besides himself were unhurt. Going to Nashville Capt. Smith for the first time met "colored" troops. There were five charges made before 12 o'clock, on his command, with the result that the colored color-bearer was killed, and the colors presented to the regiment by the colored women of Murfreesboro were captured. This was one of the hardest fought battles his company had had. Near sundown on the second day one-third of it had surrendered. Gen. Stephen D. Lee, the corps commander, took a position on the pike about one mile in the rear of the last line, and displayed a heroism that covered him with glory. Eloquent and passionately he appealed to his men to rally to him when the thrillingly suggestive scene was presented of twenty-five regimental colors, supported by about 200 battle-scarred veterans rallying around their brave commander. Capt. Smith reported with two men, saying they were ready to die with him. It is not claiming too much to say that Stovall's brigade, with Clayton's division, saved the Confederate army at this time from irretrievable ruin. The morning after the battle of Nashville, Stovall's brigade formed at Devil's Gap, where they began to prepare for breakfast. While thus engaged a Federal cavalry force of 5,000 dashed down the pike, and passing on either side of the cut gained the Confederate rear. The excitement occasioned by this movement had hardly subsided when a large column of cavalry, six abreast, came down the pike at a slow gait. It was thought to be Forrest's command, for, as they wore rubber coats they could not be identified. When they were near enough the commander was asked what troops they were, and they proved to be Federals. They were at once fired upon. Those not wounded quickly dropped from their horses and climbed up the mountain sides, leaving about 500 fine horses, which the Confederates "confiscated." They then went to Franklin, where they were soon surrounded by 15,000 or 20,000 Federal troops. Clayton's division formed a square and received their onset. The Federals charged through the lines, but the Confederates refused to surrender. The fight continued through two days and three nights—half the Confederates being barefooted and snow on the ground. Before they extricated themselves a division of Federal cavalry charged down the pike upon them at 10 o'clock at night, but they were repulsed with the loss of two stands of colors. Ascertaining that they were preparing for another assault, Gen. Lee ordered fires to be made at various distant points to deceive the enemy. As no attack was made it is presumed it had the intended effect. There were a spring and well near the pike where, when the fighting had ceased, the troops on both sides got water, and exchanged friendly greetings. Marching barefooted through snow the Confederates went to Kingston, and thence to Bentonville, where they fought their last battle in North Carolina. The last battle himself and command were in was at Bentonville, N. C., and there they surrendered during the negotiations at Greensboro, N. C. They then called on Gov. Vance and Gen. Beauregard, who made stirring speeches. After this they proceeded to High Point, where arms were stacked, and mules and horses were distributed among the Confederates; also money—one Mexican dollar to each soldier, and two to each commissioned officer. Capt. Smith was wounded at Atlanta in the leg just above the knee, and was captured at Franklin, but in a short time made his escape. He surrendered eleven men, and donated his $2 and his interest in the mules and wagons to them, and then all started on their way to Georgia. He taught school four months, and although in a good neighborhood, no one had money to pay for the schooling. The ladies proposed to pay him in jeans they had woven; but he being a single man accepted only enough to make a suit of clothes, and gave the remainder to his pupils. He then borrowed some money, and bidding farewell to all, left for Mexico. After a short stop there he went to Texas and tried for a clerkship. There were then but few railways and no large towns or cities. After spending all his money in a vain search for some honorable employment he came back to Georgia and told his wife he could find nothing to do. Responding to her question as to what he intended to do, he said he was going to be a "rail-splitter," as that was an industry not likely to be overcrowded. He settled in Titus county, Tex., and during the first three years split 50,000 rails, and fenced a large farm. In 1870 he was elected a justice of the peace and served four years, and in 1875 was elected tax receiver, serving two years. In 1876 he was elected to represent Titus county in the Texas legislature; and at the end of five years resigned and returned to Georgia on account of the bad health of his wife, and settled in Buford. He at once took an active part in every movement calculated to advance the prosperity and growth of the town. He has been either mayor or a member of the council nearly all the time. He has also been a member of the democratic executive committee ten years; and in 1888 was elected to represent Gwinnett county in the general assembly and served two terms—four years. He was one of the building committee who planned and built the Confederate Veterans' home, in which he has taken great interest. Capt. Smith is a man of extensive and varied information, generous and public-spirited, and possesses great independence and force of character; as a consequence he exercises a wide and strong influence, and always for good. For thirteen years he has been one of the leading business men of Buford. In 1865 Capt. Smith was married to Miss Mary—born in Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga.—daughter of Robert and Mary (McGinness) Jones. Of the children born to them five are living: Lula, wife of J. D. Wallace; George E.; Anna, wife of W. C. Sweeney; James T., and Mary. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and himself and wife are active and influential members of the Missionary Baptist church.

JAMES W. WILSON, merchant-farmer, Ducula, Gwinnett Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Mary (Teague) Wilson, was born in South Carolina, Oct. 8, 1833. His paternal grandfather, Benjamin Wilson, was a native of Ireland, emigrated to this country when young, served as a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and was a surveyor in South Carolina many years afterward. His father was born in that state in 1796, was reared a farmer, and followed farming all his life. In 1849 he came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. His mother was a daughter of Robin and Elizabeth (Level) Teague, whose families were of the early settlers of Newberry district, S. C., of Scotch-Irish descent, and strict members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Wilson was reared on the farm, and was educated at the historic dirt-floor log school house, with puncheon seats, stick-and-mud chimney, and holes in the side for windows, he going barefooted and his only garment a long cotton shirt. Having the misfortune to lose an eye, he had to leave school. He came to Georgia with the family in 1849, and soon afterward went to Alabama, where he remained four years. Returning from Alabama he came to Lawrenceville in 1854, and worked three years at the carriage-making business, afterward engaging in it on his own account. In 1861 he bought an interest in a mill which he operated during the war, under Gov. Brown's commission detailing him to the service for the benefit of the soldiers' families. After the war he resumed his carriage building business, which he continued with success and profit until 1874, when he bought the farm on which he now lives. Having advanced ideas, and being practically progressive, he has been as successful in farming as in his other ventures, and has engaged in merchandising also. Beginning life without a dollar, and under serious disadvantages, Mr. Wilson has made a success of every undertaking, has accumulated a fine property, and attained to prominence and influence in the county. Socially, financially and as a citizen he ranks with the best and soundest. He takes great interest in education and in religious work, and has been a member of the board of trustees of Auburn college since its establishment. Mr. Wilson was married Dec. 8, 1859, to Miss Mattie, born in Gwinnett county, daughter of Levi and Temperance (Jones) Loveless, both natives of South Carolina, Mr. Loveless being a son of George and Liney (Timmons) Loveless. Seven children have blessed this union: Gippie, wife of George Craig; James, married Miss Calia B. Freeman; Adden, partner in business; Mattie T., wife of John G. Hood; Benjamin Julius, student at Auburn; Estelle, and Ada, deceased. Mr. Wilson is a master Mason, and himself and wife are active and influential members of the Presbyterian church.

WINN. There is not a name among those of the pioneer settlers of Gwinnett county more closely and creditably connected with its early history than that of Winn, one of whose worthiest scions and representatives is Samuel J. Winn, lawyer, Lawrenceville, Ga. He was the son of Richard Dickinson and Charlotte (Mitchell) Winn, and was born near Athens in 1837. His paternal grandfather, Elisha Winn, was born in Lunenburg county, Va., in June, 1777; came to Georgia and settled in what is now Gwinnett county in 1800. Land was then of little value, and he secured a large tract on which he cleared a farm and made a home.

When the county was organized he gave a large tract, more than two hundred acres, on which to build the county seat—Lawrenceville—and ten acres for church and school purposes. To secure facilities for educating his increasing family he built a school house. He was elected one of the first justices of the inferior court, and held the office many years, and he represented the county in the general assembly continuously for seventeen years. The first session of the superior court for Gwinnett county was held in a barn of his—the largest and best in the county—the boards of which were fastened on with wooden pins made by hand. So far as one man can be said to have done so, he made the county. Col. Winn's father was born in what is now Gwinnett county in 1816. He grew to manhood on the farm, with educational advantages very limited—with none until his father built a house in which he was schooled, and in which, years afterward, the subject of this sketch finished his primary education. Later—while a young man—he acquired a literary taste, became a gifted writer, and wrote biographical sketches of many of the old settlers which are now in possession of the family. He was a remarkably handsome man, of impressive presence and superior intellectuality; an "old-line whig," very magnetic and popular, and exercised a strong influence in the county. In 1850-51 he represented the county in the general assembly, and for many years was a justice of the inferior court. In 1860 he was elected as an anti-secessionist of the convention which passed the ordinance of secession, which he reluctantly signed after persistent persuasion. In 1877 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention held that year. He was enterprising and progressive, and was actively instrumental in the establishment of the Cotton Manufacturing company, whose plant was burned down during the war. He was an enthusiastic Mason, and for very many years was worshipful master of the local lodge, and for the greater part of his life an influential member of the Methodist church. His estimable wife was a daughter of Thomas Mitchell, one of the most prominent citizens of Clarke county, Ga., and was an exemplary member of the Methodist church. (See sketch of Dr. Tandy K. Mitchell.) Col. Winn was reared on the farm, and educated at the schools in Lawrenceville. Later he attended Centenary institute in Summerfield, Ala. Subsequently he attended Emory college eighteen months, then the university of Georgia, after which he entered the office of Col. James P. Simmons—the same he now occupies—and began the study of law. He was admitted to the bar at the September term of Gwinnett superior court, 1858, and at once entered upon the practice of his profession, in which he was making excellent progress when the civil war began. He joined a body of troops organized as partisan rangers, with A. H. Hunt as colonel and F. M. Nix as lieutenant-colonel, and himself as major, which was assigned to the command of the famous raider, Gen. John H. Morgan, and participated in the great raid into Kentucky. In 1862 Col. Hunt was killed, and the rangers were reorganized as the Sixteenth battalion Georgia cavalry, under Lieut.-Col. Nix, with the subject of this sketch as major. The battalion was subsequently engaged in nearly all the celebrated raids of that period of the war. Maj. Winn having been transferred to Gen. Kirby Smith's department, was authorized to organize another command, which he did, and it became the Thirteenth regiment Georgia cavalry, of which he was made colonel. After this he was a participant in many hard-fought battles. He was taken sick at Sharpsburg while engaged in the valley campaign under Gen. Early, and was returned to Staunton. After remaining there sick some time he was granted sixty days' furlough, and came home. On the expiration of his time he was ordered to Atlanta, where he organized a new force composed of cavalry soldiers cut off from their commands, and went to West Point and Columbus, Ga. With this force he was in command when the battle was fought there after Gen. Lee's surrender. On reaching Macon he heard of that event, but he refused to surrender and brought his men to Atlanta, thereby saving the men their horses and arms. He thus perfected a war record of activity, zeal, valor and faithful service which, to say the least of it, could hardly be surpassed for gallantry. On his return home he resumed the practice of his profession, in which he has continued, and secured a clientage of large value and volume, which is constantly increasing. In 1872 he was elected to represent the thirty-fourth senatorial district (the term then being four years) in the general assembly, discharging his duties with characteristic fidelity and great ability. He has since devoted himself exclusively to his profession. Col. Winn was married in 1859 to Miss Sallie, daughter of Col. James P. Simmons, and to them three children have been born: Estelle, deceased wife of C. H. Brand, lawyer, Lawrenceville; Eula, wife of E. H. Jordan, and Courtland S., lawyer, Atlanta. Col. Winn is an enthusiastic and active master Mason, and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

THOMAS E. WINN, second son of Richard D. and Charlotte (Mitchell) Winn, and a progressive, prosperous farmer, was born near Athens, Ga., in 1839. He was brought up on the farm and received a good education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F, Capt. Mattox, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment, Col. Robert McMillan. He was elected first lieutenant of his company, and served as such one year, when he was promoted to the captaincy. One year afterward he was made major, and after serving six months he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel, in which capacity he efficiently served to the close of the war. Of the many important battles in which he participated with conspicuous gallantry may be mentioned: Malvern Hill, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Wilderness, Spottsylvania court-house, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, etc. His valuable services and prompt and faithful discharge of every duty were duly acknowledged by his superior officers, while his solicitous care for the men under his command secured for him their respect and affection. Col. Winn had studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1861. After the war he resumed the practice, and in 1866 was elected county solicitor, serving two years. In 1868 he retired from the practice and engaged in farming, making a specialty of grape culture. Col. Winn served fourteen years as county school commissioner and then resigned. In 1890 he was elected to congress from the Ninth congressional district, and served one term. Col. Winn is a progressive farmer and has been a successful one, and is also fully alive to the advancement and development of the varied natural resources of his native county. He is very popular, and is classed among the best and most substantial of the county's citizens. Col. Winn was married Dec. 13, 1865, to Miss Irene, daughter of Dr. C. M. Park, of Greene county, and to them four children have been born: Marv, Evie, Richard L., and Alice. He is a very prominent master Mason.

HABERSHAM COUNTY.

CHARLES LARKIN BASS, lawyer, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of Dr. Charles H. and Mattie (Greene) Bass, was born near Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., April 30, 1869. His great-grandfather on his father's side was Wm. Rabun, once governor of Georgia, and for whom Rabun county was named. William Rabun was born in Halifax county, N. C., April 8, 1771, and came to Georgia in 1785 with his father, Matthew Rabun, who settled in Wilkes county, and a year later moved thence to Hancock county. Though but indifferently educated, he possessed mental endowments and a personality that brought him into popular favor, and he was elected repeatedly to both the lower and upper house of the general assembly. He was president of the senate when Gov. Mitchell resigned in March, 1817, and was acting governor from that time until November, when he was elected governor, and afterward, by the people, for a full term, during which he had a spicy correspondence with Gen. Jackson. He died on his plantation in Hancock county while governor, Oct. 24, 1819, and his message was delivered to the general assembly by the president of the senate, Matthew Talbot, who succeeded him. Dr. Larkin Bass, an eminent physician, who married Miss Mary, a daughter of Gov. Rabun, was the grandfather of Charles Larkin Bass. His father, Dr. Charles H. Bass, was a son of Dr. Larkin and Mary (Rabun) Bass, and was born in Hancock county. In 1858 he married Miss Mattie, daughter of Thomas F. Greene, of Milledgeville. Dr. Bass ranked very high as a member of the medical profession, as a gentleman of scholarly attainments and varied information. He was assistant physician of the state lunatic asylum soon after his graduation from the Medical college of Georgia, until his death, which occurred in 1872. His widow is still living, and makes her home with her son in Clarksville. Of nine children born to this union five survive: Addie, Mary Rabun, Mattie, Julia and Charles L. Mr. Bass' maternal great-grandfather was William Montgomery Greene, an Irish patriot, who, on account of his participation in the rebellion of 1798, was compelled to seek refuge in the United States. He was a friend of Thomas Addis and Robert Emmett, and assisted in the capture of the latter's remains from the keeper of the Killmainham jail, and their subsequent interment. He was a cousin of the celebrated Lord Edward Fitzgerald, for whom he named his son, Dr. Thomas Fitzgerald Greene, Mr. Bass' grandfather. Dr. Greene was superintendent of the state lunatic asylum for a period of thirty-six years, a statement of which fact is evidence enough as to his capability and fidelity. Dr. Greene married Miss Adeline, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth (Hawkins) Crowder, a granddaughter of Col. John Hawkins, who served with distinction in the revolutionary war under the immediate command of Washington. Mr. Bass received his early education in Milledgeville, but finished it in the Atlanta high school in 1884. The following year the family removed to Clarksville, where they made their permanent home. Deciding to embrace the legal profession he commenced reading law, and in 1890 was admitted to the bar at Habersham superior court, Hon. C. J. Wellborn, judge presiding. Entering at once upon the practice, and giving his enthusiastic and undivided attention to his profession, he has already secured an extensive practice and a wealthy and influential clientage in the northeastern circuit. His practice is general and covers every branch of the profession, and his record is that of a well-read lawyer, a prudent counselor and polished advocate. His style before a jury is that of easy and affable character, which invariably marks the successful nisi prius lawyer and wins verdicts. He has a large clientage in whose confidence his professional and private character is safe and permanently secure. Politically, Mr. Bass is a strong and active and consistent democrat. In 1890 he was chairman of the county committee, and later president of the democratic club of Habersham county, rendering invaluable service in the campaign of 1892. That year he was elected a member of the state gubernatorial convention, and gave his enthusiastic support to the state ticket. Mr. Bass is a young man of marked ability, accomplished and polished manners, for whom the future would seem to have much in store. Reasonably and honorably ambitious to attain to distinction, his many friends in his section of the state will doubtless see to it that his abilities are recognized and his services rewarded.

GEORGE PHILLIPS ERWIN, lawyer, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of William S. and Ruth (Clark) Erwin, was born in Clarkesville, Nov. 9, 1870. His paternal grandfather, Alexander Erwin, was born in North Carolina and reared a farmer, which he made a life pursuit. In 1834 he migrated to Georgia, and settled in Habersham county, where he died in 1877. He married Miss Catharine Wales, a native of Connecticut, but who at the time was a resident of Wilkes county, Ga. She died in 1883. Mr. Erwin's father was born in Clarkesville, Jan. 27, 1839. At the age of twenty-one he was elected ordinary of Habersham county, but resigned at the end of two years and enlisted in the state troops. During the last two years of the war he was in active and arduous service—was in command of an infantry company, and participated in the numerous battles and skirmishes incident to the defense of Atlanta. After the war he was again elected ordinary, and served a full term. He also engaged in merchandising, and did a very large and profitable business. In 1868 he was elected to represent Habersham county in the general assembly, was re-elected in 1870, and in 1872 was elected senator from the Thirty-first senatorial district. In the meantime he studied law, and in 1877 was admitted to the bar, and thenceforward practiced his profession in Clarkesville until he died in 1893. During this period he served five years as solicitor-general of the north-eastern circuit. Mr. Erwin was a man of great versatility of talent and of marked general ability—eminently successful in everything he undertook. Hon. A. S. Erwin, Athens, Ga., ex-judge of the western circuit, is a brother of the above. Mr. Erwin's mother was a daughter of Sevier and Elizabeth Clark, of Hall county, Ga., was married to Mr. Erwin Nov. 27, 1867, and is the mother of six children: Joseph A., George P., the subject of this sketch, William S., Frank S., Henry C., and Pope B. Mr. Erwin was reared and educated in Clarkesville, and when eighteen years of age entered the employ of the Plant system of railways, and remained with them until 1893—five years—as cashier in the local freight department. Having decided to enter the legal profession he commenced the study of law in July, 1893, under J. J. Bowden, an eminent member of the Clarkesville bar, and was admitted Jan. 17, 1894, in Gainsville, Judge C. J. Wellborn presiding. Locating in Clarkesville, his old home, he secured at once a good practice, and has attracted to himself already a large and influential and remunerative clientage. Genial and affable, possessing intellectual endowments of a high order, and winning social characteristics, he is sure of professional success, and, should he seek it, political advancement. Mr. Erwin was happily married Sept. 24, 1891, to Miss Eva G., daughter of Capt. T. J. Fuller, of Pierce county, Ga. Mr. Erwin's mother is still living at her home in Clarkesville. The immediate ancestors of Mr. Erwin are found in the following genealogical sketch: Alexander Gavin Erwin wedded Nancy Magahee, and born to them was Alexander; Alexander married Catherine Wales, and to them William S. was born; William S. married Ruth Clark, parents of George P. Erwin. Ruth Clark was a daughter of Sevier and Elizabeth (Ingram) Clark; Sevier was a son of William and Ruth Clark; Elizabeth Ingram was a daughter of William and Elizabeth Ingram; Catherine Wales was a daughter of Isaac and Elizabeth (Miles) Wales.

WILLIAM W. KOLLOCK, civil engineer and farmer, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of George J. and Susan M. (Johnston) Kollock, was born in Savannah, Ga., in 1845. On his father's side he is of Huguenot ancestry. His grandfather, Dr. Lemuel Kollock, a gentleman of sterling character and superior ability, came to Savannah when a young man, and very soon became the leading physician of the city. He was the originator of the dry culture system of agriculture around the city, which was subsequently pressed to completion by Dr. Waring. Dr. Kollock married Miss Maria Campbell, daughter of Macartan Campbell, of Augusta, Ga., and Miss Sarah Fenwick, of the family of Fenwicks of Staunton, Northumberland, England, who were descendants of the Fenwicks of Fenwick town, a family of wide and powerful influence in the days of the ancient Saxon kings. Three children were the fruit of this marriage: P. M., a physician of eminence in Savannah; Mrs. Neufville, wife of Rev. E. Neufville, Savannah, and George J., father of the subject of this sketch. George J. Kollock was born in Savannah about 1809, where he received his primary education. He then read law under the distinguished Joseph R. Ingersoll, completing his studies about 1832. Returning to Savannah, and being admitted to the bar, he became associated with Mr. John Millen, attained to eminence in his profession, and secured a wealthy clientage and lucrative practice. He purchased a fine and extensive estate near Clarkesville, where with his family he spent the summer months. Mr. Kollock's mother was a daughter of James Johnston, and was born in Savannah about 1816. Her father was a descendant of the Earl of Annandale and of Annie Houstoun, granddaughter of Sir Patrick Houstoun, one of the first settlers of Georgia, from Linlithgow, Scotland, of a family prominent in that shire since the year 1160, when their ancestor, Hugo de Pegainin, of Normandy, obtained grants of land from Malcolm IV. of Scotland. Of the children which blessed this union five survive: William W., the subject of this sketch; J. F., Savannah; Mrs. W. E. Epps; Miss A. H. Kollock, and Mrs. M. C. Kollock, Savannah. Mr. Kollock died on the estate near Clarkesville in February, 1894, aged eighty-four years. His widow is still alive and is living on the estate. Dr. P. M. Kollock for his first wife married a sister of his brother's (G. J.) wife. She having died, he married for his second wife his first cousin, a daughter of E. F. Campbell, Augusta, Ga., and the descendants of the two brothers and sister live in Savannah and in Habersham county. Mr. Kollock, our subject, was reared and received his early education in Savannah. He enlisted and actually served more than two years in the Confederate service as a member of the Seventh Georgia cavalry. After the war he entered the university of Georgia, Athens, graduating from the school of civil engineering in 1867. For many years he occupied the Habersham county property as a summer home, but in 1876 he determined to make it his permanent home, and devote his attention exclusively to agricultural interests. A gentleman of culture and refinement, and possessed of a magnificent estate, he enjoys life to the full and dispenses old-time Georgia hospitality to friends and guests.

MULLER DUKE LAMAR, journalist, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of P. F. and Julia (Duke) Lamar, was born in Jackson county, Ga., June 18, 1871. His great-grandfather on his father's side was born in England, emigrated to America before the revolutionary war, settled in Virginia, and was a soldier in the patriot army. His grandfather, Philip Lamar, was born in Virginia. Mr. Lamar's father was a cousin of the lately deceased distinguished statesman and jurist, L. Q. C. Lamar, ex-United States senator and associate justice of the United States supreme court, and was born in Gwinnett county, Ga., Sept. 5, 1818. For many years of his life he officiated as a minister of the Church of Christ, and died in Gainesville, Ga., in 1878. He married Miss Julia, daughter of William Duke, Jackson county, by whom he had two children: Louie, who died in infancy; and Muller Duke, the subject of this sketch. Mr. Duke was a native Georgian, and was one of the wealthiest and most substantial and influential citizens in Jackson county. He represented the county several terms in the general assembly, and served as a private in the late war in the Eighteenth Georgia regiment. He married Miss Lizzie Venable—and himself and wife died in Jackson county in 1886. Mr. Lamar was raised in Jackson county, where he received his early schooling, but finished his education at the excellent high school at Norcross, Gwinnett Co., Ga. Having determined to make journalism his life-pursuit, as a preliminary step he entered the office of the "Jackson Herald," so as to gain a practical knowledge of the art of printing, and the general conduct of a paper. After remaining there during 1888-89 he went to Athens, Ga., and in 1890 was connected with the "Athens Banner." Then he went to Eastman, Dodge Co., Ga., and in 1892-93 was engaged on the "Times-Journal" there. From Eastman he went to Florida, and from September, 1893, to February, 1894, he conducted a paper at Lakeland, in that state. In July, 1894, Mr. Lamar became the proprietor and editor of the "Advertiser," published at Clarkesville. The "Advertiser" was ably edited and carefully conducted, and under Mr. Lamar's management became a bright and newsy family paper, and influential party organ. It is the official organ of Habersham county, and a faithful exponent of democratic principles, and is widely circulated in northeast Georgia. It is rapidly gaining in popularity and circulation, and as a consequence, in influence. Mr. Lamar has developed marked ability and aptitude for his profession.

JOHN MARTIN MULLENIX, farmer, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of Abraham M. and Lenny (Butler) Mullenix, was born in Pendleton district, S. C., Sept. 12, 1828. His father was a native of South Carolina, and a mechanic, came to Georgia about 1829 and settled in Franklin county, where he engaged in the boot and shoe business, and died Sept. 8, 1849. Mr. Mullenix's mother was born in Newberry district, S. C., was the mother of ten children—five boys and five girls—and died in Habersham county in 1882. Mr. Mullenix was raised and educated in Franklin county, to which his father moved from South Carolina soon after his birth. He was raised a farmer, and farming has been his life-pursuit. About March, 1862, he enlisted in Company A, Fifty-second Georgia regiment, Col. Phillips, and with his command served under Gen. Bragg in the Kentucky campaign, doing some hard fighting at Louisville and Lexington, and at Franklin, Tenn. The command was engaged in many skirmishes, and captured a large number of prisoners. The command entered Cumberland Gap, but was later ordered to Vicksburg, took a conspicuous part in the battle of Baker's Creek, and at Horse Shoe Bend, where blood flowed like water. The command remained through the protracted siege of Vicksburg, rendering efficient service; and after its capture, July, 1863, he was paroled and returned home. He was exchanged in time to rejoin his command and take part in the bloody battle near New Hope church. With his command he was an active participant in the battle at Resaca, and the bloody and obstinately contested battles between there and Atlanta, as well as those attending the defense of that city—including the memorable battle of July 21 and 22, 1864. After Atlanta fell, his command went with Gen. Hood via Florence, Ala., which was captured, fighting all the way through Tennessee to Nashville. He bore a part in the disastrous battle of Franklin; after which the command returned through Alabama, Georgia and Carolina, and joined Gen. Johnston at Salisbury, N. C. He participated in the battle at Kingston, where 1,200 Union soldiers were captured, and enjoyed the honor—as he esteems it—of bearing a part in the last battle of the unfortunate conflict, at Bentonville, N. C. After the war he returned to Habersham county, where he had settled in 1852, and where, since, he has prosperously engaged in farming. Mr. Mullenix was married Feb. 8, 1849, to Miss Catharine, daughter of Horace Bell of Franklin county—a union blessed with thirteen children, of whom twelve are living: Clarissa, Mary Jane, William M., John M., Andrew Jackson, James, Wesley, Pinckney, Thomas, Mrs. Lizzie Odell, Louisa, and Josephine.

JOHN W. OWENS, lawyer, Toccoa, Habersham Co., Ga., son of Joshua and Drucilla (Watson) Owens, was born in Anderson district, S. C., Feb. 3, 1843. Capt. Owen's father was born in South Carolina in 1818, where he lived until 1848, when he moved to Georgia, and settled in Franklin (now Banks) county. He was public-spirited, substantial and popular, and served many years as a justice of the inferior court. He died in Banks county in 1888, aged seventy years; his widow is still living, and makes her home at Harmony Grove, Jackson Co., Ga. Of the children born to them eight are living: John W., the subject of this sketch; Mrs. Amanda Gober; Mrs. Nannie McCoy; Mrs. Marie Ritchie; Mrs. Almira Staples; Mrs. Laura Watson; and brothers E. D., and C. H. Capt. Owens came with his family to what is now Banks county when five years old, where he was reared, and during his boyhood educated. He finished his literary studies at Jonesboro, Ga., and then taught at Hilliard Male institute, at Forsyth, Ga. In 1861, at the age of eighteen years he enlisted as a private in the famous Banks county guards, which became Company A, Second Georgia regiment, Gen. Robert Toombs' brigade, Longstreet's corps, Army of Northern Virginia. The regiment was organized at Brunswick, and ordered to Richmond. The regiment was reorganized soon afterward when he was commissioned first lieutenant, and not long after as captain. With his command he participated in the following hard-fought and bloody, as well as many less important, battles: First, at Yorktown—Dam No. 1—after which the command moved to Richmond, thence to Gordonsville, Va., and went into winter quarters. His command participated in the battles of Second Manassas, Cold Harbor, Malvern Hill, Brandy Station, seven days' fight around Richmond, Orange Court House, two days' fight at Gettysburg—where he was wounded, Spottsylvania Court House, Wilderness, Fredericksburg, Drury's Bluff and Fort Harrison. He also fought throughout the siege of Petersburg, and followed Gen. Longstreet to Chickamauga, where he was seriously wounded and sent to the hospital; later he was furloughed and came home. He afterward rejoined his command, Longstreet's corps, at Morristown, east Tennessee, and after four years of active, arduous service was present at the surrender at Appomattox Court House. Capt. Owens' record shows that of the many battles and skirmishes in which his regiment was engaged he missed but two. Returning from the war he engaged about eighteen months in merchandising, and then in farming. Three years later he was elected clerk of the superior court and served two years. Having in the meantime studied law, he was admitted to the bar in White county, in 1874, and shortly afterward located in Toccoa, where he has gained honorable distinction in his profession, and built up a good practice in the eastern and western circuits. He has filled the office of solicitor of Habersham county court two years, and has also served several years as mayor of Toccoa. He is regarded as an able lawyer, a sound and safe counselor, and being enterprising, progressive and public-spirited, has the confidence of the people, and enjoys a popularity accorded to but few. It is altogether probable his fellow-citizens will demand his services in a higher and broader field. Capt. Owens was married in 1869 to Miss Lucy M., daughter of Dr. Benjamin Smith of Lumpkin county, Ga.; a union blessed with three children: Alice, Charles and Nannie, of whom the first named is the only survivor. In April, 1876, Mrs. Owens died, and in March, 1880, Capt. Owens married Miss Mary Eliza, daughter of Flavius Ward of Habersham county, who has borne him five children: Mamie, Willard, De Witt, Annie and Laurens.

MICAJAH TILMAN PERKINS, lawyer, Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., son of John and Rachel (Martin) Perkins, was born in Banks county, Ga., May 22, 1866. His grandfather, Logan Perkins, was a native of Buncombe county, N. C., was one of the earliest settlers of Habersham county, and died in Banks county in 1872. Mr. Perkins' father was born in Habersham county, as a farmer, and himself and wife are still living near Mount Airy. Ten children are the fruit of their marriage: John L., Micajah Tilman, the subject of this sketch; Harvey S., Mrs. Emma F. Braselton, Texas; Bynum, Serena, Vance, Bleckley, Lulu and Absalom. Mr. Perkins was reared on the farm, attended in early boyhood the near-by schools, and finished his literary education at Sibley institute at Mount Airy, near to which his parents moved in 1874. Soon after leaving this institution, in the fall of 1887, when only twenty-one years old, he was elected sheriff of Habersham county, and is believed to have been the youngest person ever elected to that important and responsible office in this state. From that time onward his career and success have been remarkable, and offered an inspiring example and illustration of what our republican institutions can do for those of laudable ambition, possessing push and energy, combined with strict integrity. He served his term of two years with credit to himself and the entire satisfaction of his appreciative constituency. Having determined in the meantime to adopt the legal profession, he had been studying, and in 1890 was admitted to the bar. He at once entered upon the practice at Clarkesville, and has been successful beyond his most sanguine expectations—his clientage extending over the northeastern circuit, and increasing in extent and value every year. In 1890 his admiring constituency elected him to the mayoralty of Clarkesville, where he performed valuable service to the city, and in 1892 he was commissioned notary public, and ex-officio justice of the peace—an appointment he still holds. That same year the populist party invaded Habersham county, and the democratic friends of the youthful subject of this sketch presented him as their candidate to check the rising tide, and bear their banner to victory. He was triumphantly elected to represent Habersham county in the general assembly, and was placed and served on the following committees: Judiciary, privileges and elections and pensions, and had the honor of being appointed on the special committee sent to the world's fair. So faithfully and zealously did he represent and serve his constituency that in 1894 he was renominated by his party, and was re-elected. His career so far has been as brilliant as it has been brief—he seems already to have become a favorite with the people—and the promise of his future seems indeed to be of the brightest. Affable and attractive, of agreeable manners, of plain but dignified bearing, and possessing social qualities which are winning and lead to success, professional and political distinction assuredly await him. After leaving the session of the legislature of 1894, he went immediately to the Lumpkin law school of Athens, Ga., and graduated from that institution in 1895.

HALL COUNTY.

COL. ALLEN D. CANDLER, secretary of state. Few men have enjoyed in a higher degree the confidence of the people of this state than Col. Allen D. Candler. This confidence is inspired not only by his unsullied record in public life, but equally by the zeal, fidelity and wisdom which he has brought to the discharge of every duty imposed upon him by his fellow-citizens. Col. Candler is a native Georgian and was born in Lumpkin county, in this state, on Nov. 4, 1834. This was four years prior to the removal of the Cherokee Indians from north Georgia. In 1838 the family moved from Lumpkin county and located in Franklin county. Here the subject of this sketch passed his boyhood in the vigorous life of the open fields, making the best of his time and opportunities, and laying the foundation of a strong and robust constitution. He remained here until his twenty-second year, having acquired the rudiments of a primary education from the common schools of the county. This, however, was not enough for a young man who thirsted for a higher knowledge than he could gain from elementary text books, and whose ambition had pictured to him broader and better fields than those which lay around him. Leaving his home in Franklin county he matriculated as a student in Mercer university, then located at Penfield, Ga. From this institution he was graduated in 1859 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Directly after the war he was honored by his alma mater with the degree of Master of Arts, one of the highest in the gift of the university. Immediately after graduation the young applicant for life's substantial honors, flushed with the high expectations born of his college career, located in Jonesboro, Ga., and for two years engaged in the occupation of teaching school. In 1861, Georgia having seceded from the Union, the young preceptor exchanged his ferule for the musket and entered the Confederate army. He left Jonesboro in October, 1861, as a private in Company H, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment. He served as a private, however, for only one month, becoming, at the expiration of this time, the first lieutenant of the company. In October, 1862, just one year from the time of his enlistment, he was promoted to the rank of captain. His courage as a soldier and his love for military life that were plainly evinced by his conduct on the field, clearly foreshadowed still higher honors for the young soldier. In May, 1864, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Fourth Georgia reserves, and in January, 1865, near the close of the war, he was made colonel of that regiment. In addition to a number of smaller engagements the subject of this sketch figured in the following battles: Bridgeport, Tenn., Richmond, Ky., Baker's Creek, Miss., siege of Vicksburg, Miss., Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Cassville, Kennesaw Mountain, siege and battles around Atlanta and Jonesboro. At several of these points occurred the severest engagements of the war. Col. Candler was slightly wounded at Kennesaw Mountain and lost his left eye at Jonesboro, Ga. After the war he returned to Jonesboro, having, as he expressed it, "one wife, one baby, one dollar, and one eye." He resumed his occupation as a school teacher and taught until 1870. Immediately after his return home he was honored by his fellow-citizens, in recognition of his gallant services in defense of Jonesboro, by receiving from them in 1866 the office of mayor for one year. In 1870 he moved to Gainesville, Ga., and entered the lumber business. This he carried on until 1882, being at the same time a general contractor. In 1879-80 he built the Gainesville, Jefferson & Southern railroad, sixty-five miles in length, running from Gainesville to Social Circle and passing through the town of Jefferson. Col. Candler is still the president of this road, having filled that office since the time of its completion. In addition to this road he also built as contractor in 1882 a portion of the Gainesville & Dahlonga railroad, twenty-six miles in length, and a street railroad for Gainesville in 1874. It thus appears that Col. Candler has been an important factor in the material development and upbuilding of northeast Georgia. In addition to this valuable service rendered the state as a builder of railroads, he held quite a number of political stations. In 1872 he was elected mayor of Gainesville, Ga., for one year, and was succeeded by his father, Daniel G. Candler, a veteran of three wars, several years deceased. In the fall of the same year he was elected as the representative of Hall county in the state legislature, and was twice re-elected. In 1877 he became a member of the state senate, and served for two years in that body. In 1882 he was nominated as the democratic candidate for congress in the Ninth district, and was triumphantly elected, defeating Hon. Emory Speer, in one of the most exciting political campaigns of the state. Mr. Speer had carried the district in two successive elections, in the last one receiving a majority of 4,000 votes as an independent candidate. The majority of Col. Candler over his brilliant opponent was 2,600. His career in congress was a fearless one and the district was faithfully represented. He was made chairman of the committee on education in the Fiftieth congress, and a member of the committees on banking and currency and mines and mining during his four terms. Col. Candler is a loyal member of the masonic fraternity, his name appearing on the roll of the Gainesville lodge, and also on that chapter. Before the close of the war, in January, 1864, Col. Candler married the daughter of the late Thomas J. Williams, a prominent planter of Jones county, Miss Eugenia T. Williams. Eleven children were the result of this union, ten of whom are still living, six boys and four girls. The children are as follows: Eugenia, the wife of D. L. Wardroper of Lexington, Ky.; Florence, the wife of Wm. K. Ashford of Gainesville, Ga.; Marcus A.; Thomas C.; Hortense, the wife of F. K. Bunkley of Montgomery, Ala.; William D., John C., Victor Eugene, Annie and Benjamin Lee. In 1891, Col. Candler, after having served the district for several years in congress, retired to private life and entered again the lumber and contracting business at Gainesville, Ga. He continued successfully in this line of work until his appointment as secretary of state by Gov. Northen, in May, 1894, to fill the unexpired term of Gen. Philip Cook. Last fall he was elected to the same office for the regular term of two years. Col. Candler during his connection with this office has shown a marked familiarity with public affairs, and is one of the best officials that has ever occupied that responsible position. He is a Georgian of whom the state is justly proud, having served faithfully in both the field and forum and always with an eye single to her glory.

MELVIN J. CHARLES, tax collector of Hall county, was born in Gilmore, Ga., in 1849, and is a son of William and Elizabeth Charles, both natives of Georgia. He was one of a family of seven children—four boys and three girls. John P., his eldest brother, died as a member of a Louisiana regiment at the siege of Vicksburg. Harvey M. served in the army of Virginia, and was discharged for a disability caused by a wound. The other brother, James, is deceased, and the sisters, Jane, Mary Ann and Adeline, are living. The mother of Mr. Charles died when he was six years old, and at an early age he was left to shift for himself. He helped the farmers for his board and clothes and managed to pick up a fair education from the common schools. At the age of twenty-three he was married to Sarah Pierce, a daughter of James and Permelia (Deal) Pierce. To this union have been born six children: Eva Lela, John, deceased, Emma, Lou Fletcher, Gertrude and Melrose. Mr. and Mrs. Charles and their oldest daughter are members of the Baptist church. Mr. Charles is a member of the Flowery Branch lodge No. 212, F. and A. M., and of the I. O. F., Flowery Branch lodge No. 99. In 1892 he was elected to the office of tax collector and re-elected in 1894. He is a popular officer, and his administration has been eminently satisfactory to the people. He takes an active interest in politics, state and county, and is a stanch democrat.

FRANK TAYLOR DAVIE, merchant, Flowery Branch, was born Nov. 4, 1849, in Randolph county, Ala., and is the son of James Allen and Lucinda (Hamilton) Davie. The father was born in South Carolina in 1817, and after his marriage he went to Alabama and taught school in Randolph county. In 1872 he was a member of the state legislature of Arkansas and was either a county officer or in state positions the greater part of his life. He was the father of five children: Elizabeth, Frank, Jane, Juliet Eugenia and one infant, deceased. Mr. Davie died in 1881, and his wife died in February, 1893, aged seventy-eight years. Mr. Frank T. Davie spent his boyhood days in Gwinnett county, Ga., and is one of the self-made men of the state. At the age of eighteen years he had picked up a good education and then started in farming for himself. In 1874 he engaged in merchandising in Flowery Branch and has since conducted the business with such success that he is one of the leading business men of the county. In 1874 Mr. Davie married Augusta, daughter of Elisha Chamblee, a prominent citizen of Hall county. By this marriage three children have been born, one of whom, Adie, survives. The mother of these children died June 9, 1878, and Mr. Davis married for his second wife in October, 1883, Sarah E., daughter of John R. Medlock, of Norcross, Ga. To this marriage have been born three children: Frank, deceased, Carl Newman, and James Howard. Mr. and Mrs. Davie are members of the Methodist Episcopal church and Mr. Davie is district steward and one of the trustees. He is worthy master of Flowery Branch lodge No. 212, F. and A. M., and belongs to Flowery Branch lodge No. 99, I. O. O. F., of which he has filled all the chairs. He served as justice of the peace for twelve years and in 1888-89 was a member of the state legislature, serving on the committees on mines, banking and prisons. He is now a member of the board of county commissioners.

JOHN L. GAINES. One of Hall county's best farmers and a leading citizen is John Lilburn Gaines, of Flowery Branch. He was born Sept. 16, 1842, in Hall county, and here he has spent all his life. His father was Ira Gaines and his mother Nancy Hawkins, and they were the parents of eight children, four boys and four girls. Francis H., the oldest boy, was in Company D, Twenty-seventh Georgia infantry, and was killed at the second battle of Cold Harbor. William D. was in Company D, Twenty-seventh Georgia regiment, and was wounded at Sharpsburg and died at home from its effects. Henry W. T. was the third soldier of the family and is now a farmer in Hall county and runs a big set of mills. The father of these children died April 4, 1891, at the age of seventy-eight. His wife was born in 1815, and is still living, and is remarkably strong in health, as she is in mind. She is a member of the Baptist church, as was her husband during his lifetime. The subject of this memoir after the war and on reaching manhood began farming. He was elected justice of the peace for a number of years and in 1877 was elected sheriff of Hall county, and continuously elected for five terms. He then declined to be a candidate again, telling his friends that he had had more than his share. He was elected to the legislature for the terms 1892-93 and 1894-95, and served on the committees of prisons, agriculture, temperance and blind asylum of Macon. On Oct. 18, 1866, Mr. Gaines was married to Mary C., daughter of Pinckney D. Major, of Hall county. She was born in Georgia. Their marriage has been blessed with thirteen children, viz: Nancy E., Marietta, Eugenia, Ira P., Robert L., Maggie M., John L., Joseph W., Grover C., Homer W., Ernest N. and Hubert H. Mr. and Mrs. Gaines are members of the Baptist church and Mr. Gaines is a member of the F. and A. M. Mr. Gaines owns a magnificent farm of 400 acres in a high state of cultivation, and is a man enjoying the esteem of all who are fortunate enough to have his acquaintance. Mr. Gaines had the same blood in his veins that led his three brothers to volunteer for the country's cause, and he too served through the war with distinguished bravery. He was in all the battles with ex-Senator Colquitt, his superior officer. He was wounded four times at Seven Pines and was in the battles of Fort Fisher, when he was again wounded, and around Richmond and the siege of Petersburg. He was in the first engagement of the war, outside of Fort Sumter, and was in the last battle, fought after Lee had surrendered.

ROBERT E. GREEN, M. D. At the head of one of Georgia's prosperous manufacturing establishments is Dr. Robert E. Green, of Gainesville. He was born in Campbell (now Douglas) county, Ga., Sept. 29, 1846, and is the son of William E. and Mary (Stiles) Green. The parents of Dr. Green were natives of New Jersey, emigrating to Georgia in 1831, and settled on the line of Walton and Clarke counties. William E. Green and a Mr. Hopping built the High Shoals cotton mills, still running, and was engaged in the cotton manufacturing business all his life. He died in 1867 at the age of seventy-one. He was a man most highly respected for his integrity and high moral character. Dr. Robert E. Green was educated in the common schools of Campbell county and schools of Atlanta. In 1864 he enlisted in a battery of artillery and entered the Confederate service, served to the end of the war and was paroled at the surrender. He then attended the university of Georgia at Athens. Upon his father's demise he took charge of his father's business, at the same time studying medicine. He then attended the Southern Medical college at Atlanta, from which he was graduated in 1869. He practiced his profession in Atlanta until 1870, when he moved to Gainesville. He continued to practice there for two years, when his health failing, he entered the lumber business with Col. A. D. Candler. After a partnership of four years he withdrew and bought and operated the street railroad in Gainesville for eight years. He is now general manager, secretary and treasurer of the Georgia Manufacturing company of Gainesville. He was mayor of Gainesville in 1879-80 and judge of the criminal court. He belongs to the Presbyterian church, is a Mason and was at one time worshipful master of Lodge 219, at Gainesville. He was married in 1869 to Eveline E. Wilson, daughter of James H. Wilson, of Campbell county, by whom he has seven children living: R. E., Carrie A., M. Louise, Elizabeth, Emmett H., Evelyn and Albert Lamar.

GEN. JAMES LONGSTREET, of Gainesville, Ga., was born in Edgefield district, S. C., Jan. 8, 1821. His family removed to Alabama in 1831, and he was appointed from that state to the West Point Military academy, where he was graduated in 1842, and was assigned to the Fourth infantry. He was at Jefferson barracks, Mo., in 1842-44; on frontier duty at Natchitoches, La., in 1844-45; in Texas, 1845-46, and in Mexico at the battles of Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, San Antonio, Churubusco and Moline del Rey. For gallant conduct in the two latter engagements he was brevetted captain and major, and had already been made first lieutenant Feb. 23, 1847; at the storming of Chapultepec, Sept. 8, 1847, he was severely wounded. He was chief commissary of the department of Texas, 1849-51, was commissioned captain in December, 1852, and major and paymaster in July, 1858. In 1861 he resigned to join the Confederate army, of which he was immediately appointed brigadier-general, and won distinction in the first battle of Bull Run, where he prevented a large force of Federal troops from supporting McDowell's flank attack. On May 5, 1862, he made a brave stand at Williamsburg, where he was attacked by Heintzelman, Hooker and Karney, and held his ground sturdily until Hancock arrived to reinforce his opponents, when he was driven back. At the second battle of Bull Run he commanded the first corps of the army of northern Virginia, which came so promptly to the relief of Jackson when he was hard pressed by Pope's army, and by a determined flank charge decided the fortunes of the day. He led the right wing of the army of Northern Virginia at Gettysburg, and tried to dissuade Lee from ordering the disastrous charge on the third day. When Lee retreated to Virginia Gen. Longstreet, with five brigades, was transferred to Tennessee under Bragg, and at Chickamauga held the left wing of the Confederate forces. He rejoined Lee early in 1864, and was so prominent in the battle of the Wilderness that he was wounded by the fire of his own troops. He was in the surrender at Appomattox, April 9, 1865. Throughout the army he was familiarly known as "Old Pete," and was considered the hardest fighter in the Confederate service. He also had the unbounded confidence of his troops, who were devoted to him, and the whole army felt thrilled with renewed vigor in the presence of the foe when it became known down the line that "Old Pete" was up. Gen. Longstreet took up his residence in New Orleans after the war and established the commercial house of Longstreet, Owens & Co. He was appointed surveyor of the port of New Orleans by President Grant, and was afterward supervisor of internal revenue in Louisiana, and postmaster at New Orleans. In 1880 he was sent as United States minister to Turkey by President Hayes and under Garfield he was United States marshal for the district of Georgia.

JOHN E. REDWINE, a prominent citizen of Gainesville, was born in Randolph county, N. C., June 3, 1823. When an infant his parents moved to Wilson county, Tenn. He is a son of William and Lucy (Cocker) Redwine. William Redwine was of German extraction and settled in Hall county in 1827. He was a devoted member of the Methodist church and a prosperous farmer and manufacturer of tobacco. He died in 1857 at the age of sixty-five. The early educational training of J. E. Redwine was obtained in the common schools of Hall county and a select school in the neighborhood, after which he attended the high school at Gainesville, graduating in 1842. He was then engaged in teaching school for two years, and in 1854 was elected clerk of the superior court of Hall county. This office he held for twelve years. During his time in the clerk's office he read law under Judge Hutchins, Sr. He practiced his profession for a few years, then, in October, 1866, began the publication of the Gainesville "Eagle," and continued in this work until May, 1884. He was elected to the first legislature under the present constitution of Georgia in 1878-79 and was again elected in 1882 and 1883. In both general assemblies he was a member of the committee on finance, and in the session of 1882-83 he was chairman of the committee on enrollment. In 1884 Mr. Redwine sold his paper, and during all this intervening time he has been interested in farming. In 1890 he was elected commissioner of roads and revenue and was elected chairman of the board and is still serving in that capacity. He is a member of the Methodist church, is a Mason, belonging to Gainesville lodge No. 219, F. and A. M., and was worshipful master of this lodge for twenty-five years. He is also P. D. G. M. and at present is district deputy of the state of Georgia. He was married in December, 1845, to Emeline Kerbow, daughter of Solomon Kerbow, of Jackson county, by whom he has seven children: Liman A., Elgivia E., Flavius W., Servilia R., William M., Sarah A. and John E., Jr.

C. C. SANDERS, merchant and banker, Gainesville, was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1840, and is a son of Harris and Elizabeth (Smith) Sanders. Harris Sanders was a life-long member of the Baptist church, a prosperous farmer, and died in 1867 at the age of seventy-five. Mr. C. C. Sanders was educated in the schools of Jackson county and received military training at the Georgia military institute, from which place he was graduated in June, 1861. At the first call for volunteers, young Sanders, in August, 1861, enlisted as a private, and on reaching Atlanta he was elected lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment. He was sent to the army of Virginia, under Gen. Lee, and was in the battle of Williamsburg and in the seven days' fight around Richmond, ending with the battle of Malvern Hill. In the battle of Fredericksburg Col. Sander's lost nearly one-third of his regiment and at Chancellorsville one-half of it. At the battle of South Mountain, Col. Sanders was placed in command of the brigade of 3,750 men. At the close of this hard-fought battle he had lost all but 1,725 of his brigade. At Sharpsburg the losses of his brigade were 58 per cent. according to the official reports. He was in the battles of Chickamauga and Knoxville, the Wilderness and Spottsylvania court house. Col. Sanders was captured three days before the surrender of Lee at Sailor's creek, and with Gen. Custin Lee and Gen. Ewell was sent to prison at Washington city. He was there during the exciting period of President Lincoln's assassination, when the lives of all prisoners were in deadly peril. He was transferred to Johnson's island in May, and reached home in September. Since the war Col. Sanders has been engaged in the mercantile and banking business. He was one of the Georgia commissioners to the world's fair at Chicago. He is a member of the Baptist church, and was married in 1871 to Miss Fannie Scarborough, daughter of Americus Scarborough, a leading citizen of Lee county. They have two children: Robert J. and Montine.

A. R. SMITH, clerk of the superior court, Gainesville, was born in Hall county, July 13, 1855. He is a son of Robert and Elnira (Roberts) Smith, of Scotch-Irish descent and natives of Georgia. Robert Smith was a brave soldier in the civil war, enlisting in the Confederate army, Company K, Sixty-fourth Georgia regiment volunteers, and serving two years, dying in 1864. A. R. Smith was educated in the common schools of Hall county, then entered Emory college at Oxford in 1883. After completing his education he was elected clerk of the superior court of Hall county in 1885. He has been re-elected for six successive terms and had the honor of obtaining the wonderful majority of 800 when he was elected in 1895. Mr. Smith has been chairman of the democratic congressional committee of Hall county, also that of the senatorial committee, and is now chairman of the county democracy. He is a member of the Methodist church and a master Mason. He was married in 1885 to Miss Sarah Palmour, daughter of Judge John D. Palmour of Dawson county. There have been three children: Mabel, Robert E. and Winifred.

PROF. A. W. VAN HOOSE, associate president of the Georgia Female seminary and conservatory of music, located at Gainesville, Ga., was born in Griffin, Spalding Co., Ga., Oct. 31, 1860. At an early age he removed with his parents to middle Tennessee, and his earlier education was acquired at the high school of Winchester, that state. Returning to Georgia in 1878, he taught a small country school near the city of Gainesville. Beginning with a total enrollment of five pupils, Prof. Van Hoose, during the three years of his principalship, so devoted himself to the work in hand that the large number of 150 pupils were in regular attendance when the school closed at the end of the last term of his administration. Subsequently he became a student at the university of Georgia at Athens, from which institution he was graduated with honor in 1882. After graduation he taught in the South Georgia Agricultural college, Thomasville, Ga., the Howard college, Marion, Ala., and at the university of Georgia, Athens. In 1885 he was chosen president of the Gainesville college, Gainesville, Ga., retained that position one year and graduated one of the most promising classes which has ever gone out from that institution. During the summer of 1886 the property of the old Georgia Baptist Female seminary was about to be sold to satisfy various claims against it. Prof. Van Hoose saw, almost intuitively, the opportunity of a lifetime to build a really great female college. He bought the property at private sale and at once set about to make it a magnificent school. His first opening was not auspicious, as only about twenty pupils were present; but nothing daunted, he continued the work, employing only the best teachers and the most modern methods, until to-day the institution he founded ranks among the most successful of the female colleges of the south. Much of the success of the school, he insists, is due to his parents, Rev. A. and Mrs. M. F. Van Hoose, and his estimable wife (nee Miss Lucy E. Rucker, to whom he was united in marriage in August, 1887), who at all times and under all circumstances have given him their heartiest support. Feeling the need of assistance and capital, in 1893 Prof. Van Hoose sold a half interest in the school to Prof. Haywood J. Pearce.

PROF. HAYWOOD J. PEARCE was born in Columbus, Muscogee Co., Ga., Aug. 26, 1871, and is the only child and son of Mr. Thomas J. and Mrs. Virginia (Biggers) Pearce, of that place. His earlier education was acquired in the private schools of the city of Columbus, but at the age of fifteen he entered the preparatory department of Emory college, Oxford, Ga., from which institution he received his diploma in June, 1891. Immediately after graduation he was elected to the chair of Latin in the Columbus Female college, afterward assuming the presidency of the same institution, and remaining there until his present connection was formed. Prof. Pearce was married in August, 1892, to Miss Mary Matthews, of Columbus, and three children have blessed their union. The association of Profs. Van Hoose and Pearce in the management of the great institution under their charge has been and is a most pleasant one; but no biography of these gentlemen would be complete without a description of the great enterprise to which they have consecrated their lives, their talents and their money. Nestled at the base of the Blue Ridge mountains, in that section of the state known as northeast Georgia, is the beautiful, prosperous city of Gainesville. Fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea, its atmosphere is as pure as that of the mountains, and this, coupled with the fact that its water is so cool as never, even in the hottest weather, to require ice, makes it the Mecca to which thousands from the lower portions of Georgia flock during the summer months, seeking health and rest. Fever, chills, malarial diseases and mosquitoes are absolutely unknown to its people, and it is the testimony of physicians of national reputation that a year's residence in this favored section is of incalculable benefit to anyone. It is to such a place as this that the Georgia Female seminary invites its pupils. The college campus embraces some seven acres, beautifully shaded by primeval oaks, and affords splendid opportunities for exercise and amusement. An elegant gymnasium, ten-pin alley, tennis, quoits and croquet are provided in order that the young ladies may have ample facilities for exercise. The college buildings are of brick and marble, with elegantly finished interiors. An $18,000 addition was made quite recently to the home department, thus making this one of the best arranged and most commodious home schools for young ladies in the southern states. The college library is a magnificent room, 40x60 feet, tiled with Georgia marble and finished in Georgia pine. It is exceedingly well lighted and affords excellent opportunities for reading and recreation. Bath rooms and steam heat add to the comfort of the pupils. Religious services are held at the college both morning and evening, and pupils attend such churches on the Sabbath as parents may designate. One of the chief attractions of this school is the young ladies' reading room, which is fitted up with handsome book-cases, filled with carefully selected books, comfortable chairs, tables, pictures and other accessories, which combine to make it a favorite resort for all who love reading. In literature, music, art, elocution, and physical culture this institution stands in the very front rank of the colleges for women in the southern states. It is doubtful if there are a dozen institutions of its kind with as high a curriculum south. The advantages afforded in the music department are very fine, possessing as it does the only real conservatory in the southern states, in which the pupil is taught the mastery of every musical instrument, including the pipe organ recently purchased by its enterprising principals. During the early months of the coming year (1896) it is proposed that a new auditorium building, with a seating capacity of 1,000, shall be added to the already extensive buildings of the institution. The department of art offers exceptional advantages also, and its facilities are constantly being increased in order to keep pace with the growth of this particular part of the school. It is gratifying to note that the efforts of the proprietors of the school are meeting with signal success. During the collegiate year just closed eleven states were represented among the student body of the institution, and it is but a question of time when this institution will be reckoned among the leading female colleges of the union.

HON. GEORGE W. WALKER, mayor of Gainesville, Ga., was born in Bartow county, Ga., on Oct. 13, 1845, and is a son of Felix and Mary B. (Ford) Walker. He is the youngest in a family of five living children, viz.: Emaline, Margaret, Cassie, Mary and George W. He learned the blacksmith's trade when young, established a carriage manufactory in Gainesville, Ga., in 1876, and has since devoted his attention to that business, and now has a thriving trade throughout the state. In 1885 he was elected mayor of Gainesville and served one term. For the two years previous to that time he had served as a member of the city council. In December, 1893, he was again chosen mayor of Gainesville, and retains that office at this time. In 1869 he was happily joined in the bonds of holy wedlock to Miss Ella I. Smith, daughter of William P. Smith, a distinguished citizen of Gainesville, Ga. This union has been blessed by the birth of five children, now in life, viz.: William Clyde, Harry, Raiford, Ella and Ileta.

HANCOCK COUNTY.

JAMES M. ARCHER, planter, Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga. The gentleman herein named is one of the old-school planters of Hancock county, and is living on the same plantation which his father cultivated before him. He is one of that class of planters who believe in raising their own "hog and hominy," who make their farms self-sustaining, and who are to-day the only prosperous people in the state. Would that Georgia had more of them. They are the bone and sinew of the country. Grandfather William Archer came to Hancock county early in the present century. He lived to a good old age, and reared a large and prosperous family. William was the father of James M. and was born in the county in 1812. He married in 1833 Miss Elizabeth Jackson, who was of German descent, and was also a native of the county. But two children were born to the union: William J., who married and reared a family in the county, and died in 1889, and James M., whose name heads this sketch. The mother of these boys was a woman of fine qualities, and taught them to "fear God and regard man" in all the walks of life. She died at a ripe old age in 1878. William Archer was a man of iron constitution and a capacity and will for hard work equaled by but few in his day. He began life in very moderate circumstances and by middle age had placed himself in the ranks of the wealthy planters of the county. This was not accomplished by trading and short practices, but by actually "digging it out of the soil." During his life-time he was a liberal supporter of the Baptist church, and is remembered as a man of large hospitality and generous impulses. He died in 1887. James M. Archer has followed in his father's footsteps, and is looked upon as a man equally as valuable to the community. His public spirit is proverbial, and he occupies a high place in church and society, holding the respect of all who know him. He was born Jan. 12, 1837, and was given such education as the common schools of the county afforded. He married his present estimable wife, Clarissa Ann Peeler, March 21, 1861. She was a daughter of Rev. Berry Peeler, who came from South Carolina, and was for many years prior to his death a prominent and gifted minister of the Baptist church. Twelve children resulted from this union, as follows: Ida J., deceased; Addie L., widow of Dr. L. S. Garner, living now with her parents; William B., deceased; Flavius J., planter, Hancock county; Sarah B., deceased; Green P.; J. Harvey; an infant, unnamed; Anna May, Jesse Mercer, Lillian E. and Isaac Holmes. Mr. Archer is one of the heaviest land-owners in the county, paying tax on some 3,000 acres of land. He lives on the old Archer plantation, eight miles south of Sparta, in a commodious new house, surrounded by such comforts as make life pleasant in the county. During the late war he did his whole duty as a private soldier in Company E, Thirty-second Georgia regiment, Col. George P. Harrison, commanding. He enlisted in 1862 and served on the coast defenses in South Carolina, Georgia and Florida, participated in the battle of Ocean Pond, in the latter state, and the bombardment of Battery Wagoner, near Savannah. Mr. Archer is a democrat in political belief, and a deacon in the Baptist church. Socially he is regarded highly, being a gentleman of entertaining conversational powers and of most hospitable disposition.

A. S. BASS, postmaster, depot agent and storekeeper, Devereaux, Hancock Co., Ga., a station on the Macon & Augusta railway, in the western part of the county. Mr. Bass comes from good old Virginia stock, from which state his grandfather, Edmund Bass, emigrated when in his teens. Mr. Bass' father married a Miss Ingram, and settled in the western part of the county, where he reared a family of four sons and five daughters: Milton, married Ann Culver, a sister of Hardy C., whose family is mentioned elsewhere, and became the father of the following children: Ann E., Mrs. Wm. Coleman, Devereaux; W. H., Macon; A. S., the subject of this sketch; Carrie G., widow of J. W. Mote, Devereaux; George E., private Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, wounded and captured at Gettysburg, died in a Federal prison; Wesley A., planter near Devereaux; Hardy W., Baldwin county; Mary J., deceased; Sallie E.; Mrs. Wm. Brown, Devereaux; Mattie L., Mrs. F. A. Hall, Milledgeville. Mrs. Bass died in 1869. She was a woman of superior qualities and is remembered by her children as a mother faithful and true to their best interests. The father lived till 1883. He early mastered the art of successfully tilling his native heath, and was regarded as an authority on all questions pertaining to agriculture. He accumulated a good estate, and in his public and private benefactions was liberal and just. He was a member and active worker in the Methodist church, and as such is remembered as being of peculiar and wonderful power in prayer. Although not an educated man, when "talking to the Lord" he had a command of language seldom surpassed. "Syd" Bass, as he is familiarly known, came to manhood on the wave that ushered in the civil war, having been born June 22, 1841. He enlisted as a private in Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, in 1861. He participated in some of the hardest fought battles of the war, notably the seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, Chancellorsville and Second Manassas, and wears the marks of two Yankee bullets, having been wounded in the shoulder at Sharpsburg, and in the thigh at Second Manassas. Witnessing the surrender of his beloved chieftain at Appomattox, he returned home, gladly laying down the implements of war to engage in the industries of peace. The business of Mr. Bass since the war has been such as to give him a large acquaintance in the county, among whom he is regarded as a faithful and conscientious official. He is a democrat, is a Mason and belongs to the Methodist church. The marriage of Mr. Bass was consummated with Miss Ella C. Simmons in 1872, who is the mother of three children: George E., died in infancy; Anna le Gay and Ora E., young ladies at home.

CAPT. RICHARD B. BAXTER, Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga., is the only representative left in Hancock county of a very prominent and influential family whose members have won eminence in professional and business circles wherever they may have located, notably Judge Eli Baxter, an uncle of the above gentleman, who for several decades was one of the leaders of the bar of middle Georgia, and a judge of the superior court, and Thomas W., the same gentleman's father, who died a successful and prosperous merchant and manufacturer in Athens. Richard B. Baxter was born in Athens, Ga., Nov. 27, 1840, the son of Thomas W. and Mary (Wiley) Baxter. His people were North Carolinians and came to the state in its early history. His father died when Richard was but four years old. He spent his life as a business man, successively in Milledgeville, Macon and Athens, and was a man of fine business capacity, his early death cutting off a career that would have been brilliant in its success. At the time of his death he was engaged in various enterprises and was president of the Athens Manufacturing company. Mrs. Baxter was a member of the Wiley family, which has also been prominent in the state. She died in 1869, the mother of the following children: Andrew, Atlanta, Ga.; Mary, deceased, who married Judge J. J. Gresham, Macon, Ga.; Thomas W., Baltimore; Sarah, widow of W. E. Bird, Baltimore; Dr. J. S., Macon, president of the Southwestern railway; Eli L., died of disease in the late war; Edwin G., killed in Texas, and Richard B. This last-named gentleman was graduated from Franklin college (now the university of Georgia) in 1860. The year which followed was one of great interest to the young graduate, who was just at that age when the blood mantles and oppression seems most galling. When the stirring events of that year culminated in the convention which met at Milledgeville he heartily acquiesced in its decision and soon became a member of the Athens guard. This company went to the front among the very first troops, and in the organization became Company K, Third Georgia regiment. The regiment was first stationed at Portsmouth, then fortified Roanoke Island. It was subsequently detailed to patrol the Dismal Swamp canal, where it had its first engagement at South Mills. After the evacuation of Norfolk it was ordered to Petersburg, and beginning with the Seven Pines fight about Richmond, participated successively in all the important engagements throughout Virginia, was in the Maryland campaign (wounded at Sharpsburg), and participated in the great battle at Gettysburg, in all of which Mr. Baxter followed the varying fortunes of the army. After the battle he was transferred to Company E, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and went with Longstreet to reinforce the army of the west. At Chickamauga and Knoxville he did his duty gallantly, but while on a foraging tour near the latter place was unfortunate enough to fall into the hands of the enemy. This was in January, 1864. He was taken to the Rock Island military prison, from which he marched out in the very last squad which left it in 1865, the gates swinging open never again to bar the coming and going of the southern soldier. The memory of those long dreary months still lingers with the soldier and makes him appreciate to the fullest extent the liberty of thought and action. Returning home to Athens, Capt. Baxter was there happily married Aug. 9 to Miss Kate, daughter of Tinsley W. Rucker. This perfect union was broken in 1882 when death claimed the mother of his children, whom they worshiped with a love akin to the divine. These children are honoring themselves and their parents in taking useful positions in life as they come to maturity. John S., Jr., who is prominently identified with one of the Macon railroads, is a graduate of Emory college; Edgeworth B. was educated at Princeton, where he was graduated and is now a successful practitioner of the law at Augusta; Elizabeth H. was educated at the Misses Bonds' school at Baltimore, and is now the wife of J. Lane Mullaly, Sparta, Ga. The three remaining children are young people at home: Georgia F., Richard B., Jr., and Thomas W. Capt. Baxter moved to Sparta in 1867, where he has since engaged in planting and in the management of the large property which he possesses. His home reflects the character of the man in its quiet elegance. He is a keen business man, a courteous and elegant gentleman, and a citizen whom his friends delight to honor. He votes the democratic ticket, and is a consistent and prominent member of the Presbyterian church.

R. A. BEALL, Culverton, Hancock Co., Ga., is the son of Jesse R. Beall and Mary Culpepper. The family is of English extraction and came to Virginia in the colonial period, whence many members moved to and settled in North Carolina. Mr. Beall's grandfather, Samuel Beall, came from North Carolina to Georgia and settled in Warren county, Ga., about the beginning of this century. His family consisted of three sons, Erasmus, Robert and Jesse R., and one daughter, Mary, all deceased but Jesse R., father of the gentleman above named. He was born in 1812, and married in Warren county. His children were as follows: Mary, widow of Samuel Hall; America, deceased; Jane, Mrs. William A. Sutherland, Pulaski county; Annie, Mrs. J. C. Key, Milledgeville; Viola, deceased; Samuel, Jefferson county; R. A., Columbus, deceased, killed at Sharpsburg, private in Company A, Twentieth Georgia regiment; William H., Jefferson county. The mother of these children died in 1869. Mr. Beall has since remarried and now lives in Jefferson county. R. A. Beall was born January 31, 1836. He grew to man's estate on a Warren county plantation, and at the age of twenty-two married Fitzena C. Cheely. Eight children have grown up about him: James T., Hancock county; Jesse K., merchant; J. Frank, Macon; R. C., Hancock county; Anna May, single; Lucillus, Sparta; Albert C., Hancock county, and Louise. Mr. Beall has passed his life in agricultural pursuits for the most part, and is a man of well-known probity of character and undoubted integrity. As a veteran of the late war, he delights in recalling the scenes of those sanguinary days, and grows eloquent in his defense of the lost cause. Enlisting as a private in Company B, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, in 1861, he arrived on the field just after the first battle of Manassas. In the spring of 1862 he took part in the seven days' fight around Richmond, and later was at Seven Pines, Sharpsburg, Second Manassas, Fredericksburg and Gettysburg. In this bloody fight Mr. Beall was severely wounded in the right leg during the second day. He was placed in a temporary hospital, which was afterward captured by the enemy, and he thus became a prisoner of war. As he was a commissioned officer at the time, he was carried to Johnson's Island, in which summer resort he remained till February of 1864, when he was removed to Point Lookout. After a short stay there he was transferred to the prison at Fort Delaware, from whence he was paroled late in 1864. After his exchange he again entered the army, and being given a detail to look after government stores and the wounded at Lynchburg, served at that point till the surrender. Mr. Beall is a democrat in politics and a member of the Baptist church. His sons and daughters have all grown up about him, honorable men and noble women, and he lives among them secure in their respect and love.

COL. W. L. L. BOWEN. Nestling among the pine-clad hills of the upper Ogeechee river is the quiet little village of Jewells—a busy little world in itself, with its humming cotton factory, the center of interest and the thrift of its citizens attested by many pretty homes. The large company store bears the firm name of Bowen, Jewell & Co., the subject of this sketch being the senior member. Col. Bowen is a Tennessean by birth, the son of Reece and Mary (Moody) Bowen, and was born in Granger county Oct. 22, 1838. He grew to manhood in that county, and was just completing his education in what is now known as Carson and Newman college when the war broke out. Four full years he followed the fortunes of the Confederacy, after which he went to Florida, where he engaged successfully in various business enterprises until 1881. In that year he moved to Jewells, and subsequently he bought a controlling interest in the plant of his father-in-law, D. A. Jewell, and has since devoted his energies to its operation. The company has one of the finest cotton factory plants in the state, operating some 3,800 spindles and 120 looms, together with a ginnery and grist-mill, and is doing a large and paying business. Col. Bowen was one of the very first to respond to the call to arms in the late civil war. A senior at college, within a few months of graduation, he insisted on leaving for the front. The president, finding it useless to argue further, handed him his diploma as he took the train for Charleston. Arriving at that point he joined a company of minute men, but soon went to Florida, where he entered the regular army as quartermaster. This service, however, smacked too little of war for a young man of spirit, and he therefore enlisted in the Fourth Florida, a regiment of infantry which was being organized for the army in the west, and of which he was elected major. Just previous to going to Tennessee he was elected lieutenant-colonel, and on the death of the colonel commanding in 1862, was promoted to that position. While leading his regiment at the battle of Murfreesboro, his conduct under fire was such as to call forth the warmest praise of his ranking officers, and he was promoted to brigadier-general of the Confederate army. Col. Bowen, however, has modestly refrained from prefixing that title to his name, as his commission, though issued, never reached him on account of the unsettled and chaotic condition of things near the close of the war. During the war Col. Bowen enjoyed the fullest confidence of his commanding officers, and was frequently entrusted with most important business. He was personally acquainted with a large number of the leading men, both in and out of the army, and relates many interesting occurrences. The following incident he relates illustrates Gen. Hardee's keen sense of humor. It was on the day of the noted Peachtree creek engagement during the battle of Atlanta. The battle had been raging for some time with heavy losses to each army. The brave Gen. William H. T. Walker had just fallen, and Gen. Hardee, feeling that Hood should be apprised of his death, dispatched Col. Bowen to him with the sad intelligence. "Go back," said Hood, "and tell Hardee to press up Peachtree creek. It's the grandest route of the war." On hearing these orders Hardee drily remarked, "Yes, but it's the wrong kind of a route." Col. Bowen retired with the army before Sherman, and, joining Johnston in South Carolina, was shortly after sent with important dispatches to Gen. Lee. He delivered the dispatches to that general the day before the evacuation of Richmond, and returned to Johnston's army, to be soon surrendered at Greensboro, N. C. Instead of returning to his native state Col. Bowen came south, and, on arriving at Milledgeville, was taken with a severe attack of fever. During his convalescence he one day drove over to the little town of Jewells. It was there he first met the lady who now as his wife graces his beautiful home, though at that time she was but a little girl. Locating in Florida, the visits which the colonel now and then made to his people in Tennessee were supplemented by calls at Jewells. It was thus the "old, old story" was again rehearsed, and on June 28, 1877, Miss Mary E. Jewell became Mrs. Bowen. This lady, who graduated with distinguished honors at Lucy Cobb institute in 1875, is a daughter of D. A. Jewell and Mary A. (Shea) Jewell, her father having in a great measure built the factory and founded the town which bears his name. To them have been born seven children: Marie, Lucile, deceased, Mabel, Orlando, Reece, deceased, Marian, and Robert E. Lee. Col. Bowen is the leading figure in his community. In politics he is a stanch democrat, in faith a Missionary Baptist and a deacon in the church to which he belongs, and is also a royal arch Mason.

JOSIAH CARR, planter, Culverton, Hancock Co., Ga., is a North Carolinian, where he was born in Franklin county, May 9, 1828. Bereft of his parents at a tender age, Col. Carr came to Hancock county, Ga., where he found a protector in the person of an elder brother, James Carr. He was one of a family of seven children: James; Willis; John and Robert E., deceased; Green B., planter, Hancock county; Samuel, lives in Hopkins county, Tex., and Josiah. When Col. Carr came to manhood he found a wife in Miss Susan B. Barksdale, who lived but a year, dying without issue. In 1868 he again married, Sarah E. Collins becoming his wife. This lady died Aug. 26, 1880, the mother of two sons: Robert Lee, who grew to manhood, a bright, promising youth, but was stricken with typhoid fever, and died Oct. 26, 1892, and John Henry, a manly youth, now living with his father. Col. Carr served his state to the best of his ability during the civil war, but was too feeble in health to stand service in the field. His plantation consists of 3,000 acres of choice land, lying eight miles northeast of Sparta. He still holds to democracy, and is a member of the Baptist church.

W. N. COLEMAN, planter, merchant, stockman and fruit grower, Northen, Hancock Co., Ga., is a type of the vigorous and successful young man of the day. Mr. Coleman is the son of Richard and Rebecca (Thomas) Coleman, and was born in Nottaway county, Va., April 3, 1849. His father was a prosperous planter of that county, but dying early, left Mr. Coleman at fifteen years of age to fight life's battles for himself and a younger sister. The property was left in such shape as to give him little assistance. Securing a clerkship at the country store of Col. J. W. Harper at the insignificant salary of $50 per year and board, he soon made himself a necessity by diligent and faithful service. He remained with Col. Harper three years, receiving an increase in compensation each year. In January, 1870, the lad concluded to try his fortunes in the south, and arriving at Augusta secured a position in the wholesale grocery house of Z. McCord. The following year he came to Hancock county, where he engaged with an uncle, H. W. Coleman, who was a merchant and planter on the Ogeechee river. A year was spent with him, a few months with A. S. Bass, a merchant at Devereaux, and three years with D. A. Jewell & Co., at Jewells, and then Mr. Coleman felt equipped for business of his own. In company with a brother-in-law, J. E. Medlock, and Mr. G. W. Bass, the firm of Medlock, Bass & Co. began business at Jewells, and continued successfully for some three years. Mr. Bass then sold his interest to Mr. Coleman, who, after two years' successful continuance of the business, sold to his partner, and began farming at the point where he now resides, seven miles east of Sparta. He began on a limited scale, but has each year added to his possessions, until he has a little community of his own. A comfortable and commodious dwelling stands on one side of the road, among shrubbery and flowers of every variety. On the opposite side is a large gin house, with the latest improved machinery, and a barn in which may be found thorough-bred Jersey cattle, thoroughbred horses, and a large store building, filled with a choice stock of goods, a carriage and blacksmith shop, and, best of all, a neat little school-house and church. These buildings are all comparatively new and present a fine appearance to the traveler's eye. Mr. Coleman has a fine plantation of 900 acres, and a magnificent bearing peach orchard of 10,000 trees. He is too busy to engage in politics, but is a staunch democrat. He and his family are members of the Methodist church, to which he is most liberal in donations. On Jan. 28, 1878, Mr. Coleman and Willie, daughter of James H. Middlebrooks, began their married life. They are the parents of four children: Rebecca, died in infancy; Hawley, a bright lad of eleven years; Virginia, nine, and Herbert, four. Mr. and Mrs. Coleman deserve and receive the respect of a large circle of friends, whom they delight to entertain and honor.

JOHN L. CULVER, planter, Culverton, Hancock Co., Ga., is a worthy scion of one of the oldest and most prominent families in middle Georgia. His grandfather, George Culver, together with two brothers, came to the state from the Chesapeake bay country in Maryland soon after the revolutionary war, and settled in Hancock county. Here he married Elizabeth Ellis, who bore him a large family of sons and daughters. Hardy C., one of these sons, the father of John L., was born in 1800, and about 1824 married Ann L. Latimer, to whom were born eleven children, as follows: William H., merchant, Culverton; Henry H., deceased; John L., Ann Elizabeth, deceased wife of Daniel Connell, Culverton; Mary J., wife of Capt. J. W. Moore, Culverton; Thomas H., a lieutenant of Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, killed at the battle of the Wilderness; German P. and Benjamin C., planters, Culverton; Robert M., deceased in childhood; Everard H., private in Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, killed at Gettysburg, and Amazon B., who died in girlhood. Both parents of this family died in 1865. Hardy C. Culver was a man of wonderful energy, fine business judgment, and was held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens. He founded the town of Culverton, and was always foremost in every work that promised well for the public good. He gave liberally to all educational enterprises, and as a Methodist was untiring in his efforts for the advancement of that denomination, being an intimate friend of and co-worker with the late Bishop George F. Pierce. In politics he was a whig, and, though not at all fond of political life, he, by reason of his peculiar fitness, was forced to yield to the solicitations of friends, and represented his county in the legislature a number of terms, frequently drawing the support of democrats because of his just and conservative views. John L. Culver was born Dec. 26, 1829. He was raised on a plantation and given a good common school education. In July, 1861, he entered the Confederate service as captain of Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and saw service in Virginia until 1863. On the advice of his physician he resigned his commission and returned home to recuperate his failing health. When Sherman invaded Georgia he again became a soldier, this time as special escort to Gen. Gustavus Smith of the state troops, in whose service he remained to the end of the war. Mr. Culver's life has been devoted to agricultural pursuits. As a planter he has no superior in the county, and combines with a scientific knowledge of that honorable pursuit, an aptitude for business and public life which has won for him a state-wide reputation. In politics he is a stanch democrat and did fine service just after the war in wresting his county from the rule of incompetent negroes and rascally carpet-baggers. He represented his party in the lower house in the sessions of 1872-73-74 and 1875, and in 1890 was elected to represent the Twentieth senatorial district in the general assembly. He is at present chairman of the democratic executive committee, and president of the democratic party organization of Hancock county. The village of Culverton was incorporated in 1890, and he has since served as mayor. As a steward in the Methodist church and a member of the masonic fraternity Mr. Culver is a useful and popular adjunct of the community in which he resides. His marriage occurred in Glascock county, Ga., Nov. 12, 1850, his wife having been Miss Mary L., daughter of Louis Cheely. Four children were raised to maturity: Mary M., deceased wife of R. H. Moore, Culverton; Anna M., at home; Louis E., wholesale hardware merchant, Macon, Ga., and B. Louvill, wife of J. E. Kidd, Milledgeville, Ga.

WILLIAM S. DICKSON, planter, Sparta, Hancock county, Ga., is a prosperous planter living five miles southeast of Sparta. He was born in the county Sept. 25, 1839, and is the son of James M. and Margaret A. (Crawford) Dickson. The Dickson family history available at this time dates back to William's grandfather, Curry Dickson, who grew to manhood and passed his life in Hancock county. No data as to his birth and antecedents could be obtained. He married Elizabeth Shy, a name familiar to all Georgians as of the highest respectability, and from their union sprang three boys and one girl: James M., W. S., D. W. and Emily Francis, now Mrs. Thomas Jordan, Craig county, Tex. James M. is the father of William S., and is still living near him at the advanced age of eighty years. He is exceedingly well-preserved and still looks after his little farm as in his younger days. He married in 1838, and has seen eight children grow to maturity, as follows: William S., the subject of this sketch; James C., David W. and Green L., successful planters of the county; Eliza J., single; Sarah, wife of B. J. Clark; Georgia B., single; Emily F., wife of James M. Dickson, also planters of Hancock county. William S. has always resided in the county of his nativity. When the war broke out he enlisted early as a private in Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and did his duty manfully till the surrender. The regiment arrived too late to be of service in 1861, but from the opening of the campaign in 1862 to the surrender, saw plenty of hard fighting. While Mr. Dickson was in the ranks he participated in the seven days' battle around Richmond, Fairfax court house, Second Manassas and at Gettysburg. In the latter battle he was severely wounded in the left shoulder, disabling him to such an extent as to preclude his carrying a musket in the ranks, and on his return to the army he was therefore detailed for service on the wagon train. He was married in Hancock county, Dec. 24, 1865, to Rebecca, daughter of John A. Kelly. Mr. Dickson is a deacon in the Baptist church, and a most uncompromising democrat in politics. His democracy is of that type that finds no sacrifice too great for the advancement of the interests of the party, and much credit is due him for the solid front which it has been enabled to present in the county to the advancing hosts of populists.

DAVID DICKSON, deceased. Nothing so touches the heart of the true Georgian with sadness as does the contemplation of the rapidly decaying old plantation house of ante-bellum days, and its hoary-headed and tottering inmate, both soon to be numbered among "the things that were, and are not." They speak of proud days, days when the "planting element" dominated in the realms of politics and society, and read the law to all other occupations. This element was especially strong in Hancock county, where just before the war were some of the largest and finest plantations in the state. Possibly the largest and finest of these was that of the gentleman above named, he at one time having cultivated a body of some 30,000 acres. A drive of twelve miles southeast of Sparta will bring the traveler to the old Dickson plantation, where he will find the spacious house and outbuildings still standing though the "hand which held the plow" lies nerveless and still, under the sod it once cultivated. David Dickson was born in Hancock county, Ga., July 4, 1809, the son of Thomas and Elizabeth Dickson, an humble but honest parentage. Like most of the early settlers, they were dependent on the efforts of their own hands for their daily bread, and thus brought their children up in the best agricultural training school ever yet discovered. As David approached manhood, the period in which slave labor was most profitable dawned upon the south, and for the next two decades held sway. Beginning with moderate means he amassed property rapidly, and during the entire latter half of his life was probably the wealthiest man in his county. Some of his methods were peculiarly his own. It is said that he was phenomenally kind in the treatment of his slaves, and such was his influence over them that he had no use for an overseer. He was not an educated man so far as book knowledge is concerned, but was endowed with more than ordinary gifts of mind in the sphere in which he labored. He knew the productive qualities of every foot of his land, and could tell to a bushel or a bale just what each plat ought to yield. Thus, when free labor took the place of slave, he allotted each his portion in the spring-time, and told him just how much it would yield if properly cultivated. His rents were collected on those figures, of course allowing for the season, and it is said he had very few failures as a consequence. Mr. Dickson was liberal with his means toward all worthy public enterprises and in matters pertaining to education and religion; and though he favored no particular denomination, his moral character was such as to command the respect of his associates. He never used tobacco or liquor in any form, and was very chaste and careful in his language. He retained his powers, both physical and mental, to the last, dying suddenly within an hour, on Feb. 13, 1885, leaving his entire property to a former favorite female slave, who at her death, willed the same to her two sons, Julian H. and Charles G., the present owners of the large property.

CHARLES WILDS DU BOSE (deceased), lawyer and jurist, was born in Darlington district, S. C., on Sept. 24, 1825. His family were French Huguenots, their ancestors having emigrated from France to the then province of South Carolina upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes in the seventeenth century. His grandfather, Elias Du Bose, held a commission and bore a conspicuous part in the revolutionary war. His father, John Wilds Du Bose—named in honor of his maternal uncle, Judge Samuel Wilds, a highly-distinguished jurist of South Carolina—married his cousin, Elizabeth Roberts, the daughter of Dr. John Roberts, a Baptist clergyman living in Cherac's district; and Charles was their only surviving son. While still in infancy his mother died, and with the boy Mr. Du Bose left the state of his nativity and sought a new home on the St. Mary's river, Florida, where he purchased a large tract of land and spent the remainder of his life as a planter. When Charles was about five years of age his father brought to his home a second wife, the daughter of a relative who lived on the "High point of the Cumberland," Miss Mary K. Miller, first cousin to his wife Elizabeth. This gentle lady proved to be a faithful stepmother to the lonely, sensitive child, whose heart was, however, bound up in the father, to whom he was passionately attached, but who died when the boy was just verging on manhood. This second marriage was blessed with sons and daughters, and among them the thoughtful, quiet lad grew up tenderly cared for by the mother, to whom to the end of her life he was a true, unselfish elder son. His education was directed by the Rev. Dr. Baird, a Presbyterian clergyman, and noted instructor of boys at the academy in "Old St. Marys;" his uncertain health, deterring his father from sending him away from home. At sixteen the studious boy grew weary of the monotony of plantation life and longed for other scenes. With high hope in his young heart he left his father's sheltering arm and went to Augusta to begin the study of law, in the office of his relative, the Hon. Andrew J. Miller. Into the family of his stepmother's brother he was admitted as a son, remaining there until he was made a member of the bar of Georgia, by special act of the legislature, at nineteen years of age. Advised by Mr. Miller, he immediately went to Sparta in Hancock county, where he went into practice with Hon. Eli H. Baxter. Upon the election of his co-partner to the judgeship of the northern circuit he formed a second connection with the Hon. Linton Stephens, which was dissolved in 1860 by the latter's appointment to a seat on the supreme bench. Between these two men, totally dissimilar in temperament, there grew a lasting and tender friendship. Perhaps, more than all else, to gratify his friends, Mr. Du Bose accepted the clerkship of the supreme court, holding that position through many difficulties until removed, under reconstruction influences, in 1868. Very early in the war he and Linton Stephens formed a company of infantry called the "Confederate Guards." Upon the promotion of Capt. Stephens to the rank of major the command devolved upon him, but his friends, particularly Hon. Alex. H. Stephens, objected so strongly to his going to the front on account of his delicate health, and the imperative need for his presence at home, that he reluctantly consented to remain behind. This was a grief to him while the war lasted, so much so that when the governor made his last call for volunteers he presented himself at once, as a private soldier in the camp at Atlanta, only to be prostrated with camp fever. Learning this the governor sent his carriage, brought him to the city, and upon his positive refusal to return home, gave him a position on his personal staff. From 1848 to 1860 he held the office of ordinary of Hancock county by continuous elections; and during the war he was twice elected to the lower branch of the general assembly, serving in all six years. It was during the latter part of his service as legislator that he succeeded in getting through the house the bill introduced by Hon. Andrew J. Miller, but which he could never get further than the senate. This was the bill called "The Woman's Bill," now a law, giving to every married woman her own property. For that service the women of Georgia have cause to be forever grateful to Col. Du Bose's energy and perseverance. He was a member of the secession convention in 1860, and in 1866 was sent as delegate to the constitutional convention at Milledgeville. In 1877 he was again elected to a similar convention which framed our present constitution. From that time he declined all offices, even modestly refusing to listen to tempting offers of judicial preferment, devoting his energies solely to his profession. At last, however, he yielded to the solicitation of friends, and consented to represent the Twentieth senatorial district. During this term occurred the famous impeachment trials of the comptroller and state treasurer, he being one of the small minority whose votes acquitted Mr. Renfro. At this term also his son, Andrew Miller Du Bose, represented his county in the lower house, his colleagues being the Hon. William J. Northen, who afterward served two terms as governor of the state. It was at the earnest solicitation of his friend, Col. Du Bose, that Mr. Northen then, for the first time, made his appearance in official life. In each of these varied public trusts Col. Du Bose proved himself able, conscientious and faithful. In 1848 he married Miss Catherine Anne, eldest daughter of Rev. Wm. Richards, a faithful and devoted clergyman of the Baptist denomination, who came with his family from England while she was very young. Her education began in the northern states, was continued under the care of the beloved Mrs. Edgerton (afterward Mrs. Orme of Milledgeville), at her famous school at Midway, Ga. This union was particularly fortunate, congeniality of tastes and perfect understanding giving to their home life an unusual degree of wedded happiness. Mrs. Du Bose early won distinction in the literary world as a writer of prose and verse. She has enduring mention in many works, referring to "Female Writers of the South." Her little book, The Pastor's Household, and many poems and periodical contributions attracted widespread attention. Her entire family seem to have been gifted with the literary faculty, notably her oldest brother, Dr. Wm. C. Richards, of Chicago, who won eminence as poet, scientist, lecturer and divine. Mr. T. Addison Richards of New York city, a distinguished landscape artist and writer, who held the responsible position of corresponding secretary of the National Academy of Design for forty years. Also her sister, Mrs. Amelia S. Williams of Tennessee, who wields a ready and facile pen in prose and verse. The children of this happily married pair have all grown to man's estate, in honor. The eldest was Charles S. Du Bose of Warrenton, Ga., whose death at the untimely age of thirty-two cut short a life of great usefulness and rare promise, and inflicted a blow to his father's heart from which he never fully recovered. This youth quickly rose to eminence at the bar, and served the state twice as legislator, and afterward in the state senate, from which his failing health compelled him to resign. Hon. Andrew Miller Du Bose, his second son, has represented his county in the lower house, and still practices law in his father's old office in Sparta, Ga. His two younger sons are Dr. Wm. Richards Du Bose, an eminent and valued surgeon in the United States navy, and Dr. George Pierce Du Bose, who holds a responsible and honorable position in the medical department at Washington, D. C. To each of these sons it was his pride and happiness to give every advantage of education, building firmly upon the solid foundation laid by their devoted mother. Their success in life amply repaid his self-sacrificing efforts. His work thus nobly done, Col. Du Bose departed this life on Oct. 22, 1890, having just completed his sixty-fifth year. He was a member of the Presbyterian church, and counted one of the most useful citizens of his county and state. His sturdy integrity and unwavering honesty, his steadfast friendship and useful devotion to his wife and children, his gentle, courteous demeanor, and the graces that ever adorned his practical Christian life secured for him the admiration, esteem, reverence and love of every one who knew him. His wife still survives him, in the beautiful home he made for her, blest by the loving care of her sons, and their accomplished wives, and enjoying the competence won for her by his professional energy and zeal.

JAMES A. HARLEY. Conspicuous among the old and reliable families of Hancock county the name of Harley stands worthy of honorable mention. Different members have won distinction in professional and literary circles, and have intermarried with other families equally as eminent, notably the Battles, of lasting prominence throughout the state. The progenitor of this branch of the family, William J. Harley, was a native of Barnwell district, S. C. He was educated at a Baptist theological seminary, graduating in 1828 in the class made famous by Drs. McIntosh, De Votie and others of scarcely less prominence in religious circles. Serving the Master in the pulpits of South Carolina until middle age, he came to Hancock county, where several years before he had met, while attending a Baptist association, Miss Mary L. Battle. They were married in 1843, and thus began a life of connubial bliss unmarred by a single unkind act or word during its continuance. They made Hancock county their place of residence during all their married life, and were the parents of a most interesting and cultured family: James A.; Ella A. (deceased), at fourteen years of age; Mamie B., and Anna S., teachers; W. I., a prominent and successful planter and stockman of Hancock county; and Reuben B. Rev. Harley continued in the Baptist ministry until 1870, the date of his death. He was a man whose labors were wonderfully blessed in building up his denomination throughout the state. Mrs. Harley was a woman of tender and loving sympathies, a most devout Christian, and instilled into the hearts of her children a lasting reverence for that noble motherhood which she so worthily typified. She died at the age of seventy-two years, in 1890. James A. Harley, the eldest son, is a member of the bar at present in Hancock county. He was born April 1, 1846, and was educated at Mercer university, where he graduated in 1868. After leaving school he taught for a year in Alabama, then entered upon the study of the law under the preceptorship of Geo. F. Pierce, now deceased. Being admitted at Sparta in 1869, he at once entered upon the duties of his profession and has built for himself a large and remunerative practice. Mr. Harley has never held public office but once, and then by appointment by Gov. McDaniel, to the solicitorship of the northern circuit in 1884, to fill an unexpired term. He acquitted himself creditably to the end of the term, and then declined being a candidate for election. Although a mere boy when the war broke out he at once enlisted in Col. R. H. Anderson's regiment of cavalry, known as the Fifth Georgia, and did gallant service in the western division of the army. Being captured by Sherman's cavalry near Atlanta he was carried to Savannah and from thence to Point Lookout, where he was held prisoner until his exchange in February of 1865. He did not again enter the army. Mr. Harley was united in wedlock March 1, 1870, to Anna F. Pierce, youngest daughter of the late Bishop George F. Pierce of the Methodist church. Mr. and Mrs. Harley have had born to them four bright children: Pauline, George F., Ella A., and James A., Jr. Mr. Harley is of course a democrat, and of the same faith as his father. He is an active worker in the church, and is superintendent of the Baptist Sunday school at Sparta.

REUBEN BATTLE HARLEY, lawyer, Sparta, Hancock county, Ga., youngest child of the above parentage, was born Nov. 2, 1859. He was educated in the excellent academy at Sparta and studied law at Mercer university. His examination occurred before Judge E. H. Pottle at Sparta in 1884, since which time he has been actively engaged in the practice, and is looked upon as a rising member of the profession. Mr. Harley has not yet married, being wedded to his work and to his books. His distinguished characteristic is his fondness for literature, in which he is quite fond of history, and in that branch of literature has delved deep and retained the results of his research. An hour's conversation with him reveals this fact most pleasantly. He takes great interest in his profession, and as a member of the Georgia Bar association has done valuable service in its deliberations. He loves politics (what man of his tastes does not?), and is proud to give his valuable aid in keeping Hancock county in the ranks of democracy. As a consistent and earnest member of the Baptist church, and a man of fine social qualities, he is much respected in the community where he has passed his life.

JAMES M. HARRIS, planter, Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga., is a representative of an old and aristocratic family, which has for long years wielded a powerful influence for good in Hancock county. Planters by occupation, and large land owners, they united with an unsurpassed technical knowledge of farming, a clever business judgment which kept them at the head of the wealthy families of the county. Few people are better or more familiarly known than "Jim" Harris. He is a son of Peterson and Rebecca (Hurt) Harris, and was born near where he now resides, Nov. 1, 1819. His parents had come some years prior to this event from Maryland and settled on Shoulder Bone creek, eight miles northwest of Sparta. Here a family of six sons were born to them. The father died at a rather early age, and the mother married and moved with all the children except James, to Alabama, where she passed the remainder of her days. After his father's death James went to reside with an uncle, Miles G. Harris, who acted as his guardian and by whom he was reared. He was happily married Feb. 4, 1845, in Hancock county, to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Edwin Wiley, another of the old families of the county. Mr. Harris has no children of his own, but adopted at an early age, Moses W., a son of his wife's brother, Samuel H. Wiley, to whom they have given all the attention which could have been bestowed on one of their own flesh and blood. Moses W. was educated at the famous Mt. Zion academy, then presided over by William J. Northen, who has since filled the gubernatorial chair with such honor; and at the university of Georgia, which institution he was compelled to leave before graduation because of the serious illness of his father. From this time he gave his entire attention to the management of the plantation, knowing that, as the only representative of the family, the task would devolve upon him each year with greater weight as his father's health continued to fail. In 1876 Moses W. Harris was joined in marriage to Miss Lizzie H., a daughter of James T. Gardiner of Augusta, and to the union there have been born the following: James M., Jr., Mattie E., Sarah W., Henry B., Carrie H., Birdie, Elizabeth B. and Mary S. As intimated before, the Harris estate is one of the largest in the county, containing 5,000 acres more or less of choice plantation lands on Shoulder Bone creek. For long years Mr. Harris has given his personal attention to the cultivation of these lands, and is only yielding to the force of circumstances in relinquishing the work to his son as age creeps upon him. The tastes of the family never ran in the line of politics or public life in any form, and, though Mr. Harris has frequently been importuned to accept honored positions in county and state, he has always refused. He has simply done his duty as a private in the ranks of democracy. The Harris family have always been of the Presbyterian faith, and James M. follows in the same pathway.

THOMAS J. JONES, M. D., a physician with a large and remunerative practice in the western part of Hancock county, postoffice Devereaux, is a man who, morally, religiously and socially commands the highest respect of a numerous clientage of friends. He comes of old Virginia stock, his father, Henry Jones, having come to Warren county, Ga., from that state early in the present century. He had married in Virginia Miss Mary Baker, who bore him fourteen children, all of whom are now deceased but the doctor. Three of them were physicians, one a school teacher, and the rest farmers. Dr. Jones was born June 3, 1829. He received an ordinary academic education and began the study of his profession under the preceptorship of Dr. B. H. Jones of Sparta. He subsequently went to Macon, where he continued his studies with Dr. W. S. Lightfoot. He then went to Augusta, where he attended a course of lectures at the medical college. The following year he spent at Nashville Medical college, where he was graduated in the spring of 1852. He first located in the neighborhood where he now resides, but two years later removed to southwest Georgia, where he continued the practice till the war, in Weston, Webster Co. From this point he entered the service, but the rigors of an army life proved too great a strain upon him, and after a few months he was discharged. Returning to Hancock county he has since devoted himself assiduously to the amelioration of the ills of mankind; and with such a measure of success as has brought him a fair recompense, and a reputation second to none in the county. Dec. 23, 1853, Dr. Jones was joined in wedlock to Miss Elizabeth A. Butts. She is a daughter of James I. Butts, deceased, and of a family which for many years has occupied an honorable position among the worthy yeomanry of the county. Four children came to bless their home; two died in infancy; Thomas C. lived to young manhood. James A., the only living child, is a planter near his parents, and a young man of fine promise. In 1894 he was the candidate of the people's party for the legislature, and received a flattering vote, though not sufficient to elect. Dr. Jones is a Mason of royal arch degree, and a member of the Baptist church.

J. T. MIDDLEBROOKS. The name here mentioned will be recognized immediately by every Georgian as belonging to a family which left its imprint on every page of the state's history, and whose numerous members have impressed their individuality upon the local community of which they were a part. This sketch will be devoted particularly to that branch of the family which settled early in Hancock county, and which has for many decades exercised a leading and elevating influence on the public and private life of the county. Micajah Middlebrooks was a member of a colony which settled in the eastern part of Hancock county about the closing years of the last century. They were familiarly known as "Chesapeakers," having come from the bay of that name in Maryland. Soon after arriving he was married to Rachel Ellis, and they became the parents of four children—a son and three daughters. The original representatives of the family were puritanic in their moral and religious life and raised their children to the strictest observance of the tenets of the Methodist faith. The son, James Hall, grew to manhood under these influences and illustrated by his exemplary life the virtue of correct home training. He was a man of limited education, but with a simple child-like faith in the God of his early teaching, which caused him to be remembered by all who knew him as a man of remarkable and deep piety. In illustrating the degree in which he carried the teachings of the Bible into his daily life the following will be of service: He was a great sportsman, and loved his dog and gun. When double-barreled shotguns first appeared he bought the first one that came in his neighborhood. A neighbor admiring it very much and offering to trade his old gun and considerable boot-money for it, Mr. Middlebrooks agreed and the trade was consummated. On trying his neighbor's gun he found it shot better than the double-barreled gun, and therefore insisted on returning the boot-money, much to the astonishment of the other party. Mr. Middlebrooks was a member and life-long worker in the Methodist church, and a man whose memory is still fragrant in the county. He passed to his reward suddenly, dropping dead one June day in 1867, being sixty-two years of age. Having been a hard worker and a man of excellent business judgment he had accumulated a large property, which he left to his widow and children. Mrs.

Middlebrooks was formerly Cassandra Howell, and was also reared in Hancock county. She died in 1885, at the age of seventy-five years, a true and devoted mother, of earnest and devoted piety. She was the mother of nine children: William, Eliza, George C. and Elizabeth and John are deceased; Henry L. is a prominent citizen near Sparta; Caroline is Mrs. Thomas Worthen, Washington county; Willie is Mrs. W. N. Coleman, Hancock county, and James T. is a prosperous planter, living nine miles east of Sparta. This last-named gentleman was born March 16, 1843. Reaching manhood just as the war was at its height he enlisted as a private in Company K, Fourteenth Georgia regiment. Going to Virginia he participated in the battles of Second Manassas and Thoroughfare Gap; for a number of months after which he was prostrated by severe spells of typhoid fever. He recovered in time to join the army in its Pennsylvania campaign, and in the disastrous battle of Gettysburg did gallant service in the famous charge on Little Round Top. The division he was with captured this point and held it till the following day, but not being properly supported were surrounded and fell into the hands of the victorious Federals. Mr. Middlebrooks was carried to prison at Ft. Delaware and subsequently to Point Lookout, and was exchanged shortly before Lee's surrender. Since the war he has been a successful planter; and as a Christian gentleman and upright citizen is highly esteemed in the community where he resides. In April, 1876, Mr. Middlebrooks and Miss Julia, daughter of John L. Birdsong, were united in wedlock. They are the parents of an interesting family of children, whom they are rearing most circumspectly. Their names are: Howell, Edwin, Mildrim, Foster, May, deceased; Ralph, Leon and Ethel.

HENRY L. MIDDLEBROOKS, planter, near Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga., is a son of Micajah and Cassandra (Howell) Middlebrooks, and was born in Hancock county. He is a man of the most exalted Christian character, and one of the most patriotic men in the country. He enlisted as a soldier in the Confederate army at the beginning of the "war between the states," and remained in the service to the end—suffering all the dangers and privations and gallantly performing all the duties incident to soldier life. Mr. Middlebrooks was happily married in 1860 to Miss Claude, daughter of Bishop George F. Pierce. Ten happy, bright children have blessed this union: George L., Claude, P., Waldron H., Pierce, Marvin, Blanche, Harry, Flournoy, Lillian, Estelle.

J. W. MOORE, a prominent and successful agriculturist of Culverton, Hancock Co., is the son of James and Sarah C. Moore, and was born in Taliaferro county, Ga., Feb. 2, 1827. His grandfather, Usury Moore, was a resident of Dinwiddie county, Va., and emigrated to Wilkes county, Ga., in the early part of the present century, where he spent the subsequent years of his life. Capt. Moore's father was born in Virginia in 1790 and was twice married. The first wife was a Miss Irwin, who bore him five children, all now deceased. The second marriage was solemnized in Jones county, from which there resulted twelve children. Those living are: W. M., Sharon; J. W., the subject of this sketch; T. R., Sparta; O. D., Raytown; S. A., Hillman, and R. H., Culverton. The father was a merchant and planter and accumulated quite a large property. He was a man of fine qualities, and his wife was a lady of great energy and spirit. They lived to a good age, the father dying at eighty and the mother at seventy-eight years. Four of the sons entered the army and did good service for the Confederacy, one, George W., being killed in one of the fights about Richmond. Capt. Moore was reared in Taliaferro county, and was married in 1845 to Miss Frances Chandler, who died eight months later. After four years, October, 1850, he married Miss Mary J. Culver. Nine children were born to them: W. R., deceased; Amazon E., Mrs. Robert Lewis, Sparta; Anna T., wife of H. F. Waller, Culverton; Lewis A., hardware merchant, Macon; James G. and R. W., at home; Sallie C., wife of Robert Chapman, Sparta; Mary J., wife of D. S. Brown, Macon. Mr. Moore has lived in Culverton since 1850. The neighborhood is one of the finest in the county, having been the home for decades of some of the best families in the state. Early in life Capt. Moore was engaged in staging, operating several important lines. He was tax collector of the county ten years prior to the war. During the war he was commissary of the Forty-ninth Georgia regiment, and later was made brigade commissary, with the rank of captain. Since the war his occupation has been that of a planter, and at different times he has taken an active part in politics. He was elected sheriff of the county and served with credit six years; he served three terms in succession in the general assembly, a fact showing his prominence as a citizen and his popularity in political circles. The Moore plantation, part of which lies within the corporate limits of Culverton, comprises 1,500 acres of fine lands, which the captain, by his energetic and intelligent system of planting, makes yield abundant crops. Capt. Moore is a democrat, always ready to put on the harness for his party, and the Methodist church embodies his religious creed. Locally he and his family are highly esteemed in the community where they have resided so long.

PLEASANT W. RACHEL, planter, Culverton, Hancock Co., Ga. Uncle "Ples"

Rachel is a familiar figure in Hancock county, where he has for sixty-six years commanded the respect and esteem of his friends and neighbors. He was born in the county Aug. 11, 1829. His great-grandfather, Miles Rachel, moved to Georgia from North Carolina in the closing years of the last century, and settled in Hancock county, where his grandfather, Burrell Rachel, and his father, William Rachel, in turn, came on and off the scene of action. The early Rachels were planters by occupation, democrats in politics, and Methodists and Baptists in religious belief. William Rachel married Betsy Ann Wilson in 1823. But two children are living, Pleasant W., and an older brother, Milton H., La Grange, Ga. Those deceased were Frances, Susan W., J. L. and Ann. Of the father it can be said that he was a leading citizen of the county, upright and honorable in his dealings, and a man who made and kept considerable property in his lifetime. He served the state forty years as justice of the peace, and was regarded by all as a most just and honorable officer. Pleasant W. Rachel has followed agriculture during his entire life. He married in the county in 1858 to his present worthy wife, Miss Martha E., daughter of James B. Gonder. This was a family now almost extinct in the county, but of very great respectability and some prominence in ante-bellum days. Five children came to cheer their home, but two of whom grew to maturity: Norwood F., now a prosperous and leading merchant in Houston, Tex., and Ida E., who married B. G. Howard, a cotton broker of the same thriving Texas city. Mr. Rachel is a democrat of the old-school variety, and serves his party faithfully as a member of the county executive committee.

J. W. TREADWELL, planter, Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga., was born in Walton county, Ga., Aug. 17, 1838, the son of Hardy and Susan (Gunter) Treadwell. He started in life as a bookkeeper, but soon drifted into railroad circles. For fourteen years he was general agent of the Georgia, Macon & Augusta railroad. In 1861, just at the beginning of the war between the states he was made a member of the major-general's staff of the eleventh division of Georgia, with the rank and commission of major. Notwithstanding he saw no active service, being engaged all the time in transporting soldiers and provisions for the army, he still holds his commission as a relic of war times. In 1868 he moved to and came into possession of the plantation where he now resides, which he has since continued to cultivate. It consists of 1,940 acres, five miles due west from Sparta, and it is due Mr. Treadwell to say that it is one of the model plantations of the country. The large mansion of three stories stands surrounded by twenty-three other buildings, all used for plantation purposes; only two of the twenty-three are negro houses. In the house lot adjoining the yard are ten other buildings, making thirty-three in all near the dwelling. The negro houses are scattered over the plantation for two miles or more and the total number of buildings on the place is sixty-eight. These give ample storage room for big crops and protection for man and beast. With all things considered it is said to be the most desirable place in middle Georgia. Mr. Treadwell has made cotton raising a specialty for twenty-five years, raising from 100 to over 200 bales annually, with ample provision crops. At the same time he has raised stock and operated the dairy business. Having fine pasture lands, he drifted into the breeding of Jersey cattle, ahead of all others in his county. With his extensive stock it was necessary to raise food for the same, and twenty years ago he began raising turnips, making the crop a specialty, and he has gathered from 400 to 1,000 bushels per acre, having ample to feed stock and many thousands for market. In 1880, on account of failing health, Mr. Treadwell went to Florida, and while there filled the position of general freight and passenger agent of the St. John's & Lake Eustis railroad. The climate having had the desired effect, he returned home after two years, declining the proffered superintendency of the same road. The Treadwells came from Virginia to Georgia. Mr. Treadwell's grandfather, Isaac Treadwell, settled in Clarke county in 1780. He there reared a family of nine sons, whose descendants are scattered throughout Georgia and in the western states. Hardy Treadwell was the third son. He married and lived until 1857 in Monroe, Ga., where he conducted a large carriage manufactory. He removed in that year to Atlanta, continuing the business till 1865, the date of his death. His children were as follows: James M., deceased; Eliza, resides with J. W.; Fannie and Susie, deceased; J. W., the subject of this sketch; W. H., cashier First National bank, Jacksonville, Fla., and Jennie, wife of George S. Vardeman, Sparta. The marriage of Mr. Treadwell occurred at Sparta, Ga., March 25, 1868, to Elizabeth A., only daughter of J. P. Sykes, who for long years was a leading planter of Hancock county. Two daughters were born to them: Susie T., who married Osmar D. Griffies, but was early widowed and now lives with her father, and Mary L., an accomplished young lady in her teens. Mrs. Elizabeth A. Treadwell died Dec. 12, 1893, and Mr. Treadwell was married Nov. 28, 1894, to Sarah H., the eldest daughter of Judge W. B. Hunt, who was also a noted planter of Hancock county for many years. He is a democrat in politics and he and his family are members of the Methodist church.

JAMES T. WHALEY, planter, Mayfield, Hancock Co., Ga. This gentleman is an intelligent and progressive planter of the county, living ten miles east of Sparta. His ancestry were of English descent, his paternal great-grandfather removing to Maryland about the time of the revolutionary war. His grandfather, Eli Whaley, was reared there, and when a mere boy came to Walton county, Ga. There he married and passed his days and reared a family of eight boys and three girls, who, growing to maturity, have scattered over the southern states. Thomas, the father of the gentleman whose name heads this sketch, grew to manhood in Walton county. He came to Hancock county in 1818, where he began life as an overseer. His thrift and strict attention to business soon put him in possession of land of his own, which he cultivated with great success. He accumulated property rapidly, and, though badly crippled by the results of the war, died in 1872, one of the wealthiest men in the county. During his lifetime he was influential, of great force of character, and keen business foresight. Whatever he touched seemed to spring into animated and productive life. He was a deacon in the Baptist church, and gave liberally to every worthy cause. He married four times and was the father of twelve children. He first married a Miss Vezie, who bore him two children, one now living, Sanders Whaley, of Jones county, Tex. The second wife was a Miss Smith; two of her sons are now living—Frank, at Longino, Tex., and Thomas, at Marshall, Tex. The third wife was Mary Morris—James T.'s mother. His only sister, Cora, is Mrs. J. W. Conyers, Bartow county, Ga. The fourth marriage was to a Miss Ivy, who has one child living, Ella, the wife of Henry Y. McCord, Conyers, Ga. James T. Whaley was born May 3, 1849. He is gifted in a large degree with the substantial qualities most marked in his father's character, and is regarded as a citizen of more than ordinary merit by friends and neighbors. He married in Hancock county, Dec. 18, 1870, Mary, daughter of William M. Allen, and to the marriage have been born twelve children, eight of whom are living: William T., agent for the Central railroad at Mayfield; Lillian, wife of Alonzo W. Allen, Warren county, Ga.; Walter, Ina, Homer, Guy, Emory and Pauline, children at home. Mr. Whaley has a fine plantation of 800 acres ten and one-half miles east of Sparta and has surrounded himself with the comforts of a well-improved and substantial home. He is much interested in education, being at present a member of the board of education of his county. He is a member of the Baptist church, in which he is both deacon and clerk. In politics he is a democrat.

HARALSON COUNTY.

AUSTIN AYRES, farmer, Felton, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Martin and Sarah Ayres, was born in Greenville, S. C., May 18, 1822. His father was a farmer, and came by wagon from South Carolina to Georgia, and settled in Gwinnett county in 1825. In 1836 he moved from Gwinnett to Paulding county, Ga., and settled on a lot of land he drew from the government, and on which the subject of this sketch now lives. At that time the country was filled with Indians and wild game, and for many months his father's family lived in a log cabin with a dirt floor. Mr. Ayres' advantages for schooling were exceedingly meager. In 1838 he was a member of the military force which removed the Indians from Georgia. He began farm life for himself in 1846, by clearing land; then he made his purchase—a forty-acre tract. To this he has added till he now owns 1,437 acres of land. For twenty-five years he has been a justice of the peace, and is still holding the office. He has been extremely successful, and being one of the wealthiest, as well as one of the oldest citizens of the county, is highly esteemed, and commands the utmost respect of everybody. To have held the office of justice of the peace so long, common sense and a sense of justice must be paramount characteristics. Mr. Ayres was married Sept. 28, 1843, to Miss Susan, daughter of Nathan and Priscilla Gaun, who came from Tennessee to Georgia in 1830. To them eleven children have been born: Harriet, Mary Adaline, Jane, Nancy Letitia, Lou Genia, Alfred, Berry Reuben, Hiram, Sarah Frances, and William Solomon and Isaac, deceased. Mr. Ayres is a member of the Missionary Baptist church, having been baptized July 27, 1843.

WILLIAM J. BROWN, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of William J. and Susan Brown, was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1852. His paternal grandfather, Roland Brown, was a farmer, a poor man, and came from South Carolina to Georgia early in the present century. His wife was a Miss Dicy Waldrop, also a native of South Carolina. The parents of our subject were born in Georgia, and the father was reared on a farm, but he started in life for himself as a brakeman on the Georgia railway. He was promoted to a conductorship on a freight train, and, saving some money, came to and settled on a farm in Haralson county in 1860. During the war he served as captain in the army until the surrender. He also was elected and served as a justice of the inferior court, and died in 1886. Mr. Brown received a very limited education, and has followed farming exclusively. He was married Dec. 23, 1873, to Miss Nancy Carolina, daughter of Seaborn and Melinda Caroline McGarity, of Paulding county, Ga. To them nine children have been born: Carrie Leota, Willie S., Eva May, Cora Ella, Robert Joseph, Sarah Udara, Bertie, Agnes Pearl, James Benjamin. Mrs. Brown is an exemplary member of the Methodist church. Mr. Brown is a master Mason, one of the most prosperous farmers in the county, and as a citizen commands the respect and esteem of all who know him.

C. C. EAVES, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of L. B. and Lavinia (Camp) Eaves, was born in Paulding county, Ga., in 1834. His father came from Rutherford county, N. C., where he married his wife, a daughter of Cleburne Camp, who came to Georgia in 1832. When his parents settled in Haralson county they were in moderately good circumstances. His father died at the age of sixty-five, and the mother at the age of seventy-two years. Mr. Eaves was reared on the farm, but like thousands of others, children of frontiersmen and pioneers, received very meager schooling, owing to inconveniences and disadvantages, both of accommodations and teachers. He, however, by studying at home at night by fire-light, improved himself very much in that respect. In 1862 he enlisted in Montgomery's artillery, with which he remained about six months, when, being taken sick, he returned home and sent a substitute to the army. His attention has been given principally to his farm, although at one time he engaged in merchandising, and now, in addition to his farm, runs a grist mill. A plain, common-sense, unostentatious farmer, he is entirely content with his vocation, with its sufficient income, and with being regarded by his neighbors as an honorable man and good citizen. Mr. Eaves married in 1865, for his first wife, Miss Amanda, daughter of John and Betsy Kuhrt, of Pike county, Ga., by whom he had nine children: Johnnie Cleburne, William Taylor, Benjamin Franklin, Davy Alonzo, Davis, Lovie, Bailey, Sedford and Jackson. He married for his second wife Miss Jennie, daughter of Absolom Wilson. Himself and wife are consistent and zealous members of the Primitive Baptist church. About the close of the war he was elected a justice of the peace.

JAMES F. GARNER, contractor, Draketown, Haralson Co., Ga., son of William and Betsy Garner, was born in Paulding county, Aug. 30, 1845. His parents came in an ox-cart from South Carolina to Georgia, and settled in Gwinnett county. In 1843 his parents moved to Paulding county, where they lived until they died. Mr. Garner was reared mainly in Paulding county, and received no education but what could be obtained at the common country schools, and started in life very poor. His service during the war was confined to making fusion caps at Atlanta for the Confederate government. While farming has been his principal pursuit—his life reliance—he has been engaged in contracting, and is now the leading and most extensive contractor in that part of the state. He has made money and is now financially strong. Faithful work, honest compliance with the terms of his contracts, and uprightness of character have had their reward. Mr. Garner was married July 13, 1865, to Miss Caroline Waldrop, born in November, 1845, daughter of T. G. and Sallie Waldrop, of Haralson county. To them have been born ten children: William Joseph, James Mansel, Sarah Elizabeth, George Washington, John Franklin, Mollie, deceased, Amanda, Adelia Mary, Alice, and Azilphia Caroline.

WILLIAM GAULDING, physician, Waco, Haralson Co., Ga., son of John and Jane Gaulding, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., April 15, 1833. His parents subsequently removed to Troup county, where he was reared and received the very indifferent education he started in life with. Having more fully educated himself and studied medicine, he attended Georgia Medical college, Augusta, from which he graduated in 1856, and immediately afterward located at Haralsonville, Troup county. After remaining there twenty years, and establishing a very large and remunerative practice, he removed, in 1876, to Carroll county, where he remained until December, 1893, adding to his reputation as one of the most skillful and successful physicians in that part of the state. At the last-named date he moved to Waco, where he is still actively practicing his profession, enjoying the unreserved confidence of a large and still increasing constituency. He was postmaster a number of years at Haralsonville, conducted a drug store at Carrollton and Waco, and engaged extensively in farming during his professional life, and has accumulated a quite large estate. Dr. Gaulding was married May 6, 1856, to Miss Amanda R., daughter of R. W. and Elizabeth Brown, a union which has been blessed with eleven children: Aldora, Lizzie Love, Henry Valentine, Benjamin Holmes, deceased, Lizzie Thomas, J. W., Odessa, Seaborn May, Exar, deceased, Clyde Speer, and Luella, deceased. Dr. Gaulding was originally an "old-line" whig, and voted against secession, but is now affiliated with the populists. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent and influential members of the Methodist church.

W. F. GOLDIN, physician and surgeon, Draketown, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Seaborn and Sarah Goldin, was born in what is now Haralson county, near where he now lives, Feb. 6, 1851. His father was born in what is now Walton county, Ga., in 1817, and his mother was born in the same locality. His parents moved from Walton to Paulding county in 1844, and settled on a tract of land, which he subsequently converted into a fruit and nursery farm. Dr. Goldin's educational advantages during his boyhood and youth were of the most limited and indifferent sort; but after he attained manhood he attended the Tallapoosa, Ga., high school, where he acquired a very good education. He then read medicine, and under a temporary license practiced awhile. In 1875 he entered Atlanta Medical college, from which he was graduated in 1877, and located in Draketown. In 1888 Dr. Goldin went to London, England, and took a special course in surgery in the London medical colleges, and has since built up a large and very remunerative practice. He stands at the head of his profession in that part of the state, is very popular, and is steadily growing in reputation. In addition to his practice Dr. Goldin conducts a general merchandise store and is engaged in saw-milling. He not only excels in his profession, but is regarded as possessing superior business and financiering ability. In 1890 he was elected to represent the Thirty-eighth senatorial district in the general assembly, and established a reputation as a wise and able legislator. Dr. Goldin was married in 1878 to Miss Sarah Louisiana, daughter of Dr. R. B. and Sarah Hutcheson, and to them six children have been born: Grover Cleveland, Sarah Effie, Robert Battey, John Maddox and Arlina and Cora Glenn, the two last deceased. Dr. Goldin is a master Mason, and himself and family are very prominent members of the Missionary Baptist church.

GEORGE R. HAMILTON, merchant-farmer, Breman, Haralson Co., Ga., son of John L. and Marguerite (Reid) Hamilton, was born in Carroll county, Ga., Sept. 6, 1830. His father was a son of Archibald Hamilton, and was born in Abbeville district, S. C., March 10, 1800, was a poor man, and came to Georgia on a wagon in 1812, and settled in what is now Gwinnett county, and in 1829 moved to Carroll county. He was a volunteer in the company of Capt. Waguons, which accompanied the Indians as a guard on their removal from Georgia. Mr. Hamilton's maternal grandfather was George Reid. Mr. Hamilton received only the very limited and indifferent education obtainable at that time and locality, and began life for himself as a farmer on rented land. In 1856 he was elected ordinary of the county, serving efficiently and acceptably, and just before the war was appointed postmaster at Buchanan. His only experience during the war was in capturing deserters near Bowdon in Carroll county. He is still conducting his farm, and in addition is keeping a general merchandise store at Breman. He is one of the oldest settlers in Haralson county, popular, and has been very successful. He has never married.

ROBERT B. HITCHCOCK, farmer and saw-mill man, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of J. C. and Martha (Jenkins) Hitchcock, was born in Polk county, Ga., in 1862. His father was the son of J. C. Hitchcock, a farmer, and was born near Rockmart, Polk Co., Ga., and raised and educated there. He enlisted as a soldier in the late "unpleasantness," but as he belonged to the home guards, was in no battle. His mother was also born in Polk county. Mr. Hitchcock's boyhood was passed during the most trying period of our history, and he was deprived almost entirely of educational advantages—teachers scarce and not the best, and school houses inconvenient and uncomfortable. He came to Haralson county when seventeen years old, in 1879, and began the battle of life moneyless, among strangers. He farmed successfully for some years, saved money, and then engaged in saw-milling with the best of success. He is prosperous and has become financially strong; and is justly regarded as one of the rising young men of the county. Mr. Hitchcock was married July 6, 1888, to Miss Mellie, daughter of William and Mary Summerville, Polk county, to whom three children have been born: Israel Columbia, Robert Simpson and Selina Christine. Mr. Hitchcock is a master Mason.

JAMES R. HEAD, farmer, Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., son of D. B. and Harriet Head, was born in Baldwin county, Ga., Sept. 12, 1823. His grandfather and grandmother on his father's side were born in Virginia, his grandfather, James Head, coming to Georgia just before the revolutionary war. Mr. Head's father was reared a farmer, but in 1837 he engaged in merchandising, which he continued until 1842, when he returned to the farm. In the meantime he studied medicine and in 1845 entered upon the practice, which he successfully followed until his death, which occurred in 1887, and was occasioned by a fall from a wagon near Gadsden, Ala. Mr. Head was reared in Fayette county, Ga., until he was thirteen years of age (1836), when his parents moved to Carroll county. His education was limited to what was obtainable at the common country schools within the brief time then allowed farmers' boys. Mr. Head enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. William Potts of Newnan, Ga., which became a part of the Second regiment, Georgia state troops. With his command he participated in the battle at New Hope church, went thence to Marietta, then to Atlanta and Jonesboro. From there the command went with Gen. Hood when he made his flank movement to Nashville, Tenn. Beginning life with nothing, he has by industry, upright dealing and good management, acquired a quite large property and is accounted one of the most substantial and responsible citizens of the county. Farming has been his life-pursuit; but he was a justice of the peace five years, and is now a member of the board of education. Mr. Head was married Feb. 24, 1842, to Miss Amanda A., daughter of Solomon and Mary Stisher of Carroll county, who has borne him three children: Mary Ann Harriet, Marguerite Roberts and Elizabeth Missouri. Mr. Head is a master Mason and an exemplary member of the Missionary Baptist church.

JOHN K. HOLCOMBE, JR., farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of John K. and Rachel Holcombe, was born in Carroll county, Ga., July 4, 1848. His father was born in Laurens district, S. C., in 1810, and came to Georgia with the family in a one-horse wagon, and settled in what is now De Kalb county, in 1820. His education was very limited, and he followed farming all his life. Mr. Holcombe's mother was born in what is now De Kalb county in 1815, and was married to her husband in 1830. Mr. Holcombe received a very limited education, as he was merely a boy and lad while the war was being waged, and the schools suspended; but being ambitious he studied at home and acquired a fairly good education. He was reared a farmer, but ran machinery at one period of his life, and has also done a general merchandise business. The estimation in which he is held by the people of Haralson county is evidenced by the fact that for ten years he held the office of sheriff. He has been successful in all his undertakings, has accumulated a competency, and while one of the most popular, he is accounted one of the solidest men in the county. Mr. Holcombe married Miss Mary, daughter of Levi and Lucretia (Reeves) Stidman of Bartow county. Her grandfather, Martin Stidman, was one of the first settlers of Bartow (then Cass) county. Six children have blessed this union: William F., Reuben Cornelius, Estelle, Sarah Elizabeth, Emma and John Kellette. As Mr. Holcombe is yet young, so popular and so well capacitated for public position, it is quite certain he will again be called into the public service.

A. J. HUNT, ex-postmaster, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of S. M. and Luvina (Wilson) Hunt, was born in Cherokee county, Ga., Feb. 24, 1843. His father was born in Pickens district, S. C., in 1812, and his mother was born in Virginia in 1815. Mr. Hunt was raised on the farm, and had but a few months' education, and that under indifferent teachers and under uncomfortable conditions. But when he grew up, and during his leisure time, and the friendly aid of a pine-knot light, he added largely to his stock of knowledge, and has now a pretty good education. He enlisted Feb. 26, 1861, in Company E, First Georgia regiment, under Capt. J. D. Walker of Augusta, and was chosen sergeant. The company was assigned to "Tige" Anderson's brigade and among other important battles in which his command participated were Yorktown, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg and Centerville, Va. He remained in the service until the surrender. At the close of the war his only capital was two suits of clothes; but he went to farming, and has been successful in that and other undertakings beyond his most sanguine expectations, and honored with office by his appreciative fellow-citizens. In 1875 he was elected a justice of the peace and in 1888 elected sheriff of the county; in each case doing faithful and efficient service. All that he has, he has made himself, and under great disadvantages; but his success illustrates what industry and persistent effort can accomplish. Mr. Hunt was married, February, 1865, to Miss Laura, daughter of Champion and Elvira (Stewart) Westbrook of Lumpkin county, Ga. Her father was a native of Tennessee, and her mother of North Carolina. The following children have been born to them: Eva Lee, Emma Loretta, Cora Analey, Robert Champion, Joseph Blanse, Samuel Mason, Vila Gertrude. Mr. Hunt is a master Mason, and his family are consistent members of the Baptist church.

R. B. HUTCHESON, physician, Draketown, Haralson Co., Ga., son of John and Susannah Hutcheson, was born in McDonough, Henry Co., Ga., in 1825. His parents were born and raised in South Carolina. His father was a carpenter, and the family came to Georgia in 1822. Dr. Hutcheson was reared and educated in Henry county, the education being such as could be obtained at the "old-field" schools common to the rural districts in his boyhood days. In 1852 he moved to that part of Paulding which is now included in Haralson county, and bought land and settled where he now lives. He grew up with the country, is widely and favorably known, and is one of the wealthiest citizens in the county. In 1853-54 he engaged in the manufacture of buggies at Cedartown, Ga., and in 1854 secured a license to practice medicine, and practiced many years with great success. He was and is now extensively engaged in farming. He was elected a delegate to represent the Thirty-eighth senatorial district in the constitutional convention of 1867-68 and was elected to represent Haralson county in 1873-74 in the general assembly. He was again elected in 1886 to the general assembly. The doctor is a man of strong convictions, firm in his faith and outspoken in advocacy. Dr. Hutcheson has been married twice. His first wife was Miss Mary J., daughter of John Stateham, whom he married Oct. 29, 1848, and by whom he had three children: John R., James F. and William D., deceased. His second wife was Miss Ellen, daughter of Jacob Hogue, who has borne him eight children: Frances M., Edward B., Mary S., Sallie S., Mattie E., Amanda, Robert H. and Jacob, deceased. Dr. Hutcheson is a master Mason and a member of the Missionary Baptist church.

G. R. HUTCHINS, lawyer, Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Nathan L. and Matilda Hutchins, was born in Randolph county, Ala., Jan. 22, 1867. His father was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1831. In 1850 he went to Alabama, and from there to Mississippi. Subsequently he returned to Alabama, and being there when the war began, enlisted in the Thirteenth Alabama regiment, which was assigned to A. P. Hills' corps. He remained in the service until the surrender, receiving two wounds (one in the hip and one in the hand), from which he is disabled. After the war he married and returned to Troup county, Ga., and became a contractor. Not long afterward he removed to Heard county, Ga., where he remained until 1893, when he came to Haralson county. While in the army he was the first soldier in his company who was given a furlough on account of good service. Mr. Hutchins' mother was a daughter of James B. Greer, and was born in 1834. Mr. Hutchins received but little schooling during his boyhood, only ten days after he was thirteen years of age. Later, however, he acquired a very excellent education, and for several years was engaged in farming and saw-milling. In 1885 he taught school in Haralson county, and read law, and Jan. 22, 1886, was admitted to the bar and located in Tallapoosa, where he still lives. In 1888 he was elected mayor of Tallapoosa, and in 1891 was a member of the city council. In 1892 he was elected mayor again to fill an unexpired term, and in 1893 was re-elected for a full term. Mr. Hutchins had nothing—not even a good education—to start life with, excepting pluck, energy, a resolute purpose, and integrity of character. Yet, at the age of nineteen he was admitted to the bar, and has bounded to the front as the most promising young lawyer in his circuit, rapidly gaining a large and influential clientage, and already, young as he is, has been called by his fellow-citizens to honorable and responsible official positions. It is safe to predict for him a professional reputation surpassed by few, and distinction in the political and other fields. Mr. Hutchins has been married twice. His first wife was Miss Maggie, daughter of Calvin and Mary Fults, of Cobb county, Ga., to whom he was married in February, 1887, and who died without issue. In November, 1891, he was married to Miss Marie, daughter of W. H. and Leora Kimball, formerly of Michigan, by whom he has had two children, Harold Charles and Marie Louise. Mr. Hutchins is a prominent member of the Christian church.

WILEY JAMES, farmer, Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., son of John P. and Nancy James, was born in Henry county, Ga., Aug. 10, 1834. His father was born in Rockingham county, N. C., in 1809, and when a young man came to Georgia in a wagon and settled on a farm in Henry county. His mother was born in Washington county, Ga., in 1815. Mr. James' parents were poor, and he was raised comparatively uneducated. When only thirteen years of age his father died, leaving his widow without property and a family of children to raise and educate. But she was a woman of great strength of mind, uncommonly good judgment, and great energy of character. By her good management the little that was left was made extraordinarily productive and accumulative, so that she was enabled to give the daughters a college education. And Mr. James, after he became grown, was enabled to attend the excellent school at Worthville, in Butts county, Ga., and acquire a good education. He was married Dec. 7, 1858, to Miss Patience Foster—born March 14, 1842—daughter of Andrew J. and Edna Foster, natives of South Carolina. Seven children were the offspring of this marriage: Anna B., Nola B., Hooten A., Frankie E., Wylly C. and John A. and Mary C., deceased. Mr. James moved from Campbell county, Ga., to Haralson in 1886, and enjoys the unaffected esteem of all who know him. He is a Knight of Honor, and himself and family are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

WILLIAM JOHNSON, JR., farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of William and Polly (Ayres) Johnson, was born in Haralson county in 1853. His father was born and raised in what is now Haralson county, reached manhood poor and penniless and uneducated. He made his first money splitting rails at fifty cents per hundred, and worked at that and saved money until he had enough to buy a small tract of land on Tallapoosa river. He was a Baptist preacher and a very useful citizen. His mother was a native of North Carolina. Mr. Johnson was raised a farmer, and as there were no schools then in his neighborhood, received no education, but after he was married received instruction from his wife by a pine-knot fire light. He has always lived in Haralson county, and is so highly esteemed as to have been elected sheriff of the county in 1891. When he married he did not have a dollar, but he has worked hard and saved money, and now has a nice farm and is comfortably situated. He is rated among the best citizens of Haralson county and none command higher respect or are more highly esteemed. Mr. Johnson married Miss Mary Munroe—born in 1843—daughter of Duncan Munroe, and to them five children have been born: Oscar, Martha Jane, Willie, Mollie and Charlie. Mr. Johnson is a master Mason and himself and wife are exemplary members of the Baptist church.

JUDGE JOE W. KELLEY, residing at Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., is the son of William L. and Frances C. Kelley. He was born in Polk county, at Wilson Springs, Ga., July 16, 1856. His father was born in Tennessee, Oct. 15, 1833, and was brought to Forsyth county, Ga., in his infancy, where he was reared until he was eighteen years old, and then moved to Polk county, Ga. His grandfather, William Kelley, was a native of South Carolina, but migrated to Forsyth county, Ga., where he lived several years. While on his way to the west he died in Tennessee. The progenitor of the American branch of this family was William Kelley, born in Ireland. The grandmother of Judge Kelley was a Miss Millie Heath, of Scotch descent, and his mother was Frances C., daughter of Joseph H. Hobbs and Peggie (Summerlin) Hobbs. She was born April 3, 1830, in Cherokee (now Haralson) county, Ga., and was of Scotch-Irish ancestry. Judge Kelley's father was a gallant soldier of the Ninth Georgia battalion of artillery and was in the battles of the western army to the burning of Atlanta. After the war he returned to Haralson county, to his wife and children, renting land to cultivate the first year. It is worth while telling as part of the history of the times that when this soldier-father returned to his home, he and his eldest son, commonly called Buck, whose full name is Joseph William Andrew Jackson Kelley, made the crop, with only the food which the grass fields furnished, the young lad holding the horse to graze, and also taking his part at the hoe. The second year the family moved to forty-acre lot in the woods, which the thrifty mother had bought from her father during the war, and building a house and making a clearing, cultivated it for a living. Thus it appears that Judge Kelley was a worker from his youth. Sometimes he hired out as a farm hand to help his father to keep out of debt and to pay for more land which the family now owns, and he labored for his father until reaching manhood. He only had the advantage of about nine months' schooling at the common country summer schools until he was twenty-one years of age. At the age of twenty-two he began teaching school himself, which he continued for several years. In the meantime (Dec. 16, 1879) he married Miss Lydia J. Hitt, daughter of Allen R. Hitt and Elizabeth (Le Grand) Hitt. His wife's mother was a daughter of Thomas Harrison, of South Carolina, and was related to Gen. William Harrison. For the first few years Judge Kelley improved a farm and taught school from three to eight months each year. After two years in school at Buchanan he again taught school, making himself competent to discharge the duties of the position to which he was called in 1889. As a proof of esteem he was elected tax collector of Haralson county in 1889, and having given faithful services for two years, was re-elected in 1891, and on the expiration of his second term in 1893 the people of his county, who saw his worth, elected him to the highly important office of ordinary, in which position he is now serving acceptably to the people. As may be seen, Judge Kelley is popular and held in high esteem by his community. It is gratifying to know that a gentleman says of him that as ordinary of Haralson county he has done more good work than all of his predecessors for forty years. He has interested himself very greatly in the improvement of his county without material increase of its taxes. The public roads have been very much improved through his orders; the first iron bridge was built—two completed and another under construction, all spanning the Tallapoosa river, furnishing accommodation in travel to large numbers of citizens. His administration has been a great benefit to his county. Judge and Mrs. Kelley have a family of six children: Winifred C., Louella F., Howell Tilden, Flora Lee, Murdock Cleveland, Bertie Americus. Judge Kelley is a master Mason and Mrs. Kelley is a member of the Primitive Baptist church.

ELIJAH KIRK, farmer-merchant, Felton, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Jack and Elizabeth Kirk, was born in Pike county, Ga., March 16, 1857. His parents were very poor—so poor they could not spare him from the crop, so the only schooling he received was a few weeks each year after the crop was "laid by." On reaching manhood he came to Haralson county, where he worked on farms until he accumulated enough money to buy a small farm. He worked diligently and intelligently on his farm, made good crops for his force, and saved money. He managed his small annual surplus with unusual discretion, until in 1890, he found himself possessed of enough capital to embark in a general merchandise store. He has been phenomenally successful in this enterprise, and has now the largest store in Felton, and is doing a large and profitable business. In addition he owns several nice desirable farms which he rents. He is popular in the community, highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens, and considered one of the best financiers in his section. All he lacks to round off and complete his character and fill the measure of his happiness is a good wife.

N. J. LANGSTON, physician, Waco, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Reuben J. and Sarah Langston, was born in Franklin county, Ga., Dec. 10, 1848. His father was a farmer in ordinary circumstances, and both father and mother were born and lived and died in Franklin county. Dr. Langston received the benefit only of the very limited educational advantages afforded by the common country schools of the period and locality. These he supplemented by study at home, at night by pine-knot light. Aug. 27, 1862, he enlisted in Company B, Capt. J. J. Owens, Twenty-ninth Georgia regiment, and with his command participated in the following important battles: Jackson, Miss., Missionary Ridge, Chickamauga, New Hope Church, and Resaca. During his service he was wounded three times, and a ball received when one was inflicted, still remains in his hip. After the war he returned to his farm in Franklin county where he farmed until 1887, when he engaged in business as a traveling photographer, which, however, he continued but a few months, when he became a traveling passenger agent for the Richmond & Danville Railway company, a position he held until 1891. He then studied medicine, and entering the Southern Medical college, at Atlanta, graduated from it March 23, 1893. He located at once at Waco, and rapidly advanced to a front position. Dr. Langston has been twice married. His first wife, married in 1869, was Miss Mary, daughter of John and Mary Duncan, of Elbert county, by whom he had two children: William H. and Maude. His second wife, whom he married in 1891, was Miss Maggie, daughter of C. P. Vandergriff of Temple, Carroll Co., Ga. Dr. Langston has already achieved unusual success in his profession, and the promise of eminence in the future is very bright. His family are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

JAMES R. LATIMER, merchant, Waco, Haralson Co., Ga., son of R. T. and Lovy J. (Tweedell) Latimer, was born Aug. 7, 1858. His father was born in South Carolina, and when a young man came to Georgia and settled on a small farm in Cobb county. His mother was a daughter of Rev. W. S. and Betsey

Tweedell of the same county. Mr. Latimer was in his boyhood during the civil war, and received no schooling, but subsequently acquired a very good education. He worked on the farm until 1879, when, with $200 capital, he entered upon a mercantile life at Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga. After doing a successful business there until 1886, he moved to Waco, where he continued business, and enjoyed a prosperity beyond his most sanguine expectations. He is popular with the people, a steady-going business man, enjoys the confidence of the public, and is considered one of the most prosperous young business men in the county. Mr. Latimer was married in Philadelphia, Penn., Jan. 7, 1884, to Miss Emmie, daughter of Dr. Joseph R. and Hattie E. Hood. Dr. Hood went to Philadelphia in 1881 for the purpose of advertising a patent cultivator, and returned to Randolph county, Ala., in 1887. This union has been blessed with two children: Ottie Bell and Robert Earl. Mr. Latimer is a master Mason, and himself and family are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

MILES W. LINER, farmer, Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Christopher D. and Sarah Liner, was born in Carroll county, Ga., May 26, 1836. His parents went from Walton county, Ga., to Mississippi, in 1835, but returned to Georgia and settled in Carroll county early in 1836. Mr. Liner was raised in Carroll county, and was educated at the "old-field" common schools, taught in the dirt floor log cabins. He was exempt from military service during the war on account of physical disability. Mr. Liner was married Sept. 23, 1858, to Miss Marguerite E., daughter of Robert A. and Jane Katharine Read of Carroll county, by whom he has had sixteen children: George Alexander, Henry Wise, Sarah Katharine, John Franklin, Robert Christopher, Mary Elizabeth, Susan Indiana, James Quitman, Harvey Washington, Rhoda Malighty, Madison, Van Buren, Jefferson, Malachi, Emma Rosella, and Simeon Jackson (deceased). Mr. Liner is a well-to-do farmer, respected by everybody, unambitious, and content with the generous yield of his well-cultivated lands.

T. J. LOVELESS, merchant-farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Thos. and Rebecca Loveless, was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1832. His parents were born in Greenville district in South Carolina in 1800, where they were married and lived until 1830. That year they came to Georgia in a wagon, settled in the woods in Newton county, where they cleared a farm, meantime living in a dirt-floor log cabin. Here they followed farming and raised their children. Mr. Loveless was raised on the farm, and attended school at the dirt-floor log house, lighted through the spaces between the logs, with slabs for seats and writing desks, and chimney made of mud and sticks. After his graduation Mr. Loveless himself taught school in these historical structures, and afterward farmed. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, Capt. W. Bass, Fourth Georgia regiment, and after serving six months went into the regular army, Company C, Capt. John A. Grice, Fifty-sixth Georgia regiment, Col. E. P. Watkins. With his command he was in very active service, and participated in many important battles: Baker's Creek, where he was slightly wounded; siege of Vicksburg, where he was captured; Mission Ridge, and from there with Gens. Johnston and Hood in front of Gen. Sherman; shared in the defense of Atlanta, and was in the battle of Jonesboro. He was first lieutenant of his company, and as the captain was nearly always absent he was in command. He remained in the service until the surrender, and after that resumed the cultivation of his farm, which he did with success until 1882, when he opened a general merchandise store in Buchanan, and is profitably conducting both. He is now the leading merchant of Buchanan, and, in connection with his store, is keeping a hotel. He has been very successful as a farmer, merchant, and hotelkeeper, has made money, and is a much-liked and highly esteemed citizen. Mr. Loveless was married in 1857 to Miss Louisa J., daughter of Thomas and Letitia (Lindley) Camp, who were native South Carolinians, but who, early in life came to Georgia, where they raised their family. One child only, Robert E., has blessed this union. Mr. Loveless is a master Mason, and himself and wife are exemplary members of the Baptist church.

F. M. LYLE, saw and grist-mill man, Draketown, Haralson Co., Ga., son of J. H. and Mary Ann Lyle, was born in Polk county, Ga., May 4, 1855. His father was born in Campbell county, Ga., and went from there to Polk county when he was thirteen years old. Mr. Lyle's parents, when he was six months old, moved from Polk to Paulding county, in which he was raised and educated—the education being rudimental and the school taught in churches. This education and a good store of pluck and energy was his capital; and that he has employed it wisely and well is evidenced by his success. When he began life for himself it was as a farmer; but as his capital increased his enterprise increased also, so that now he is operating a saw-mill, a grist-mill and a cotton-gin, doing well with all, and prospering. From no cash capital at the start, he has by industry and good management accumulated paying property, so that now he is enjoying a good, comfortable income. Mr. Lyle was happily married in 1878 to Miss Fannie, daughter of W. C. White, of Haralson county, a union which has been blessed with seven children: Minnie Lee, Ola, William Fletcher, Effie, Sarah Ellen, Henry Lee, Johnnie. Mr. Lyle is a master Mason, and a zealous member of the Protestant Methodist church.

J. M. M'BRIDE, lawyer, Tallapoosa, Haralson Co., Ga., was born in Campbell county, Ga., about forty-four years ago. The year of his birth his parents moved to what is now Haralson county (which was organized soon afterward), in which he has lived ever since, and received his education. In 1874 he began the study of law under the preceptorship of Maj. Blance, of Cedartown, Ga., and soon afterward he was admitted to the bar. He located in Brehanan, the county seat, where he practiced twelve years, growing in reputation and winning a constantly increasing clientage. In 1887 he moved to Tallapoosa, which has since been his home. In 1880 he was elected to represent Haralson county in the general assembly, and was re-elected in 1882. In 1884 he was elected to represent the Thirty-eighth senatorial district in the general assembly, and in 1892 was again elected to represent his county in that body. These almost continuous elections attest his popularity with his fellow-citizens—a popularity it is quite sure he could not have so long enjoyed if he had not proven to be an able and faithful representative, devoted to and guarding the interests of his constituents. Mr. McBride was married in 1874 to Miss Mattie, daughter of the late S. T. Johnson, of Alabama, a union blessed with five children, four of whom are living: Eula, Maude, Hebert and Murdoch. Mr. McBride is a member of the Masonic fraternity.

C. L. M'PHERSON, farmer, Bremen, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Elijah and Sarah (Small) McPherson, was born in Carroll county, Ga., April 4, 1844. His father was born in Pennsylvania, July 13, 1789, migrated from there to Tennessee, where he married, and in 1830 moved in an ox-cart from Tennessee to Georgia and settled in Carroll county. He was a farmer and saw-mill man, but had no property. His mother was born in Tennessee in 1809. Mr. McPherson was reared on the farm and received very little schooling. He began life on 100 acres of land, with one ox and a wagon. He enlisted in 1864 in a company belonging to the Seventh Georgia regiment, state troops, and subsequently entered the Confederate service, and was sent to Virginia. He was captured Aug. 19, 1864, and sent to Point Lookout, Md., where he remained until Sept. 29, 1864, when he was released, and Oct. 6 following rejoined his command in Virginia, with which he remained until the surrender. Mr. McPherson is considered one of the best and most successful farmers in the county, perfectly reliable, and in the highest degree responsible. Mr. McPherson was married in 1867 to Miss Lucinda, daughter of John L. and Marguerite Hamilton, of Haralson county, who has borne him five children: A. P., N. C., L. D., H. R., and J. H.

BENJAMIN F. MORGAN, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of William M. and Eady M. (Austin) Morgan, was born in Polk county, Ga., Nov. 23, 1859. Mr. Morgan's father was born in Gwinnett county in 1815, and was married in Walton county, Ga., in 1842 to Miss Eady M., daughter of J. M. Austin. He went to Polk county, Ga., in 1840, and thence to middle Tennessee in 1859. He was a soldier during the Florida war, and enlisted in the late war between the states. He was taken sick with the dysentery about the time of the battle of Shiloh, and came home on furlough, but was never able to return to the army. He was a farmer and mechanic, started in life with about $2,000, and did well until the war; when it closed he found himself ruined. Mr. Morgan began life without a dollar, and uneducated, as his father was too poor to give him any schooling. But he has been exceptionally successful in all his undertakings. He is a man of great enterprise, sagacious in planning, energetic in execution and decidedly progressive in everything. From a most inauspicious, unpromising beginning, without means, he has become one of the most promising and one of the wealthiest citizens in Haralson county. He is a young man yet, and in view of what he has already accomplished, one cannot forecast—possessing the pluck, push and progressiveness he does—what he may accomplish or attain to in the future. During the years 1888-89-90 he was engaged in merchandising at Temple, Ga., but since then has been engaged in farming and extensive sawmilling. Mr. Morgan was married March 19, 1885, to Miss Sallie L., daughter of William L. Moseley, of Douglas county, Ga. Five children have blessed this union: Effie Odessa, deceased; William Emory; John Robert; Benjamin Franklin; Pearl Estorie. Mr. Morgan is a master Mason, and his family are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

J. O. REDWINE, farmer, Bremen, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Jacob and Nancy (Tremble) Redwine, was born in De Kalb county (now Fulton) May 5, 1829. His father was born in North Carolina, came to Georgia early in this century, when a young man, poor, and settled on a rented farm in Elbert county, and subsequently moved to De Kalb county. His mother was a daughter of John and Charity Tremble, formerly of Franklin county, but who finally settled in what is now De Kalb county. Mr. Redwine was raised in De Kalb county on the farm, and attended the common "old-field" school—the last one being taught under a tent at Mount Gilead camp-ground, in what is now Fulton county. He was a justice of the peace three years, previous to 1861. In October of that year he enlisted in Campbell county in Company H, Thirtieth Georgia regiment, as a private, and rose gradually to a captaincy. He was slightly wounded, near Resaca, in May, 1863; was again wounded in a skirmish at Decatur, Ga., July 22, 1863, and was badly wounded at Decatur, Ala., September, 1863. Mr. Redwine moved to Haralson county in 1883, and bought and settled on the farm where he now lives. He began life very poor—split rails to earn the money with which to pay for his marriage license, and, afterward, to buy his provisions. He now has a good farm and comfortable home, and is a well-to-do, prosperous farmer, contented with the products of his farm, and the solid comforts and enjoyments of the home circle.

Mr. Redwine was married in October, 1849, to Miss Eliza, daughter of William and Arminda Hitchcock, of De Kalb county. To them seven children have been born: J. A., W. L., T. W., Sallie, J. E., Annie, and Vassie. Mr. Redwine and his family are exemplary members of the Methodist church.

ANDREW J. STEWART, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Walter and Nancy (Calloway) Stewart, was born in Monroe county, Ga., in 1816. His paternal grandfather, Jarret Stewart, was a native of Scotland, and one of the early settlers of Georgia. Mr. Stewart's father was born and grew to manhood in what is now Henry county, in Georgia. He was a very good English scholar for the times, and his surroundings, and was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. In 1837 he moved from Henry to Carroll county, Ga., settling and clearing a farm in the woods, undergoing all the privations and hardships incident to frontier life. He lived on this farm until 1863, when he came to the home of his son, Andrew, where he lived until he died. He was a very pious man, and strictly observed all the ordinances of his church. Mr. Stewart's mother was a daughter of Obadiah and Elizabeth Calloway, who were natives of Maryland, and came to Georgia in an ox-cart and settled and cleared a farm in Hancock county about the beginning of this century. Mr. Stewart grew to manhood on the farm, and was entirely deprived of educational advantages. But he was a hard worker, economical and a good manager, as may be inferred when it is stated that when he settled where he now lives, his only worldly possessions were a wife and child and fifteen cents in money; but now he owns 900 acres of good land, and very considerable property in Buchanan. Mr. Stewart has been married four times. His first wife was Miss Nancy, daughter of Elijah and Rachel Brooks, whom he married in 1837, and by whom he had six children—four living: John, Mary J., Nancy A., and Calloway B. The mother was Georgia-born, a member of the Baptist church, and died in February, 1856. In November of that year he married Miss Jane, daughter of Jerman Burton, who died early in 1858. October following he married Miss Emily, daughter of Martin and Sarah Ayers, who died April 1, 1882. In September, 1888, he married Melinda, daughter of John K. Holcombe. Himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

WILLIAM M. WILLIAMS, farmer, Buchanan, Haralson Co., Ga., son of Wyatt and Nancy (Wood) Williams, was born in Paulding county, Ga., in 1836. His father was the son of Hezekiah Williams, and was born in Tennessee, came to Georgia after reaching manhood, and was a member of the guard which accompanied the Indians from Georgia. He came to the state a poor man, but before he died—Jan. 15, 1885—he had acquired an excellent tract of land and a competency. His mother was born in Buncombe county, N. C., and when a child came with her father, Lawrence Wood, to Carroll county, Ga., where she was raised. Husband and wife were members of the Missionary Baptist church. Mr. Williams was raised on the farm, and with no educational advantages. After he was married he attended school for a time and obtained a pretty fair education, on whose foundation he has since built. March 13, 1862, he enlisted under Capt. Alexander Merchanson, Fortieth Georgia regiment, Col. Ab. Johnson, and went to the front. With his command, he participated in the battle at Fairsville, Tenn., after which he was taken sick, and never sufficiently recovered to return to the army. During the war all his personal property was destroyed, and his farm left a devastated waste. By untiring application and good management he has improved and added to the value of his property, is regarded as one of the solidest of the county's citizens, and stands as high as any in the estimation of the people. Not being ambitious to hold office, he has never aspired to, or held, any political position. Mr. Williams was married in 1858 to Miss Annie E., daughter of Walton and Sarah (Ellender) Berry. Her parents were from Massachusetts, but came to Georgia and settled in Putnam county, Ga., where she was reared. Three children have blessed this union: Nancy Ellen, Mary Frances, and James B. Mr. Williams' family are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

HARRIS COUNTY.

JUDGE ALEXANDER A. ALLEN was born in Abbeville district, S. C., in 1821. After receiving his preparatory education he entered the university of Georgia, from which he graduated in 1842, and then read law in Lexington, Ga., under the preceptorship of Hon. Joseph H. Lumpkin, the first chief justice of the supreme court of Georgia. After his admission to the bar he located in Bainbridge, where he achieved a splendid professional success, gaining an extensive and influential clientage, and, in 1856, was appointed judge of the superior court for his circuit. After the war he moved to Florida, but in a short time returned to Bainbridge.

S. M. BRANNON, farmer, Ellerslie, Harris Co., Ga., son of Calvin J. and Catharine (Brannan) Brannon, was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1830. His paternal grandparents were John and Nancy (Parker) Brannon. He was of Irish descent, a native of South Carolina, migrated to Georgia in the twenties, and settled in Newton county, where he lived until 1835, when he moved to Harris county. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. Mr. Brannon's father was born in South Carolina, and while a youth came to Georgia with the family. In 1835 he moved to Harris county in ox-carts and settled in the woods, camping there three weeks while felling timber and building log huts to live in. The "settlements" at that time were few and far between. He was a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war. He was a native of North Carolina, whence he moved to Monroe county, Ga. Mr. Brannon was raised on the farm, and received only such education as was obtainable in a pioneer period of settlement. During the late civil war he served with the militia or state troops, participating in the defense of Atlanta and the battle of Griswoldville, and was with the forces in front of the Union army when "Marching Through Georgia." Before the war Mr. Brannon had large investments in slaves and live stock; as a result of the "unpleasantness" the slaves were set free and the mules all stolen. On his return from the war in 1865 he bought some land on time and engaged in farming. Going to work with his accustomed energy and superior business methods he soon relieved himself of all incumbrances, has been successful, and is now one of the most prosperous farmers in the county. Progressive and public-spirited, and conscientious in the discharge of every obligation, he enjoys the entire confidence of the people and great popularity. He served the county as tax collector one term, and has been a justice of the peace for thirty or more years. Mr. Brannon was married in 1849 to Miss Mary A. Bowles, born in Monroe county, Ga., in 1829, daughter of Henry H. and Matilda (Morgan) Bowles. He was a native of South Carolina, and moved to Georgia and settled in Monroe county early in life. Five of the children born to them are still living: Minta, wife of W. E. Edge, Anniston, Ala.; Mattie, wife of M. M. Hudson, Columbus, Ga.; Katie, wife of Geo. G. Neal, Harris county, Ga.; Anna, wife of J. T. Perry, Russell county, Ala.; Wade H., married to Miss Simpson of Chattanooga, Tenn., and now in Bessemer, Ala., holding a responsible position with the Tennessee Coal & Iron company. Mr. Brannon is a master Mason and a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church, of which he has been a delegate to the general conference.

A. J. BURT, farmer, Fortson, Harris Co., Ga., son of Joel H. and Mildred A. (Owen) Burt, was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1834. His paternal grandparents, Jackson and Elizabeth (Burt) Burt, were born in what is now Putnam county, Ga., whence they moved to Talbot county, and thence, later, to Marion county. Mr. Burt's father was born in Putnam county in 1807—the year the county was organized—went with the family to Talbot county, among its earliest settlers. He was a soldier in the Florida war. His maternal great-grandparents were John and Mildred (Grant) Owen. He was of Welsh descent, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His maternal grandparents, Daniel G. and Sarah (Willis) Owen, were natives of North Carolina, migrated to Georgia early in life, and settled in Wilkes county, Ga., and afterward moved to Talbot county. He was born May 18, 1779, and she was born in 1788 and died in 1830. Mr. Burt was reared on the farm, and had the benefit of only such limited education as a newly settled country could afford, and then commenced life as a farmer. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. Pride, Thirty-first Georgia regiment, Col. Evans. His service was short and uneventful, as he was taken sick at Savannah and had to be sent home. He had nothing at the end of the war, and labored hard for a living; but thanks to a good constitution, continued good health, patient perseverance and frugality, he is now comfortably circumstanced as to property, and enjoys the esteem of the community in which he lives. Mr. Burt was married in 1858 to Miss Amanda Kimbrough, born in Harris county in 1839, daughter of Henry and Mary (Rosser) Kimbrough. Her grandparents, Thomas and Sarah (Sasser) Kimbrough, were born in Georgia, and he was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. Her parents were natives of Putnam county. Her grandparents on her mother's side, David and Sallie (Adams) Rosser, were among the earliest settlers of what is now Putnam county, and he was a soldier in the revolutionary army. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Burt but two are living: Mary and Eufalia. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are consistent and useful members of the Methodist church.

JOHN CARLISLE, farmer, Cleola, Harris Co., Ga., son of Matthew and Lucinda (Stovall) Carlisle, was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1847. His grandparents on his father's side were Micajah and Susanna (Hale) Carlisle, who were natives of North Carolina. They migrated to Georgia in early life and settled in Putnam county. Mr. Carlisle's father was born in Bibb county in 1811, was raised a farmer, and followed that calling all his life. His grandparents on his mother's side were Bartholemew and Martha (White) Stovall, who were among the earliest settlers of Crawford county. Mr. Carlisle was raised on the farm, and received such education as the county schools of the time and locality afforded. He began life a poor man, and cultivated rented land until 1878, when he bought the farm he lives on now. He is a good and prosperous farmer, and is highly esteemed as a citizen. He was married in 1875 to Miss Jennie Grimes, born in Talbot county in 1850, daughter of Stephen and Elizabeth (Reedy) Grimes. Her paternal grandfather, Charles Grimes, was a native of Rhode Island, migrated when a young man to Georgia, and settled in Talbot county, where her father, who was a soldier in the late war was born and reared. William Reedy, her maternal grandfather, who was a soldier in the war of 1812 and in the Seminole war in 1836, was a native of South Carolina, where she was born. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Carlisle seven are living: Benjamin R., Mattie, Raleigh R., Lucy E., Matthew S., J. Lew and John R. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and the Baptist church.

ROBERT F. CARTER, merchant-farmer, Ellerslie, Harris Co., Ga., son of Neal and Mary (Fleming) Carter, was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1852. His paternal grandparents, Jessie and Sarah (Neal) Carter, were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated to Georgia and settled in Warren county. He served as a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, and, later, moved to Talbot county. He represented his county one term in the general assembly. He was strongly opposed to secession, and when Gen. Wilson's raiders passed through Harris county burning houses and destroying property they left his unmolested. Mr. Carter's father was born in Warren county in 1817, but early in life moved to Talbot county, where he made his permanent home. His maternal grandfather, Robert Fleming, was a native of Virginia, came to Georgia in the first quarter of this century, and finally went to Texas, where he died. He was a preacher of some note, and lived a self-sacrificing and useful life. Mr. Carter was raised on the farm, and was given as good an education as could be had in view of the unsettled condition of the country when he was growing up. In 1872 he embarked with small capital in a general merchandising business in Ellerslie, and has conducted it with the most gratifying success. His trade has steadily increased, so that now he is doing as large a business as any merchant in the county, and is prosperous. He has bought a lot of land every year for the last ten years, and in addition to his merchandising conducts a large farm, a ginney and a mill. He ranks high socially, and as a farmer, merchant and financier. Mr. Carter was married in 1876 to Miss Camella Walton, born in Talbot county in 1854, daughter of John H. and Mary (Wörthen) Walton. He was an early settler in Talbot county, a soldier in the Seminole war, and became very prominent in the county, which he represented in the general assembly. Of the children born to them five survive: Jessie, Robert F., Susie, Walton C. and Camella. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

JESSE COX, farmer, Mulberry Grove, Harris Co., Ga., son of Asa and Maria (Roundtree) Cox, was born in Jones county, Ga., in 1815. His paternal grandfather, Cary Cox, was a native of South Carolina, was a farmer and a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Cox's father was born in Edgefield district, S. C., whence he moved early in life to Jones county. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. His maternal grandfather, Roundtree, was a native of North Carolina, but moved to South Carolina, where he died. He also was a soldier in the revolutionary war. Mr. Cox was reared on the farm and received only a limited education. He has been a farmer all his life, and has been successful and prosperous. He had accumulated a quite large property before the war—largely in negroes, which of course he lost, besides sustaining very serious loss and damage otherwise. Beginning almost anew after the close of the war he has by energy and industry and good management accumulated a quite large estate and enjoys a competency. In 1878 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and has been a justice of the peace for thirty or more years—an index of the high estimation in which he is held by his fellow-citizens. Mr. Cox was married in 1839 to Miss Lucinda J. Webb, born in 1817, daughter of Elias and Nancy (Mama) Webb, early settlers of Harris county. Seven of the children born to them are yet living: Ann M., Narcissa, John J., William Virgil, Carrie, Martin and Exie. The mother of these children, a worthy and useful member of the Baptist church, died early in 1864. Late in the same year he married Miss Elizabeth Moultrie, born in Harris county in 1834, daughter of John D. Moultrie, who was born in South Carolina, and moving to Georgia, was one of the earliest settlers of Harris county, and is still enjoying life there. Mr. Cox has been particularly careful to give his children a good education. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

Mr. Davidson's father was born in Warren county in 1812, where he was schooled and grew to manhood on the farm. He served in the Florida war, after which he settled in Harris county, where he has successfully followed farming since. His maternal grandparents were Aaron and Elizabeth (Smith) Goodman. He was a native of North Carolina, raised a farmer, and came to Georgia when eighteen years of age, where he married and raised a family. Mr. Davidson grew to manhood on the farm, and received only a limited education. In 1864 he enlisted in Company I, Capt. Moss, Ninth Georgia Militia regiment, with which he gallantly participated in the defense of Atlanta, the battle of Griswoldville (where he was wounded), and obstructing the Union forces when "marching through Georgia." On his return from the war he engaged in farm work, and in 1879 made his first purchase of a small tract of land, to which he has since gradually made additions until now he has a fine 650-acre plantation under excellent cultivation with a good comfortable home on it. Industrious and frugal, a good farmer and citizen, and entirely reliable, he deservedly stands high with his fellow-citizens. Mr. Davidson was married in 1876 to Miss Mattie O. Hutchinson, born in Harris county in 1854, daughter of Nicholas and Mary (Pratt) Hutchinson. He was born and raised in Warren county, Ga., and did faithful and efficient service as a soldier in the late war between the states. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Davidson, two are living: Claude and Eunice.

His paternal grandparents, Ransom and Susan Davis, were among the early settlers of Lincoln county. Mr. Davis' father was born in Lincoln county in 1810, was raised a farmer, and made it his life occupation. His maternal grandparents, John and Elizabeth Guice, were native Georgians. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and settled early in life in what is now Meriwether county. Mr. Davis was reared on the farm, was educated at country schools, and when grown engaged in farming. In 1862 he enlisted in Company D, Capt. Kennon, Third Georgia regiment, but remained in the service only a short time; being discharged on account of disability. When the war closed he had nothing but good health, good character, a self-reliant spirit, and independent impulses. He now has a good farm, a good home, and the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Davis was married in 1849 to Miss Caroline Hadley, born in Harris county in 1830, daughter of Thomas and Delancy (Mullin) Hadley. Six children of those born to them survive: Cornelia, Elizabeth, Martha, Thomas, John and Leila. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died in 1872. In 1873 he contracted a second marriage with Miss Mary Spivey, born in Harris county in 1843, daughter of Thomas and Emily (Robinson) Spivey, early settlers in Harris county. Four children born to them are now living: Emily, Lanie Lou, Lucy and Susie Kate. Mr. Davis is a master Mason, and both are members of the Baptist church.

ADGER S. ELLISON, farmer, Ellerslie, Harris Co., Ga., son of John and Elizabeth (Patterson) Ellison, was born in Chester district, S. C., in 1827. His grandfather on his father's side was William Ellison, a native of South Carolina. He was a captain in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and was captured and confined in a prison-ship off the South Carolina coast a long time. He made his native state his home until he died. Mr. Ellison's father was born in South Carolina in 1777, where he was reared and married. He was a farmer and merchant, and migrated to Georgia and settled in Talbot county early in its history, and died there in 1863. His maternal grandfather was John Patterson, who was a native of Ireland, came to this country in 1779, settled in Maryland, served as a soldier in the revolutionary war, and finally settled in South Carolina, where he died. Mr. Ellison was reared on the farm, partly in South Carolina and partly in Talbot county, Ga., to which the family moved when he was young. In 1863 he enlisted in Company C, Capt. Crawford, Third Georgia regiment. He was subsequently transferred to a company commanded by Capt. Willis, and participated in the battles at Chattanooga, Chickamauga, Dalton, Resaca, Rocky Face, the defense of Atlanta and engagements in front of the Union army while "marching through Georgia," and Bentonville, N. C. He was off duty for some considerable time during the war. After it was over he came home to find his horses, mules and other live stock "confiscated," and commenced farming with an exceedingly meager outfit. Nothing daunted he went to work to re-habilitate his farm and recuperate his fortune, in which he has been eminently successful. A good farmer with a splendid farm, and one of the best of managers, he stands now among the foremost of Harris county's private citizens socially and financially. Mr. Ellison was married in 1850 to Miss Margaret Terry, born in Talbot county in 1831, daughter of Stephen and Sarah (Patterson) Terry, native South Carolinians, who came to Georgia and settled in Talbot county in 1831. Of the children which blessed this union six survive: Stephen, John, Maggie, Lula, wife of Wm. Pitts of Harris county, Ga., Bessie and Jimmie. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died Jan. 4, 1893. He is a master Mason, and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

S. C. GOODMAN, farmer, Chipley, Harris Co., Ga., son of Aaron and Elizabeth (Smith) Goodman, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., in 1831. His paternal grandparents, John and Elizabeth Goodman, were natives of North Carolina. He was of German descent and served as a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Goodman's father was born in North Carolina and migrated to Georgia and settled in Meriwether county in 1829. He was a general trader or speculator, and accumulated considerable property. He was a volunteer soldier in the Florida war. His maternal grandparents, James and Sarah Smith, were among the early settlers of Jones county. He was of Irish descent and was a soldier in the revolutionary war. Mr. Goodman was reared on the farm and was educated at the common country schools. During the civil war he served with the militia, or state troops. Before the war he owned a great many slaves, which were freed, and after the war he had to begin life anew. Farming has been his life occupation, with which, its pleasures and satisfactory success, he has been content. With a good farm, a comfortable home, an interesting family, a competency, and the respect of the community, he is satisfied. He is a member of the county board of commissioners. Mr. Goodman was married in 1855 to Miss Susan Bowles, born in Harris county in 1836, daughter of Thomas and Asenith (Bennett) Bowles, of old Georgia families. He was a soldier in the Seminole, or Florida war. Mr. Goodman's wife, an exemplary member of the Methodist church, died, and of her children the following five are living: Ida, Ella, Ada, Laura and Lula. In 1883 Mr. Goodman was married to Miss Elizabeth Evans, born in Meriwether county in 1840, daughter of John J. and Martha (Walker) Evans. He was a native of Harris county, and served in the Confederate army during the late civil war. Mr. Goodman and his wife are consistent members of the Baptist church.

ERASTUS C. HOOD, retired physician, Mulberry Grove, Harris Co., Ga., son of Joel and Martha T. (Dowdy) Hood, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1816. His great-grandfather was born in England, and came to this country in colonial times. His grandparents were John and Rebecca (Reeves) Hood. He was born in Amelia county, Va., enlisted and served in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and at its close was discharged at Savannah. He walked from there to Wilkes county, where he soon afterward married and settled, and lived till he died. Dr. Hood's father was born in Wilkes county Sept. 28, 1789, where he was raised a farmer; served in the war of 1812 as captain in the army, and afterward moved from Wilkes county to what is now Coweta, and thence to what is now Meriwether county, where he ended his days Oct. 11, 1861. His maternal grandparents were Martin and Mary (Temple) Dowdy. He was a native of Virginia, and was a soldier in the revolutionary army. He afterward migrated to Georgia, and was one of the earliest settlers in Oglethorpe county, where he married and lived until he died. Dr. Hood received his primary education at Whitesville, Harris county, and then studied medicine under Drs. J. W. Cato and J. W. Stinson, and afterward attended the lectures at the medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, one session. Subsequently he went to the medical college at Lexington, Ky., from which he was graduated in 1840. On his return home he was associated with his old preceptor, Dr. Stinson—well known all over Meriwether county as one of the most skillful physicians in the county, and practiced ten years, when he moved to Whitesville. After practicing there some years he moved to his present home. He represented Harris county in the general assembly two terms and the senatorial district one term. Being an extensive producer he was exempted from army service during the war. He was a member of the constitutional convention in 1865, and was Freedmen's bureau agent for Harris county three years. Dr. Hood has sustained the reputation of being one of the best physicians in that part of the state, has proved his ability and skill, is highly esteemed professionally and socially, has enjoyed an extensive practice and accumulated a fortune. He is one of the largest land-holders in Harris county. Dr. Hood was married in 1845 to Miss Mary Cochran—born in Jasper county, Ga., in 1826—daughter of Martin and Myron (Armstrong) Cochran. Mr. Cochran was born in Jasper county in 1793, and attained to considerable prominence and influence. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, and served as sheriff of the county fourteen years. Later he removed to Harris county, where he died. Of the children born to Dr. and Mrs. Hood three survive: Julia, wife of C. I. Hudson, Hamilton; Milton F., and Erastus C., Jr. Dr. Hood is a member of the masonic fraternity, and himself and wife are revered and influential members of the Baptist church.

C. I. HUDSON, farmer and warehouse man, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of W. I. and F. R. (McHone) Hudson, was born in Harris county in 1845. His paternal grandfather, Charles Hudson, was a native of Virginia, came to Georgia early in the present century and settled in the woods in Putnam county, where he lived until he died. His maternal grandparents, Thomas and Nancy (Marshall) McHone, were also natives of Virginia, whence they moved to Georgia, and settled in Harris county. Subsequently he moved to Butler county, Ala., where he died. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. Mr. Hudson's father was born in Putnam county in 1822, and was raised a farmer, a pursuit which he followed through life. When grown he moved to Harris county, where he married and became very prominent. He was ordinary of the county for many years; represented the senatorial district in the general assembly; was a member of the secession convention in 1861, and also of the constitutional convention of 1877; was a justice of the inferior court many years; and when he died, in 1893, was a county commissioner. Mr. Hudson received his primary education in the schools at Hamilton, and afterward attended the Georgia Military institute near Marietta, where he was when the civil war was precipitated. He enlisted in Company E, Second Georgia regiment, state line, and participated in the battles of New Hope church, Kennesaw mountain, those around Atlanta, Jonesboro and Griswoldville, where he was wounded and captured. After he was captured he was taken to Port Royal, thence to Fortress Monroe, and from there to the old Capitol prison at Washington city, whence he was finally sent to Fort Delaware, where he was detained as a prisoner until after the surrender, when he was paroled. Returning to his home he engaged in farming, which he has followed ever since, with more than ordinary success. In addition to farming he has established an extensive warehouse business in Hamilton, which has proved to be a very great financial success. He is progressive in all his ideas, enterprising and energetic, financially solid, and one of the most substantial citizens in the county. Mr. Hudson was married in 1866 to Miss Julia Hood—born in Harris county in 1844—daughter of Dr. Erastus C. and Mary (Cochran) Hood. (A sketch of Dr. Hood will be found elsewhere in these Memoirs.) Of the children which blessed this union these are living: May R., Hood, Charles I., and William I. He is a member of the board of education; of the Ancient Order of Woodmen; and himself and wife are prominent members of the Baptist church.

JOHN F. JENKINS, farmer, Chipley, Harris Co., Ga., son of David and Elizabeth (Cooper) Jenkins, was born in Harris county in 1838. His paternal grandfather, Lewis Jenkins, was a native of North Carolina, and migrated to Georgia early in the present century. He was a volunteer soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Jenkins' father was born in North Carolina in 1804, came to Georgia with his father, and settled in Harris county in 1827—the year it was laid off—and was one of the first men to make a crop in the then new county. He served in the Florida and Seminole war, and died in 1870. His maternal grandfather, Cooper, was a native of South Carolina. Mr. Jenkins was raised on the farm, and was educated at the schools taught in the log houses of that period. In 1861 he enlisted in Company H, Capt. Kennon, Seventeenth Georgia regiment, and with it bore an honorable part in many important battles, among them: Seven days' fight around Richmond, second Manassas, Wilderness, Gettysburg, Knoxville, Petersburg, Chickamauga, etc. At the battle of the Wilderness he was severely wounded and came home, but in a short time returned to the army. He was promoted to the captaincy of Company H, and remained in the service until the surrender. He came home from the war penniless and went to work as a farm hand, which he did for five years. At the end of that time he bought a farm, and to it he has added as he saved money, until now he has 1,000 acres of farming land equal to any in the county. His success is only another demonstration of what pluck, industry, economy and perseverance can accomplish. As a farmer and a man of practical business sense he ranks with the foremost. In 1888 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and was placed on the committees on ways and means, temperance, journals, and public library. He has been a member of the county board of education for fourteen years. Mr. Jenkins was married in 1869 to Miss Mary Evans—born in Harris county in 1841—daughter of Jackson and Martha (Walker) Evans. He was a native Georgian, and did good service during the late civil war. Of the children which blessed this union five are living: George W., Ora L., Minnie M., John F., and Charles C. The mother of these having died, he contracted a second marriage in 1885 with Miss Margaret J. Murray—born in Harris county in 1840—daughter of Thomas Murray, formerly of South Carolina, and among the early settlers of the county. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are worthy members of the Baptist church.

WILLIS JONES, farmer, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of Willis and Frances (Florence) Jones, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., in 1826. His father was born in Virginia—where his parents were born and lived and died, in 1782—came to Georgia when a boy and made his home in Oglethorpe county; became a prosperous farmer and married. During his life he served as a justice of the inferior court and represented the county in the general assembly. He departed this life in 1840. Mr. Jones' maternal grandparents were natives of Virginia, and the grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Jones worked on the farm and received a limited education at that never-to-be-forgotten institution of learning—the dirt-floor log school-house which has graduated so many men of distinction. Like thousands of other farmer boys, he started in life poor, but by industry and economy has acquired a comfortable competency, won the esteem of his fellow-citizens, and been honored by them, having served them many years as a justice of the inferior court. Mr. Jones was married in 1847 to Miss Mary J. Florence, born in Meriwether county in 1831, daughter of William and Millie A. (Arnett) Florence. Mr. Florence was born in Wilkes county, Ga., whence he moved to Meriwether county, where he lived till he died. Of the children born to Mr. Jones by his marriage, eight are living: William M., Celestia C., Monroe M., Benjamin Fillmore, Lula F., Ida B., Mary W. and Lamar. Himself and wife are devoted and consistent members of the Baptist church.

CHRISTOPHER C. JONES, farmer, Harris Co. (P. O., West Point, Troup county), Ga., son of James and Celia (Edge) Jones, was born in Troup county in 1831. His paternal grandparents, Henry and Patsey Jones, were natives of North Carolina, where they spent their lives. Mr. Jones' father was born in North Carolina in 1779, migrated to Georgia and settled in Troup county, where he married and settled and reared his family, and beneath whose soil he rests. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. His mother was a daughter of Patsy Edge. He was a native of Alabama. Mr. Jones was reared on the farm and received but limited and indifferent schooling. He however educated himself by hard study, sufficiently to undertake teaching, and taught school ten years. In 1858 he bought his first tract of land, to which he has added from time to time by purchase until now he owns 3,000 acres of good land. He began his farm life by hard work all day in the field, and by making shingles at night, an article in great demand at the time. As a result he is in possession of a large body of excellent land, a large farm in a fine state of cultivation, enjoys all the prosperity he desires, and in the highest degree the respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens. He has now at his home a bale of cotton he made twenty-five years ago. Mr. Jones was married in 1858 to Miss Lucy Anderson, born in Greene county, Ga., in 1835, daughter of Elijah and Phoebe (Clark) Anderson. He was born in 1803 in Greene county, where he died in 1858. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have seven children living: Richard T., James E., Samuel N., John H., Christopher C., Balsora A. and Robert M. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

HENRY L. LOWE, farmer, Ellerslie, Harris Co., Ga., son of Henry H. and Bethena (Littleton) Lowe, was born in Jones county, Ga., in 1818. His paternal grandparents, Henry and Elizabeth (Tarver) Lowe, were natives of North Carolina, and migrated to Georgia and settled in what is now Jones county about 1800. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Lowe's father was born in what is now Jones county, where he grew to manhood and married, and afterward moved to Harris county, among its earliest settlers about the time the county was laid out. He was a large and prominent farmer, served as a general during the Creek war, and represented the county in the general assembly. His maternal grandfather, Benjamin Tarver, was one of the very earliest settlers of what is now Jones county. Mr. Lowe was raised in Macon, Ga., where he received his schooling. He began life by clerking in Macon, and continued it until 1843, when he went to Griffin, Ga., and was one of the first settlers there. Subsequently he moved to Harris county and engaged in farming. During the war he was exempted by Gov. Brown from military service, but was commissioned to gather provisions for the army. Toward the close of the war Federal raiders under Gen. Wilson passed through Harris county and burned down all his buildings but his residence, and "confiscated" thirty-two head of mules. But devoting all his energies and his time and attention to the improvement of his farm, he has it now in good condition, with a comfortable dwelling and substantial outbuildings, and is regarded as one of the financially solid men of Harris county. Mr. Lowe was married in 1850 to Miss Edith F. Kilgore, born in Pike county, Ga., daughter of John V. and Eliza (Woods) Kilgore. He was an early settler of Pike county, was a soldier in the Seminole war, and subsequently died in Harris county. Three of the children born to this union there are living: Jackson, Benjamin F. and John H. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died in 1878, and in 1879 he contracted a second marriage with Miss Sallie Lynch, born in Pike county, daughter of George J. and Elizabeth (Holly) Lynch. He was a native Georgian, an early settler of Putnam county, and afterward moved to Harris county. Mrs. Lowe is a consistent member of the Baptist church, and he is a member of the masonic fraternity.

W. H. M'DONNELL, farmer, Ellerslie, Harris Co., Ga., son of Andrew and Sarah (Thornton) McDonnell, was born in Meriwether county in 1843. His paternal grandfather was a native of Scotland, who emigrated to this country when a young man and settled in Columbia county, Ga., where he married and made his home until he died. Mr. McDonnell's father was born in Columbia county, Ga., where he was reared on the farm, and whence he moved to Meriwether county. His maternal grandfather, James Thornton, was a native Georgian, was a farmer and served in the war of 1812. Mr. McDonnell was reared on the farm, and was given only a limited education. In 1862 he enlisted in Company G, Capt. G. W. Knight, later Capt. N. B. Roberts, Fifty-fourth Georgia regiment. Among the battles in which the command participated were: Missionary Ridge, Dalton, Resaca, Cass Station, New Hope church, the defense of Atlanta, Franklin, Nashville—where he received a slight, not disabling wound—and Bentonville, N. C. After the war he worked on a farm, first for wages, later for himself on rented land until 1879, when he made his first purchase of land. He now owns a good farm and comfortable home, and makes plenty and to spare. A good and industrious citizen, he is content with the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. McDonnell was married in 1861 to Miss Catharine Tarvin, born in Harris county in 1842, daughter of Churchwell and Sarah (Phillips) Tarvin. He was born in Columbia county, and moved to Harris county, and settled about the time it was organized. He served as a soldier in the Seminole war. Three of the children which were the fruit of this marriage, are living: Mamie, Minnie and Sallie. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are consistent members of the Baptist church.

J. A. MIDDLEBROOKS, farmer, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of Isaac and Elizabeth (Thompson) Middlebrooks, was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1811. His paternal grandparents, Isaac and Jennie Middlebrooks, were natives of South Carolina, and migrated to Georgia and settled in Clarke county about the beginning of this century. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Middlebrooks' father was born in South Carolina and came to Georgia with his father, was reared a farmer, and in 1829 moved to Harris county. His mother was a daughter of John and Sallie Thompson, members of old Georgia families. Mr. Middlebrooks was reared on the farm and educated at the common schools of the country. He volunteered as a soldier in the Florida war, and served under Capt. Sloan. He also served in the late "unpleasantness" as a member of the state militia. He began life by working on the farms of John Holland, Joel Lockhart, James Kelley and Aaron Goodman. In 1839 he bought a farm, and to this he has constantly added gradually until now his land-holdings are quite large, and are the result of good farming, economy and judicious investment. He is highly esteemed in his community and is remarkably active for a man of his age. Mr. Middlebrooks was married in 1837 to Miss Nancy Hall, born in Harris county in 1822, daughter of Thomas and Martha (Manning) Hall. Of the children born to them four are living: Thomas, William, George A. and Laura. In 1852 the mother of these, who was an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died, and in 1854 he contracted a second marriage with Miss Martha C. Jenkins, born in Harris county in 1834, daughter of William and Jane Jenkins, who came to Georgia from North Carolina. Of their children three survive: Sallie, Hiram and Robert Lee. Their mother having died, he, in 1880, married Miss Mary Huff, born in Harris county in 1855, daughter of Andrew and Louisa (Davis) Huff. He is a master Mason and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

J. M. MOBLEY, lawyer, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of Reuben R. and Gricilla C. (Burford) Mobley, was born in Jones county, Ga., in 1823. His paternal grandparents, Levi and Sarah (Rabb) Mobley, were natives of South Carolina, where they were married, and some years afterwards migrated to Georgia and settled in Jones county. He afterwards moved to Alabama, where he lived until he died. He was of Scotch descent, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His maternal grandparents, Leonard and Nancy (Smith) Burford, were natives of Virginia, who came to Georgia early in this century, and were among the pioneer settlers of Jones county. He also was a soldier in the revolutionary army. Mr. Mobley's father was born in South Carolina in 1794, came to Georgia with his parents, and grew to manhood on the farm in Jones county. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, was one of the first settlers in Harris county, was a member of the first grand jury, and operated the first cotton gin in the county. He was an enthusiastic and exemplary member of the Methodist church, and the first church organized in the county was organized at his home. Mr. Mobley was raised on the farm, and received a very good education for the locality and period, completing it under the preceptorship of A. H. Scott, a prominent teacher of his day. He began the study of law at the age of eighteen, and was admitted to the bar when twenty years of age, by a special act of the general assembly. He established himself in Hamilton, where he has lived ever since, done an extensive practice, won professional distinction, and honorable political positions, and been a prominent and influential promoter of every project or measure promising material or moral improvement and advancement. He earned the money by his practice wherewith to pay for his legal education; and whatever he has attained to professionally, financially, or otherwise, has, under providence, been due to his industry and fidelity to every duty and trust. Before the war he was a member of the general assembly of Georgia four years, and served on the following committees: Judiciary, finance, and banks; and had the honor of serving with Ben H. Hill, Linton Stephens and Francis Bartow, and, professionally, at the bar, with Hill, William Dougherty, Walter T. Colquitt, and other legal luminaries of ante-bellum times. In 1861 he was elected secretary of the senate of Georgia; and, after the war commenced, he served with the state, or home guards, serving on Gov. Brown's staff, with rank of colonel, his principal duty being to secure clothing for the Georgia soldiers in the Confederate army. He, however, saw some active service in the field, participating in the defense of Macon, and in the capture of Gen. Stoneman. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1877, and actively co-operated with Gen. Robert Toombs in inserting the article authorizing the establishment of the board of railroad commissioners. He also served on the standing committee on counties, and on the general revision committee, of which Gen. Toombs was chairman. In 1888 he was presidential elector for the fourth congressional district, and cast his vote for Grover Cleveland. Thus, it will be seen that his life has been one of great activity and of local and state-wide usefulness, crowned with public approval and appreciation, and honorably won distinction. Mr. Mobley was happily married in 1846 to Miss Matilda K., daughter of Benjamin and Nancy (Beck) Henry. Her father was a native of Virginia, closely related to the great revolutionary patriot, Patrick Henry, and served with distinction as captain in the war of 1812. Of the children which blessed this union, six are living: Reuben B.; Sarah A. B., wife of J. M. Kimbrough; Jimmie M., widow of John W. Gamble; James H.; John B., and Lula. His wife was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1829, was an exemplary member of the Methodist church, and died in 1879. Mr. Mobley is a prominent and distinguished member of the masonic fraternity, having been grand master of the Grand lodge of Georgia four years. He is also a life-long member of the Methodist church, in the service of which, in his sphere, he has lived a life of usefulness. Although the war left him poor, he now enjoys a comfortable competency.

J. C. MOON, farmer, Cleola, Harris Co., Ga., son of Jesse and Mary (Phillips) Moon, was born in Troup county, Ga., in 1844. His paternal grandfather, Moon, was one of the earliest settlers of Harris county, and his father was a well-known devoted Methodist preacher. Late in life he migrated to Arkansas, where he died. Mr. Moon's mother was a daughter of a Mr. Phillips, whose family were among the early settlers of Elbert county. Mr. Moon was quite young when the family went to Arkansas, where he grew to manhood on the farm, and with exceedingly limited educational advantages. In 1861 he enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. Lewis, which formed a part of an Indian regiment; but was never in a regular engagement. After the war he returned to Harris county and cultivated rented land for many years, making his first purchase in 1874. Since that time he has bought and paid for the excellent farm he now lives on, and is comfortably situated. He is a man of untiring industry, a good farmer, and a well-thought-of citizen. Mr. Moon was married in 1866 to Miss Elizabeth Milner—born in Harris county in 1849—daughter of L. B. and Sarah J. (Lossen) Milner. He was born in Jasper county, and was a faithful soldier during the late civil war. Of the children which blessed this union, nine survive: Sarah, Jesse H., Hixie, Pearlle, Joseph, Georgia, Sidney, Robert T., and Ben Hill. His wife is a consistent member of the Baptist church.

J. T. PEARSON, farmer, Harris county, postoffice, West Point, Troup Co., Ga., son of James and Caroline (Barron) Pearson, was born in Upson county, Ga., in 1839. His father was of French descent, was born in Georgia, was raised a farmer and continued to be one all his life; served as a soldier in the Florida war, and died in 1866. His maternal grandparents were a Mr. and Mrs. Barron, he being of Irish extraction. Mr. Pearson worked on the farm, and was given the best education obtainable at the historical dirt-floor log school-house, and then engaged in farming. In 1862 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. J. C. Wright, Forty-sixth Alabama regiment, and with his command was in twenty-seven battles—some of them as important and bloody as any fought during the war; among them—Blair's Cross-roads, Baker's Creek, Big Black Creek, Vicksburg, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, Dalton, Rasaca, and Nashville. He was captured at Vicksburg, and, after being held five days, was released. He was again captured, at Nashville, and this time was sent to Camp Chase, Columbus, Ohio, where he was held a prisoner eight months. Returning from the war with nothing, he went to work on the farm, and for a short time was engaged in merchandising. In 1869 he bought his first land, on which he made his permanent home, and to which he has since gradually added, until now he has between 900 and 1,000 acres of land. On his "home-place" he has a large steam ginnery, and on Flat Shoals creek, a large mill and another ginnery. He is enterprising and energetic, keeps abreast of the times in agricultural and kindred improvements, and is fully alive to all measures calculated to develop our resources. Mr. Pearson was married in 1868 to Miss Amanda M. Johnson—born in Harris county in 1843—daughter of Benjamin and Jane (Doddwell) Johnson. Mr. Johnson was born in North Carolina, came to Georgia early in life, was one of the earliest settlers in Harris county, and was a soldier in the Florida or Seminole war. Of the children born to them, nine are living: James W., John A., Mary J., Milton H., Annie P., Thomas C., Arthur A., Billie B., and Daniel M. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are active members of the Baptist church.

M'ALVIN H. SPENCE, farmer, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of Nathan and Adaline (Reeves) Spence, was born in Rockingham county, N. C., in 1810. His grandparents on his father's side, Nathan and Elizabeth (Quindley) Spence, were natives of Maryland; he was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war—migrated to North Carolina after the war, thence to Georgia, where he lived some years in what is now Jasper county, and ultimately went to Walker county, Ga., where he lived till he died. Mr. Spence's father was born in Maryland, and moved with the family to North Carolina, and thence to Jasper county, Ga. He afterwards moved to Gwinnett county, Ga., where he died. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. His grandparents, on his mother's side, Malachi and Rhoda (Howell) Reeves, were natives of Virginia, in which state they lived all their lives. Mr. Spence worked and grew to manhood on the farm, and was given as good an education as the country schools could afford at the time. He was a volunteer soldier in the Florida war. When he came to Harris county he had only thirty-seven and one-half cents, yet, such was his industry, frugality and extraordinarily good management that in 1860 he had fifty-six negroes, besides his plantation, made up of land he commenced buying in 1834. At the close of the war fifty cents was the sum of his cash capital; but to-day he is regarded as one of the wealthiest and one of the financially strongest of Harris county's citizens. He has made his fortune by attending strictly to his agricultural interests in all their details, and in a way to retain the respect and sincere esteem of his fellow-citizens. He has served the county as a justice of the inferior court. Mr. Spence was married in 1830 to Miss Elizabeth Spence, born in North Carolina in 1812, daughter of James Spence, a native of the same state. Of the children born to them, four survive: James, Adaline, Eliza, Frances. Martha and Mary are deceased. The mother of these having died, he, in 1845, married Miss Martha Milligan. By this marriage three children were born: William, George and Sallie, the last-named the only one living. For his third wife he married Mrs. Elizabeth Ellis in 1892. Mr. Spence is a master Mason, and belongs to the Baptist church, while Mrs. Spence is a member of the Methodist church south.

LYCURGUS L. STANFORD, lawyer and farmer, Hamilton, Harris Co., Ga., son of Nehemiah and Elizabeth (Wyatt) Stanford, was born in Putnam county, Ga., in 1831. His paternal great-grandparents, Joshua and Elizabeth (McGhee) Stanford, were natives of England and Scotland respectively, whence, with a brother of his, they emigrated to this country with Lord Cecil to Maryland, and settled on the eastern shore of Chesapeake bay. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, was captured and imprisoned on a man-of-war for six months. His brother emigrated south to one of the Carolinas. Mr. Stanford's paternal grandparents, Levin and Eleanor (McGhee) Stanford, were born on the eastern shore of Chesapeake bay, Maryland, migrated to Georgia in 1800, and settled in Warren county, whence, in 1808, they moved to Putnam county, where they lived until they died. Mr. Stanford's father was born in Warren county in 1805, and was raised a farmer, which was his life-pursuit. He was a boy when his father moved to Putnam county, where he lived until 1859, when he moved to Murray county, Ga., where he lived until he died in 1879. His maternal grandparents were Sylvester and Sarah (Mills) Wyatt. He was a native of England, emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, and settled in North Carolina, was on the committee which drafted the ordinance of separation from Great Britain, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the war for independence. Some years afterward he moved to Paducah, Ky., where he died in 1854. Mr. Stanford was raised on the farm and received his primary education at Jefferson academy in Putnam county. He afterward attended Maryville college, Maryville, Tenn., from which he graduated in 1854. In 1857 he was chosen president of the Hamilton Female college, and later went to Cumberland university, Lebanon, Tenn., from the law department of which he graduated in 1859. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. B. A. Thornton, Third Georgia cavalry, and after serving two months was commissioned as captain of Company K, same regiment. With his command he participated in many engagements, many of them bloody and important; among them: Bridgeport, Vinegar Hill, Munfordville, Perryville, Crab Orchard, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, and Resaca. At the last-named battle, May 14, 1864, he was captured and sent to Johnson's island, where he was detained as a prisoner for about thirteen months, reaching home, after his release, in July, 1865. He at once entered upon the practice of the law, and has uninterruptedly pursued it since, growing in reputation, with a clientage all the time gradually increasing in volume, value and influence. In 1868 he was elected a member of the constitutional convention; and in 1877 was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and again in 1881. Mr. Stanford was married in 1854 to Miss Maggie, daughter of John and Sarah (Smith) Henry, of east Tennessee. She died in 1858, leaving two sons, Jno. C., who died in 1879, aged twenty-four, and Wm. H., who died in 1893, aged twenty-six. Her father was a native Virginian and a near relative of Patrick Henry, the eloquent Virginia patriot. Later in life he moved to Tennessee, where he became very prominent. In 1859 Mr. Stanford married Miss Maggie A. Passmore—born in Harris county in 1836—daughter of James and Nancy (Lester) Passmore. She died in 1862, leaving one living child, Maggie, wife of J. H. Brawner. In 1865, for his third wife, he married Miss Marietta Walker—born in Muscogee county, Ga., in 1836—daughter of James and Lucinda (Ferguson) Walker. She died early in 1882, leaving one child, Lycurgus W. Late in the same year he was married to Miss Eliza C. Walker—born in Muscogee county—sister of his last wife, by whom he has had one child, James L. He is an enthusiastic member of the masonic fraternity, and worshipful master of the local lodge. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church. In 1894 Mr. Stanford was a prominent candidate for congress from the fourth district, and in the convention held at Warm Springs, Ga., Aug. 13-16, 1894, was only defeated after the 365th ballot by the present incumbent, Hon. C. L. Moses, of Coweta county. Mr. Stanford is one of the active politicians of the state, and is now and has been since its organization, president commander of Harris county, Ga., camp of Confederate Veterans.

WILLIAM H. THOMPSON, farmer, Cataula, Harris Co., Ga., son of John W. and Melinda (Thorp) Thompson, was born in Muscogee county, Ga., in 1837. His grandparents, James M. and Susan (Meadows) Thompson, were born on board ship on the ocean, while their parents were on the voyage to America. Their parents settled in Virginia; but after they reached maturity they migrated early in this century to Georgia, and settled in Jones county. He was a captain in the war of 1812, and was killed in battle during the war. Mr. Thompson's father was born in Jones county in 1809. He was a farmer, and worked also at mill-wrighting. In 1836 he moved to Muscogee county, which he made his home until he died. He was a soldier in the Florida or Seminole war. His maternal grandparents were William and Martha (Davis) Thorp. He was born in Virginia, but early in life came to Georgia and settled in Twiggs county and made it his permanent home. He also served in the Indian war. Mr. Thompson was raised on the farm and educated at Marshall college. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. Pride, Thirty-first Georgia regiment, and with his command participated in many battles, among them Chancellorsville, seven days' fight around Richmond, and second Manassas. At this last-named battle he was severely wounded and had to come home. He has since devoted himself to his farming interest, is progressive and prosperous, and ranks among the best farmers in Harris county. He was elected justice of the peace many years ago, and still holds the office. Mr. Thompson was married in 1859 to Miss Georgia McKay—born in Harris county in 1840—daughter of John and Mary (Watt) McKay. He was born (of Scotch descent) in North Carolina, was a farmer, and came to Georgia and settled in Harris county, where he attained to considerable prominence. Of the children which were the fruit of this union six survive: Willie, Mattie, Fannie B., John W., Eugene, and Marshall J. He is a master Mason and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

HART COUNTY.

WILLIAM A. HILLIARD, farmer, Bowersville, Hart Co., Ga., son of Bartlett and Mildred (Duncan) Hilliard, was born in South Carolina in 1825. His paternal grandparents, Armisted and Dorcas (Williams) Hilliard, were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated early in life to South Carolina. He was of English lineage, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Hilliard's father was born in Lancaster district, S. C., was raised a farmer and continued to be one all his life. In 1852 he moved to Georgia, of which he became a life-long citizen. His maternal grandparents were Jesse and Rebecca (Farrell) Duncan, natives of North Carolina, where they spent their lives. Mr. Hilliard was raised on the farm and was educated to a limited extent in the near-by country schools. In 1862 he enlisted as a member of Beauregard battery, Martin's battalion, Smith's brigade. Among the important battles in which his command participated were: Charleston, Jackson, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Kennesaw mountain, around Atlanta, Jonesboro, Franklin, and Nashville—remaining in the service until the surrender. Mr. Hilliard is an industrious and excellent farmer, owns a good 400-acre farm under good cultivation and supplied with substantial out-buildings; and owns, besides, considerable valuable town property. He devotes all his time to his farm and to home life, beloved by his family and much respected by his neighbors. Mr. Hilliard was married in 1847 to Miss Mary—born in South Carolina in 1824—daughter of David and Mary (Smith) Lee. He was a native of Virginia, was highly educated, and for many years a practicing lawyer. He migrated to South Carolina, and subsequently relinquished the law and engaged in farming. Mr. and Mrs. Hilliard have seven children living: Rebecca Brown, David L., William B., John B., Mary Cole, Perry G., and Jersey S. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

F. M. GAINES, farmer, Coldwater, Hart Co., Ga., son of Francis and Diodema (Hailey) Gaines, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1837. His paternal grandparents were R. T. and Sallie (Alexander) Gaines. He was born in Virginia, left his family and came to Georgia when a youth and settled in the woods in Elbert county. He used to tell his family afterward that when he came to the county the country was so densely overgrown with pea-vines that it was difficult to travel. Mr. Gaines' father was born in Elbert county and was raised a farmer. After farming some years he added general merchandising to his farming and accumulated much property. His maternal grandparents were John and Mary (Underwood) Hailey. He was a farmer, and a son of William Hailey, who died in Elbert county in 1817. Mr. Gaines grew to manhood on the farm, with very meager educational advantages. In 1862 he enlisted in Company I, Capt. Eberhart—later Capt. James Sanders—Ninth Georgia battalion, afterward the Thirty-seventh Georgia regiment. With his command he was engaged in some of the most important battles of the war—Tazewell, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Dalton, Resaca (where he was wounded), the siege of Atlanta, Nashville, etc., and remained with the army until the surrender. Mr. Gaines started in life with nothing. He, however, bought a plantation for $3,500, and paid for it in two years. He has continued to prosper, and now owns a splendid tract of land of about 1,100 acres, two fine mills—one in Hart and one in Elbert county; has a guano factory, and owns stock in the Hartwell bank. His very remarkable success gives evidence of great nerve at the beginning, and industry and energy sustained by unusually good judgment in the investment of his profits. Mr. Gaines was married in 1867 to Miss Emily, daughter of Lawrence and Lucy (Teasley) Adams. He was a native and well-to-do farmer of Elbert county, where he died. Early in 1868 Mrs. Gaines died, leaving one child, Lawrence. Late in that year he married Miss Ducilla Adams—born in Elbert county in 1844—by whom he had seven children: Frank, Lucy, John, Diodema, Francis J., Ducilla, and Mollie. The mother of these died in 1887; and in 1888 he contracted a third marriage with Miss Kate—born in LaGrange, Ga., in 1862—daughter of Dr. Sydney and Elizabeth (Tatum) Little. Dr. Little was born in Putnam county and located and practiced medicine in Troup county, Ga., many years, and died in LaGrange. By this last marriage Mr. Gaines has had four children born to him: Marion L., Christine, Sydney D., and Seth M. Mr. Gaines is a member of the masonic fraternity.

T. J. LINDER, merchant, Hartwell, Hart county, son of John and Louisa (Bonner) Linder, was born in Spartanburg district, S. C., in 1844. His paternal grandparents were Lee and Mary (Templeton) Linder. He was of German extraction and born in Virginia; was a farmer, and early in life came to South Carolina, where he profitably followed his vocation. Mr. Linder's father was born in South Carolina, was a merchant, came to Georgia in 1851 and continued his mercantile business, conducting in addition extensive farming interests and acquiring a large estate. He served as a lieutenant in the Confederate army during the late "unpleasantness," and died in 1889. His mother was a daughter of Bryant Bonner, a native of Virginia, who came to South Carolina and settled in Spartanburg, where he prosperously followed farming until he died. Mr. Linder was seven years old when his father came to Georgia, and had the good fortune to receive a very good education. In 1863 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. Trenholm (a son of the secretary of the treasury of the Confederate states), Seventh South Carolina cavalry. His command participated very actively and serviceably in the campaigns generally, and among other important battles was in those of Cold Harbor, Malvern Hill, Darbytown, etc. He remained in the service until surrendered at Appomattox. For two years immediately succeeding the war he engaged in farming; after that, in 1867, he embarked in the mercantile business, and has continued in it since, part of the time with his brother. He still, however, gives careful attention to extensive farming interests, besides looking after valuable town property. Wide-awake, financially strong and perfectly reliable, he is popular, and occupies an enviable high social position, and exercises a wide and salutary influence. Mr. Linder was married in 1872 to Miss Susan, born in North Carolina in 1854, daughter of John and Mary (Woodson) Peck, natives of North Carolina, who came to Georgia in 1864. Eight of the children born to them are now living: Arthur, Emmett, Emma, Clarence, Ethel, Lee, Thomas J. and Louise. Mrs. Linder is an active and valued member of the Methodist church.

J. H. M'MULLAN, minister of the gospel, Hartwell, Hart Co., Ga., son of St. Clair and Clarissa (Richardson) McMullan, was born in Elbert county, Ga., November, 1824. His paternal grandparents were John and Elizabeth (Beasley) McMullan. He was born in Ireland, emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia before the revolutionary war, during which he served in the patriot army. Subsequently he removed to Georgia and settled in Elbert county, where he died at a ripe old age. Mr. McMullan's father was born in Elbert county, Ga., on the plantation and became a successful planter. He died in Hart county at the advanced age of eighty-five years. His mother was a daughter of Amos and Susan (Smith) Richardson, for whose sketch see that of M. M. Richardson in these Memoirs. Mr. McMullan was raised on the farm, and his educational advantages were exceedingly limited. He studied grammar and other branches whilst at work, and finally when he was twenty-one years old received four months' schooling. He began preaching at his home church in 1858 and has been engaged in the ministry ever since, preaching as pastor in Hart, Elbert and Franklin counties and Anderson county, S. C. His labors have covered quite an area of territory, and have been very arduous and long-continued, and during the period he has been an earnest worker and instrumental in establishing and building up many churches. It is said he has planned and built more churches than any man in Georgia. Mr. McMullan is a good business man. Commencing after the war with but little, he has prospered and has accumulated quite a nice property; in this he is largely indebted to the untiring industry and executive ability of his devoted wife, who has ever been his constant support and inspiration in his ministerial labors. Mr. McMullan is still actively engaged in preaching the gospel, and is doing the best work of his life. He was married in 1852 to Miss Martha V. Lofin, of Lincoln county, Ga., daughter of George and Elizabeth (Hawes) Lofin. Their only two children, Peyton S. and Emma H., now Mrs. R. S. Hill, are both living. The father, wife and children are all faithful workers in the Baptist church.

THOMAS L. M'MULLAN, farmer, Hartwell, Hart Co., Ga., son of John and Joyce (McMullan) McMullan, was born in Elbert county in 1842. His grandparents on his father's side were Thomas and Sallie (Gaines) McMullan, who were of Irish descent, born in Virginia, and migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county about the beginning of this century. He was a farmer and followed that calling until he died, which event occurred in Hart county, formerly a part of Elbert. Mr. McMullan's father was born in Elbert county, where he was raised a farmer, and followed farming all his life. Later he moved to Hart county, where he died. On his mother's side his grandparents were Louis and Frances (Stowers) McMullan, native Virginians. His paternal and maternal grandfathers were brothers. Mr. McMullan grew to manhood on the family homestead, with meager educational advantages. In 1862 he enlisted in Company A, Ninth Georgia battalion, which subsequently became a part of the Thirty-seventh Georgia regiment, and his company was commanded by Capt. J. G. McMullan. He was wounded at the battle of Murfreesboro and was sent to the hospital, and after remaining there ten days returned home. Resuming his farming he has devoted his entire time and attention to it with satisfactory success, and now owns about 1,100 acres of land, including one of the best farms in the county. He is one of Hart county's solidest and most highly respected citizens. Mr. McMullan was married in 1864 to Miss Catharine, born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1844, daughter of P. and Ann (Rumsey) Crow, of families who were early settlers in northeast Georgia. He was a soldier during the late civil war. Of the children born to them three are living: Etta, Lula and William B. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Baptist church.

A. J. M'MULLAN, farmer, Hartwell, Hart Co., Ga., son of St. Clair and Clarissa (Richardson) McMullan, was born in Elbert (now Hart) county in 1848. His paternal grandparents were John and Elizabeth (Beasley) McMullan. (For sketch of his grandfather see that of J. H. McMullan in these Memoirs.) Mr. McMullan's father was born in Elbert county, was a prosperous farmer and died in 1886. His maternal grandparents were Amos and Susan (Smith) Richardson. (For sketch of Amos Richardson see that of M. M. Richardson in these Memoirs.) Mr. McMullan's boyhood and youth were passed during the memorable "unpleasantness." He was in the service about six months, most of the time in the ditches around Atlanta. In 1870 he entered the university of Georgia, from which he graduated in 1873. He has since devoted all his time and attention to agricultural pursuits with a success which has demonstrated his superior business management and financial ability. Besides about 1,000 acres of land of his own he manages about 2,400 acres for Dr. Turner, his father-in-law. In addition he owns and operates a mill and ginnery on Cedar creek. Besides the above he owns a stock farm on Savannah river and is recognized as one of the best farmers in the county. He is one of the directors of the Hartwell cotton mills, and is interested in the Hartwell bank. In almost every respect he is in the front rank in social life, as a progressive farmer and as a safe, shrewd business manager and financier. Mr. McMullan was happily married in 1878 to Miss Sallie, born in Hart county in 1853, daughter of Dr. J. L. and Mary (Jones) Turner. Dr. Turner was born in Lincoln county, Ga., and is a retired physician. He was graduated from the university of Georgia in the same class with T. R. R. Cobb, Benjamin Hill, Linton Stephens, and other subsequently distinguished Georgians. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. McMullan these survive: Lucius, Susie, Joel and Louise. Himself and wife are active and valued members of the Baptist church.

JEPHTHA W. NORMAN, farmer, Cold Water, Hart Co., Ga., son of Wm. and Mary (Waller) Norman, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1822. His grandparents on his father's side were John and Nancy (Austin) Norman. He was a native of Virginia, migrated to Georgia in 1797 and settled in Wilkes county, where he farmed until his death. Mr. Norman's father was born in Virginia, and when his father came to Georgia was about three years old. He grew to manhood on the farm, and followed farming all his life. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, and died in 1839. His grandparents on his mother's side were Nimrod and Martha (Beard) Waller. He was born in Virginia, was a farmer, and when he came to Georgia settled in Wilkes county. Mr. Norman was reared a farmer and received very little schooling. He followed farming as a main pursuit, but in connection with it conducted a general merchandise store. At the close of the war he had 333 acres of land, to which he has gradually added until he now has 2,200 acres of as good land as is in the county, besides much other valuable property, after giving each of his children $2,000. He has neither desired nor held any public office, and has given his entire time and labor to his farm and his store, and is perfectly satisfied with the results. He has seen his children well provided for, has performed his duties to church and state, and possesses the esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Norman was married in 1842 to Miss Sarah, born in Elbert county in 1824, daughter of Elijah B. and Jane (Hill) Norman. He was born in Wilkes county, and was a well-to-do farmer. Of the children which blessed this union six survive: W. B., Henrietta Bond, A. B., George P., Laura A. and Fannie Thornton. Mrs. Norman, who was a devoted member of the Methodist church, died in 1888. Mr. Norman is also a member of the Methodist church, and is calmly awaiting the summons which shall call him to a reunion with his departed companion.

A. H. PARKS, farmer, Montevideo, Hart Co., Ga., son of Marshall and Mary (Mewborn) Parks, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1835. The family is of English extraction, his paternal grandfather having emigrated from England and settled in Virginia long enough before the revolutionary war to serve in the patriot army. His grandparents were Abraham and Nancy (Self) Parks, born in Virginia, whence about the beginning of this century they migrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county, where he became a prominent planter. Mr. Parks' father was born in Elbert county, was reared on the plantation, followed farming and also worked as a mechanic. He was sheriff of Elbert county many years, and late in life moved to Floyd county, and died in 1846. His mother was a daughter of Archie and Fathia (Shepard) Mewborn. Her father, born in England, emigrated to Georgia and settled in Elbert county, and engaged in farming as long as he lived. Mr. Parks was reared on the farm; the limited education he received was obtained at the neighboring country schools, and when grown he engaged in farming. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Capt. Thornton, Thirty-eighth Georgia regiment. He participated in the following among other important battles: Horseshoe Bend, Brandy Station, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg (where he was wounded), Wilderness, etc. He remained in the army until the surrender, after which, with twenty-five cents, good health and a resolute spirit as his capital, he started to make a competency, if not acquire wealth. He has so far succeeded as to be the owner now of 1,300 acres of good land and a saw-mill and ginnery, and as his plantation is on the Savannah river he is also proprietor of Parks ferry. As might be presumed in regard to one who accomplished such results, he rates high as a progressive and substantial citizen. Mr. Parks was married in 1867 to Miss Sarah C., born in Elbert county in 1831, daughter of John and Nancy (Gore) McCurry. He was a native of Georgia and a farmer, was a justice of the peace several years, and also for a time sheriff of the county. He died in Hart county. Mrs. Parks, who was a devoted member of the Baptist church, died in 1889. Mr. Parks himself is a very prominent member of the Baptist church.

WILLIAM VICKERY, farmer, Hartwell, Hart Co., Ga., son of James and Mary (Sanders) Vickery, was born in Elbert (now Hart) county in 1822. His paternal grandparents were Aaron and Millie (Dodson) Vickery. He was a native of Virginia and came to Georgia when a young man and settled in Elbert county. Mr. Vickery's father was born in Elbert county, where he lived all his life. Farming was his life pursuit and he gave all his time and attention to make a success of it. He took time, however, to serve as a volunteer soldier in the last war with Great Britain. His mother was a daughter of Elias and Mary (Carter) Sanders, native Georgians. Mr. Vickery was reared on the farm, and was educated at the near-by dirt-floor log school houses. He started in life a poor boy, but by dint of hard work, economy and good management he has become rich and owns about 2,000 acres of good land, including a well-tilled productive farm. He was a justice of the peace twenty years, the only public office he ever held. He stands very high and is much esteemed by his neighbors. Mr.

Vickery was married in 1845 to Miss Susan, born in South Carolina in 1828, daughter of James and Iva (Rush) Stapler. He was born in Edgefield district, S. C., was a large and successful farmer, served as a volunteer in the Seminole war and came to Georgia about 1840 and settled in Elbert county, where he died. Eight of the children born to them are living: James, Philip, Mary A., John, Thomas, Andy, Laura and Martha. The mother of these, an exemplary member of the Baptist church, died in 1895. Mr. Vickery himself is an influential and revered member of the Baptist church.

HEARD COUNTY.

ANDREW B. BROWN, farmer, Corinth, Heard Co., Ga., son of Christopher and Nancy (Fannin) Brown, was born on the farm near where he now lives, in 1837. His father was a native of South Carolina and came to Georgia with his parents in 1806, who stopped a while in the lower part of the state and then moved to Walton county. Later they settled in Morgan county, Ga. In 1826 Mr. Brown's father moved to Troup county and settled on land afterward included in Heard county. He was the first permanent white settler in what is now Heard county, and settled in the virgin forest, in which Indians roamed and hunted the game with which the forest abounded. Having been elected a justice of the inferior court of Troup county, his father was transferred in his official capacity to the new county of Heard when organized in 1830, and was thus the first justice of the inferior court of the county, and the first official in it who administered an oath. He acquired quite a fortune, and after a life of usefulness died in 1880. His mother was born in 1807, and was a daughter of William and Nancy Fanin, an old South Carolina family. Mr. Brown was born and reared, and now owns and lives on, the first farm cleared in Heard county, and what education he has was obtained in the never-to-be-forgotten dirt-floor log school house with its split-log seats, stick-and-mud chimney and holes sawed through the logs to let light in. In 1862 he enlisted in Company G, Seventh Georgia regiment, but unusual exposure superinduced rheumatism, which rendered him unfit for service, and he was sent home. Resuming planting he has devoted himself to it all his life, and has now one of the largest and best-appointed and best-improved plantations in the county. Plantation life and the domestic enjoyments of a delightful home, where he dispenses a generous hospitality, have so fully satisfied his ambition that he has cared nothing for public office. Mr. Brown was married Sept. 9, 1869, to Miss Katharine, daughter of George and Nancy (Maddox) Snow, of old and highly respected Virginia families. This union has been blessed with two children: Christopher Frederick and Nannie K.

JAMES B. DAVIS, farmer, Enon Grove, Heard Co., Ga., son of George B. and Mary (Davis) Davis, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1830. His father was born in Virginia about 1796, and was left an orphan at a very early age. He was adopted and reared by William Beetles, who gave him a fairly good common school education. While he was in young boyhood Mr. Beetles migrated to Georgia, making the trip in ox-carts and on foot. He studied and improved upon his primary education so far as to become a teacher. He served gallantly as a soldier in the war of 1812. Later in life he was ordained a minister in the Baptist church and officiated as such until his death, which occurred in 1878. His mother, daughter of James and Judy (Grissum) Davis, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1798, received a good common school education, married in 1818, and lived to a good old age. Mr. Davis was reared on the farm, received a good education for the locality and period and when twenty years of age moved with his parents to Heard county, where he has made his home since. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, which was part of a regiment commanded by Col. Wilcoxon, of the reserve or home guard service. He was soon afterward commissioned first lieutenant and continued as such until mustered out after the surrender. After the war he resumed his farming, to which he has devoted his entire time and attention in an energetic effort to rebuild a fortune shattered as a result of the war. Being fully abreast of the times, and a thoroughly practical farmer, he believes in diversified and self-sustaining agriculture, and has successfully carried out his theories. He stands high with his neighbors as a farmer and citizen, and has been content with their esteem and the success which has attended his well-directed energies. In 1856 he was elected a justice of the peace and held the office twenty-four years consecutively—the only public office he ever held. Mr. Davis was married in 1854 to Miss Corinthia, daughter of Thomas B. and Lucy (Cosby) Wilkinson, who has borne him two children: Thomas B. and Mary L.

CHARLES W. HEARN, farmer, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of John and Nancy (Lynch) Hearn, was born in Hancock county, Ga., in 1808. His father was born in Richmond county, Va., in 1767, raised a farmer and educated at the common schools. He was a home guard the latter part of the revolutionary war. In 1807 he migrated to Georgia with his family and settled in Hancock county, making the journey in ox-carts. Mr. Hearn was reared on the farm and educated at the common schools of the county. While in his boyhood his father moved to Putnam county. In 1832 Mr. Hearn moved to Troup county. In 1853 he was elected justice of the peace, was re-elected and held the office for many years. He enlisted as a member of the reserve or home guard in 1862, was elected first lieutenant, assigned to Col. William Carter's regiment and remained with his command until the fall of Richmond. He returned to his farm after that event, where he farmed until 1867, when he removed to his present place in Heard county. He has a fine body of land, and a large farm under excellent cultivation. Although eighty-six years of age he is in robust health, well-preserved and very active for his age. Mr. Hearn was married in 1829 to Miss Nancy Wheeler, who was an orphan and who died in 1851. Two years afterward he contracted a second marriage with Mrs. Mary (nee McKinney) Sattiewhite, who has borne him one child, a son, Romaldus. She was a daughter of Eli and Sarah McKinney, born in Jones county, Ga., in 1819, and in 1835 was married to Smith Sattiewhite. He volunteered as a soldier in the Florida war and died in 1842. Mr. and Mrs. Hearn are active and much beloved, venerated members of the Baptist church, and are held in the highest esteem by the entire community. Romaldus Hearn, only child of Charles W. and Mary Hearn, was born in Troup county in 1854, where he was reared on the farm and received only such education as could be obtained during the vacations of hard farm work—winter—and after "laying-by" time. He was married in 1874 to Miss Ada, daughter of Joseph and Prudie (Thomas) Carter. To them five children have been born: E. Watson, Prudence M., Lola, deceased, Pauline and Annie. Mr. Hearn has a fine farm and a comfortable home, surrounded by an intelligent and interesting family, with no harassing cares, and with an abundance of this world's goods, enjoying peace, plenty and prosperity.

ALFORD G. HENDRICK, farmer, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of James A. and Martha (Crosby) Hendrick, was born in Heard county July 24, 1855. He grew to manhood on the farm and was educated at the near-by country schools, and the academy in Franklin. At the age of nineteen he engaged in mercantile business and continued in it four years. At that time he was married to Miss Josie L., daughter of Jephtha H. and Emily B. (Heflin) Daniel. Since his marriage he has been engaged in farming and stock-raising, in which his success has been equal to his most sanguine expectations. He is fully abreast of the movements of the times, and to the development of the county's resources. He also takes a very active interest in politics. Mr. and Mrs. Hendrick have had six children born to them: Mary H., Hugh H., Emma S., Josie L., Ruth, and Grace.

MRS. MARTHA S. (CROSBY) HENDRICK, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., daughter of John and Martha S. (Killebro) Crosby, and widow of James A. Hendrick, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1833. Her father was of Virginia parentage and born in 1798. In 1840—his conveyance being an ox-cart—he moved to Heard county, settled in the woods and lived under tents until log cabins could be built. She was left motherless at the age of five years; and when a child of eleven years did all the housework of her father's family, and besides, spun and wove, and made all her father's clothing. Under such circumstances it may be readily realized that her educational advantages and opportunities were of the most limited character; irregular intervals during two years at the common schools. However, by judicious reading and careful home study she managed to improve her education and acquire a large fund of general information, which, in after life, proved of inestimable value to her. In 1852 she was united in marriage to James A. Hendrick. He was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1823, son of Hugh and Allie (Huey) Hendrick, who were born in Virginia of old Virginia families. He, too, was left an orphan when small—only seven years of age—and his education was limited to only nine months in the common country schools. He began work for himself at a very early age, developing remarkable trading and money-making qualities. His companion proved to be a helpmeet indeed, so that by their united efforts quite a fortune was accumulated. He died in 18—, leaving his widow and four children: Mary F., widow of Frank C. Lumpkin, John C., William A., and Alford G.

JOHN DICKERSON HIGHTOWER, farmer, Rockdale, Heard Co., Ga., son of Henry R. and Tempie (Ray) Hightower, was born in what is now Campbell county, Ga., in 1825. His father was born in Pennsylvania, and about the year 1800 migrated thence to Georgia and settled in Oglethorpe county. His conveyance was an old-time ox-cart with wooden wheels, the frame being put together with wooden pins and hickory withes. He cleared a farm and commenced farming, but after some years moved to what is now Campbell county and engaged in farming until his death, which occurred in 1857. Mr. Hightower was raised on the farm, on which he worked, and attended school at a little log school house until nearing maturity, since when many years of his life have been interestingly eventful. At the age of nineteen he ran away from home to join an expedition against Mexico, and enlisted in Company C, Capt. W. T. Wofford, in Calhoun's cavalry battalion. He did scout duty during the entire war, and went as far south as the peninsula of Yucatan, where he was wounded in the thigh by a lance in the hands of a Mexican. In 1848 he returned to his home in Campbell county, but did not stay long. The next year he joined a company of gold hunters, started for California and shipped from Mobile to go via Cape Horn. After a long and rough and tedious voyage he reached the alleged land of promise, only to meet with sad disappointment. After spending months in a fruitless search for the precious metal he found himself impoverished, and decided to return home. A sympathizing friend loaned him the money for the purpose, and the early fifties found him at the plow handles on the old homestead. In 1852 he moved to Heard county, where he continued farming with satisfactory success. When the civil war was precipitated in 1861 he enlisted in Company K, Forty-first Georgia regiment, participating in its engagements. At Perryville, Ky., he received a wound which disabled him temporarily, and he was sent home. At the end of six months he returned to his command, and at the battle of Baker's creek was again wounded, but continued in the field. After the surrender he returned, penniless and homeless, to Heard county. He went to work as a farm hand, worked and lived hard until he got a start, when he bought a piece of land and went to farming on his own account. Working hard, and early and late, and living frugally, he has placed himself in easy circumstances. He owns a good farm, has all that he craves in the matter of a good home with plenty, and a comfortable bank account. No citizen of the county stands higher. Mr. Hightower was married soon after his return from California to Miss Roanisa, daughter of Joshua and Polly (Wallace) Teal, who has borne him six children, only two of whom—Isom J. and Benjamin F.—are living.

R. HOUSAN JACKSON, planter and preacher, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of Isaac and Elizabeth (Perkins) Jackson, was born at White Plains, Greene Co., Ga., in 1834. His paternal great-grandfather, Isaac Jackson, was a native of Ireland, came to Georgia soon after Gen. Oglethorpe planted the colony, served with distinction as a major in the patriot army during the revolutionary war under the immediate command of Washington. For meritorious service congress voted him a grant of 1,200 acres of land in Hancock county, Ga., on which he was buried when he died in 1790. Two children survived him, Henry, and Pollie (Jackson) Mapp. Henry—who was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch—was born in 1760, was a large and successful planter, and distinguished himself as a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. About 1780 he married Miss Sallie Mapp, and to them thirteen children were born. Mr. Jackson's father, Isaac, was one of these, and was born in 1785. He was raised on the plantation, educated at the schools at White Plains, and when he arrived at majority began life as a planter. About 1817 he married his wife—daughter of Jesse and Polly (Ingram) Perkins, old North Carolina families, of English and Welsh descent. They soon afterward moved to White Plains, where his wife died in 1840 and he five years later. Mr. Jackson was educated at Dawson institute, White Plains, where the brilliancy and versatility of his intellectual endowments gained for him honorable distinction. After finishing his education he began life as a planter, and planting has been the principal pursuit of his life. He read law about this time, but did not seek admittance to the bar as other important duties called him to other fields. In 1856 he moved to Heard county, which has since been his home, and where he has become and is generally recognized as a leading and one of the most progressive and influential planters in the county. Two years later he was elected a justice of the inferior court and filled the office for ten consecutive years. In 1861 he was elected, without opposition, to represent Heard county in the general assembly, and was continued, by re-election, until 1865. In 1886 he was elected to represent his senatorial district in the same body, and in 1890 was called upon to again represent Heard county. During his several terms in the senate and house he was conspicuous for his great and earnest working capacity, and his able and influential support of various wise and economic bills which he was largely instrumental in having enacted into laws. His activity and tirelessness in behalf of the interests of his immediate constituents made him a marked character of each legislative body. In 1887 he organized the farmers' alliance in Georgia, and was made its first president. In this great and important work he demonstrated his extraordinary capacity as a leader and organizer. In six months, as the result of his activity and energy, the order had a membership of 80,000 in the state and began to wield a potent influence. In 1889 he was associated with the Atlanta "Journal" as a special correspondent. In 1852 Mr. Jackson united himself with the Baptist church at White Plains, under the preaching of that eminent divine, Rev. Prof. S. G. Hillyer. Ten years later—at the age of twenty-six—he was ordained a minister of the Baptist church, since which time he has been an active and ardent laborer in the vineyard of the Master. Few preachers have done more arduous and continuous work, notwithstanding the hard and valuable work he has done in other fields. At one time he supplied four pulpits while superintending the cultivation of four farms; and for fifteen years has been moderator of the Western Baptist association. Mr. Jackson was married in 1857 to Miss Marie, daughter of Hugh and Elizabeth (Brown) Hall, a union which has been blessed with eight children: Phemonia, Elizabeth, Isaac, P. H. Mell, Anna Z., Henrietta, Sabe, and Ruby. He is an enthusiastic and highly esteemed member of the masonic fraternity. In his ministerial and other public work he has been extraordinarily active and influential for good; in private he is courteous and affable, representing the open-handed hospitality of the old-time southern gentleman; added to which are the charms of the literary attainments of great natural intellectuality.

JOHN H. LANE, farmer, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of Collingsworth and Elizabeth (Dunlap) Lane, was born in Heard county in 1844. His paternal grandfather, Henry Lane, was a prominent Methodist preacher, who came to Georgia the latter part of the last century, and settled in what is now Coweta, and from there to what is now Heard county, and finally went to Alabama. Mr. Lane's father was born in what is now Coweta county in 1819, was reared a farmer, and was given such education as could be obtained at the country schools of the locality and time. He served as a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war, after which he returned to the farm, where he spent the remainder of his life, which ended in 1874. His mother was born in 1822, and was the daughter of David Dunlap, a native of South Carolina who came to Georgia in the first quarter of the present century. Mr. Lane was reared on the farm, and was educated at the common schools of the county. In 1862 he enlisted in Company K, Capt. Spearman, Fiftieth Georgia regiment. He was in many important battles: Baker's Creek, siege of Vicksburg—where he was captured, but soon exchanged and sent to the front—at Missionary Ridge, the defense of Atlanta, Nashville, etc. While defending Atlanta he was wounded by a spent ball, but not seriously, and remained on duty until the surrender. Resuming his farming as soon as the war was over, he has industriously pursued it since, with results meeting his most sanguine expectations. Upright and honorable, thrifty and prosperous, he has the confidence and esteem of all who know him. Mr. Lane was married in 1874 to Miss Piety, daughter of John and Dovie (Plaster) Daniel, by whom he has had seven children, of whom four are living: Mrs. Lizzie Hubbard, Dovie, Mary E. and Brewer. For more than a quarter of a century he has been an active member of the Methodist church.

MRS. MARY F. LUMPKIN, farmer and hotel-keeper, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., widow of the late Frank C. Lumpkin, and daughter of James A. and Martha (Crosby) Hendrick, was born in Heard county, Jan. 5, 1852. She had good educational advantages, having attended the schools at Franklin and the college at Newnan, Coweta Co., Ga. She was married Jan. 29, 1868, to Frank C. Lumpkin, son of Richard and Frances (Crosby) Lumpkin, who was born in Chambers county, Ala, in 1843. He was reared on the farm and educated at the common schools of the county. In 1861, aged eighteen, he enlisted in Company G, Thirty-seventh Alabama regiment, and remained with the army throughout the war without a furlough. During his service he participated in some of the most hotly contested and bloodiest battles of the war, and passed through some of the most trying campaigns. At the siege of Vicksburg he was captured but soon exchanged. After the surrender he came to Heard county and engaged in farming, and followed it many years with remarkable success. In 1891 he moved to Franklin and embarked in the hotel business, in which he prospered. On Feb. 23, 1894, he was murdered in cold blood without any known cause. To this union four children were born, three living: Minnie, wife of a Mr. Shackelford; John C., and Lillian Renoe. Since the death of her husband Mrs. Lumpkin, with the assistance of her son, has successfully conducted the hotel and the large farm. Her excellent management has made her hostelry one of the most popular in that part of the state.

WILLIAM H. MELSON, farmer, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of Abelton and Penelope (Sims) Melson, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1829. His paternal grandparents, Daniel and Mary (Grace) Melson, migrated from Maryland to Georgia, coming all the way in ox-carts, the latter part of the last century, and settled in Hancock county. He served with some distinction as a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Melson's father was born in Hancock county in 1801, reared a farmer and given the education obtainable in the rural districts at that time. In 1828 he moved to what is now Heard county, and when the new county was organized in 1830 assisted in the work of organization. He was a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war, after which he devoted all his time and attention to his farming interests. He died in 1872. Mr. Melson grew to manhood on the farm, and obtained his education at the historic old log school house, where so many of Georgia's distinguished men acquired the rudiments of an English education. Reaching manhood he began the life of a farmer, which has been his life pursuit, in which he has abundantly prospered. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E, Capt. J. D. Sims, which was assigned to the command of Gen. John H. Morgan. After his discharge in 1863 he enlisted in the state service and served two terms of six months each. At the close of the war he returned to his farm a few miles east of Franklin, and has since been satisfied with the quiet enjoyments of farm life and a comfortable home. In 1870 he was elected justice of the peace, and held the office by successive re-elections for more than twenty years. Mr. Melson was married in 1853 to Miss Martha, daughter of Thomas and Nancy (Maine) Holland, and to them four children have been born: Louisa, Mrs. Pendergess; Nancy, Mrs. Ware; Carrie, and John Holland.

JOHN I. MILLER, merchant-capitalist, Corinth, Heard Co., Ga., son of Joseph T. and Mary T. (Moreland) Miller, was born in Heard county, Ga., in 1852. His paternal grandfather, John Miller, was a native of Ireland, emigrated to this country just before the beginning of this century, and settled in Jones county, Ga. Mr. Miller's father was born in Jones county in 1814, where he was reared on the farm and educated at the common schools of the country. In 1837 he moved to

Heard county, transporting all his household goods on a wagon, behind which his farm stock was driven. He bought land in the virgin forest, cleared a farm and cultivated it with exceptional success until 1860, when he died. Mr. Miller's mother was a daughter of Isaac and Penelope (Ousley) Moreland, a prominent family of Jones county, and died in 1864. Mr. Miller, it will be observed, had the misfortune to lose his father when only eight years old and his mother when twelve years old. After the death of his mother he went to live with his aunt, Mrs. Annie Johnson, in Jasper county, where he remained two years. While on the home farm he attended school at Corinth, and while with his aunt he attended school at Holly Springs, Jasper county, walking four miles. Since reaching manhood planting has been his chief business, and he owns and manages a very large plantation which includes some of the most productive land in Heard county, cultivated by improved implements and by improved methods. In addition to his extensive planting interests he has engaged in merchandising, milling, general trading and cotton brokerage, all of which he conducted with unflagging energy and consummate skill. In all his transactions he has displayed remarkable business sagacity and financial ability, and made a complete success of the many and varied enterprises he has undertaken. He is one of the solid, substantial citizens of the county and of unquestioned integrity. His interesting family occupy one of the most delightful homes in Corinth. Socially and financially he ranks among the foremost of Heard county's citizens. Mr. Miller was married in 1870 to Miss Ambrosia, daughter of Henry and Mary Pitman, who bore him two children, and died May 2, 1872. One of the children died, but the other, Norman C., is living. The ensuing year he contracted a second marriage with Miss Sallie F., daughter of Christopher and Nancy (Fleming) Brown, by whom he has had nine children: Nancy F., Mary E., Fannie R., Annie P., John I., Jr., Ida E., Harvey A., Mattie M. and Thomas I. He has been an ardent and active member of the Methodist church since he was seventeen years old.

WESLEY SPEARMAN, farmer, Corinth, Heard Co., Ga., son of Edmond and Martha (Cook) Spearman, was born in Heard county in 1833, and died at his home near the place of his birth July 4, 1895. His paternal grandfather, John Spearman, was a native of Maryland, whence he migrated in the latter part of the last century to South Carolina. Not many years afterward he moved to Georgia and settled in Wilkes county, and thence to Jasper county, where he died. Mr. Spearman's father was born in Wilkes county in 1806, worked on the farm, and was educated at the country schools in Wilkes and Jasper counties. In 1830, with his three brothers, he came to Heard county, bought land and cleared a farm in the woods. The next year he married his wife, who was a daughter of John and Mary (Heard) Cook. Mr. Spearman grew to manhood on the farm, and was educated at the schools common to the locality and period. In 1861 he enlisted in Company D, Fourth Georgia regiment, and served until the surrender of Atlanta. When the war closed he found himself impoverished by the destruction of his property; but he set to work to retrieve his losses and rehabilitate himself, in which he was eminently successful. At his death he left a large and well improved farm in the best portion of Heard county, and an excellent home in Corinth, where in his last years he enjoyed all the comforts of life that could be desired, and the good will and esteem of his fellow-citizens. In 1861 he was elected justice of the peace and held the office uninterruptedly for twenty-nine years. In 1880 he was elected to represent Heard county in the general assembly, and he was a member of the county board of education for many years. In all the public positions he held, the discharge of their duties was characterized by promptness, fidelity and conscientious regard for the public good. Mr. Spearman married Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Christopher and Frances (Fannin) Brown, by whom he had two children: Edmond C., and Ruth, wife of Dr. J. B. Sanders. Mr. Spearman was a devoted and exemplary member of the Methodist church for half a century.

HUMPHREY A. TOMPKINS, farmer, Franklin, Heard Co., son of Nicholas and Lucinda T. (Springer) Tompkins, was born in Heard county March 9, 1851. His paternal grandfather, Giles Tompkins, was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and migrated from Virginia to Georgia, and settled in Oglethorpe county the latter part of the last century. Mr. Tompkins' father was born in Oglethorpe county in 1798, received such education as could be obtained at the country schools of the locality at the time, and when grown, entered upon farming as a life pursuit. Later, he moved to Putnam county, Ga., and thence to Troup county about 1830, and settled on land now within the bounds of Heard county. He served during the Seminole war, holding a commission as major. He also served as a soldier in the war with Mexico. At the close of that war he returned to his farm. Such were his skill as a planter and his business sagacity and management that he became the owner of 175 slaves and the largest land-owner in Heard county. He died Aug. 12, 1860. He was married twice; his second wife being the mother of the subject of this sketch. She was a daughter of William G. and Mary (Baxter) Springer. Mr. Springer was for many years an Indian agent. By this marriage he had five children: William G., John T., Humphrey A., Benjamin Hill, and Eliza Baxter. Mr. Tompkins was raised on the family plantation, and received as good an education as was obtainable, considering the locality, and the fact that his boyhood was passed during "war times." When only fourteen years old he assumed control of his father's extensive plantation, which had suffered immensely from the ravages of war, and entered upon the management of the property. With wonderfully good judgment, a perseverance and a spirit of determination, that quailed not at any obstacle, he succeeded in preserving intact and rehabilitating the large and valuable estate, which to-day stands as a monument to his unwearying industry and tireless energy. Notwithstanding the apparently stern and inflexible will needed to accomplish such results, he is one of the most genial and whole-souled gentlemen to be found in any community. In 1890 he was elected treasurer over an opponent, who had held the office fourteen years, and was regarded as invincible, which speaks volumes for the estimation in which he is held, and the good will entertained toward him by his fellow-citizens. Mr. Tompkins was happily married in 1882 to Miss Viola L., daughter of Matthew and Lousiana (Yates) Monk—a union which has been blessed with four children: John S., Effie Lou, Eliza Baxter, and Florence C. He is an ardent member of the masonic fraternity, and a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church.

BENJAMIN HILL TOMPKINS, planter, Franklin, Heard Co., Ga., son of Nicholas and Lucinda T. (Springer) Tompkins, was born on the plantation on which he now lives, in 1860. (For sketch of his parents, see that of his brother, Humphrey A. Tompkins, elsewhere in this work.) Mr. Tompkins was left fatherless when an infant, was raised on the family homestead, and educated at the common schools of the county. His surroundings compelled him, while very young, to assume the duties and responsibilities of mature manhood. But following the example, and inspired by the spirit and courage of his brother Humphrey, he set manfully to work to solve the great problem of life and success. He, like his brother, determined to know no such word as fail—and like him, he has worked out a splendid success. He owns several thousand acres of fine land, including the original family homestead, improved by his father more than sixty years ago—of which he is justly proud—and is otherwise supplied with an abundance of the good things of this life—and is, therefore, happily situated. Mr. Tompkins was married Sept. 1, 1880, to Miss Montie, daughter of Joseph and Mary (Pendergrass) Holliday. To them the following children have been born: Nicholas, Joseph B., John, Berd Berry, Mary Baxter, and Levi Ridley.

JAMES B. WARE, farmer, Corinth, Heard Co., Ga., son of John M. and Lucy (Sturdivant) Ware, was born on the plantation on which he now lives in Heard county (then just organized) in 1830. His paternal grandfather, Henry Ware, was born in Maryland in 1756—his parents having been among the early English settlers of that state. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, at the close of which, Dec. 14, 1783, he married Miss Winnie Mims, and soon afterward migrated to South Carolina, where he died Nov. 21, 1807. His widow died Sept. 14, 1812. Mr. Ware's father was born in Edgefield district, S. C., in 1788, grew to manhood on the farm, and was educated at the near-by country schools. While yet a young man he migrated to Georgia, and began farming in Lincoln county. In 1827 he moved to Pike, and the next year to Troup, and later to Coweta county, Ga., where he died Aug. 18, 1838. May 11, 1811, he married his wife, who was an orphan girl living with her uncle, Lockhart, of Lincoln county. She died Oct. 22, 1869. Mr. Ware was raised a farmer on the plantation, and received his primary education at a little log school-house, still standing, a few miles from the old homestead. He began life on the plantation of his father, and has prospered in his labors. His natural capacity and superior abilities as a man of affairs being quickly recognized by his fellow-citizens, he was elected a justice of the peace in 1852, and held the office seven years. In 1859 he was elected to represent Heard county in the general assembly. In 1874 he was again elected, and on each occasion represented his constituency with fidelity, and usefully. He was also elected a justice of the inferior court, and rendered efficient service to the county in that capacity for eleven years. In 1887 he organized the Corinth Agricultural Club and Fair association, of which he was then elected, and has continued to be, president, in which capacity he has done quite as much, if not more, than any other citizen to improve and advance the agricultural interests of the county. In 1863 he raised a company of seventy men—of which he was elected captain—which became Company G, of Col. Wilcoxon's regiment of state troops. In 1864 he enlisted in the Confederate service, in which he continued, rendering valuable service until the surrender. During the "unpleasantness" he gave up his business and devoted money, time and labor to caring for the families of the soldiers, a noble service on his part which they have never forgotten, and for which they have ever been ready to express their gratitude. It was the soldiers in the field, who, though in Virginia, were allowed to vote, first elected him justice of the inferior court. He has been much before the public and much in public life, and has always been found working for the best interests of the people. As a planter, he has been eminently successful, and a sort of leader by general consent. His well-arranged and well-cultivated fields bear ample testimony to his intelligent supervision and skill. He is progressive or nothing, and exercises a wholesome influence among his farmer-friends. Mr. Ware was married Oct. 11, 1849, to Miss Sarah M., daughter of John and Comfort (Grace) Sims. Of the children, which blessed this union, the following are living: Mrs. Alberta V. Orr, A. E., Mrs. Addie G. Snow, John F., Alonzo C., Alfred Z., Henry H., Robert H., and Minnie. He is an ardent and active member of the masonic fraternity, of forty years' standing, and has been a member of the Baptist church since 1851, of which he has been a deacon since 1860, and treasurer of the Western Baptist association for the past seventeen years.

HENRY COUNTY.

HENRY J. COPELAND. This is the name of one of the oldest and most respected of southern families. The family is of English origin, the great-grandfather of the younger generation having come from England and settled in South Carolina. W. M. Copeland, now residing in McDonough, Henry Co., Ga., was born Feb. 18, 1823, in Laurens district, S. C., and is the son of William and Nancy (Bryan) Copeland. The Bryans were of Irish descent, and were also from South Carolina, where the grandparents lived during the revolutionary war. William and Nancy Copeland, with a small family, came to Henry county, Ga., in 1826, where they settled about seven miles east of McDonough, one of his sons now residing on the plantation. They passed their days in Henry county, both living to a good old age, the father being eighty-nine and the mother eighty years of age at the time of their death. Although not possessed of great wealth, they made a very comfortable living, and had plenty of the good things of life. In politics Mr. Copeland was a whig, and a Baptist in religious belief. W. M. Copeland has passed his life in Henry county as a farmer. During the war he was one of Joe Brown's "pets," and served faithfully at the siege of Atlanta, and also at Savannah. Jan. 20, 1848, Mr. Copeland was married to Miss Mary A., daughter of William and Mary Green, the Green family also being one of the early ones of Henry county. To this marriage were born three children: Henry J., merchant, McDonough; Mary J., Mrs. J. T. Fields, Henry county; and W. G., at home. Henry J. was born March 18, 1849. His first business venture was made at Conyers in 1870. This lasted about a year. From that time until 1880, he clerked and farmed alternately. In that year he went into the mercantile business for himself at Hampton. On the building of the E. T., Va. & Ga. railroad through McDonough, he removed his stock to the latter place, where he has since continued to do a successful and thriving business. He carries an average stock of $6,000, and does a safe and constantly increasing business, which, together with his ginnery and farm, gives him little time for leisure. He married in Rockdale county, Jan. 16, 1873, to Miss Emma V., daughter of John E. and Mary Reagan, and is the father of seven interesting children: Edward M., Arthur G., Henry W., Zachary W., Lila M., Annie Lou and Frank M. Like other former Copelands, he is a Baptist in faith, and a democrat in politics.

WILLIAM N. NELSON, ordinary of Henry county, McDonough, Ga., is the son of Perry and Martha (McGough) Nelson, and was born in Greene county, Ga., Aug. 17, 1822. His grandfather, Taylor Nelson, who was of Welsh descent, lived in Maryland, and was a private in the revolutionary war. Soon after the close of the war he moved to Hancock county, Ga., where he lived for a period of years, and from thence to Morgan county, where he died at an advanced age. The father, Perry Nelson, was born in Hancock county in 1792, and was married in Greene county in 1821, to Miss Martha McGough, whose family were South Carolinians. Of Irish descent, her father, John McGough, immigrated together with his father, mother, brothers and sisters, from Ireland to America and settled in South Carolina, Abbeville district, when he (John) was only ten years old. A large family of Carsons came over to America in the same ship. John McGough married Miss Elizabeth Carson, the grandmother of Mr. William N. Nelson. To their marriage were born three sons and three daughters: William N., the subject of this sketch; Joseph F., planter, Taliaferro county; James A. C., planter, Putnam county; Mary and Martha, who were twins, the latter deceased and the former Mrs. John Andrews, of Butts county; Margaret E., (Mrs. Fred S. Stewart, of Atlanta, deceased). The mother died in 1878 at the age of eighty years, and the father in the same year, aged seventy-eight. He was a farmer by occupation, a Baptist in faith and an old-time democrat. He was an old veteran, having been a soldier in the war of 1812. William N. Nelson was reared to manhood in Greene county. Acquiring a common school education, he began teaching school in 1845, and taught without interruption until 1875 in the counties of Greene, Hancock, Butts, Spalding and Henry. After being a teacher for thirty years he decided to change his occupation to that of farming, which he carried on successfully until 1886, when he was elected county ordinary. Being exempted from the regular service during the late war on account of his occupation, he yet found time and inclination to do something for the cause, and in 1864 became one of Joe Brown's "pets." He married in Butts county, Oct. 31, 1847, Miss Martha, daughter of Thomas and Nancy McGough, and became the father of the following children: Laura A., Mrs. G. D. Brown, Henry county; Emma C., Mrs. McN. Moore, deceased; Cora, unmarried; Mattie Lenora, Mrs. O. S. Moore, Morton, Miss.; Ida, Mrs. J. F. M. Fields, Greenwood, Ga.; Geneva, Mrs. McN. Moore, Morton, Miss.; William D., McDonough, clerk in his father's office, and Mary Clyde, unmarried. For many years a member of the Baptist church, and a most successful teacher in the schools of the county where he lives, he has well-earned the high regard in which he is held by former pupils and friends. Twice he has been elected to public office, first as school commissioner and then to the office of ordinary, which he now holds, and for which important position a better or more competent man could not have been chosen. In politics a democrat of the old school, he has lived to see many changes in his state and national government.

Q. R. NOLAN. Twenty-eight miles southeast of Atlanta stands the town of McDonough, in Henry county, a name around which cluster memories of "ye olden time," when Atlanta was a waste place, and the pioneer and Indian roamed the woods together. It is the county seat of Henry county, one of the originals, and which has given birth to Fulton and several other lusty children which have long since distanced their progenitor in population and importance. With the advance of civilization old Henry county has lost many of her first families and yet there still remains much of the sturdy stock which made the county famous. Among the leading families of the present town of McDonough is the one whose name heads this sketch, and which has occupied an enviable position in the county for the past fifty years. Quinces R. Nolan, the deceased head of the family, was born in Morgan county, Ga., on Nov. 18, 1824, and died at McDonough Jan. 1, 1876. He was the son of Thomas Nolan and Miss Martha (Browder) Thrasher, and was reared on a plantation in the county of his birth. His literary education was obtained at Emory and Henry college, Va. Subsequently attending Yale college, he graduated in the law department in the same class with the late lamented Joseph E. Brown, between whom and Col. Nolan there existed a lifelong and intimate friendship. Soon after his return to Georgia Mr. Nolan located for the practice of his chosen profession in McDonough, then the most flourishing town in that part of the state, and where he continued an active member of the bar until his death. He soon established a fine reputation as a lawyer, being especially strong in administrative law, of which he was a thorough master. Mr. Nolan was an efficient public officer of Henry county for some fifteen years, having been elected ordinary in 1853, and retiring on account of ill health in 1868. In disposition he was quiet and unassuming, of fine personal habits, fond of his books and fireside, and never was happier than when in the bosom of his family. In politics he was an ardent whig, in faith a consistent Methodist, and was a Mason of royal arch degree, and a member of the fraternity of Odd Fellows. Mr. Nolan married the lady who still survives him, Miss Antoinette C. Campbell, at McDonough, on Jan. 28, 1849. She was the daughter of Col. James H. Campbell and Pernelia D. Lane. Col. Campbell was an ardent whig, a zealous Christian in the Methodist church, a royal arch Mason and was made brigadier-general just previous to his last illness. He was reared in Morgan county, but resided in Butts county, where he died in June, 1844. Mrs. Nolan's grandfather, George Campbell, was one of the revolutionary heroes, having served five years and nine months in that immortal struggle for independence. He was from Mecklenburg, N. C., and had settled in Morgan county in the colonial period. He was a Presbyterian of the old blue stocking variety, unbending in his integrity, and unswerving in his devotion to his church, which he served faithfully for sixty-five years as an elder. His abstemious habits, never having used liquor or tobacco in any form, contributed to the prolongation of his useful life, the advanced age of eighty-eight years having been reached before he laid down the cross. To this marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Nolan were born four sons: Thomas C., William M., Edgar Q., and John Q. Of these William M. and Edgar Q. died before maturity. Thomas C., the eldest, died at the age of forty-three. He was educated at Emory and Henry college, Virginia, and was a lawyer, having been a number of years before his demise in the employ of the E. T., Va. & Ga. R. R. In this branch of the law he had few equals and was rapidly rising to the very top of the profession. He left a wife (nee Annie M. Lemmon) and three children: Elizabeth, Annie and Quinces R. J. Q., the only living child, was educated at Emory college, Oxford, Ga., where he graduated in 1874. For years he was the worthy representative of the E. T. Va. & Ga. R. R. at McDonough, but is now giving his attention to the cultivation of the Nolan estate. He married Miss Fannie Cochran, a talented and accomplished lady of Barnesville, Ga. Frank M., a bright lad of ten years, is their only son, and bids fair to realize the high standard of excellence attained by former members of the family, which has ever been noted for its oratorical gifts, its poetical genius and literary culture, having furnished from its ranks ministers, editors, orators, scholars and military heroes.

DANIEL W. SCOTT, the leading physician and surgeon of McDonough, Henry Co., Ga., is the eldest of a family of nine children of James and Mary (Thrasher) Scott, and was born in Newton county, Ga., Dec. 15, 1849. The family is of Scotch-Irish descent, dating their first connection with American institutions back to the days when old Virginia was a state unborn. The great-grandfather of Dr. Scott was named William, and in South Carolina married Jane Thomas, moved to Jasper county, Ga., in the early part of the century, is mentioned by White as one of the earliest and most prominent settlers of the county. After remaining here a number of years he removed to Monroe county, where he reared his family and died. He lies buried at Rogers' church. His wife died at a son's home near Talbotton, Ga., and was buried three miles west of that place. William and Jane Scott were the parents of twelve children, the doctor's grandfather being the second child. This gentleman married Jemima Walker, and passed his married existence in Newton county. He reared five sons and two daughters, all now deceased. Dr. Scott's father was the third son, and became a thrifty and prosperous planter of Newton county, where he passed his life. He was a man of retired disposition and habits, of fine moral character, a Baptist in faith and a democrat in politics. He died in 1883. The widow still lives on the old homestead and is the mother of the following children: Dr. Daniel W.; D. Barton, suffered death by a falling tree in 1880; Ophelia J., died unmarried, Aug. 20, 1894; Emma J., Mrs. Green Hull, Conyers, Ga.; James A., planter, Newton county; Lula, Mrs. D. C. Camp, Atlanta; William A., planter, Rockdale county; Mamie H., and Walter Lee, young people at home. Dr. Scott was educated at that superior school—the Conyers academy, and at the Atlanta Medical college, where he was graduated in March, 1875. Entered on the practice of his profession near Shady Dale, Jasper Co., whence, after two years, he removed to Peachstone Shoals, Henry Co. In 1882 he came to McDonough, where he now enjoys a large and constantly growing practice. Dr. Scott has few equals in the sick chamber. As a Christian gentleman of broad views and liberal spirit, he merits the patronage and respect of his numerous constituency. He is a Baptist in religious belief, and a democrat in politics, though he eschews the latter as much as possible. On Dec. 11, 1878, Dr. Scott was joined in wedlock to Miss Laura E. Sharp. This lady has the proud distinction of being able to trace her ancestry from the Mayflower, her paternal grandmother having been a Morton, well-known as one of the original Puritan families. She is a daughter of Henry T. and Caroline (Dulin) Sharp, and was born and reared in Newton county. To Dr. and Mrs. Scott have been born two bright and interesting children: Adiel Roscoe and Leila Bay.

CHARLES THORNTON ZACHRY. This is the name of a family whose members, though not numerous, have always been men and women of the highest character and noble impulses. Its introduction into America from Scotland was attended with circumstances of extreme hardship. The Zachry who landed in Maryland with a Rucker and a Smith, being the only three persons saved from their wrecked vessel. From this gentleman has sprung the American contingent of the family. Little is known of the early movements of the family, save that they were prominent agriculturists and intermarried with some of the best families of the colonies. It is recorded that a John Zachry, of South Carolina, married Mary Hay, a daughter of the famous Daniel Hay, who was killed while in Washington's service. From Maryland to the Carolinas, the name appeared from thence in Georgia after the revolutionary war, where Daniel Zachry, after a residence of uncertain period in Warren county, settled in Putnam county, where he reared a large and prosperous family. James B., one of the sons, after marrying Miss Olive Morton, removed to Newton county, where he spent the remainder of his life as a planter, dying at the age of seventy-two years. His wife outlived him four years, dying in 1876. They were the parents of twelve children: Thomas H., died while in the Mexican war; William, deceased; Daniel H., Jefferson, Texas; Col. C. T.; Mary L., deceased; John M., Atlanta; Alfred H., Bartow, Fla.; H. D., El Paso, Texas; L. H., also in Texas; Lucy, Mrs. W. G. Turner, Henry county; Carrie, deceased, and James B., Jr., deceased. Col. C. T. Zachry is the fourth son, and is the most prominent member of the family in his day. He was born in Newton county, Feb. 4, 1828, and in 1853 settled in Henry county, where he has since been a prominent and leading planter. Col. Zachry has been twice married. In 1852 he married Miss Frances A. Turner, who bore him two children, and died in the fall of 1861. James Greer, the son, is a prominent lawyer and capitalist of New York city, and the daughter, Nancy A., married C. W. McCally, of Atlanta, and died in 1892. The second marriage occurred in 1865, to Miss Elizabeth J. Russell, who still survives, the mother of four children: Glancey, who married T. P. Thompson, and is now a widow, living with her father; Clifford and Elizabeth T., accomplished unmarried daughters, and Mary V., Mrs. R. L. Howell, Sanford, Fla. Col. Zachry is a man of earnest convictions on all subjects, and has taken a leading part in politics during his lifetime. His democracy is unquestioned, yet having been reared a whig, it is of that conservative type which stands rather on principle than party. He has aided his party in the deliberations of many conventions, and has been called upon to bear its standard in several hard-fought contests. His first public service was as a delegate in the convention of 1865, where he voted cheerfully to return to the old Union, having deprecated leaving it in 1861. He served his county in the lower house during the sessions of 1880-81-82-83, where he did excellent service for the bill establishing the technological school and for educational questions in general. In 1890 he was honored with the senatorship of the thirty-fourth senatorial district, and served in the sessions of that and the following year. As chairman of the agricultural committee he introduced a bill, which passed with but few unimportant changes, settling what is known as the betterment question. Col. Zachry's title is not of the variety too common in states since the war, but was won by actual service on the battlefield. Although opposed to war in principle, he yielded to the inevitable and aided in raising a company for the maintenance of the position taken by his native state, of which he was elected captain. In the organization it was known as Company H, Twenty-seventh Georgia regiment, and did valiant service at Yorktown, Williamsburg, the seven days' fight around Richmond, second Manassas, Sharpsburg, and in many other of the most sanguinary battles of the war, some forty-five engagements in all. On the first organization of the regiment Col. Zachry was elected major, in which position he served till after the battle of Manassas, when he was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy. For gallant conduct on the bloody field of Sharpsburg he won his present title, which he held with honor till the close of the war. He was wounded four different times: at first, Cold Harbor; the Wilderness and Chancellorsville, slightly, and seriously at Sharpsburg, while leading his regiment in a bayonet charge on the Yankee left. It was at the battle of Olustee, in Florida, however, that Col. Zachry won his chief distinction, for when history is correctly written it will chronicle the fact that he was the real hero of that important and successful rout of the Federals. His scouts were the first to learn the close proximity of the enemy. Immediately informing Gen. Finnegan, troops were hurried to the front and a line of battle formed. These troops were for the most part raw recruits, who gave way at the first charge. Col. Zachry had been ordered to the extreme left, and had moved promptly to position, only to find that he was too far from the scene of action. Moving to the right he arrived just in time to witness the retirement of the provincials, who it is due to remark, might have behaved more creditably had they been furnished sufficiently with ammunition. Rallying them behind his battle-scarred veterans, he faced the advancing enemy and soon turned defeat into victory, driving the enemy ingloriously from the field. Col. Zachry accomplished this without the assistance or the orders of his superiors, all of which can be substantiated by undoubted testimony. The colonel has always modestly declined publication of these facts, but history is history only when correctly written, and they are given the prominence merited from having been so long buried. Col. Zachry is a Methodist in faith and a Mason. He is spending the closing years of his life in the cultivation of his large plantation, which lies ten miles northeast of McDonough, in Henry county. Col. Zachry was one among the first men in Georgia whose influence was used to establish the law known as the stock law, which has proven to be of such incalculable value to the farmers of the state of Georgia.

Its origin existed at the Livingston Agricultural club, in Newton county, of which Col. Zachry was a member, and was one of a committee of five appointed to investigate and report upon its practicability. By that committee he (Col. Zachry) was appointed a committee of one to visit a local section in Alabama, where the stock law had been in operation for a number of years, and report upon its utility. Henry was one of the first three counties in the state to adopt it.

HOUSTON COUNTY.

JOHN GREEN BROWN is the son of Dempsey Brown, who was a native of North Carolina. His grandfather, Samuel Brown, was of Scotch-Irish descent. He reared a family of four sons and two daughters, all of whom are deceased. Dempsey Brown, the third of these sons was born in 1801. When a young man he removed to Georgia and settled in Twiggs county. He began with small capital, but by energy and perseverance he soon attained success. His education was rather limited, though he was a natural mathematician, and considered one of the best of his day. In moral rectitude he was upright to sternness, and lived a life singularly free from guile of any kind. He married Miss Nancy Green and reared the following children: Mrs. Joseph Wimberly, Mrs. Dr. Bryant, Mrs. Felder, Mrs. Dr. Frank Walker, Mrs. B. M. Wyble of Americus, Ga., Mrs. J. R. Wimberly of Arkansas, Hon. Clay Brown of Griffin, Ga., and John Green Brown, the subject of this sketch, who was born in Twiggs county, Ga., Sept. 14, 1831. He was reared in Houston county, his parents moving to that county when he was only one year old. He received an excellent education, having been a student at La Grange, Ga., for several years. In 1854, Miss Smitha Tooke of Houston county became his wife. She became mother of two children: Glenmore Brown and Mrs. R. O. Pate of Hawkinsville, Ga. The mother died when quite a young woman. In February, 1871, Mr. Brown married Miss Cora Rutherford, and to them were born seven children, six of whom are living: Mrs. Luciny Polhill, John Green, Jr., Rutherford, Eugene, Dempsey and Mary, all of whom reside at home. In 1862 he enlisted in the Fifth Georgia regiment, Thomas' brigade, Hill's division, W. R. Davis being captain. After the first year he was transferred to the western army and remained there during the entire war. From the ranks he was promoted to lieutenant and finally to captain, in which position he gallantly led his company through many engagements. Mr. Brown is at present engaged in farming and merchandising—has a fine store and a farming interest which requires his entire attention. As a citizen of Houston, no man stands higher in the estimation of her people than John G. Brown.

L. F. CATER, a merchant of Perry, Ga., is the son of Thomas Johnson Cater, who was a native of South Carolina, and was born at Barnwell about the year 1825. While he was yet a boy the family moved to Georgia and located near Augusta on a plantation. When but fourteen years of age, he was employed as a clerk by Fort, Hamilton & Co., cotton merchants of Macon. Here he remained four years, when he formed a partnership with Edward Bowdrey, and they became engaged in the mercantile business in Macon. He continued in business ten years, meeting with the greatest success, financially. At this time, on account of impaired health, he removed to Houston county, and, after a residence there of three years, returned to Macon. During the war he again removed to Houston county, where he passed the remainder of his life. In 1867 he established the business now conducted by his son, L. F. Cater. His wife was Amelia Wimberly, of Jones county, and she became the mother of thirteen children, of whom there are living Catherine (Oliver), Alabama; F. S., merchant, of Macon; J. J., Forsyth; Ida A. (Rogers); Florence N. (Howard); Robert L., M. D., and L. F., merchant, all of Perry. The mother died in 1883, and the father survived her but a few years. A kind Christian gentleman, an active member of the M. E. church, and the leader in the county of the prohibition movement, he deserved the respect accorded him. Although a most thorough democrat, he was not an aspirant for political honors. Lewis Franklin Cater was born in Houston county Jan. 24, 1863. He has had the best of educational advantages, having attended the A. & M. college, of Auburn, Ala., and Emory college, of Oxford, Ga., and the business college of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. After his graduation he entered the store of his father, which he has since conducted, and of which he is now the proprietor. In August of 1889 he was united in marriage to Miss Helen Parks, a daughter of Wiley S. Parks, of Dawson, Ga. To this marriage have been born two children—Frank and Helen, the former deceased. Mr. Cater, like his father, is a stanch democrat. Following the custom of many merchants in country towns, Mr. Cater cultivates a plantation of some 1,200 acres. He is an active worker in the M. E. church, of which he is a steward, and as a business man and citizen, is most highly respected.

JOHN A. COFFEE, planter. Early in the history of America two brothers, surnamed Coffee, emigrated to this country from Ireland, and from them are descended the large family of that name. Tradition has it that each of these brothers had one son, who became famous during the Indian wars, and rose to the military rank of general. One of these, Gen. John Coffee, was a native of Hancock county, Ga., but later of Telfair county. He was a man of prominence, and was a member of the national house of representatives at the time of his death. As an instance of the extreme slowness of the distribution of news which prevailed in that early date of Georgia's history, is the fact that John Coffee was dead and buried when his election for a second term as congressman was announced; indeed, he was dead before the ballots electing him were cast. He married Miss Connelepy Bryan, who was a native of North Carolina. They reared John, Peter, Williams, Columbus, Jackson, Bryan, Sarah, and Susan. Of these there are living Jackson, in Florida, and Sarah, who married Gen. Mark Wilcox, and now resides in Dodge county, Ga. Peter Coffee, the father of John A., was born in 1813, in Hancock county, Ga. He was, however, reared on a plantation in Telfair county, and was the recipient of a common school education. At the death of his father he was in possession of some property, though the greater portion of his wealth was in slaves. He married Miss Susan Ann Rogers, a daughter of James A., of Telfair county, who was an early settler, very prominent, and was a member of the legislature. To this union there were born John A., Joshua, Susan, Peter, Columbus, Sarah, Penolape, Jackson and Baily; all save Baily are living. The mother of these children died in '62, and Peter married a Miss Shelton, who, with three children resulting from this union, resides in Florida. The father was a man of fine influence in Telfair, having acted as one of the justices of the inferior court for years. He was a Methodist by profession of faith, a master Mason, and in politics was a democrat. He died in 18—. Maj. John A. Coffee was born April 26, 1838, in Telfair county, and was there reared. When a young man he was possessed of small means, which he invested in a mercantile venture, which he continued until 1861, when he enlisted in a company known as the Telfair Volunteers, and was elected second lieutenant. This company became Company H, of the Twentieth Georgia regiment. In July, 1861, he was mustered into service at Richmond, Va., and fought in the Virginia army. He took part in numerous engagements, such as seven-days' fight at Richmond, second Manassas, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg and Chickamauga. At Fredericksburg, he was on Lee's right flank. On the night before the battle, December 13, he was the field officer of the day, and when alarm of battle was given, was complimented by Gen. Bannings for his promptness. After the battle he was promoted to captain, and at Gettysburg was made major of the Twentieth Georgia regiment. He was wounded in this battle by a rifle ball in the right leg, and was conveyed to the hospital, from which he was paroled and sent home. After his partial recovery he served with Maj. O. A. Bacon in the capacity of supervisor of the subsistence department. In 1864 the major married Miss Rebecca S. Daniell, a daughter of James Daniell, of Hawkinsville, Ga., and to that union there were born three children—Mrs. Dr. Slippy, of Twiggs county, sketch of whom appears elsewhere; and George and Mrs. W. W. Lemon, of Hawkinsville. The mother of these died May 4, 1873. The major's second union was to Miss Nannie C. Brown, of Houston county, a daughter of Stephen and Mary C. To this union have been born Cornelia R. and Eugenie, educated at Shorter college, Rome, Ga.; John A., Jr.; Helen, and Ethel. For some years Maj. Coffee was a merchant of Hawkinsville, but in 1876 he removed to his plantation, where he has since resided. He cultivates 1,500 acres of land, and devotes much attention to stock-raising. He is a member of the Methodist church and of the masonic fraternity.

JOE L. ELLIS, a native of Houston county and one of its leading citizens, was born Dec. 16, 1837. His parents were poor and he had little opportunity for acquiring an education. His youth was spent in hard labor, but by honesty and perseverance he has risen to comfortable circumstances. He owns 1,800 acres of the finest land in Houston county. He has had many misfortunes to contend with, one of which was the destruction of all his buildings by fire in 1888. But, as he had overcome other difficulties, so he arose above this misfortune, and thus justly merits his well-earned reputation as a progressive citizen and untiring worker. In 1862 Mr. Ellis enlisted in the Forty-fifth Georgia infantry and served until the close of the war. He participated in the battles of the Wilderness, where he was seriously wounded. He was also at Chancellorsville, second Manassas, and in many minor engagements. Mr. Ellis married Miss Catherine Daniel, of Houston county, who was well known and highly respected. To this marriage have been born five children, four of whom are living—Dora, Mrs. Brown Pitts, of Florida; Stonewall; Mattie, and Mary. Together with these children, Mr. and Mrs. Ellis are enjoying the competency he has acquired, and live happily in the esteem of a large circle of neighbors and acquaintances.

J. M. GRAY.—The Hon. J. M. Gray was born in Crawford county, Ga., Feb. 11, 1842. When but a boy he enlisted in the Confederate service as a member of Company C, Sixth Georgia volunteers, under Capt. Anderson. He participated in all the more important engagements of the war in Virginia, Maryland and Florida. On May 31, 1862, he was wounded by a rifle ball in the lower left limb, and the flesh retains to-day the "leaden messenger." Near the close of the war he was captured at Bentonville, N. C., and confined at Johnson's island, Ohio, where he remained a prisoner until the surrender. In June of 1865 he returned to Fort Valley, having for four years and one month battled bravely for the undying principles of the Confederacy. Upon his return he at once directed his attention to agriculture, beginning with no capital and on a very small scale. In 1872 he became engaged in the mercantile business, having previously been identified with railroad interests. The following year the present house of Gray

Bros. was formed, and their success has been phenomenal. They now conduct the largest establishment between Macon and Americus. A member of the state legislature in 1882, he served on several committees, chief of which was the railroad commission, of which he was chairman. Since the expiration of his term he has devoted his time and attention to farming and mercantile pursuits. Mr. Gray married a Miss Love, of Effingham county, Ga. To them was born but one child, Charles, who is a resident of Fort Valley. In 1867 the mother died. After a period a second marriage was solemnized, the lady, Mrs. Kelly, being a native of Talbot county, Ga. But two children have been born to this union, Annie, Mrs. Charles D. Hurt, Atlanta, and Belle, who resides with her parents. Mr. Gray is a thorough democrat, and for six years has done good service as chairman of the board of county school commissioners. He and his wife are members of the Baptist church. The Grays are of Scotch descent, the family being among the earliest settlers of what is now Wilkinson county, then the abode of the red man. Peter Gray, the father of J. M. Gray, was born in the above named county and when he was but a boy the family moved to Crawford county, locating on the Flint river. Here on his father's plantation Peter grew to manhood. The usual inheritance from Scotch ancestry, thrift and industry, gave him precedence, and many a rich planter in the early days of the present century entrusted to him their entire farming interests. He married Miss Winifred, a daughter of one of Putnam county's earliest and foremost citizens. To this union three boys were born: William C., who was a member of Company C, Sixth Georgia regiment, who was wounded and died at Richmond; C. G., a sketch of whom appears elsewhere; and Jefferson M., subject of this sketch. The father of these boys was a man of strong convictions, and did not hesitate to condemn wrong under any circumstances. He was a devout Methodist and always jealous of his religious principles. He died in 1883, his wife having preceded him in 1879, and they lie buried in Fort Valley's beautiful cemetery.

CAPT. JOHN A. HOUSER was born in South Carolina on Aug. 1, 1827, and was there reared. He acquired a collegiate education, having been graduated from the South Carolina Military academy in 1850. During the following year (1851) he located himself in Houston county, Ga., where he became a teacher in the schools of that county. In 1852 he engaged in farming and continued plying that vocation for some five years, when he engaged in mercantile pursuits in Perry, Ga. He immediately became identified with the interests of the community in which he dwelt, and the opening of the late war found him captain of a volunteer company which was of the Southern Rights guard. The individual wealth of Capt. Houser's company represented more than a million of dollars, and the equipment of the company was the finest obtainable. At the first call for volunteers this company was first to tender their services, a distinction of which they may well be proud. The company was detailed to Pensacola, Fla., and served there four months, then was transferred to northwest Virginia, under Gen. Stonewall Jackson. They were in many dangerous and perilous engagements and exploits, and acquitted themselves under Capt. Houser's leadership in a most creditable manner. Capt. Houser happily received no wounds, though shot through the clothing upon one occasion. At the close of the war the captain returned to Fort Valley and began anew, and by enterprise, energy and judicious investments he has become not only wealthy in point of finance, but enjoys the esteem and respect of a wide circle of friends. He married in 1851 Miss Elizabeth A. Jones, a native of Charleston, S. C., and to them have been born the following children: Edward J., deceased; Franklin C.; Julia J. Reese, of Thomasville, Ga.; Nettie L. (Mrs. A. B. Green), of Fort Valley; Lizzie Kate, deceased. Capt. Houser has been a lifelong democrat and while not aspiring to political prominence he has been the mayor of Fort Valley for a number of years, and has done a vast amount of good for the little city. At present he is one of its largest property holders, and has a large amount of capital invested in other interests. Both the captain and his wife are members of the Methodist church. The Houser family history may be briefly stated as follows: Andrew Houser, a native of Germany, moved to America in 1739 and located in South Carolina, where he made for himself a most successful career, and this without capital or other advantages in commencement. During the revolution he was a brave and gallant patriot under Gen. Marion. He reared a family of seven children, of whom at the date of this writing (1894) there is but one living, and he, Peter M., is a venerable and esteemed resident of South Carolina. Andrew Houser lived to the advanced age of eighty-two. His success was due entirely to his own industry and thrift. David Houser, the son of Andrew, was born in 1798 in South Carolina, in which state his entire career was passed. He was a man of good education and superior mental poise and for a number of years represented his district in the state legislature, and for more than forty years was secretary and treasurer of the local board of county commissioners. Both he and his wife were devoted Christians and members of the Methodist church. His vocation was that of a planter. He married Miss Ann Louisa Felder, a member of an old and prominent South Carolina family, and to them were born thirteen children, the names of whom are: David H., Ann L., John A., Caroline, Madison, Felder, Andrew, William, Mary, Martha, Ellen, Lewis, and one not named. Of the above there is but one living, Capt. John A. The father of these died in 1876, and the mother in 1863.

DR. JOSEPH PALMER, ordinary of Houston county, Ga. The family of which this gentleman is a member was promulgated in America by one Thomas Palmer, who emigrated to the colonies in 1685. He married Sarah Saunders and reared three sons, Thomas, John, and Peter. Of these John married Marianne Gendron, who was the daughter of John Gendron and Elizabeth Mazyeh, and granddaughter of Philip Gendron, a native of England. A son of this marriage, John Palmer, married Mary Mayham, daughter of Col. Hezekiah Mayham, who was colonel of the second regiment of South Carolina cavalry during the war for independence. John Gendron Palmer, their son, was senior captain in the First regiment of South Carolina cavalry—McDonald's—during the same war. He married Ann Cahnsac. This lady bore a son, Joseph, who upon arriving at maturity became connected by marriage with the famous Marion family of South Carolina, his wife being Elizabeth Porcher, a daughter of Benjamin, eldest brother of Gen. Francis Marion, of immortal revolutionary memory. This couple were the grandparents of Dr. Joseph Palmer of Perry, whose father, John Gendron Palmer, married Catherine Conturier Marion, daughter of Francis Marion Dwight, the adopted son and grandnephew of Gen. Francis Marion, whose mother was Christiana Broughton, daughter of Gov. Broughton and granddaughter of Sir Nathaniel Johnson. Dr. Joseph Palmer was born July 10, 1835, in Pineville, S. C. He was reared in and about Charleston, and was graduated from the military academy of that city. Selecting medicine as his profession he took two courses of lectures in the South Carolina college and one course in the Jefferson Medical college in Philadelphia, and a hospital course in the Bellevue hospital of New York. He completed his medical studies in 1858 and immediately located in Perry, Houston Co., where he has since resided, actively and successfully engaging in practice until his election to his present position in 1892. Dr. Palmer, as a South Carolinian, early became impatient of northern interference with the south, and having had military training was one of the first to begin active preparations for the conflict. In January, 1861, the Southern Rights guards, one of the volunteer companies of the state of which he was first lieutenant, offered their services to Gov. Brown under his call for twelve months troops and were mustered into service on March 18, 1861, at Macon, Ga. They were ordered to Pensacola, Fla., April 1, 1861, when after six weeks' service they were ordered to Richmond, Va., and were assigned to Gen. Garnet's command and then stationed at Laurel Hill in northwest Virginia. After the defeat of Col. Pegram at Rich Mountain, Gen. Garnet was forced to retreat from his position at Laurel Hill, Liuet. Palmer was placed in command of his army, which position he held on the whole retreat. He was promoted adjutant of the regiment in December, 1861, holding his position until April, 1862, when the regiment was mustered out of service—its time having expired. Upon returning home the majority of the company organized the Southern Rights battery, of which he was elected captain. With this battery he joined Bragg in his Kentucky campaign. At the battle of Perryville he was made major for gallant conduct. After Bragg's retreat from Kentucky he was assigned to Gen. Morgan's command in December, 1862, and went on the famous 1,000-mile raid through Kentucky, in which they fought nine fights, paroled 4,000 prisoners, destroyed the railroad from Munfordsville, Ky., to within seventeen miles of Louisville, and reaching McMinnville, Tenn., in safety, after having traveled 1,000 miles in fifteen days. For gallantry at the battle of Elizabethtown, Gen. Morgan presented Dr. Palmer with a sword captured from Col. Smith, a Federal commanding officer. On the return of Morgan, Maj. Palmer was ordered by Gen. Bragg to organize the battalion of reserve artillery, which position he held until the return of the army of Tennessee to North Carolina. He was the senior artillery officer of the army of Tennessee. After the battle of Bentonville he was ordered with his regiment to Danville, Va., to guard Gen. Lee's rear and supplies. After Lee's surrender he held Danville till Gen. Johnston got his army out of Raleigh; then rejoined Gen. Johnston at Greensboro, N. C., having had the honor of commanding the first and last rear guard of the Confederate army east of the Mississippi. Dr. Palmer first married in 1864, Miss Mary Lewis, daughter of Curtis Lewis of Griffin, Ga. Seven children blessed that marriage: Curtis L.; John G.; Kate Marion, now Mrs. John F. Logan; Joseph; Frances Dwight; Mary L.; and Nat H. Only three children, Mrs. Logan, Joseph and Frank, survive their mother, who died in April, 1880. In 1887 Dr. Palmer married Miss Florence Hill, daughter of Judge J. A. Hill and Maria Holt. The children born to this union are Maria Holt, James Hill, Lila Legare, Ellison Capers and Florence Hill. Dr. Palmer is a Methodist, a Mason and a staunch, useful and faithful citizen of Houston for so long a period that he is revered as is, possibly, no other. His popularity is boundless and his friends numberless.

A. C. RILEY. A family of widely-scattered connections by inter-marriages, and of no inconsiderable note throughout Georgia and the south, is that of Riley, of Welsh-Dutch extraction, a branch of which was among the early settlers of Houston county, Ga. Alonzo Church Riley, judge of the county court, Perry, Houston Co., Ga., son of George Samuel and Caroline Catharine (Wade) Riley, was born in Perry, May 17, 1856. His great-great-grandparents were Wm. and Mary (Whetstone) Guisentine—she being of Welsh lineage. To them one child, Mary, was born, who married John Goolsen, a Welshman. They had one child, also named Mary, who married Jacob Riley, the grandfather of Judge A. C. Riley, who had the following brothers and sisters: John, George, Christian, Daniel, David, Nancy, and Mary. To Jacob and Mary (Goolsen) Riley nine children were born: John, Mary, Caroline Rebecca, Sarah, Frances, Cornelia, Jacob, Annie and George Samuel. John married a Miss Tison, who are not known to have had any children; Mary married Absalom Marshall, by whom she had four children: Cornelius, Charles, Carrie and William; Caroline Rebecca married John C. Staley, and to them eight children were born: George, Willie, Irene, Edmund, John, Robert, Emma and Mary; Sarah married first Ezekiel Coney, by whom she had four children: Cornelia, Emma, Eva and Frank, and for her second husband she married Cornelius Boozman, by whom she had one son, John; Frances married Dr. W. W. Hovis, of Perry, but they had no children; Jacob married Miss Elizabeth Brown, by whom he had three children: George, Brown and Winnie; Annie married Murdock Wilcox, and to them three children were born: Lewis, Mary and Thomas; George Samuel, the youngest child of Jacob and Mary (Goolsen) Riley, and Judge Riley's father, was born in Orangeburg district, S. C., March 7, 1829, where he received his preparatory education and then entered the university of Georgia, whence he was graduated with the first in the class of 1849. After his graduation he studied law, was admitted to the bar, located and entered upon the practice of law in Perry in 1852. In January, 1856, he was elected ordinary of Houston county, but his tenure of the office was brief, as he died on May 17 following. Judge Riley's father was married Dec. 10, 1850, to Miss Caroline Catharine, daughter of Rev. D. F. and Catharine E. (Treutlen) Wade. To Mr. and Mrs. Wade three children were born: Caroline Catharine, born Jan. 16, 1828; Margaret Amanda, born Jan. 15, 1830, and John Daniel, born May 13, 1834. Rev. Daniel F. Wade died Feb. 8, 1858, aged about fifty-seven years. His widow died May 24, 1864, in the fifty-seventh year of her age. Judge Riley's grandfather on his mother's side was J. A. Treutlen, the first governor of Georgia elected under the first constitution that was adopted in 1777. Gov. Treutlen had been conspicuously active and daringly aggressive before and during the revolutionary war. After the British regained Savannah he fell into the hands of the tories, who, it is related, murdered him and in the presence of his family chopped his body to pieces and then sent the pieces to their sympathizers. Judge Riley's parents had two children: Georgia Caroline, born Feb. 7, 1852, who was married to Edward Patterson, then of Eufalia, Ala., now of Gainesville, Ga., and who is the mother of two girls: Marion, born March 19, 1877, and Carrie Elizabeth, born Sept. 12, 1882, and Alonzo Church Riley, the subject of this sketch. His mother and sister were graduated by Wesleyan Female college, Macon, and it is a coincidence that he mentions with justifiable pride that they graduated with the first honors of their classes. After the death of his father, which occurred when he was only eight months old, Judge Riley's mother went to her father's home in Macon county, Ga., and after remaining there two years removed to Fort Valley, where his boyhood days were passed until 1865, where he attended school and the academy of which Rev. T. B. Russell was principal, and his mother taught a private school, and assisted in the female seminary. In 1871 his mother went with her children to his uncle, John D. Wade, a physician at Winchester, Macon Co., who soon afterward was burned out, and both families lost nearly all they possessed. Having prepared himself, Judge Riley entered the university of Georgia, from which he was graduated in 1877; during his college course he received the senior medal for the best debater in the Demosthenian society, and graduated with the degree of A. B. After his graduation he taught school first in Hayneville, Houston Co., then in Alabama. Returning to Hayneville he taught about six months, then went to his Uncle John Wade's and boarded, while he read law under Judge Samuel Hale while he was spending his summer at Fort Valley, walking to Fort Valley twice a week. He was afterward admitted to the bar at Crawford superior court, Judge Charles F. Crisp, now speaker of the United States house of representatives, and at once, without a dollar, commenced the practice at Fort Valley. In 1882 he was elected mayor of the city.

served one term, then went to Macon, but after an experience of eighteen months moved back to Fort Valley. He was again elected mayor, but resigned to accept the appointment of county judge, tendered him by Gov. Gordon, for the unexpired term of Judge A. L. Miller, who had been appointed judge of the superior court. On the expiration of his term he was reappointed by Gov. Northen, and is now acceptably discharging the duties of the office. Since his appointment he has made his home in Perry. Judge Riley was married Jan. 19, 1881, to Miss Lula A. Frederick, of Marshallville, an old schoolmate, and to them these children have been born: Alice Tomlinson, born Nov. 16, 1881, died Jan. 31, 1882; Carrie Elise, born April 28, 1883; Alonzo Church, Jr., born June 28, 1885; Eugenia, born Dec. 20, 1887; Frederick Treutlen, born Feb. 28, 1889; Gladys, born Jan. 11, 1891, and Howard Wade, born June 10, 1893.

EZEKIEL H. WIMBERLY. John Wimberly, the grandfather of the gentleman whose name heads this sketch, was a native of Virginia, and in manhood emigrated to North Carolina, where he died at the age of seventy-five. His children, all of whom became prominent men, were: Abner, Ezekiel, Perry, Lewis, John, William, Fred, James and Henry, and one daughter, Clorie, who married Mr. Watson, of South Carolina. Henry, the ninth son, father of Ezekiel H., was born in North Carolina in 1800. When a youth he moved to Bibb county, Ga., and became a planter of moderate means, and married Nancy O. Childers, of Washington county, Ga., formerly of North Carolina. He became the father of eight children, of whom there are now living: Ezekiel H., Sarah, widow of Benjamin A. Hudson, and Martha, wife of Richard R. Williams. He became a resident of Houston county in 1828, was a whig in politics, and was ready at all times to defend his principles in a solidly democratic community. His death occurred in 1840 and that of his wife in 1866. He was among the most substantial citizens of his county and a man of wide popularity. Ezekiel H. was born in Bibb county, Ga., Aug. 20, 1824. Soon after his birth the family moved to Houston county, where he was reared and received such education as was obtainable in the old-fashioned log school houses of that day, with their uncomfortable benches and high platforms and cast-iron rules. Feb. 12, 1845, he married Mary E., daughter of James Pope, and to them were born five children: Henry, James, John, Mattie and Mary. The mother of these children died June 9, 1858. During the war he was assigned the most difficult and dangerous task of conveying supplies to the army. His son Henry enlisted in the Confederate service when but sixteen years of age, and was a member of the Southern Rights guards. He died at the hospital in Madison, Ga., in 1864. The present wife of Mr. Wimberly was Miss Lucy E., daughter of Rev. Y. F. Tignen, of south Georgia conference, to whom he was married April 26, 1860. She is the mother of five children: Fletcher, Lee, William, Oliver and Ezekiel H., Jr. Only two are living—Lee, wife of J. F. Coney, Hawkinsville, Ga., and Ezekiel H., Jr., a promising young man at home, farming and merchandising at Hayneville, Ga. He promises a bright future. The above presents a brief history of one of Houston's very best families. Ezekiel H., the present worthy representative, and familiarly known as "Uncle Zeke," lives in a country home, typical of ante-bellum days, where the latch string is always out, and where good cheer prevails to an extent truly grateful in these modern times. His plantation consists of 800 acres of land, which, under the supervision of himself, are made to yield the most abundant harvest. Mr. Wimberly possesses in a flattering degree the respect of a large circle of friends whom he delights to entertain with the hospitality of a southern gentleman of the old school.
